THE HISTORIE OF THE WORLD

THE PREFACE.

HOw confit and how vnworthy a choice I haue made of my selfe, to vndertake a worke of this nature, mine owne reason, though exceeding weake, hath sufficiently resolued mee. For had it beene begotten then with my first knowne of day, when the light of common knowledge began to open it selfe to my yonguer yeares, and before any wound received, either from Fortune or Time: I might yet well haue doubted, that the darknesse of Age and Death would haue couered ouer both it and Mee, long before the performance. For, beginning with the Creation, I haue proceeded with the History of the World, and lastly purposed (some few sallies excepted) to confine my Discourse, with this our renowned Iland of Great Brittaine. I confesse that it had better sorted with my disability, the better part of whose times are run out in other trauailes, to haue set together (as I could) the vnioynted and scattered frame of our English affaires, than of the Vniuersall: in whom, had there bin no other defect (who am all defect) than the time of the day, it were enough, the day of a tempestuous life, drawne on to the very euening ere I began. But those vnmoist, and soule-piercing wounds, which are euer aking, while vncured: with the desire to satisfie those few friends, which I haue tryed by the fire of Aduersity, the former enforcing, the latter perswading, haue caused mee to make my thoughes legible, and my selfe the subiect of euery opinion, wise or weake.

To the World I present them, to which I am nothing indebted: neither haue others that were, (Fortune changing) sped much better in any age. For Prosperity and Aduersity haue euermore tyed and vnty'd vulgar affections. And as we see it in experience, That dogs doe alwaies barke at those they know not, and that it is their nature to accompany one another in those clamours: so it is with the inconsiderate multitude, who, wanting that vertue which we call Honesty in all men, and that especiall gift of GOD which we call Charity in Christian men, condemne without hearing, and wound without offence giuen: led thereunto by vncertaine report only; which his Maiesty truely acknowledgeth for the Author of all lies. Blame no man (saith Syracides) before thou haue enquired the matter: vnderstand first, and then reforme righteously. Rumor, res sine teste, sine iudice, maligna, fallax; Rumor is without witnesse, without iudge, malicious and deceiueable. This vanity of vulgar opinion it was, that gaue Saint Augustine argument to affirme, That he feared the praise of good men, and desired that of the euill. And herein no man hath giuen a better rule, than this of Seneca: Conscientiæ satisfaciamus: nihil in famam laboremus, sequatur fama, dum bene audearis. Let us satisfie our owne consciences, and not trouble our ſelues with fame: bee it neuer ſo ill, it is to be deſpiſed ſo we deſerue well.

For my ſelfe, if I haue in any thing ſerued my Country, and prized it before my priuate: the generall acceptation can yeeld me no other profit at this time than doth a faire Sunſhine day to a Sea-man after ſhipwrack; & the contrary no other harm, than an outragious tempeſt after the Port attained. I know that I loſt the loue of many, for my fidelity towards Her, whom I muſt ſtill honour in the duſt; though further than the defence of her excellent perſon, I neuer perſecuted any man. Of thoſe that did it, and by what deuice they did it, He that is the Supreame Iudge of all the world, hath taken the accompt: ſo as for this kinde of ſuffering, I muſt ſay with Seneca, Mala opinio, bene parta, delectat.

As for other men; if there be any that haue made themſelues Fathers of that fame, which hath been begotten for them: I can neyther enuy at ſuch their purchaſed glory, nor much lament mine owne miſhap in that kind; but content my ſelfe to ſay with Virgil, Sic vos non vobis, in many particulars. To labour other ſatisfaction, were an effect of phrenzy, not of hope: ſeeing it is not Truth, but Opinion, that can trauell the World without a paſs-port. For were it otherwiſe; and were there not as many internall formes of the minde, as there are externall figures of men; there were then ſome poſsibility to perſwade by the mouth of one Aduocate, euen Equity alone.

But ſuch is the multiplying & extenſiue vertue of dead Earth, & of that breath-giuing life which God hath caſt vpon ſlime & duſt, as that among thoſe that were, of whom we read and heare, & among thoſe that are, whom we ſee & conuerſe with; euery one hath receiued a ſeuerall picture of face, & euery one a diuers picture of minde; euery one a forme apart, euery one a fancy & cogitation differing: there being nothing wherin Nature ſo much triumpheth as in diſsimilitude. From whence it commeth that there is found ſo great diuerſity of opinions; ſo ſtrong a contrariety of inclinations; ſo many natural & vnnatural; wiſe, fooliſh, manly, & childiſh affections and paſsions in mortall men. For it is not the viſible faſhion and ſhape of plants, and of reaſonable Creatures, that makes the difference of working in the one, and of condition in the other; but the forme internall.

And though it hath pleaſed God to reſerue the Art of reading mens thoughts to himſelfe: yet, as the fruit tels the name of the Tree; ſo do the outward works of men (ſo far as their cogitatiõs are acted) giue vs wherof to gheſs at the reſt. Nay, it were not hard to expreſſe the one by the other, very neere the life: did not craft in many, feare in the moſt, and the worlds loue in all, teach euery capacity, according to the compaſſe it hath, to qualifie and maske ouer their inward deformities for a time. Though it be alſo true, Nemo poteſt diu perſonam ferre fictam: citò in naturam ſuam reſidunt, quibus veritas non ſubeſt. No man can long continue masked in a counterfeit behauiour: the things that are forced for pretences hauing no ground of truth, cannot long diſſemble their own natures. Neither can any man (ſaith Plutarch*) ſo change himſelfe, but that his heart may bee ſometimes ſeene at his tongues end.*

In this great diſcord and diſsimilitude of reaſonable Creatures, if we direct our ſelues to the Multitude; Omnis honeſtæ rei malus iudex eſt vulgus: The common people are euill Iudges of honeſt things, and whoſe Wiſedome (ſaith Eccleſiaſtes) is to be deſpiſed; if to the better ſort, euery vnderſtanding hath a peculiar iudgement, by which it both censureth other men, & valueth it self. And therefore vnto me it will not seeme strange, though I finde these my worthlesse papers torne with Rats: seeing the slothfull Censurers of all ages haue not spared to taxe the Reuerend Fathers of the Church, with Ambition, the seuerest men to themselues, with Hypocrisie, the greatest louers of Iustice, with Popularity, and those of the truest valour and fortitude, with vaine-glory. But of these natures which lie in wait to finde fault, and to turne good into euill, seeing Salomon complained long since: & that the very age of the world renders it euery day after other more malicious; I must leaue the professors to their easie waies of reprehension, than which there is nothing of more facility. Eccl.c.11. Nihil facilius, quam reprehendere alium.

To me it belongs in the first part of this Preface, following the common & approued custome of those, who haue left the memories of time past to after ages, to giue, as neare as I can, the same right to History which they haue done. Yet seeing therein I should but borrow other mens words; I wil not trouble the Reader with the repetition. True it is that among many other benefits for which it hath bin honoured; in this one it triumpheth ouer all humane knowledge, That it hath giuen vs life in our vnderstanding, since the world it selfe had life & beginning, euen to this day: yea, it hath triumphed ouer time, which besides it nothing but eternity hath triumphed ouer: for it hath carried our knowledge ouer the vast and deuouring space of many thousands of yeares, & giuen so faire & piercing eies to our minde; that wee plainly behold liuing now (as if we had liued then) that great world, Magni Dei sapiens opus, the wise work (saith Hermes) of a great GOD, as it was then, when but new to it selfe. By it (I say) it is, that we liue in the very time when it was created: we behold how it was gouerned: how it was couered with waters, and againe repeopled: How Kings and Kingdomes haue flourished and fallen, and for what vertue and piety God made prosperous; and for what vice and deformity he made wretched, both the one and the other. And it is not the least debt which we owe vnto History, that it hath made vs acquainted with our dead Auncestors; and, out of the depth and darknesse of the earth, deliuered vs their memory and fame. In a word, wee may gather out of History a policy no lesse wise than eternall; by the comparison and application of other mens fore-passed miseries with our owne like errours & ill deseruings. But it is neither of Examples the most liuely instruction, nor the words of the wisest men, nor the terror of future torments; that hath yet so wrought in our blind and stupified mindes; as to make vs remember, That the infinite eye and wisedome of God doth pierce through all our pretences; as to make vs remember, That the iustice of God doth require none other accuser, than our owne consciences: which neither the false beauty of our apparent actions, nor all the formality, which (to pacifie the opinions of men) we put on; can in any, or the least kind, couer from his knowledge. And so much did that heathen wisedome confesse, no way as yet qualified by the knowledge of a true God. If any (saith Euripides) hauing in his life committed wickednesse, thinke hee can hide it from the euerlasting gods, he thinkes not well.

To repeat GODS iudgements in particular, vpon those of all degrees, which haue plaied with his mercies; would require a volume apart: for the Sea of examples hath no bottome. The markes, set on priuate men, are with their bodies cast into the earth; and their fortunes, written onely in the memories of those that liued with them: so as they who succeed, and haue not seene the fall of others, do not feare their owne faules: GOD sendeth not vpon the greater or greateſt haue beene left to poſterity; firſt, by thoſe happy hands which the Holy Ghoſt hath guided, and ſecondly, by their venture, who haue gathered the acts and ends of men, moſt ſtrange and remarkeable in the world. Now to poynt farre off, and to ſpeake of the conuerſion of Angells into Deuills, for Ambition: Or of the greateſt and moſt glorious Kings, who haue ſowne the graſſe of the earth with beaſts, for pride and diſdaine towards GOD: Or of that wiſe working of Pharaoh, when he ſlue the Infants of Iſrael, ere they had recouered their cradles: Or of the policy of Iezabel, in couering the murder of Naboth by a tryall of the Elders, according to the Law, with many thouſands of the like: what were it other, than to make an hopeleſſe proofe, that farre-off examples would not be left to the ſame farre-off reſpects, as heretofore? For who hath not obſerued, what labour, practice, perill, bloudſhed, and cruelty, the Kings and Princes of the world haue vndergone, exerciſed, taken on them, and committed, to make themſelues and their iſſues maſters of the world? And yet hath Babylon, Perſia, Egypt, Syria, Macedon, Carthago, Rome, & the reſt, no fruit, no flower, graſſ, nor leaf, ſpringing vpon the face of the earth, of thoſe ſeeds: No, their very roots & ruines do hardly remaine. Omnia quæ manu hominum facta ſunt, vel manu hominum euertuntur, vel ſtando & durando deficiunt: All that the hand of man can make, is eyther ouerturnd by the hand of man, or at length by ſtanding and continuing conſumed. The reaſons of whoſe ruines, are diuerſly giuen by thoſe that ground their opinions on ſecond cauſes. All Kingdomes & States haue fallen (ſay the Politicians) by outward & forrain force, or by inward negligence & diſſenſion, or by a third cauſe ariſing from both. Others obſerue, That the greateſt haue ſunk downe vnder their own weight; of which Liuie hath a touch: eo crevit, vt magnitudine laboret ſua: Others, That the diuine prouidence (which Cratippus obiected to Pompey) hath ſet downe the date and period of euery Eſtate, before their firſt foundation and erection. But hereof I will giue my ſelfe a day ouer to reſolue.

For ſeeing the firſt bookes of the following ſtory, haue vndertaken the diſcourſe of the firſt Kings and Kingdomes: and that it is impoſſible for the ſhort life of a Preface, to trauaile after, and ouertake farre-off Antiquity, and to iudge of it; I will for the preſent, examine what profit hath been gathered by our owne Kings, & their Neighbour Princes: who hauing beheld, both in diuine & humane letters, the ſucceſſe of infidelity, iniuſtice, and cruelty, haue (notwithſtanding) planted after the ſame patterne.

True it is, that the iudgements of all men are not agreeable, nor (which is more ſtrange) the affection of any one man ſtirred vp a-like with examples of like nature: But euery one is touched moſt, with that which moſt neerely ſeemeth to touch his owne priuate; Or otherwiſe beſt ſuteth with his apprehenſion. But the iudgements of GOD are for euer vnchangeable; neyther is hee wearied by the long proceſſe of time, and won to giue his bleſſing in one age, to that which he hath curſed in another. Wherefore thoſe that are wiſe, or whoſe wiſedome if it bee not great, yet is true and well grounded, will be able to diſcerne the bitter fruites of irreligious policy, as well among thoſe examples that are found in ages remoued farre from the preſent, as in thoſe of latter times. And that it may no leſſe appeare by euident proofe, than by asseueration, That ill doing hath alwaies beene attended with ill successe: I will here, by way of Preface, run ouer some examples, which the worke ensuing hath not reached.

Among our Kings of the Norman race, we haue no sooner passed ouer the violence of the Norman Conquest, than we encounter with a singular and most remarkable example of Gods Iustice, vpon the children of Henry the first. For that King, when hoth by force, craft and cruelty, he had dispossest, ouerreacht, and lastly made blinde and destroyed his elder Brother Robert Duke of Normandy, to make his owne sonnes Lords of this Land: GOD cast them all, Male and Female, Nephewes and Neeces (Maud excepted) into the bottome of the Sea, with aboue a hundred and fifty others that attended them, whereof a great many were Noble, and of the King dearly beloued.

To passe ouer the rest, till we come to Edward the Second: it is certaine, that after the murder of that King, the issue of bloud then made, though it had some times of stay and stopping, did againe breake out, and that so often and in such abundance, as all our Princes of the Masculine race (very few excepted) dyed of the same disease. And although the yongue yeares of Edward the Third, made his knowledge of that horrible fact no more than suspicious: yet in that he afterwards caused his owne Vncle the Earle of Kent to die, for no other offence than the desire of his Brothers redemption, whom the Earle as then supposed to be liuing; the King making that to be treason in his Vncle, which was indeede treason in himself, (had his Vncles intelligence been true) this I say made it manifest, that he was not ignorant of what had past, nor greatly desirous to haue had it otherwise; though he caused Mortimer to die for the same.

This cruelty the secret and vnsearchable iudgement of GOD reuenged on the Grand-child of Edward the Third: and so it fell out, euen to the last of that line, that in the second or third descent they were all buried vnder the ruines of those buildings, of which the Mortar had beene tempered with innocent bloud. For Richard the Second, who saw, both his Treasurers, his Chancellor, and his Steward, with diuers others of his Counsailours, some of them slaughtered by the people, others in his absence executed by his enemies; yet hee alwaies tooke himselfe for ouer-wise, to be taught by examples. The Earles of Huntingdon and Kent, Montagu & Spencer, who thought themselues as great Politicians in those daies as others haue done in these: hoping to please the King, and to secure themselues, by the Murder of Glouceſter; died soone after, with many other their adherents, by the like violent hands; and farre more shamefully than did that Duke. And as for the King himselfe (who in regard of many deedes, vnworthy of his Greatnesse, cannot be excused, as the disauowing himselfe by breach of Faith, Charters, Pardons and Patents:) Hee was in the prime of his youth deposed, and murdered by his Cosen Germane and vassall, Henry of Lancaster, afterwards Henry the Fourth.

This King, whose Title was weake, & his obtaining the Crowne traiterous: who brake faith with the Lords at his landing, protesting to intend onely the recouery of his proper inheritance, brake faith with Richard himselfe; and brake faith with all the Kingdome in Parliament, to whom hee swore that the deposed King should liue. After that he had enioyed this Realme some few yeares, and in that time had beene set vpon on all sides by his Subiects, and neuer free from con-conspiracies & rebellions he saw (if soules immortall see & discern any things after the bodies death) his Graud-childe Henry the sixt, & his Son the Prince, suddenly & without mercy, murdered; the possession of the Crowne (for which hee had caused so much bloud to be poured out) transferred from his race, & by the Issues of his enemies worn & enioy'd: enemies, whom by his own practice he supposed that he had left no lesse power-lesse, than the succession of the Kingdom quest-lesse, by entailing the same upon his owne Issues by Parliament. And out of doubt, humane reason could haue iudged no otherwise, but that these cautions prouisions of the father, seconded by the valour & signall victories of his son Henry the fift, had buried the hopes of euery Competitor, vnder the despaire of all reconquest and recouery. I say, that humane reason might so haue iudged: were not this passage of Casaubon also true; Dies, hora, momentum, euertendis dominationibus sufficit, quæ adamantinis credebantur radicibus esse fundatæ; A day, an houre, a moment, is enough to ouerturne the things, that seemed to haue beene founded and rooted in Adamant.

Now for Henry the sixt, vpon whom the great storm of his Grand-fathers grieuous faults fell, as it formerly had done vpon Richard the Grand-childe of Edward: although he was generally esteemed for a gentle & innocent Prince, yet as he refused the daughter of Armaignac, of the House of Nauarre, the greatest of the Princes of France, to whom he was affianced (by which match hee might haue defended his inheritance in France) & married the daughter of Aniou, (by which he lost all that he had in France) so in condescending to the vnworthy death of his Vncle of Gloucester, the maine and strong Pillar of the house of Lancaster; He drew on himselfe & this kingdom the greatest ioynt-losse & dishonour, that euer it sustained since the Norman conquest. Of whom it may truly be said which a Counsellor of his own spake of Henry the third of France, Qu'il estoit vne fort gétile Prince; mais son reigne est aduenu en vne fort mauuois temps: That hee was a very gentle Prince, but his reigne happened in a verie vnfortunate season.

It is true that Buckingham & Suffolke were the practisers and contriuers of the Dukes death: Buckingham & Suffolke, because the Duke gaue instructions to their authority, which otherwise vnder the Queene had been absolute; the Queene in respect of her personall wound, spretæque iniuria formæ, because Gloucester disswaded her marriage. But the fruit was answerable to the seed; the successe to the Counsaile. For after the cutting downe of Gloucester, Yorke grew vp so fast, as he dared to dispute his right both by arguments & armes; in which quarrell, Suffolke and Buckingham, with the greatest number of their adherents, were dissolued. And although for his breach of Oath by Sacrament, it pleased God to strike down Yorke: yet his son the Earle of March, following the plaine path which his Father had troden out, despoiled Henry the Father, and Edward the son, both of their liues and Kingdome. And what was the end now of that politique Lady the Queene, other than this, That she liued to behold the wretched ends of all her partakers: that she liued to looke on, while her Husband the King, & her onely son the Prince, were hewen in sunder; while the Crowne was set on his head that did it? Shee liued to see her selfe dispoiled of her Estate, and of her moueables: and lastly, her father, by rendering vp to the Crowne of France the Earledome of Prouence and other places, for the payment of fifty thousand crownes for her Ransome, to become come a ſtarke Beggar. And this was the end of that ſubtilty, which Sitacides calleth fine but vnrighteous: for other fruit hath it neuer yeelded ſince the world was. Siracb. 19

And now it came to Edward the fourths turn (though after many difficulties) to triumph. For all the plants of Lancaſter were rooted vp, one only Earle of Richmond excepted, whom alſo he had once bought of the Duke of Brittain, but could not hold him. And yet was not this of Edward ſuch a Plantation, as could any way promiſe in it ſelfe ſtability. For this Edward the King (to omit more than many of his other cruelties) beheld and allowed the ſlaughter which Glouceſter, Dorſet, Haſtings, and others, made of Edward the Prince in his owne preſence: of which tragicall Actors, there was not one that eſcaped the iudgement of GOD in the ſame kinde. And He, which (beſides the execution of his brother Clarence, for none other offence than he himſelfe had formed in his own imagination) inſtructed Glouceſter to kill Henry the ſixt, his Predeceſſour; taught him alſo by the ſame Art to kill his owne ſons and ſucceſſors, Edward and Richard. For thoſe Kings which haue ſold the bloud of others at a low rate, haue but made the market for their owne enemies, to buy of theirs at the ſame price.

To Edward the Fourth ſucceeded Richard the Third, the greateſt Maſter in miſchiefe of all that fore-went him: who although, for the neceſſity of his Tragedy, he had more parts to play, and more to performe in his owne perſon, than all the reſt; yet he ſo well fitted euery affection that plaid with him, as if each of them had but acted his owne intereſt. For he wrought ſo cunningly vpon the affections of Haſtings and Buckingham, enemies to the Queene and to all her kindred, as he eaſily allured them to condeſcend, that Riuers and Grey, the Kings Maternall Vncle and halfe brother, ſhould (for the firſt) be ſeuered from him: ſecondly, hee wrought their conſent to haue them impriſoned: and laſtly (for the auoiding of future inconuenience) to haue their heads ſeuered from their bodies. And hauing now brought thoſe his chiefe inſtruments to exerciſe that common precept, which the Deuill hath written on euery poſt, namely, To depreſſe thoſe whom they had grieued, and to deſtroy thoſe whom they had depreſt; Hee vrged that argument ſo far and ſo forcibly, as nothing but the death of the yongue king himſelfe, & of his brother, could faſhion the concluſion. For hee cauſed it to be hammered into Buckinghams head, That, whenſoeuer the King or his Brother, ſhould haue able yeeres to exerciſe their power; they would take a moſt ſeuere reuenge of that cureleſſe wrong, offered to their Vncle and Brother, Riuers and Grey.

Sceleratæ ſceleribus tuendæ. Sen. de clem.

But this was not his manner of reaſoning with Haſtings, whoſe fidelity to his Maſters Sonnes was without ſuſpect: and yet the Diuell, who neuer diſſwades by impoſſibility, taught him to try him. And ſo he did. But when he found by Cates*by who ſounded him, that he was not fordable; He firſt reſolued to kill him ſitting in councell: wherein hauing failed with his ſword; Hee ſet the Hangman vpon him, with a weapon of more weight. And becauſe nothing elſe could moue his appetite, He cauſed his head to be ſtricken off, before hee eate his dinner. A greater iudgement of God, than this vpon* Haſtings I haue neuer obſerued in any ſtorie. For the ſelfe ſame day that the Earle Riuers, Grey, and others, were (without triall of Law, or offence giuen) by Haſtings aduice executed at Pomfret. I ſay Haſtings himſelfe in the ſame day, & (as I take it) in the ſame houre, in the ſame law-leſſe manner, had his head ſtricken off in the Tower of London.

But

But Buckingham liued a while longer; and with an eloquent oration perswaded the Londonets to elect Richard for their king. And having receiued the Earledome of Hereford for reward, besides the high hope of marrying his daughter to the Kings onely sonne; after many grieuous vexations of mind, and vnfortunate attempts, being in the end betrayed and deliuered vp by his trustiest seruant; Hee had his head seuered from his body at Salisbury, without the trouble of any of his Peers. And what successe had Richard himself after all these mischiefes & murders, policies, and counter-policies to Christian religion: & after such time as with a most mercilesse hand he had pressed out the breath of his Nephews and Naturall Lords; other than the prosperity of so short a life, as it tooke end, ere himselfe could well looke ouer and discerne it? the great out-cry of innocent bloud, obtained at GODS hands the effusion of his; who became a spectacle of shame & dishonour, both to his friends and enemies.

This cruell King, Henry the 7. cut off; & was therin (no doubt) the immediate instrument of Gods iustice. A politick Prince he was if euer there were any, who by the engine of his wisdome, beate downe & ouerturned as many strong oppositions both before & after he wore the Crowne, as euer King of England did: I say by his wisdome, because as he euer left the rains of his affectiõs in the hands of his profit, so he alwaies weighed his vndertakings by his abilities, leauing nothing more to hazzard than so much as cannot be denied it in all humane actions. He had well obserued the proceedings of Loys the 11. whom he followed in all that was royall or royall-like, but he was far more iust, & begun not their processes whom he hated or feared by the execution, as Loys did.

He could neuer endure any mediation in rewarding his seruants, & therein exceeding wise; for whatsoeuer himselfe gaue, he himselfe receiued back the thankes & the loue, knowing it wel that the affections of men (purchased by nothing so readily as by benefits) were traines that better became great kings, than great subiects. On the contrary, in whatsoeuer he grieued his subiects, he wisely put it off on those, that he found fit ministers for such actions. Howsoeuer the taking off of Stanlies head, who set the Crown on his, & the death of the yongue Earle of Warwick, son to George D. of Clarence, shews, as the successe also did, that he held somewhat of the errors of his Ancestors; for his possession in the first line ended in his grand-children, as that of Edward the Third and Henry the Fourth had done.

Now for King Henry the eight: if all the pictures and patternes of a mercilesse Prince were lost in the World, they might all againe be painted to the life, out of the story of this King. For how many seruants did he aduãce in hast (but for what vertue no man could suspect) and with the change of his fancy ruined againe; no man knowing for what offence? To how many others of more desert gaue he abundant flowers from whence to gather hony, and in the end of Haruest burnt them in the Hiue? How many wiues did he cut off, & cast off, as his fancy & affection chãged? How many Princes of the bloud (whereof some of them for age could hardly crawle towards the blocke) with a world of others of all degrees (of whom our common Chronicles haue kept the accompt) did hee execute? yea, in his very death-bed, and when hee was at the point to haue giuen his accompt to GOD for the aboundance of bloud already spilt: He imprisoned the Duke of Norfolke the Father; & executed the Earle of Surrey the son; the one, whose deseruings he knew not how to value, hauing neuer omitted any thing that concerned his own honour, & the kings seruice; the other neuer hauing comitted any thing worthy of his least displeasure: the one preceding valiant and aduised; the other no lesse valiant than learned, & of excellent hope. But besides the sorrowes which he heaped vpon the Fatherlesse & Widowes at home: and besides the vaine enterprises abroad, wherin it is thought that he consumed more treasure, than all our victorious Kings did in their seuerall Conquests: what causelesse and cruell warres did he make vpon his own Nephew King Iames the first? What Lawes & Wills did he deuise to establish this Kingdome in his owne issues? losing his sharpest weapons to cut off, and cut downe those branches, which sprang from the same root that himselfe did. And in the end (notwithstanding these his so many irreligious prouisions) it pleased God to take away all his owne, without increase; though, for themselues in their seuerall kindes, all Princes of eminent vertue. For these words of Samuel to Agag King of the Amalikites, haue beene verified vpon many others: As thy sword hath made other women childlesse, so shall thy mother be childlesse among other women. And that bloud which the same King Henry affirmed, that the cold aire of Scotland had frozen vpon the North, God hath diffused by the sunshine of his grace: from whence His Maiesty now liuing, & long to liue, is descended. Of whom I may say it truly, That if all the malice of the world were infused into one eie: yet could it not discerne in his life, euen to this day, any one of those foule spots, by which the consciences of all the forenamed Princes (in effect) haue bin defiled; nor any droppe of that innocent bloud on the sword of his iustice, with which the most that fore-went him, haue stained both their hands and fame. And for this Crowne of England, it may truely be auowed: That he hath receiued it euen from the hand of God, and hath staied the time of putting it on, howsoeuer he were prouoked to hasten it: That he neuer tooke reuenge of any man, that sought to put him beside it: That he refused the assistance of Her enemies, that wore it long, with as great glory as euer Princesse did: That his Maiesty entred not by a breach, nor by bloud, but by the Ordinary gate, which his owne right set open, and into which, by a generall loue and obedience, He was receiued. And howsoeuer His Maiesties preceding title to this Kingdome, was perferred by many Princes (witnesse the Treaty at Cambray in the yeare, 1559) yet he neuer pleased to dispute it, during the life of that renowned Lady his Predecessor; no, notwithstanding the iniury of not being declared Heire, in all the time of Her long raigne.

Neither ought we to forget, or neglect our thankfulnesse to GOD for the vniting of the Northen parts of Brittany to the South, to wit, of Scotland to England, which though they were seuered but by small brookes and bankes, yet by reason of the long continued warre, and the cruelties exercised vpon each other, in the affection of the Nations, they were infinitly seuered. This I say is not the least of Gods blessings which His Maiesty hath brought with him vnto this Land: No, put all our petty grieuances together, & heap them vp to their hight, they will appeare but as a Mole-hill compared with the Mountaine of this concord. And if all the Historians since then haue acknowledged the vniting of the Red-Rose, and the White, for the greatest happinesse, (Christian Religion excepted) that euer this Kingdome receiued from GOD, certainly the peace betweene the two Lions of gold and gules, and the making them one, doth by many degrees exceed the former; for by it, besides the sparing of our british bloud, heretofore and during the difference, so often & abundantly shed, the state of England is more assured, the Kingdome more inabled to recouer her ancient honour and rights, and by it made more inuincible, than by all our former alliances, practices, policies & conqueſts. It is true that hereof we do not yet finde the effect. But had the Duke of Parma in the yeare 1588. ioyned the army which he commanded, with that of Spaine, and landed it on the ſouth coaſt; & had his Maieſty at the ſame time declared himſelfe againſt vs in the north: it is eaſie to diuine what had become of the liberty of England, certainely we would then without murmur haue brought this vnion a farre greater praiſe than it hath ſince coſt vs. It is true, that there was neuer any Comon weale or Kingdom in the world, wherein no man had cauſe to lament. Kings liue in the world & not aboue it. They are not infinit to examine euery mans cauſe, or to relieue euery mans wants, And yet in the latter, (though to his owne preiudice) His Maieſtie hath had more compaſſion of other mens neceſſities, than of his own Coffers. Of whom it may be ſaid as of Salomon, Dedit Deus Salomoni latitudinem cordis: Which if other men do not vnderſtand with Pineda, to be meant by Liberality, but by Latitude of knowledge; yet may it be better ſpoken of His Maieſty, than of anie King that euer England had; who as well in diuine, as humane vnderſtanding, hath exceeded all that fore-went him, by many degrees.

Piv. comment. in gal. 1. K. 4.

I could ſay much more of the Kings Maieſty, without flatterie: did I not feare the imputation of preſumption, & withall ſuſpect, that it might befall theſe papers of mine, (though the loſſe were little) as it did the Pictures of Queen Elizabeth, made by vnskilfull and common Painters, which by her owne commandement were knockt in peeces and caſt into the fire. For ill Artiſts, in ſetting out the beautie of the externall, and weake writers, in deſcribing the vertues of the internall; doe often leaue to poſterity, of well formed faces a deformed memory; and of the moſt Perfect and Princely mindes, a moſt defectiue repreſentation. It may ſuffice, and there needes no other diſcourſe; if the honeſt Reader but compare the cruell & turbulent paſſages of our former Kings, and of other their Neighbour-Princes (of whom for that purpoſe I haue inſerted this briefe diſcourſe) with His Maieſties temperate, reuengeleſſe, and liberal diſpoſition: I ſay, that if the honeſt Reader weigh them iuſtly, and with an euen hand: and withall but beſtow euery deformed child on his true Parent; He ſhall find, that there is no man that hath ſo iuſt cauſe to complaine, as the King himſelfe hath. Now as we haue told the ſucceſſe of the trumperies and cruelties of our owne Kings, and other great perſonages: ſo we finde, that GOD is euery where the ſame GOD. And as it pleaſed him to puniſh the vſurpation, & vnnatural cruelty of Henry the firſt, & of our third Edward, in their Children for many generations: ſo dealt He with the ſons of Loyes Debonaire, the ſon of Charles the great, or Charlemaine. For after ſuch time as Debonaire of France, had torne out the eies of Bernard his Nephew, the ſon of Pepin the eldeſt ſonne of Charlemaine, & heire of the Empire, & then cauſed him to die in priſon, as did our Henry to Robert his eldeſt brother: there followed nothing but murders vpon murders, poyſoning, impriſonments, & ciuill war; till the whole race of that famous Emperour was extinguiſhed. And though Debonaire, after he had rid himſelfe of his Nephew by a violent death, & of his baſtard brothers by a ciuil death (hauing incloſed them with ſure gard, al the daies of their lines, within a Monaſtery) held himſelf ſecure from all oppoſition: Yet God raiſed vp againſt him (which he ſuſpected not) his own ſons, to vex him, to inuade him, to take him priſoner, & to depoſe him; his owne ſons, with whom (to ſatisfie their ambition) he

he had ſhared his eſtate, and giuen them Crownes to weare; and Kingdomes to gouerne, during his owne life. Yea his eldeſt ſon Lothaire (for he had foure, three by his firſt wife, & one by his ſecond; to wit, Lothaire, Pepin, Loys, and Charles*) made it the cauſe of his depoſition, That he had vſed violence towards his brothers and kinſmen, and that he had ſuffered his Nephew (whom he might haue deliuered) to be ſlaine, eo quod, ſaith the Text,* fratribus & propinquis violentiam intulerit, et nepotem ſuum, quem ipſe liberare poterat, interfici permiſerit: Becauſe he vſed violence to his Brothers and Kinſmen, & ſuffered his Nephew to be ſlaine whom he might haue deliuered. Step. Paſquier recherd. 5. c. 1.

Yet did he that which few Kings doe, namely repent him of his cruelty. For, among many other things, which he performed in the Generall Aſſembly of the States, it followes: Poſt hæc autem palam ſe erraſſe confeſſus, & imitatus Imperatoris Theodoſii exemplum, pœnitentiam ſpontaneam ſuſcepit, tam de his, quam quæ in Bernardum proprium nepotem geſſerat, After this hee did openly confeſſe himſelfe to haue erred, and following the example of the Emperour Theodoſius, hee vnderwent voluntary penance, as well for his other offences, as for that which he had done againſt Bernard his own Nephew. Paſq. Ibidem.

This he did; and it was praiſe-worthy. But the bloud that is vniuſtly ſpilt, is not againe gathered vp from the ground by repentance. Theſe Medicines, miniſtred to the dead, haue but dead rewards.

This King, as I haue ſaid, had foure Sonnes. To Lothaire his eldeſt he gaue the Kingdome of Italy; as Charlemaine, his father, had done to Pepin the father of Bernard, who was to ſucceed him in the Empire. To Pepin the ſecond ſon he gaue the Kingdome of Aquitaine: to Loys, the Kingdome of Bauier: and to Charles, whom he had by a ſecond wife called Iudith, the remainder of the Kingdome of France. But this ſecond wife, being a Mother-in-law to the reſt, perſwaded Debonaire to caſt his ſon Pepin out of Aquitain; therby to greaten Charles, which, after the death of his ſonne Pepin, he proſecuted to effect, againſt his Grand-child bearing the ſame name. In the meane wile, being inuaded by his ſon Loys of Bauier, he dies for griefe.

Debonaire dead, Loys of Bauier, & Charles afterwards called the bald, & their Nephew Pepin of Aquitaine, ioyne in league againſt the Emperour Lothaire their eldeſt brother. They fight neere to Auxerre the moſt bloudy battaile that euer was ſtroken in France: in which, the marueilous loſſe of Nobility, & men of war, gaue courage to the Saracens to inuade Italy; to the Hunnes to fall vpon Almaine, & the Danes to enter vpon Normandy. Charles the bald by treaſon ſeizeth vpon his Nephew Pepin, kills him in a Cloyſter: Carloman rebells againſt his Father Charles the bald, the Father burns out the eies of his Son Carloman; Bauier inuades the Emperour Lothaire his brother, Lothaire quits the Empire; Hee is aſſailed and wounded to the heart by his owne conſcience, for his rebellion againſt his Father, and for his other cruelties, and dies in a Monaſtery. Charles the bald, the Vncle oppreſſeth his Nephewes the Sonnes of Lothaire, hee vſurpeth the Empire to the preiudice of Loyes of Bauier his elder Brother; Bauiers armies and his Sonne Carloman are beaten, hee dies of griefe, & the Vſurper Charles is poyſoned by Zedechias a Iew his Phyſitian, his Son Loys le Beque dies of the ſame drinke. Beque had Charles the ſimple and two Baſtards, Loys and Carloman; they rebell againſt their Brother, but the eldeſt breakes his Neck, the yonguer is ſlain by a wild Bore; the ſon of Bauiere had the ſame ill deſtiny, and brake his Neck by a fall out of a Windo w in ſporting with his companions. Charles the groſſe becomes Lord of all that the ſonnes of Debonaire held in Germanie; wherewith not contented, he inuades Charles the ſimple: but being forſaken of his Nobility, of his wife, and of his vnderſtanding, he dies a diſtracted beggar. Charles the ſimple is held in Wardſhip by Eudes Maior of the Pallace, then by Robert the Brother of Eudes: and laſtly, being taken by the Earle of Vermandois, hee is forced to dye in the priſon of Peron. Loyes the ſonne of Charles the ſimple breakes his Neck in chaſing a Wolfe, and of the two ſonnes of this Loys, the one dies of poyſon, the other dies in the priſon of Orleans; after whom Hugh Capet, of another race, and a ſtranger to the French, makes himſelfe King.

Theſe miſerable ends had the iſſues of Debonaire, who after he had once apparrelled iniuſtice with authority, his ſonnes and ſucceſſors tooke vp the faſhion, and wore that Garment ſo long without other prouiſion, as when the ſame was torne from their ſhoulders, euery man deſpiſed them as miſerable & naked beggars. The wretched ſucceſſe they had, (ſaith a learned French-man) ſhewes, que en ceſte mort il y a voit plus du fait des hommes que de Dieu, ou de la iuſtice: that in the death of that Prince, to wit, of Bernard the ſon of Pepin, the true heire of Charlemaine, men had more medling than either God, or Iuſtice had.

But to come neerer home; it is certaine that Francis the firſt, One of the worthieſt Kings (except for that fact) that euer the French-men had, did neuer enioy himſelfe; after he had commended the deſtruction of the Proteſtants of Mirandol & Cabrieres, to the Parliament of Prouence, which poore people were therupon burnt and murdered; men, women, and children. It is true that the ſaid King Francis repented himſelfe of the fact, and gaue charge to Henry his ſonne, to doe iuſtice vpon the Murderers, threatning his ſonne with GODS iudgements, if he neglected it. But this vnſeaſonable care of his, GOD was not pleaſed to accept for payment. For after Henry himſelfe was ſlaine in ſport by Montgomery, wee all may remember what became of his foure ſonnes, Francis, Charles, Henry, and Hercules. Of which although three of them became Kings, and were married to beautifull and vertuous Ladies: yet were they, one after another, caſt out of the world, without ſtock or ſeed. And notwithſtanding their ſubtilty, and breach of faith, with all their Maſſacres vpon thoſe of the religion, and great effuſion of bloud, the Crowne was ſet on his head, whom they all laboured to diſſolue; the Proteſtants remaine more in number than euer they were, and hold to this day more ſtrong cities than euer they had.

Let vs now ſee if God be not the ſame God in Spaine, as in England & France. Towards whom wee will looke no further backe than to Don Pedro of Caſtile: in reſpect of which Prince, all the Tyrants of Sicil, our Richard the third, and the great Euan Vaſilowick of Moſcouia, were but petty ones: this Caſtilian, of all Chriſtian and Heathen Kings, hauing beene the moſt mercileſſe. For, beſides thoſe of his own Bloud and Nobility, which he cauſed to be ſlaine in his owne Court & Chamber, as Sancho Ruis, the great Maſter of Calatraua, Ruis Gonſales, Alphonſo Tello, and Don Iohn of Arragon, whom hee cut in peeces and caſt into the ſtreets, denying him Chriſtian buriall: I ſay, beſides theſe, and the ſlaughter of Gomes Manriques, Diego Peres, Alphonso Gomes, and the great Commander of Castile; He made away the two Infantes of Arragon his Cosen germans, his brother Don Frederick, Don Iohn de la Cerde, Albuquerques, Nugnes de Guzmã, Cornel, Cabrera, Tenorio, Mendes de Toledo, Gutiere his great Treasurer, & all his Kindred, & a world of others. Neither did he spare his two yongu'est brothers, innocent Princes: whom after he had kept in close prison from their Cradles, till one of them had liue fifteene yeares, and the other foureteene, he murdered them there. Nay, he spared not his Mother, nor his wife the Lady Blanch of Bourbon. Lastly, as he caused the Archbishop of Toledo, & the Dean to be killed of purpose to enioy their treasures: so did he put to death Mahomet Aben Alhamar King of Barbary, with 37. of his Nobility, that came vnto him for succour, with a great summe of money, to levy (by his fauour) some companies of souldiers to returne withall. Yea, he would needes assist the Hangman with his owne hand, in the execution of the old King, in so much as Pope Vrban declared him an enemy both to God and Man. But what was his end? Hauing beene formerly beaten out of his Kingdome, and re-established by the valour of the English Nation, led by the famous Duke of Lancaster: He was stabbed to death by his yonguer Brother the Earle of Astramara, who dispossest all his Children of their inheritance, which, but for the Fathers iniustice and cruelty, had neuer beene in danger of any such thing. Hist. of Spai. c.

If we can parallel any man with this King, it must be Duke Iohn of Burgoigne, who, after his traiterous murder of the Duke of Orleans, caused the Constable of Armagnac, the Chancellor of France, the Bishops of Cõstance, Bayeux, Eureux, Senlis, Saintes, and other religious and reuerend Church-men, the Earle of grand Pré, Hector of Chartres, and (in effect) all the officers of iustice, of the Chamber of Accompts, Treasury, and Request, (with sixteene hundred others to accompany them) to be suddenly and violently slaine. Hereby, while he hoped to gouerne, and to haue mastred France: He was soone after strucken with an axe in the face, in the presence of the Dauphin; and, without any leisure to repent his misdeeds, presently slaine. These were the Louers of other mens miseries: and misery found them out. French inuent. in Anno 1418.

Now for the Kings of Spaine, which liued both with Henry the seuenth, Henry the eight, Queene Mary, and Queene Elizabeth; Ferdinand of Arragon was the first: and the first that laid the foundation of the present Austrian greatnesse. For this King did not content himselfe to hold Arragon by the vsurpation of his Ancestor, & to fasten thereunto the Kingdome of Castile and Leon, which Isabel his wife held by strong hand, and his assistance, from her owne Neece the Daughter of the last Henry: but most cruelly and craftily, without all colour or pretence of right, Hee also cast his owne Neece out of the Kingdome of Nauarre, and, contrary to faith, and the promise that he made to restore it, fortified the best places, and so wasted the rest, as there was no means left for any army to inuade it. This King, I say, that betrayed also Ferdinand and Frederick Kings of Naples, Princes of his owne bloud, and by double alliance tyed vnto him: sold them to the French: and with the same Army, sent for their succour vnder Gonsaluo, cast them out, and shared their Kingdome with the French, whom afterwards he most shamefully betrayed.

This wise and politique King, who sold Heauen and his owne Honour, to make his ſonne, the Prince of Spaine, the greateſt Monarch of the world: ſaw him die in the flower of his yeares; and his wife great with childe, with her vntimely birth, at once & together buried. His eldeſt daughter married vnto Don Alphõſo Prince of Portugall, beheld her firſt husband breake his necke in her preſence; and being with childe by her ſecond, died with it. A iuſt iudgement of God vpon the race of Iohn, father to Alphonſo, now wholly extinguiſhed: who had not onely left many diſconſolate Mothers in Portugall, by the ſlaughter of their children; but had formerly ſlaine with his owne hand, the ſonne and onely comfort of his Aunt the Lady Beatrix, Dutcheſſe of Viſeo. The ſecond Daughter of Ferdinand, married to the Arch-Duke Philip, turned foole, and died mad and deprived. His third daughter, beſtowed on King Henry the eight, He ſaw caſt off by the King: the mother of many troubles in England; & the mother of a daughter, that in her vnhappy zeale ſhed a world of innocent bloud; loſt Calice to the French; and died heart-broken without increaſe. To conclude: all thoſe Kingdomes of Ferdinand haue maſters of a new name; and, by a ſtrange family are gouerned and poſſeſt.

Charles the fift, ſon to the Arch-Duke Philip, in whoſe vain enterpriſes vpon the French, vpon the Almans, & other Princes and States, ſo many multitudes of Chriſtian ſouldiers, and renowned Captaines, were conſumed: who gaue the while a moſt perillous entrance to the Turkes, and ſuffered Rhodes the Key of Chriſtendom, to be taken; was in concluſion chaced out of France, and in a ſort out of Germany; and left to the French, Mentz, Toule, and Verdun, places belonging to the Empire, ſtole away from Inſpurg; and ſcaled the Alpes by torch-light, purſued by Duke Maurice; hauing hoped to ſwallow vp all thoſe dominions wherein hee concocted nothing ſaue his owne diſgraces. And hauing, after the ſlaughter of ſo many Millions of men, no one foote of ground in eyther: Hee crept into a Cloyſter, and made himſelfe a Penſioner of an hundred thouſand Duckets by the yeare to his ſonne Philip, from whom he very ſlowly receiued his meane and ordinary maintenance.

Netber. Hiſt. l. 7. fol. 313.

His Son againe King Philip the ſecond, not ſatisfied to hold Holland and Zeland, (wreſted by his anceſtors from Iaqueline their lawfull Princeſſe) & to poſſeſſe in peace many other Prouinces of the Netherlands: perſwaded by that miſchieuous Cardinall of Granuile, and other Romiſh Tyrants; not onely forgot the moſt remarkable ſeruices, done to his Father the Emperour, by the Nobilitie of thoſe countries; not onely forgot the Preſent made him vpon his entry, of forty millions of Florens, called the Nouale aide; nor onely forgot that hee had twice moſt ſolemnly ſworne to the Generall States, to maintaine and preſerue their ancient rights, priuiledges, and cuſtomes, which they had enioyed vnder their thirtie and fiue Earles before him, Conditionall Princes of thoſe Prouinces: but beginning firſt to conſtraine them, and enthrall them by the Spaniſh Inquiſition, and then to impouriſh them by many new deuiſed and intolerable impoſitions; he laſtly, by ſtrong hand and maine force, attempted to make himſelfe not onely an abſolute Monarch ouer them, like vnto the Kings and Souerainges of England and France; but Turke-like, to tread vnder his feet all their Nationall and fundamentall Lawes, Priuiledges, and ancient Rights. To effect which, after he had eaſily obtained from the Pope a Diſpenſation of his former Oathes (which Diſpenſation was the true cauſe of the war & bloudſhed ſince then;) & after he had tried what he could performe, by diuiding of their owne Nobility, vnder the gouernment of his base sister, Margaret of Austria, & the Cardinall Granuile. He employed that most mercilesse Spaniard Don Ferdinand Aluarez of Toledo, Duke of Alua; followed with a powerfull army of strange Nations: by whom hee first slaughtered that renowned Captaine the Earle of Egmont, Prince of Gauare: & Philip Montmorency Earle of Horn: made away Montigue, & the Marquis of Berguis, & cut off in those sixe yeares (that Alua gouerned) of Gentlemen & others, eighteene thousand & sixe hundred, by the hands of the Hangman, besides all his other barbarous murders & massacres. By whose ministry when he could not yet bring his affaires to their wished ends, hauing it in his hope to worke that by subtilty, which he had failed to performe by force: He sent for Gouernour his bastard brother Don Iohn of Austria; a Prince of great hope, & very gracious to those people. But he, vsing the same Papall aduantage that his predecessors had done, made no scruple to take Oath vpon the Holy Euangelists, to obserue the treaty made with the Generall States; & to discharge the Low Countries of all Spaniards, & other strangers, therin garrisond: Towards whose Pay & Pasport, the Netherlands strained themselues to make payment of 600. thousand pounds. Which monies receiued, He suddenly surprised the Citadells of Antwerp & Namures: not doubting (being vnsuspected by the States) to haue possest himselfe of all the mastring places of those Prouinces. For whatsoeuer he ouertly pretended; Hee held in secret a contrary councell with the Secretary Escouedo, Rhodus, Barlemont, & others, Ministers of the Spanish tyranny; formerly practised, & now againe intended. But let vs now see the effect & end of this periury, & of all other the Dukes cruelties. First, for himselfe; after he had murdered so many of the Nobility, executed (as aforesaid) eighteen thousand six hundred in six yeeres; & most cruelly slaine Man, Woman, and Childe, in Mecklin, Zutphen, Naerden and other places: and after he had consumed six and thirty millions of treasure in six yeares: notwithstanding his Spanish vant, That he would suffocate the Hollanders in their owne butter-barrells, and milk-tubbes: Hee departed the country no otherwise accompanied, than with the curse & detestation of the whole Nation; leauing his Masters affaires in a tenfold worse estate, than hee found them at his first arriuall. For Don Iohn, whose haughty conceipt of himselfe ouercame the greatest difficulties; though his iudgement were ouer-weake to mannage the least: what wonders did his fearefull breach of faith bring forth, other than the King his brothers iealousie and distrust, with the vntimely death that seized him, euen in the flowre of his youth? And for Escouedo his sharpe-witted Secretarie, who in his owne imagination had conquered for his Master both England & the Netherlands, being sent into Spaine vpon some new proiect, He was at the first arriuall, & before any accesse to the King, by certaine Ruffians appointed by Anthony Peres (though by better warrant than his) rudely murdered in his own lodging. Lastly, if we consider the King of Spaines carriage, his counsaile & successe in this businesse, there is nothing left to the memory of man more remarkeable. For he hath paid aboue an hundred Millions, & the liues of aboue foure hundred thousand Christians, for the losse of all those countries; which, for beauty, gaue place to none, & for reuenue, did equall his West Indies: for the losse of a nation which most willingly obeyed him; & who at this day, after forty yeares warre, are in despight of all his forces become a free Estate, & far more rich and powerfull, than they were, when he first began to impouerish and oppresse them.

Oh by what plots, by what forſwearings, betrayings, oppreſſions, impriſonments, tortures, poyſonings, and vnder what reaſons of State, and politique ſubtilety, haue theſe forenamed Kings, both ſtrangers, and of our owne Nation, pulled the vengeance of GOD vpon themſelues, vpon their, and vpon their prudent miniſters! and in the end haue brought thoſe things to paſſe for their enemies, and ſeene an effect ſo directly contrary to all their owne counſailes and cruelties, as the one could neuer haue hoped for themſelues, and the other neuer haue ſucceeded; if no ſuch oppoſition had euer been made. GOD hath ſaid it and performed it euer: Perdam ſapientiam ſapientum, I will deſtroy the wiſedome of the wiſe.

But what of all this? and to what end doe we lay before the eyes of the liuing, the fall and fortunes of the dead: ſeeing the world is the ſame that it hath bin, & the children of the preſent time, will ſtill obey their parents? It is in the preſent time, that all the wits of the world are exerciſed. To hold the times wee haue, wee hold all things lawfull: and either we hope to hold them for euer; or at leaſt wee hope, that there is nothing after them to be hoped for. For as wee are content to forget our owne experience, and to counterfeit the ignorance of our owne knowledge, in all things that concerne our ſelues; or perſwade our ſelues, that GOD hath giuen vs letters patents to purſue all our irreligious affections, with a non obſtante: ſo we neither looke behind vs what hath been, nor before vs what ſhall be. It is true, that the quantity which we haue, is of the body: wee are by it ioyned to the earth: we are compounded of earth; and we inhabite it. The Heauens are high, farre off, and vnſearcheable: we haue ſenſe and feeling of corporall things; and of eternall grace, but by reuelation. No maruaile then that our thoughts are alſo earthy: and it is leſſe to be wondred at, that the words of worthleſſe men cannot cleanſe them: ſeeing their doctrine and inſtruction, whoſe vnderſtanding the Holy Ghoſt vouchſafed to inhabite, haue not performed it. For as the Prophet Eſay cryed out long agone, Lord, who hath beleeued our reports? And out of doubt, as Eſay complained then for himſelfe and others: ſo are they leſſe beleeued, euery day after other. For although Religion, and the truth thereof, be in euery mans mouth, yea, in the diſcourſe of euery woman, who for the greateſt number are but Idols of vanity: what is it other than an vniuerſall diſſimulation? We profeſſe that we know GOD: but by workes we deny him. For Beatitude doth not conſiſt in the knowledge of diuine things, but in a diuine life: for the Diuells know them better than men. Beatitudo non eſt diuinorum cognitio, ſed vita diuina. And certainly there is nothing more to be admired, and more to bee lamented, than the priuate contention, the paſſionate diſpute, the perſonall hatred, and the perpetuall war, maſſacres, and murthers, for Religion among Chriſtians: the diſcourſe whereof hath ſo occupied the World, as it hath well neere driuen the practice thereof out of the World. Who would not ſoone reſolue, that tooke knowledge but of the religious diſputations among men, and not of their liues which diſpute, that there were no other thing in their deſires, than the purchaſe of Heauen; and that the World it ſelfe were but vſed as it ought, and as an Inne or place, wherein to repoſe our ſelues in paſſing on towards our celeſtiall habitation? when on the contrary, beſides the diſcourſe and outward profeſſion, the ſoule hath nothing but hypocriſie. We are all (in effect) become Comœdians in religion: and while wee act in geſture and voyce, diuine vertues, in all the courſe of our liues we renounce our Perſons, and the parts wee play. For Charity, Iuſtice, and Truth, haue but their being in termes, like the Philosophers Materia prima.

Neither is it that wisedome, which Salomon deemeth to be the Schoole-Mistresse of the knowledge of God, that hath valuation in the world: it is enough that we giue it our good word: but the same which is altogether exercised in the seruice of the World, as the gathering of riches chiefly, by which we purchase and obtaine honour, with the many respects which attend it. These indeed be the markes, which (when we haue bent our consciences to the highest) we all shoote at. For the obtaining whereof it is true, that the care is our owne; the care our owne in this life, the perill our owne in the future: and yet when we haue gathered the greatest abundance, we our selues enioy no more thereof, than so much as belongs to one man. For the rest, He that had the greatest wisedome, and the greatest ability that euer man had, hath told vs that this is the vse: When goods increase (saith Salomon) they also increase that eate them; and what good commeth to the Owners, but the beholding thereof with their eyes? As for those that deuoure the rest, and follow vs in faire weather: they againe forsake vs in the first tempest of misfortune, and steere away before the Sea and Winde, leauing vs to the malice of our destinies. Of these, among a thousand examples, I will take but one out of Master Dannet, and vse his owne words: Whilest the Emperour Charles the fift, after the resignation of his Estates, staied at Vlosshing for winde, to carry him his last iourny into Spaine; Hee conferred on a time with Seldius, his brother Ferdinands Embassadour, till the deepe of the night. And when Seldius should depart: the Emperour calling for some of his seruants, and no body answering him (for those that attended vpon him, were some gone to their lodgings, and all the rest asleepe) the Emperour tooke vp the candle himselfe, and went before Seldius to light him downe the staires; & so did, notwithstanding all the resistance that Seldius could make. And when He was come to the staires foote, Hee said thus vnto him: Seldius, remember this of Charles the Emperour, when he shall be dead and gone, That Him, whom thou hast knowne in thy time emironed with so many mighty Armies, and Guards of souldiers, thou hast also seene alone, abandoned, and forsaken, yea euen of his owne domesticall seruants, &c. I acknowledge this change of Fortune to proceed from the mighty hand of GOD; which I will by no meanes goe about to withstand.

Eccles. 5. 10.

But you will say that there are some things else, and of greater regard than the former. The first, is the reuerend respect that is held of great men, and the Honour done vnto them by all sorts of people. And it is true indeed: prouided, that an inward loue for their iustice and piety, accompany the outward worship giuen to their places and power; without which what is the applause of the Multitude, but as the out-cry of an Heard of Animals, who without the knowledge of any true cause, please themselues with the noyse they make? For seeing it is a thing exceeding rare, to distinguish Vertue and Fortune: the most impious (if prosperous) haue euer been applauded; the most vertuous (if vnprosperous) haue euer been despised. For as Fortunes man rides the Horse, so Fortune herselfe rides the Man. Who, when he is descended and on foote: the Man taken from his Beast, and Fortune from the Man; a base groome beates the one, and a bitter contempt spurnes at the other, with equall liberty.

The ſecond, is the greatning of our poſterity, and the contemplation of their glory whom we leaue behinde vs. Certainely, of thoſe which conceiue that their ſoules departed take any comfort therein, it may be truly ſaid of them, which Lactantius ſpake of certaine Heathen Philoſophers, quod ſapientes ſunt in reſtulta. For when our ſpirits immortall ſhall be once ſeparate from our mortall bodies, & diſpoſed by GOD: there remaineth in them no other ioy of their poſterity which ſucceed, than there doth of pride in that ſtone, which ſleepeth in the Wall of a Kings Palace; nor any other ſorrow for their pouerty, than there doth of ſhame in that, which beareth vp a Beggars cottage. Neſciunt mortui, etiam ſancti, quid agunt viui, etiam eorum filii, quia animæ mortuorum rebus viuentium non interſunt: The dead, though holy, know nothing of the liuing, no, not of their owne children: for the ſoules of thoſe departed, are not conuerſant with their affaires that remaine. And if wee doubt of Saint Auguſtine, wee cannot of Iob; who tells vs, That wee know not if our ſonnes ſhall bee honourable: neither ſhall wee vnderſtand concerning them, whether they ſhall bee of low degree. Which Eccleſiaſtes alſo confirmeth: Man walketh in a ſhadow, and diſquieteth himſelfe in vaine: hee heapeth vp riches, and cannot tell who ſhall gather them. The liuing (ſaith hee) know that they ſhall die, but the dead know nothing at all: for who can ſhew vnto man, what ſhall be after him vnder the Sun? Hee therefore accompteth it among the reſt of worldly vanities, to labour and trauaile in the world; not knowing after death, whether a foole or a wiſe man ſhould enioy the fruits thereof: which made me (ſaith he) endeauour euen to abhorre mine own labour. And what can other men hope, whoſe bleſſed or ſorrowfull eſtates after death God hath reſerued? mans knowledge lying but in his hope, ſeeing the Prophet Eſay confeſſeth of the elect, That Abraham is ignorant of vs, and Iſrael knowes vs not. But hereof we are aſſured, that the long and darke night of death, (of whoſe following day wee ſhall neuer behold the dawne, till his returne that hath triumphed ouer it) ſhall couer vs ouer till the world be no more. After which, and when we ſhall againe receiue Organs glorified and incorruptible, the ſeats of Angelicall affections: in ſo great admiration ſhall the ſoules of the bleſſed be exerciſed, as they cannot admit the mixture of any ſecond or leſſe ioy; nor any returne of forgone & mortall affection towards friends, kindred, or children. Of whom whether we ſhall retaine any particular knowledge, or in any ſort diſtinguiſh them: no man can aſſure vs; & the wiſeſt men doubt. But on the contrary; If a diuine life retaine any of thoſe faculties, which the ſoule exerciſed in a mortall body; wee ſhall not at that time ſo diuide the ioyes of Heauen, as to caſt any part therof on the memory of their felicities which remaine in the World. No, be their eſtates greater than euer the World gaue, we ſhall (by the difference knowne vnto vs) euen deteſt their conſideration. And whatſoeuer comfort ſhall remaine of all forepaſt, the ſame will conſiſt in the charity, which we exerciſed liuing: and in that Piety, Iuſtice, and firme Faith, for which it pleaſed the infinite mercy of God to accept of vs, and receiue vs. Shall we therefore value honour and riches at nothing? and neglect them, as vnneceſſarie & vaine? Certainly no. For that infinite wiſedome of God, which hath diſtinguiſhed his Angells by degrees: which hath giuen greater and leſſe light & beauty, to Heauenly bodies: which hath made differences betweene beaſts and birds: created ted the Eagle and the Flye, the Cedar and the Shrub; and among ſtones, giuen the faireſt tincture to the Ruby, and the quickeſt light to the Diamond; hath alſo ordained Kings, Dukes or Leaders of the people, Magiſtrates, Iudges, and other degrees among men. And as honour is left to poſterity, for a marke and enſigne of the vertue and vnderſtanding of their Anceſtors: ſo, ſeeing Siracides preferreth Death before Beggary: and that titles, without proportionable eſtates, fall vnder the miſerable ſuccour of other mens pity; I accompt it fooliſhneſſe to condemne ſuch a care: Prouided, that worldly goods be well gotten, and that we raiſe not our owne buildings out of other mens ruines. For, as Plato doth firſt preferre the perfection of bodily health; ſecondly, the forme and beauty; and thirdly, Diuitias nulla fraude quæſitas: ſo Ieremy cries, Woe vnto them that erect their houſes by vnrighteouſneſſe, and their chambers without equity: and Eſay the ſame, Woe to thoſe that ſpoile and were not ſpoiled. And it was out of the true wiſdome of Salomon, that he commandeth vs, not to drinke the wine of violence, not to lie in wait for bloud, and not to ſwallow them vp aliue, whoſe riches we couet: for ſuch are the wayes (ſaith hee) of euery one that is greedy of gaine.

And if we could afford our ſelues but ſo much leiſure as to conſider, That hee which hath moſt in the world, hath, in reſpect of the world, nothing in it: and that he which hath the longeſt time lent him to liue in it, hath yet no proportion at all therein, ſetting it either by that which is paſt, when we were not, or by that time which is to come, in which we ſhall abide for euer: I ſay, if both, to wit, our proportion in the world, and our time in the world, differ not much from that which is nothing, it is not out of any excellency of vnderſtanding, that we ſo much priſe the one, which hath (in effect) no being: and ſo much neglect the other, which hath no ending: coueting thoſe mortall things of the world, as if our ſoules were therein immortall, and neglecting thoſe things which are immortall, as if our ſelues after the world were but mortall.

But let euery man value his owne wiſedome, as he pleaſeth. Let the Rich man thinke all fooles, that cannot equall his abundance; the Reuenger eſteeme all negligent, that haue not trodden down their oppoſites; the Politician, all groſſe that cannot merchandize their faith: Yet when we once come in ſight of the Port of death, to which all windes driue vs, & when by letting fall that fatall Anchor, which can neuer be weighed again, the Nauigation of this life takes end. Then it is, I ſay, that our own cogitations (thoſe ſad & ſeuere cogitations, formerly beaten from vs by our Health and Felicity) returne againe, and pay vs to the vttermoſt for all the pleaſing paſſages of our liues paſt. It is then that we cry out to God for mercy; then, when our ſelues can no longer exerciſe cruelty to others: and it is onely then, that we are ſtrucken through the ſoule with this terrible ſentence, That God will not be mockt. For if according to S. Peter, The righteous ſcarcely be ſaued: and that God ſpared not his Angels: where ſhall thoſe appeare, who, hauing ſerued their appetites all their liues, preſume to think, that the ſeuere Commandements of the All-powerfull God were giuen but in ſport, and that the ſhort breath, which we draw when death preſſeth vs, if we can but faſhion it to the ſound of Mercy (without any kind of ſatisfaction or amends) is ſufficient? O quam multi, ſaith a reuerend Father, cum hac ſpe ad æternos labores & bella deſcendunt! I confeſſe that it is a great comfort to our friends, to haue it ſaid, that we ended well: for we all de-desire (as Balaam did) to die the death of the righteous. But what shall we call a disesteeming, an apposing, or (indeed) a mocking of God: if those men doe not appose him, disesteeme him, and mocke him, that thinke it enough for God, to aske him forgiuenesse at leisure, with the remainder and last drowing of a malitious breath? For what doe they otherwise, that die this kinde of wel-dying, but say vnto God as followeth: We beseech thee, O God, that all the falshoods, forswearings, and treacheries of our liues past, may be pleasing vnto thee; that thou wilt for our sakes (that haue had no leisure to doe any thing for thine) change thy nature (though impossible) and forget to be a iust God; that thou wilt loue iniures and oppressions, call ambition wisedome, and charity foolishnesse. For I shall preiudice my sonne (which I am resolued not to doe) if I make restitution; and confesse my selfe to haue been vniust, (which I am too proud to do) if I deliuer the oppressed. Certainely, these wise worldlings haue either found out a new God, or made One: and in all likelihood such a Leaden One, as Lewis the eleuenth ware in his Cappe; which when he had caused any that he feared, or hated, to be killed, he would take it from his head and kisse it: beseeching it to pardon him this one euill act more, and it should be the last; which (as at other times) he did, when by the practice of a Cardinall and a falsified Sacrament, he caused the Earle of Armagnac to be stabbed to death; mockeries indeed fit to be vsed towards a Leaden, but not towards the euerliuing God. But of this composition are all deuout louers of the World, that they feare all that is dureleſſe and ridiculous: they feare the plots and practices of their opposites, and their very whisperings: they feare the opinions of men which beate but vpon shadowes: they flatter and forsake the prosperous and vnprosperous, be they friends or Kings: yea they diue vnder water, like Duckes, at euery pebble stone, that's but throwne towards them by a powerfull hand: and on the contrary, they shew an obstinate and Giantlike valour, against the terrible iudgements of the Al-powerfull God: yea they shew themselues gods against God, and slaues towards men; towards men whose bodies and consciences are alike rotten.

Now for the rest: If we truly examine the difference of both conditions; to wit, of the rich and mighty, whom we call fortunate; and of the poore & oppressed, whom we account wretched: we shall find the happinesse of the one, and the miserable estate of the other, so tied by God to the very instant, and both so subiect to enterchange (witnesse the sudden downefall of the greatest Princes, and the speedy vprising of the meanest persons) as the one hath nothing so certaine, whereof to boast; nor the other so vncertaine, whereof to bewaile it selfe. For there is no man so assured of his honour, of his riches, health, or life; but that he may be depriued of eyther or all, the very next houre or day to come. Quid vesper vehat, incertum est, What the euening will bring with it, it is vncertaine. And yet ye cannot tell (saith S. Iames) what shall be to morrow. To day he is set vp, and to morrow he shall not be found: for hee is turned into dust; and his purpose perisheth. And although the aire which compasseth aduersity, be very obscure: yet therin we better discerne God, than in that shining light which enuironeth worldly glory; through which, for the cleernesse thereof, there is no vanity which escapeth our sight. And let aduersity seem what it will; to happy men ridiculous, who make themselues merry at other mens misfortunes; and to those vnder the crosse, grieuous: yet this is true, That for all that is past, to the very instant, the portions remaining are equall to either. For be it that wee haue liued many yeares, and (according to Salomon) in them all wee haue reioyced, or beleeue that we haue measured the same length of dayes, and therein haue euermore sorrowed: yet looking backe from our present being, wee finde both the one and the other, to wit, the ioy and the woe, sayled ouer of sighes, and death, which doth pursue vs & hold vs in chace, from our infancy, hath gathered it. Quicquid retrò est, mors tenet: Whatsoeuer of our age is past, death holds it. So as whosoeuer hee bee, to whom Fortune hath beene a seruant, and the Time a friend: let him but take the accompt of his memory (for wee haue no other keeper of our pleasures past) and truly examine what it hath reserued either of beauty and youth, or fore-gone delights; what it hath saued, that it might last, of his dearest affections, or of whatsoeuer else the amorous Spring time gaue his thoughts of contentment, then vnualuable; and hee shall finde that all the art which his elder yeares haue, can draw no other vapour out of these dissolutions, than heauy secret, and sad sighes. He shall finde nothing remaining, but those sorrowes, which grow vp after our fast-springing youth, ouertake it, when it is at a stand, and ouer-top it vtterly, when it beginnes to wither: in so much as looking back from the very instant time, & from our now being, the poore, diseased, & captiue creature, hath as little sense of all his former miseries and paines, as hee, that is most blest in common opinion, hath of his fore-passed pleasures and delights. For whatsoeuer is cast behinde vs, is iust nothing: and what is to come, deceiptfull hope hath it: Omnia quæ euentura sunt, in incerto iacent. Onely those few blacke Swannes I must except: who hauing had the grace to value worldly vanities at no more than their owne price; doe, by retaining the comfortable memory of a well acted life, behold death without dread, and the graue without feare; and embrace both, as necessary guides to endlesse glory.

For my selfe, this is my consolation, and all that I can offer to others, that the sorrowes of this life are but of two sorts: whereof the one hath respect to GOD; the other, to the World. In the first we complaine to GOD against our selues, for our offences against him; and confesse, Et tu iustus es in omnibus quæ venerunt super nos, And thou O Lord art iust in all that hath befallen vs. In the second wee complaine to our selues against GOD: as if hee had done vs wrong, either in not giuing vs worldly goods and honours, answering our appetites: or for taking them againe from vs hauing had them; forgetting that humble & iust acknowledgment of Iob, the Lord hath giuen, & the Lord hath taken. To the first of which Saint Paul hath promised blessednesse; to the second, death. And out of doubt he is either a foole, or vngratefull to GOD, or both, that doth not acknowledge, how meane soeuer his estate be, that the same is yet far greater, than that which God oweth him: or doth not acknowledge, how sharpe soeuer his afflictions be, that the same are yet far lesse, than those which are due vnto him. And if an Heathen wiseman cal the aduersities of the world but tributa viuendi, the tributes of liuing: a wise Christian man ought to know them, & beare them, but as the tributes of offending. He ought to beare them manlike, & resoluedly, & not as those whining souldiers do, qui gementes sequuntur imperatorem.

For seeing God, who is the Author of all our tragedies, hath written out for vs, & appointed vs all the parts we are to play: and hath not, in their distribution, been partiall to the most mighty Princes of the world; That gaue vnto Darius the part of the greatest Emperour, and the part of the most miserable beggar, a beggar begging water of an Enemy, to quench the great drought of death; That appointed Belisarius to play the Grand Signior of the Turks in the morning, & in the same day the Footstoole of Tamerlane (both which parts Valerian had also plaid, being taken by Sapores:) that made Belisarius play the most victorious Captaine, & lastly the part of a blinde beggar; of which examples many thousands may be produced: why should other men, who are but as the least wormes, complaine of wrongs? Certainly there is no other account to be made of this ridiculous world, than to resolue, That the change of fortune on the great Theater, is but as the change of garments on the lesse. For when on the one and the other, euery man weares but his own skin, the Players are all alike. Now if any man out of weaknes prise the passages of this world otherwise (for saith Petrarch, Magni ingenii est reuocare mentem a sensibus) it is by reason of that vnhappy fantasie of ours, which forgeth in the braines of Man all the miseries (the corporall excepted) whereunto he is subiect. Therein it is, that Misfortune & Aduersity work all that they worke. For seeing Death, in the end of the Play, takes from all, whatsoeuer Fortune or Force takes from any one: it were a foolish madnesse in the shipwracke of worldly things, where all sinkes but the Sorrow, to saue it. That were, as Seneca saith, Fortunæ succumbere, quod tristius est omni fato, To fall vnder Fortune, of all other the most miserable destinie.

But it is now time to sound a retrait; and to desire to be excused of this long pursuit: and withall, that the good intent, which hath moued mee to draw the picture of time past (which we call History) in so large a Table, may also bee accepted in place of a better reason.

The examples of diuine prouidence, euery where found (the first diuine Histories being nothing else but a continuation of such examples) haue perswaded me to fetch my beginning from the beginning of all things; to wit, Creation. For though these two glorious actions of the Almighty be so neere, and (as it were) linked together, that the one necessarily implyeth the other: Creation inferring Prouidence (for what father forsaketh the childe that he hath begotten?) and Prouidence presupposing Creation: Yet many of those that haue seemed to excell in worldly wisedome, haue gone about to disioyne this coherence; the Epicure denying both Creation and Prouidence, but granting that the world had a Beginning; the Aristotelian granting Prouidence, but denying both the Creation and the Beginning.

Now although this doctrine of Faith, touching the Creation in time (for by faith we vnderstād, that the world was made by the word of God) be too weighty a worke for Aristotles rotten ground to beare vp, vpon which he hath (notwithstanding) founded the Defences and Fortresses of all his Verball Doctrine: Yet that the necessity of infinite power, and the worlds beginning, and the impossibility of the contrary euen in the iudgement of Naturall reason, wherein he beleeued, had not better informed him; it is greatly to be maruailed at. And it is no lesse strange, that those men which are desirous of knowledge (seeing Aristotle hath failed in this maine point; and taught little other than termes in the rest) haue so retrencht their mindes from the following and ouertaking of truth, and so absolutely subiected themselues to the law of those Philosophicall principles; as all contrary kinde of teaching, in the search of causes, they haue condemned either for phantasticall, or curious. But doth it follow, that the positions of Heathen Philosophers, are vndoubted grounds and principles in-indeed, because so called? Or that ipsa dixerunt, doth make them to be such? Certainly no. But this is true, That whereas natural reason hath built any thing so strong against it selfe, as the same reason can hardly assaile it, much lesse better it: euen the same in euery question of Nature, and finite power, may be approued for a fundamentall law of humane knowledge. For saith Charron in his booke of Wisdome, Tout proposition humaine a autant d'authorité quel' autre, si la raison n'en fait la difference; Euery humane proposition hath equall authority, if reason make not the difference, the first being but the fables of principles. But hereof how shall the vpright and vnpartiall iudgement of man giue a sentence, where opposition and examination are not admitted to giue in euidence? And to this purpose it was well said of Lactantius, Sapientiam sibi adimunt, qui sine vllo iudicio inuenta maiorum probant, & ab aliis pecudum more ducuntur: They neglect their owne wisdome, who without any iudgement approue the inuention of those that fore-went them, & suffer themselues after the manner of Beasts, to be led by them. By the aduantage of which sloth and dulnesse, ignorance is now become so powerfull a Tyrant: as it hath set true Philosophy, Physick, and Diuinity in a Pillory; and written ouer the first, Contra negantem Principia; ouer the second, Virtus specifica; and ouer the third, Ecclesia Romana.

But for my selfe, I shall neuer be perswaded, that God hath shut vp all light of Learning within the lanthorne of Aristotles braines: or that it was euer said vnto him, as vnto Esdras, Accendam in Corde tuo Lucernam intellectus: that God hath giuen inuention but to the Heathen, and that they onely inuaded Nature, and found the strength and bottome thereof; the same Nature hauing consumed all her store, and left nothing of price to after-ages. That these and these be the causes of these and these effects; Time hath taught vs; and not reason: and so hath experience without Art. The Cheese-wife knoweth it as well as the Philosopher, that sowre Rennet doth coagulate her milke into a curd. But if wee aske a reason of this cause, why the sowrenesse doth it? whereby it doth it? and the manner how? I thinke that there is nothing to bee found in vulgar Philosophy, to satisfie this and many other like vulgar questions. But man to couer his ignorance in the least things, who cannot giue a true reason for the Grasse vnder his feet, why it should be greene rather than red, or of any other colour; that could neuer yet discouer the way and reason of Natures working, in those which are farre lesse noble creatures than himselfe; who is farre more Noble than the Heauens themselues: Man (saith Salomon) that can hardly discerne the things that are vpon the Earth, and with great labour finde out the things that are before vs; that hath so short a time in the world, as he no sooner begins to learne, than to die; that hath in his memory but borrowed knowledge; in his vnderstanding, nothing truly; that is ignorant of the Essence of his owne soule, and which the wisest of the Naturalists (if Aristotle be he) could neuer so much as define, but by the Action & Effect, telling vs what it works (which all men know as well as he) but not what it is, which neither he, nor any else, doth know, but GOD that created it; (For though I were perfect, yet I know not my soule, saith Iob.) Man, I say, that is but an Idiot in the next cause of his owne life, and in the cause of all actions of his life: will (notwithstanding) examine the Art of GOD in creating the World; of GOD, who (saith Iob) is so excellent as wee know him not;

and examine the beginning of the worke, which had end before Mankinde had a beginning of being. He will disable Gods power to make a world, without matter to make it of. He will rather ginne the mothes of the Aire for a cleaſe, caſt the work on neceſsity or chance, beſtow the honour thereof on Nature, make two powers, the one to be the Author of the Matter, the other of the Forme, and laſtly, for want of a worke-man, haue it Eternall: which latter opinion Ariſtotle to make himſelfe the Author of a new Doctrine, brought into the World: and his Sectatours haue maintained it; parati ac coniurati, quos ſequuntur, Philoſophorum animis inuictis opiniones tueri. For Hermes, who liued at once with, or ſoone after Moſes, Zoroaſter, Muſæus, Orpheus, Linus, Anaximenes, Anaxagoras, Empedocles, Meliſſus, Pherecydes, Thales, Cleanthes, Pythagoras, Plato, and many others (whoſe opinions are exquiſitely gathered by Steuchius Eugubinus) found in the neceſsity of inuincible reaſon, One eternall and infinite Being, to be the Parent of the vniuerſall. Horum omnium ſententia quamuis ſit incerta, eodem tamen ſpectat, vt Prouidẽtiam vnam eſſe contendant: ſiue enim Natura, ſiue Æther, ſiue Ratio, ſiue mens, ſiue fatalis neceſsitas, ſiue diuina Lex, idem eſſe quod à nobis dicitur Deus: All theſe mens opinions (ſaith Lactantius) though vncertain, come to this, That they agree vpon one Prouidence, whether the ſame be Nature, or light, or Reaſon, or vnderſtanding, or deſtinie, or diuine ordinance, that it is the ſame which we call GOD. Certainly, as all the Riuers in the world, though they haue diuers riſings, and diuers runnings; though they ſometimes hide themſelues for a while vnder ground, & ſeeme to be loſt in Sea-like Lakes, doe at laſt finde, & fall into the great Ocean: ſo after all the ſearches that humane capacitie hath; & after all Philoſophicall contemplation and curioſity; in the neceſsity of this infinite power, all the reaſon of man ends and diſſolues it ſelfe.

Lact. 5.

As for others, and firſt touching thoſe which conceiue the matter of the World to haue beene eternall, and that God did not create the World, ex nihilo, but ex materia præexiſtẽte: the Suppoſition is ſo weak, as is hardly worth the anſwering. For (ſaith Euſebius) Mihi videntur qui hoc dicunt, fortunam quoque Deo annectere, They ſeeme vnto me, which affirme this, to giue part of the work to God, & part to Fortune: inſomuch as if God had not found this firſt matter by chance, He had neither beene Author, nor Father, nor Creator, nor Lord of the Vniuerſall. For were the Matter or Chaos eternall: it then followes, That either this ſuppoſed Matter did fit it ſelfe to God, or God accommodate himſelfe to the matter. For the firſt; it is impoſſible, that things without ſenſe could proportion themſelues to the Work-mans will. For the ſecond; it were horrible to conceiue of God, That as an Artificer he applied himſelfe, according to the proportion of matter which he lighted vpon.

Euſeb. de prap. Euang. l. 14. c. 8.

But let it be ſuppoſed, That this matter hath bin made by any Power, not Omnipotent, and infinitely wiſe: I would gladly learne how it came to paſſe, that the ſame was proportionable to his intention, that was Omnipotent & infinitely wiſe, & no more, nor no leſſe, than ſerued to receiue the forme of the Vniuerſall. For, had it wanted any thing of what was ſufficient; then muſt it be granted, That God created out of nothing ſo much of new matter, as ſerued to finiſh the work of the World: Or had there bin more of this matter, than ſufficed, then God did diſſolue & annihilate whatſoeuer remained and was ſuperfluous. And this muſt euery reaſonable ſonable ſoule confeſſe, That it is the ſame worke of God alone, to create any thing out of nothing, And by the ſame art and power, and by none other, can thoſe things, or any part of that eternall matter, be againe changed into Nothing; by which thoſe things, that once were nothing, obtained a beginning of being.

Againe, to ſay that this matter was the cauſe of it ſelfe; this, of all other, were the greateſt idiotiſme. For, if it were the cauſe of it ſelfe at any time; then there was alſo a time when it ſelfe was not: at which time of not being, it is eaſie enough to conceiue, that it could neither procure it ſelfe, nor any thing elſe. For to be, and not to be, at once, is impoſſible. Nihil autem ſeipſum præcedit, neq; ſeipſum componit corpus: There is nothing that doth præcede it ſelfe, neither doe bodies compound themſelues.

For the reſt, Thoſe that faine this matter to be eternall, muſt of neceſſity confeſſe, that Infinite cannot bee ſeparate from Eternity. And then had infinite matter left no place for infinite forme, but that the firſt matter was finite, the forme which it receiued proues it. For concluſion of this part, whoſoeuer will make choice, rather to beleeue in eternall deformity, or in eternall dead matter, than in eternall light and eternall life: let eternall death be his reward. For it is a madnes of that kind, as wanteth tearmes to expreſſe it. For what reaſon of men (whom the curſe of preſumption hath not ſtupified) hath doubted, That infinite power (of which we can comprehend but a kind of ſhadow, quia comprehenſio eſt intra terminos, qui infinito repugnant) hath any thing wanting in it ſelf, either for matter or form; yea for as many worlds (if ſuch had beene Gods will) as the Sea hath ſands? For where the power is without limitation, the work hath no other limitation, than the workmans will. Yea Reaſon it ſelf findes it more eaſie for infinite power, to deliuer from it ſelfe a finite world, without the helpe of matter prepared; than for a finite man; a foole and duſt, to change the forme of matter made to his hands. They are Dionyſius his words, Deus in vna exiſtentia omnia præhabet: and againe, Eſſe omnium eſt ipſa Diuinitas, omne quod vides, & quod non vides; to wit, cauſaliter, or in better tearmes, non tanquam forma, ſed tanquam cauſa vniuerſalis. Neither hath the world vniuerſall cloſed vp all of GOD: For the moſt part of his workes (ſaith Siracides) are hid. Neither can the depth of his wiſedome bee opened, by the glorious worke of the world: which neuer brought to knowledge all it can; for then were his infinite power bounded, and made finite. And hereof it comes; That wee ſeldome entitle GOD the all-shewing, or the all-willing; but the Almighty, that is, infinitely able. Cap. 16. v. 21.

But now for thoſe, who from that ground, That out of nothing nothing is made, inferre the Worlds eternity; and yet not ſo ſaluage therin, as thoſe are, which giue an eternall being to dead matter: It is true, if the word (nothing) be taken in the affirmatiue; and the making, impoſed vpon Naturall Agents and finite power; That out of nothing, nothing is made. But ſeeing their great Doctor Ariſtotle himſelfe confeſſeth, quod omnes antiqui decreuerunt quaſi quoddam rerum principium, ipſumq; infinitum, That all the Ancient decree a kind of beginning, and the ſame to be infinite: and a little after, more largely and plainly, Principium eius eſt nullum, ſed ipſum omnium cernitur eſſe principium, ac omnia complecti atque regere: it is ſtrange that this Philoſopher, with his followers, ſhould rather make choice out of falſhood, to conclude falſly; than out of truth, to reſolue truly. For if we compare the world Vniuerſal, & all the Stanc. Eug. l. 3. c. 9. ex Ariſt. Phyſ. 3. 20.

vnmeaſurable Orbes of Heauen, and thoſe marueilous bodies of the Sun, Moone, and Stars, with ipſum Infinitum: it may truly be ſaid of them all, which himſelf affirmes of his imaginary Materia prima, That they are neither quid, quale, nor quantum; and therfore to bring finite (which hath no proportion with infinite) out of infinite (qui deſtruit omnem proportionē) is no wonder in Gods power. And therfore Anaximander, Meliſſus, & Empedocles, call the world vniuerſall, but particulam Vniuerſitatis and infinitatis, a parcell of that which is the vniuerſality and the infinity it ſelf; & Plato, but a ſhadow of God. But the other, to proue the worlds eternity, vrgeth this Maxime, That, A ſufficient & effectual cauſe being granted, an anſwerable effect therof is alſo granted: inferring that God being for euer a ſufficient & effectual cauſe of the world, the effect of the cauſe ſhould alſo haue bin for euer; to wit, the world vniuerſall. But what a ſtrange mockery is this in ſo great a Maſter, to confeſſe a ſufficient & effectual cauſe of the world, (to wit, an almighty God) in his Antecedent; & the ſame God to be a God reſtrained in his concluſion; to make God free in power, & bound in wil; able to effect, vnable to determine; able to make all things, and yet vnable to make choice of the time when? For this were impiouſly to reſolue of God, as of natural neceſſity; which hath neither choice, nor will, nor vnderſtanding; which cannot but worke matter being preſent: as fire, to burne things combuſtible. Againe he thus diſputeth, That euery Agent which can work, and doth not work: if it afterward worke, it is either thereto moued by it ſelfe, or by ſomewhat elſe: and ſo it paſſeth from power to Act But God (ſaith he) is immoueable, and is neither moued by himſelfe, nor by any other: but being alwaies the ſame, doth alwaies worke. Whence he concludeth, If the world were cauſed by God, that he was for euer the cauſe thereof: and therfore eternall. The anſwer to this is verie eaſie, For that Gods performing in due time that, which he euer determined at length to performe, doth not argue any alteration or change, but rather conſtancy in him. For the ſame action of his will, which made the world for euer, did alſo with-hold the effect to the time ordained. To this anſwer, in it ſelfe ſufficient: others adde further, that the Patterne or Image of the World may be ſaid to be eternall: which the Platonicks call, ſpiritualem mundum; and doe in this ſort diſtinguiſh the Idæa and Creation in time.

Mar. Ficin. de immort. Animæ l. 12. c. 1.

Spiritualis ille mundus, mundi huius exemplar, primumque Dei opus, vita æquali eſt Architecto, fuit ſemper cum illo, eritque ſemper. Mundus autem corporalis, quod ſecundum opus eſt Dei, decedit iam ab opifice ex parte vna, quia non fuit ſemper: retinet alteram, quia ſit ſemper futurus: That repreſentatiue, or the intentionall world (ſay they) the ſampler of this viſible world, the firſt worke of GOD, was equally ancient with the Architect; for it was for euer with him, and euer ſhall bee. This materiall world, the ſecond worke or creature of GOD, doth differ from the worker in this, That it was not from euerlaſting, and in this it doth agree, that it ſhall be for euer to come. The firſt point, That it was not for euer, all Chriſtians confeſſe: The other they vnderſtand no other wiſe, than that after the conſūmation of this world, there ſhalbe a new Heauen and a new Earth, without any new creation of matter. But of theſe things we neednot here ſtand to argue: though ſuch opinions be not vnworthy the propounding, in this conſideration, of an eternall and vnchangeable cauſe, producing a changeable and temporall effect. Touching which point Proclus the Platoniſt diſputeth,

That

That the compounded essence of the World (and because compounded, therefore dissipable) is continued, & knit to the Diuine Being, by an individual & inseparable power flowing from Diuine vnity, & that the Worlds naturall appetite of God sheweth, that the same proceedeth from a good and vnderstanding diuine; and that this vertue, by which the World is continued & knit together, must be infinite, that it may infinitely and euerlastingly continue and preserue the same. Which infinite Vertue, the finite World (saith he) is not capable of, but receiueth it from the diuine infinite according to the temporall Nature it hath, successiuely euery moment by little & little; euen as the whole Materiall World is not altogether: but the abolished parts are departed by small degrees, and the parts yet to come, do by the same small degrees succeed, as the shadow of a tree in a Riuer seemeth to haue continued the same a long time in the water, but it is perpetually renued, in the continuall ebbing and flowing thereof.

But to returne to them, which denying that euer the World had any beginning, withall deny that euer it shall haue any end, & to this purpose affirme, That it was neuer heard, neuer read, neuer seene, no not by any reason perceiued, that the Heauens haue euer suffered corruption; or that they appeare any way the older by continuance; or in any sort otherwise than they were; which had they been subiect to finall corruption, some change would haue been discerned in so long a time. To this it is answered, That the little change as yet perceiued, doth rather proue their newnesse, and that they haue not continued so long, than that they wil continue for euer as they are. And if coniecturall arguments may receiue answer by coniectures: it then seemeth that some alteration may be found. For either Aristotle, Plinie, Strabo, Beda, Aquinas, and others, were grossely mistaken: or else those parts of the world, lying within the burnt Zone, were not in elder times habitable, by reason of the Suns heate, neither were the Seas, vnder the Equinoctial, nauigable. But wee know by experience, that those Regions, so situate, are filled with people, and exceeding temperate; and the Sea, ouer which we Nauigate, passable enough. We reade also many Histories of deluges: and how that in the time of Phaeton, diuers places in the world were burnt vp, by the Sunnes violent beate.

Arist. Met. 2. Plin. l. 2. c. 8. Strab. l. 3. Beda de ratione tem. 11. c. 32. Thom. p. 1. q. 102. art. 2.

But in a Word, this obseruation is exceeding feeble. For we know it for certain, That stone-wals, of matter moldring and friable, haue stood two, or three thousand yeares: that many things haue beene digged vp out of the earth, of that depth, as supposed to haue beene buried by the generall floud; without any alteration either of substance or figure: yea it is beleeued, and it is very probable, that the gold which is daily found in Mynes, and Rockes, vnder ground, was created together with the Earth.

And if bodies elementary, and compounded, the eldest times haue not inuaded and corrupted: what great alteration should wee looke for in Cœlestiall and quinteessentiall bodies? And yet we haue reason to thinke, that the Sunne, by whose help all Creatures are generate, doth not in these latter Ages assist Nature, as heretofore. We haue neither Giants, such as the eldest world had: nor mighty men, such as the elder world had; but all things in generall are reputed of lesse vertue which from the Heauens receiue vertue. Whence, if the nature of a Preface, would permit a larger discourse, we might easily fetch store of proue; as that this world shall at length haue end, as that once it had beginning.

And I see no good answer that can bee made to this obiection: If the World were eternall, why not all things in the World Eternall? If there were no first, no cause, no Father, no Creator, no incomprehensible Wisedome, but that euery Nature had beene alike eternall, and Man more ancient than euery other Nature: Why had not the eternall reason of Man, prouided for his eternall being in the World? For if all were equall, why not equall conditions to all? Why should heauenly bodies liue for euer, and the bodies of Men rot and die?

Againe, who was it that appointed the Earth to keepe the center, and gaue Order that it should hang in the Aire: that the Sunne should trauaile betweene the Tropicks, and neuer exceed those bounds, nor faile to performe that Progresse once in euery yeare: the Moone to liue by borrowed light: the first Starres (according to common opinion) to bee fastned like Nailes in a Cart-wheele; and the Planets to wander at their pleasure? Or if none of these had power ouer other: Was it out of Charity and Loue, that the Sunne by his perpetuall trauaile within those two Circles, hath visited, giuen light vnto, and relieued all parts of the Earth, and the Creatures therein, by turnes and times? Out of doubt, if the Sunne haue of his owne accord kept this course in all eternity: He may iustly bee called eternall Charity, and euerlasting Loue. The same may be said of all the Starres: who being all of them most large and cleare fountaines of vertue and operation, may also bee called eternall vertues: the Earth may be called eternall patience; the Moone, an eternall borrower and beggar; and Man of all other the most miserable, eternally mortall. And what were this, but to beleeue againe in the old Play of the gods? Yea in more gods by Millions, than euer Hesiodus dreampt of. But in steed of this mad folly, we see it well enough with our feeble & mortall eyes: and the eyes of our reason discerne it better; That the Sun, Moone, Starres, & the Earth, are limited, bounded, and constrained: themselues they haue not constrained, nor could. Omne determinatum causam habet aliquam efficientem, quæ illud determinauerit, Euery thing bounded hath some efficient cause, by which it is bounded.

Now for Nature; As by the ambiguity of this name, the schoole of Aristotle hath both commended many errours vnto vs, and sought also thereby to obscure the glory of the high Moderator of all things, shining in the Creation, and in the gouerning of the World: so if the best definition be taken out of the second of Aristotles physicks, or primo de Cœlo, or out of the fift of his Metaphysicks; I say that the best is but nominall, and seruing onely to difference the beginning of Naturall motion from Artificiall: which yet the Academicks open better, when they call it A Seminary strength, infused into matter by the Soule of the World: who giue the first place to Prouidence, the second to Fate, and but the third to Nature. Prouidentia (by which they vnderstand GOD) dux & caput; Fatum, medium ex prouidentia prodiens; Natura postremum. But be it what he will, or be it any of these (God excepted) or participating of all: yet that it hath choice or vnderstanding (both which are necessarily in the cause of all things) no man hath a vowed. For this is vnanswerable of Lactantius, Is autem facit aliquid, qui aut voluntatem faciendi habet, aut scientiam, He only can be said to be the doer of a thing, that hath either will or knowledge in the doing it.

But the will and science of Nature, are in these words truly expresst by Ficinus: Ficin. in Plat. Potest vbiq; Natura, vel per diuersa media, vel ex diuersis materiis, diuersa facere: sublata vero mediorũ materiarumq; diuersitate, vel vnicũ, vel similimum limium operatur, neque poteſt quando adeſt materia non operari; It is the power of Nature by diuerſity of meanes, or out of diuerſity of matter, to produce diuers things: but taking away the diuerſity of meanes, and the diuerſity of matter, it then workes but one or the like worke; neither can it but worke, matter being preſent. Now if Nature made choice of diuerſity of matter, to worke all theſe variable workes of Heauen and Earth, it had then both vnderſtanding and will; it had counſaile to beginne, reaſon to diſpoſe; vertue and knowledge to finiſh, and power to gouerne: without which all things had been but one and the ſame: all of the matter of Heauen, or all of the matter of Earth. And if we grant Nature this will, and this vnderſtanding, this counſaile, reaſon, and power; Cur Natura potius quam Deus nominetur? Why ſhould we then call ſuch a cauſe rather Nature, than God? God, of whom all men haue notion, and giue the firſt and higheſt place to Diuine power: Omnes homines notionem deorum habent, omneſq; ſummum locum diuino cuidam numini aſſignant. And this I ſay in ſhort; that it is a true effect of true reaſon in man (were there no authority more binding than reaſon) to acknowledge and adore the firſt and moſt ſublime power. Vera Philoſophia, eſt aſcenſus ab his quæ fluunt, & oriuntur, & occidunt, ad ea quæ vere ſunt, & ſemper eadem: True Philoſophy, is an aſcending from the things which flow, and ariſe, and fall, to the things that are for euer the ſame.

Ariſt. l. 1. de Cælo. c. 3. T. 22.

For the reſt, I do alſo account it not the meaneſt, but an impiety monſtrous, to confound God and Nature: be it but in tearmes. For it is God, that only diſpoſeth of all things according to his own will, & maketh of one Earth, Veſſels of honor & diſhonor. It is Nature that can diſpoſe of nothing, but according to the will of the matter wherin it worketh. It is God that cõmandeth al: It is Nature that is obedient to all. It is God, that doth good vnto all, knowing and louing the good he doth: It is Nature, that ſecondarily doth alſo good, but it neither knoweth nor loueth the good it doth. It is God, that hath all things in himſelf: Nature, nothing in it ſelf. It is God, which is the Father, and hath begotten all things: It is Nature, which is begotten by all things, in which it liueth and laboureth; for by it ſelfe it exiſteth not. For ſhall we ſay, that it is out of affection to the Earth, that heauie things fall towards it? Shal we cal it Reaſon, which doth conduct euery Riuer into the ſalt Sea? Shall we tearme it knowledge in fire, that makes it to conſume combuſtible matter? If it be Affection, Reaſon, and Knowledge in theſe: by the ſame Affection, Reaſon, and Knowledge it is, that Nature worketh. And therfore ſeeing all things worke as they do, (call it by Forme, or Nature, or by what you pleaſe) yet becauſe they worke by an impulſion, which they cannot reſiſt; or by a faculty, infuſed by the ſupremeſt power: we are neither to wonder at, nor to worſhip, the faculty that worketh, nor the Creature wherein it worketh. But herein lies the wonder: and to him is the worſhip due, who hath created ſuch a Nature in things, & ſuch a faculty, as neither knowing it ſelfe, the matter wherein it worketh, nor the vertue and power which it hath; do yet worke all things to their laſt and vttermoſt perfection. And therefore euery reaſonable man, taking to himſelfe for a ground that which is granted by all Antiquity, and by all men truly learned that euer the world had; to wit; That there is a power infinite, and eternall (which alſo neceſſity doth proue vnto vs, without the helpe of Faith, and Reaſon; without the force of Authority) all things do as eaſily follow which haue bin deliuered by diuine letters, as the waters of a running riuer do ſucceſsiuely purſue each other frō the firſt fountaines.

This much I ſay it is, that Reaſon it ſelfe hath taught vs: and this is the beginning of knowledge. Sapientia præcedit, Religio ſequitur: quia prius eſt Deum ſcire, conſequens colere; Sapience goes before, Religion followes: becauſe it is firſt to know God, and then to worſhip him. This Sapience Plato calleth abſoluti boni ſcientiam, The ſcience of the abſolute good: and another ſcientiam rerum primarum, ſempiternarum, perpetuarum. For Faith (ſaith Iſidore) is not extorted by violence; but by reaſon and examples perſwaded: fides nequaquam vi extorquetur, ſed ratione & exemplis ſuadetur. I confeſſe it, That to enquire further, as of the eſſence of God, of his power, of his Art, & by what meane He created the world: Or of his ſecret iudgement, & the cauſes is not an effect of Reaſon: Sed cum ratione inſaniunt, but they grow mad with reaſon, that inquire after it: For as it is no ſhame nor diſhonour (ſaith a French Author) de faire arreſt au but qu'on naſceu ſurpaſſer, For a man to reſt himſelf there, where he finds it impoſſible to paſſe on further: ſo whatſoeuer is beyond, and out of the reach of true reaſon, it acknowledgeth it to be ſo, as vnderſtanding it ſelf not to be infinite, but according to the Name and Nature it hath, to be a Teacher, that beſt knowes the end of his own Art. For ſeeing both Reaſon & Neceſsity teach vs (Reaſon, which is pars diuini ſpiritus in corpus humanum merſi) that the world was made by a power infinite; and yet how it was made, it cannot teach vs: and ſeeing the ſame Reaſon and Neceſsity make vs know, that the ſame infinite power is euery where in the world; and yet how euery where, it cannot informe vs: our beleeue hereof is not weakned, but greatly ſtrengthened, by our ignorance, becauſe it is the ſame Reaſon that tels vs, That ſuch a Nature cannot be ſaid to be God, that can be in all conceiued by man.

Quod eſt infinitum & non ſecundum naturam terminatum non continetur à ſcientia. Ariſt. poſter.

I haue been already ouer-long, to make any large diſcourſe either of the parts of the following Story, or in mine owne excuſe: eſpecially in the excuſe of this or that paſſage; ſeeing the whole is exceeding weak and defectiue. Among the groſſeſt, the vnſutable diuiſion of the bookes, I could not know how to excuſe, had I not beene directed to inlarge the building after the foundation was laid, and the firſt part finiſhed. All men know that there is no great Art in the diuiding euenly of thoſe things, which are ſubiect to number and meaſure. For the reſt, it ſutes well enough with a great many Bookes of this Age, which ſpeake too much, and yet ſay little: Ipſi nobis furto ſubducimur. We are ſtollen away from our ſelues, ſetting a high price on all that is our owne. But hereof, though a late good Writer make complaint, yet ſhall it not lay hold on mee, becauſe I beleeue as hee doth; that who ſo thinkes himſelfe the wiſeſt man, is but a poore and miſerable ignorant. Thoſe that are the beſt men of war, againſt all the vanities and fooleries of the World, do alwaies keepe the ſtrongeſt guards againſt themſelues, to defend them from themſelues, from ſelfe loue, ſelfe eſtimation, and ſelfe opinion.

Generally concerning the order of the worke, I haue onely taken counſaile from the Argument. For of the Aſſyrians, which after the down-fall of Babel take vp the firſt part, and were the firſt great Kings of the World, there came little to the view of poſterity: ſome few enterpriſes, greater in fame than faith, of Ninus and Semiramis excepted.

It was the ſtory of the Hebrewes, of all before the Olimpiads, that ouercame the conſuming diſeaſe of time; and preſerued it ſelfe, from the very cradle and beginning ginning to this day: and yet not ſo entire, but that the large diſcourſes thereof (to which in many Scriptures we are referred) are no where found. The Fragments of other Stories, with the actions of thoſe Kings and Princes which ſhot vp here & there in the ſame time, I am driuen to relate by way of digreſsion: of which wee may ſay with Virgil:

Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vaſto;

They appeare here and there floting in the great gulfe of time.

To the ſame firſt Ages doe belong the report of many Inuentions therein found, and from them deriued to vs; though moſt of the Authors Names haue periſhed in ſo long a Nauigation. For thoſe Ages had their Lawes; they had diuerſity of Gouernment; they had Kingly rule; Nobility, Pollicy in war; Nauigation, and all, or the moſt of needfull Trades. To ſpeak therfore of theſe (ſeeing in a generall Hiſtory we ſhould haue left a great deale of Nakedneſſe, by their omiſsion) it cannot properly be called a digreſsion. True it is, that I haue made alſo many others: which if they ſhall be laid to my charge, I muſt caſt the fault into the great heape of humane error. For ſeeing we digreſſe in all the waies of our liues: yea, ſeeing the life of man is nothing elſe but digreſsion; I may the better be excuſed, in writing their liues & actions. I am not altogether ignorant in the Lawes of Hiſtory, and of the Kindes. The ſame hath been taught by many, but by no man better, and with greater breuity, than by that excellent learned Gentleman Sir Francis Bacon. Chriſtian Lawes are alſo taught vs by the Prophets and Apoſtles, and euery day preacht vnto vs. But wee ſtill make large digreſsions: yea, the teachers themſelues doe not (in all) keepe the path which they point out to others.

For the reſt, after ſuch time as the Perſians had wreſted the Empire from the Chaldæans, and had raiſed a great Monarchy, producing Actions of more importance than were elſewhere to be found: it was agreeable to the Order of Story, to attend this Empire; whilſt it ſo flouriſhed, that the affaires of the nations adioyning had reference thereunto. The like obſeruance was to be vſed towards the fortunes of Greece, when they againe began to get ground vpon the Perſians, as alſo towards the affairs of Rome, when the Romans grew more mighty thã the Greeks.

As for the Medes, the Macedonians, the Sicilians, the Carthaginians, and other Nations who reſiſted the beginnings of the former Empires, and afterwards became but parts of their compoſition and enlargement: it ſeemed beſt to remember what was known of them from their ſeuerall beginnings, in ſuch times and places as they in their flouriſhing eſtates oppoſed thoſe Monarchies, which in the end ſwallowed them vp. And herein I haue followed the beſt Geographers: who ſeldome giue names to thoſe ſmall brookes, whereof many, ioyned together, make great Riuers; till ſuch time as they become vnited, and run in maine ſtreame to the Ocean Sea. If the Phraſe be weak, & the Stile not euery-where like it ſelf; the firſt ſhews their legitimation and true Parent; the ſecond will excuſe it ſelf vpon the Variety of Matter. For Virgil, who wrote his Eclogues, gracili auena, vſed ſtronger pipes, when he ſounded the wars of Æneas. It may alſo be laid to my charge, that I vſe diuers Hebrew words in my firſt booke, and elſewhere: in which language others may thinke, and I my ſelfe acknowledge it, that I am altogether ignorant: but it is true, that ſome of them I find in Montanus, others in latine Caracter in S. Senenſis, and of the reſt I haue borrowed the interpretation of ſome of my friends. But ſay I had bin beholding to neither, yet were it not to be wondred at, hauing had a cleuen yeares leasure, to attaine the knowledge of that, or of any other tongue; Howsoeuer, I know that it will be said by many, That I might haue been more pleasing to the Reader, if I had written the Story of mine owne times, hauing been permitted to draw water as neare the Well-head as another. To this I answer, that whosoeuer in writing a moderne History, shall follow truth too neare the heeles, it may haply strike out his teeth. There is no Mistresse or Guide, that hath led her followers and seruants into greater miseries. He that goes after her too far off, loseth her sight, and loseth himselfe: and he that walkes after her at a middle distance; I know not whether I should call that kinde of course, Temper or Baseneſſe. It is true, that I neuer trauailed after mens opinions, when I might haue made the best vſe of them: and I haue now too few dayes remaining, to imitate those, that either out of extreame ambition, or extreame cowardiſe, or both, do yet (when death hath them on his shoulders) flatter the world, between the bed and the graue. It is enough for me (being in that state I am) to write of the eldeſt times: wherein also why may it not be said, that in speaking of the past, I point at the present, and taxe the vices of those that are yet liuing, in their persons that are long since dead, and haue it laid to my charge? But this I cannot helpe, though innocent. And certainly if there be any, that finding themselues spotted like the Tigers of old time, shal find fault with mee for painting them ouer anew, they shall therein accuse themselues iuſtly, & me falſly.

For I proteſt before the Maieſty of God, That I malice no man vnder the Sunne. Impoſsible I know it is to please all: seeing few or none are so pleased with themselues, or so assured of themselues, by reason of their subiection to their priuate passions, but that they seem diuers persons in one & the same day. Seneca hath said it, and so do I: Vnus mihi pro populo erat: and to the same effect Epicurus, Hoc ego non multis ſed tibi; or (as it hath since lamentably fallen out) I may borrow the resolution of an ancient Philosopher, Satis eſt vnus, Satis eſt nullus. For it was for the seruice of that inestimable Prince Henry, the succeſsiue hope, and one of the greateſt of the Christian World, that I vndertooke this Worke. It pleased him to peruſe some part thereof, and to pardon what was amiſse. It is now left to the world without a Master: from which all that is presented, hath receiued both blows and thanks, Eadem probamus, eadem reprehendimus: hic exitus eſt omnis iudicii, in quo lis ſecundum plures datur. But these discourses are idle. I know that as the charitable will iudge charitably: so against those, qui gloriantur in malitia, my present aduerſity hath disarmed me. I am on the Ground already; & therefore haue not far to fall: and for riſing againe, as in the Naturall priuation there is no receſsion to habit, so it is seldome seene in the priuation politique. I do therefore forbeare to ſtile my Readers Gentle, Courteous, and Friendly, thereby to beg their good opinions; or to promiſe a second and third volume (which I also intend) if the first receiue grace and good acceptance. For that which is already done, may be thought enough, and too much: and it is certaine, let vs claw the Reader with neuer ſo many courteous phraſes, yet shall we euermore be thought fooles, that write fooliſhly. For conclusion, all the hope I haue lies in this, That I haue already found more vngentle and vncourteous Readers of my Loue towards them, and well deſerring of them, than euer I shall doe againe. For had it been otherwiſe, I should hardly haue had this leiſure, to haue made my ſelfe a foole in print.

THE

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORY OF THE WORLD:

INTREATING OF THE BEGINNING, AND first Ages of the same, from the Creation, vnto ABRAHAM.

THE FIRST BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

Of the Creation, and Preseruation of the World.

§. I.

That the inuisible God is seene in his Creatures.

GOD, whom the wisest men acknowledge to be a Power vneffable, and Vertue infinite, a Light by abundant claritie inuisible; an Vnderstanding, which it selfe can onely comprehend, an Essence eternall and spirituall, of absolute pureneſſe and simplicitie; was, and is pleased to make himselfe knowne by the worke of the World: in the wonderfull magnitude whereof, (all which Hee imbraceth, filleth, and sustayneth) we behold the Image of that glorie, which cannot be measured, and withall that one, and yet vniuersall Nature, which cannot be defined. In the glorious Lights of Heauen, we perceiue a shadow of his diuine Countenance; in his mercifull prouision for all that liue, his manifold goodnesse: and lastly, in creating and making existent the World vniuersall, by the absolute Arte of his owne Word, his Power and Almightinesse; which Power, Light, Vertue, Wisedome, and Goodnesse, being all but attributes of one simple Essence, and one God, we in all admire, and in part discerne per speculum creaturarum, that is, in the disposition, order, and varietie of Celestiall and Terrestriall bodies: Terrestriall, in their strange and manifold diuersities; Celestiall, in their beautie and magnitude; which in their continuall and contrary motions, are neither repugnant, intermixt, nor confounded. By these potent effects, we approch to the knowledge of the Omnipotent cause, and by these motions, their Almightie Mouer.

In these more then wonderfull works, God (saith Hugo) speaketh vnto man, and it is true, that these be those discourses of God, whose effects, all that liue, witnesse in themselues; the sensible, in their sensible natures; the reasonable, in their reasonable soules: for according to S. GREGORY, Omnis homo eo ipso quòd rationalis conditus est, ex ipsa ratione, illum qui se condidit, Deum esse colligere debet: Euery man, in that he is reasonable, out of the same reason may know, that he which made him, is God. This God all men behold (saith Iob,) which is according to the Fathers, Dominationem illius conspicere in creaturis, To discerne him in his prouidence by his Creatures. That God hath beene otherwise seene, to wit, with corporall eyes, exceedeth the small proportion of my vnderstanding, ding, grounded on these places of S. Iohn, and S. Paul, Yee haue not heard his voice at any time, neither haue yee seene his shape. And againe, Whom neuer man saw, nor can see.

And this, I am sure, agreeth with the nature of Gods simplicitie, of which S. Augustine, Ipsa enim natura, vel substantia, vel quolibet alio nomine appellandum est, idipsum quod Deus est, corporaliter videri non potest; That nature, or that substance, or by whatsoeuer name that is to be called which is God, whatsoeuer that be, the same cannot be corporally perceiued. And of this opinion were Origen, Cyril, Chrysostome, Gregory Nazianzenus, Hierome, Augustine, Gregory the great, Euaristus, Alcuinus, Dionysius Areopagita, Aquinas, and all others of authoritie. But by his owne Word, and by this visible World, is God perceiued of men, which is also the vnderstood language of the Almightie, vouchsafed to all his Creatures, whose Hieroglyphicall Characters, are the vnnumbred Starres, the Sunne and Moone, written on these large Volumes of the Firmament: written also on the Earth and the Seas, by the letters of all those liuing Creatures, and Plants, which inhabit and reside therein. Therefore said that learned CVSANVS, Mundus vniuersus nihil aliud est, quàm Deus explicatus; The World vniuersall, is nothing else but God expresst. And the inuisible things of God (saith S. Paul) are seene by creation of the World, being considered in his Creatures. Of all which, there was no other cause preceding, then his owne Will, no other matter then his owne Power, no other workman then his owne Word, no other consideration then his owne infinite Goodnesse. The example and patterne of these his Creatures, as hee beheld the same in all eternitie in the abundance of his owne loue, so was it at length in the most wise order, by his vnchanged Will mooued, by his high Wisedome disposed, and by his almightie Power perfected, and made visible. And therefore (saith Mirandula) we ought to loue God, Ex fide, & ex effectibus, (that is) both perswaded by his Word, and by the effects of the Worlds creation: Neq; enim qui causa caret, ex causa & origine sciri, cognosciq; potest, sed vel ex rerum, quæ facta sunt, quæq; fiunt & gubernantur obseruatione & collatione, vel ex ipsius Dei verbo: For he of whom there is no higher cause, cannot be knowne by any knowledge of cause or beginning, (saith Montanus) but either by the obseruing and conferring of things, which he hath, or doth create and gouerne, or else by the Word of God himselfe.

§. II.

That the wisest of the Heathen, whose authoritie is not to be despised, haue acknowledged the world to haue beene created by God.

THis worke and creation of the World, did most of the ancient and learned Philosophers acknowledge, though by diuers termes, and in a different manner expresst, I meane all those who are entitled by S. AVGVSTINE, Summi Philosophi, Philosophers of highest iudgement and vnderstanding. Mercurius Trismegistus calleth God, Principium vniuersorum; The originall of the vniuersall: to whom hee giueth also the attributes of Mens, Natura, Actus, Necessitas, Finis, & Renouatio. And wherein hee truely, with S. Paul, casteth vpon God all power; confessing also, that the world was made by Gods almightie Word, and not by hands: Verbo, non manibus fabricatus est mundus. Zoroaster (whom Heraclitus followed in opinion) tooke the word Fire, to expresse God by (as in Deuteronomy, and in Saint Paul it is vsed) Omnia ex vno igne genita sunt; All things (saith he) are caused, or produced out of one fire.

So did Orpheus plainely teach, that the world had beginning in time, from the Will of the most High God; whose remarkeable words are thus conuerted: Cùm abscondisset omnia Iupiter summus, deindè in lumen gratum emisit, ex sacro corde operans cogitata & mirabilia: Of which I conceiue this sense; When great Iupiter had hidden all things in himselfe; working out of the loue of his sacred heart, he sent thence, or brought forth into gratefull light, the admirable works which he had fore-thought.

Orph. de sum. Ioue.

Pindarus the Poet, and one of the wisest, acknowledged also one God, the most High, to be the Father and Creator of all things; Vnus Deus, Pater, Creator summus. PLATO calleth God the cause and originall, the nature and reason of the vniuersall; Totius rerum natura, causa, & origo Deus. But hereof more at large hereafter.

Vid. cap. 6.

Now, although the curiositie of some men haue found it superfluous, to remember the opinions of Philosophers, in matters of Diuinitie: (it being true, that the Scripture hath.

hath not want of any forraine teſtimony) yet as the Fathers, with others excellently learned, are my examples herein; ſo Saint Paul himſelfe did not deſpiſe, but thought it lawfull, and profitable, to remember whatſoeuer hee found agreeable to the Word of God, among the Heathen, that he might thereby take from them all eſcape, by way of ignorance, God rendring vengeance to them that know him not: as in his Epiſtle to Titus, he citeth Epimenides againſt the Cretians, and to the Corinthians, Menander, and in the ſeuenteenth of the Acts, Aratus, &c. for Truth (ſaith S. Ambroſe) by whomſoeuer vttered, is of the holy Ghoſt; Veritas à quocunq; dicatur, à Spiritu ſancto eſt: and laſtly, let thoſe kind of men learne this rule; Quæ ſacris ſeruiunt, prophana non ſunt; Nothing is prophane that ſerueth to the vſe of holy things.

§. III.

Of the meaning of In Principio, Geneſ. 1. 1.

THis viſible World of which Moſes writeth, God created in the beginning, or, firſt of all: in which (ſaith Tertullian) things began to be. This word Beginning (in which the Hebrewes ſeeke ſome hidden myſterie, and which in the Iewes Targum is conuerted by the word Sapientia) cannot be referred to ſucceſſion of time, nor to order, as ſome men haue conceiued, both which are ſubſequent: but onely to Creation then. For before that Beginning, there was neither primary matter to be informed, nor forme to informe, nor any being, but the Eternall. Nature was not, nor the next Parent of Time begotten, Time properly and naturally taken; for if God had but diſpoſed of Matter already in being, then as the word Beginning could not be referred to all things, ſo muſt it follow, that the inſtitution of Matter proceeded from a greater Power, then that of God. And by what name ſhall we then call ſuch an One (ſaith Lactantius) as exceedeth God in potency: for it is an act of more excellency to make, then to diſpoſe of things made? whereupon it may be concluded, that Matter could not be before this Beginning: except we faine a double Creation, or allow of two Powers, and both infinite, the impoſſibilitie whereof ſcorneth defence. Nam impoſſibile plura eſſe infinita: quoniam alterum eſſet in altero finitum; There cannot bee more infinites then one; for one of them would limit the other. Cuſan. de Mente lib. 3.

§. IIII.

Of the meaning of the words Heauen and Earth: Geneſis 2. 1.

THe vniuerſall matter of the world (which Moyſes comprehendeth vnder the names of Heauen and Earth) is by diuers diuerſly vnderſtood: for there are that conceiue, that by thoſe words, was meant the firſt matter, as the Peripatetikes vnderſtand it, to which, S. Auguſtine and Iſidore ſeeme to adhere. Feciſti mundum (ſaith S. Auguſtine) de materia informi, quam feciſti de nulla re, penè nullam rem: (that is) Thou haſt made the world of a matter without forme; which matter thou madeſt of nothing, and being made, it was little other then nothing.

But this potentiall and imaginarie materia prima, cannot exiſt without forme. Peter Lombard, the Schoole-men, Beda, Lyranus, Comeſtor, Toſtatus and others, affirme, that it pleaſed God firſt of all to create the Empyrean Heauen: which at the ſucceeding inſtant (ſaith Beda and Strabo) he filled with Angels. This Empyrean Heauen Steuchius Eugubinus calleth Diuine claritie, and vncreated: an errour, for which he is ſharply charged by Pererius, though (as I conceiue) he rather fayled in the ſubſequent, when he made it to be a place, and the ſeate of Angels, and iuſt Soules, then in the former affirmation: for of the firſt, That God liueth in eternall Light, it is written; My ſoule, praiſe thou the Lord, that couereth himſelfe with light: and in the Reuelation; And the Citie hath no neede of Sunne, neither of the Moone to ſhine in it: for the glory of God did light it. And herein alſo Iohn Mercer vpon Geneſis, differeth not in opinion from Eugubinus: for as by Heauen created in the beginning, was not meant the inuiſible or ſupercelestiall; ſo in his iudgement, becauſe it was in all Eternitie, the glorious ſeate of God himſelfe, it was not neceſſary to be created; Quem mundum ſupercœleſtem meo iudicio creari (ſaith Mercer) non erat neceſſe. Beda Hex. Strabo ſuper Geneſ. Eug. Coſ. & de nat. incorp. Pſal. 104. 12. Claritas diuina nõ eſt lux ſenſa, ſed ſapientia Dei, non creata, ſed nata. Apoc. 21. 23. Mercer. in Gen. cap. 7. verſ. 7.

But as Moſes forbare to ſpeake of Angels, and of things inuiſible, and incorporate, for the weakneſſe of their capacities, whom he then cared to informe of thoſe things, which were more manifeſt, (to wit) that God did not only by a ſtrong hand deliuer them from the bondage of Egypt, according to his promiſe made to their forefathers: but alſo that he created, and was the ſole cauſe of this aſpectable, and perceiueable Vniuerſall; ſo on the other ſide I dare not thinke, that any ſuperceleſtiall Heauen, or whatſoeuer elſe (not himſelfe) was increate & eternall: and as for the place of God before the world created, the finite wiſdome of mortall men hath no perception of it, neither can it limit the ſeate of infinite power, no more then infinite power it ſelfe can be limited: for his place is in himſelfe, whom no magnitude elſe can cõtain: How great is the houſe of God (ſaith BARVCH) how large is the place of his poſſeſſions! it is great, and hath no end, it is high and vnmeaſurable.

Bar. 3. 24. 25.

But leauing multiplicitie of opinion, it is more probable & allowed, that by the words Heauen and Earth, was meant the ſolid matter and ſubſtance, aſwell of all the Heauens, and Orbes ſupernall, as of the Globe of the Earth and Waters, which couered it ouer, (to wit) that very matter of all things, materia, Chaos, poſsibilitas, ſiue poſſe fieri. Which matter (ſaith Caluin) was ſo called, quòd totius mundi ſemen fuerit; Becauſe it was the ſeed of the Vniuerſall: an opinion of ancient Philoſophers long before.

§. V.

That the ſubſtance of the waters, as mixt in the body of the earth, is by MOSES vnderſtood in the word Earth: and that the Earth, by the attributes of vnformed and voide, is deſcribed as the Chaos of the ancient Heathen.

MOSES firſt nameth Heauen and Earth (putting waters but in the third place) as comprehending waters in the word Earth; but afterwards hee nameth them apart, when God by his Spirit began to diſtinguiſh the confuſed Maſſe, and (as Baſil ſaith) præparare naturam aquæ ad fœcunditatem vitalem; to prepare the nature of water to a vitall fruitfulneſſe.

For vnder the word Heauen, was the matter of all heauenly bodies, and natures expreſt: and by the name of Earth and Waters, all was meant, whatſoeuer is vnder the Moone, and ſubiect to alteration. Corrupt ſeedes bring forth corrupt plants; to which the pure heauens are not ſubiect, though ſubiect to perilhing. They ſhall periſh (ſaith Dauid) and the heauens ſhall vaniſh away like ſmoke, ſaith Eſay. Neither were the waters the matter of Earth: for it is written, Let the waters vnder the heauens be gathered into one place, and let the drie land appeare: which proueth that the drie land was mixt and couered with the waters, and not yet diſtinguiſhed; but no way, that the waters were the matter or ſeede of the Earth, much leſſe of the Vniuerſall. Initio tu Domine terram fundaſti, Thou, O Lord, in the beginning haſt founded the Earth: and againe, The Earth was couered with the Deepe (meaning with waters) as with a garment, ſaith Dauid. And if by naturall arguments it may be proued, that water by condenſation may become earth, the ſame reaſon teacheth vs alſo, that earth rarified may become water: water, aire: aire, fire; and ſo on the contrarie. Deus ignis ſubſtantiam per aerem in aquam conuertit, God turneth the ſubſtance of fire, by aire, into water. For the Heauens and the Earth remained in the ſame ſtate, in which they were created, as touching their ſubſtance, though there was afterwards added multiplicitie of perfection, in reſpect of beautie and ornament. Cælum verò & terra in ſtatu creationis remanſerunt, quantum ad ſubſtantiam, licet multiplex perfectio decoris & ornatus eis poſtmodùm ſuperaddita eſt. And the word which the Hebrewes cal Maim, is not to be vnderſtood according to the Latine tranſlation ſimply, and as ſpecificall water; but the ſame more properly ſignifieth liquor. For (according to Montanus) Eſt autem Maim liquor geminus, & hoc nomen propter verborum penuriam, Latina lingua plurali numero aquas fecit. For Maim (ſaith he) is a double liquor, (that is, of diuers natures) and this name or word the Latines wanting a voice to expreſſe it, call it in the Plurall, Aquas, Waters.

This Maſſe, or indigeſted matter, or Chaos created in the beginning, was without forme, that is, without the proper forme, which it afterwards acquired, when the Spirit of God had ſeparated the Earth, and digeſted it from the waters: And the earth was voide: that is, not producing any creatures, or adorned with any plants, fruits, or flowers. But after the Spirit of God had moued vpon the waters, and wrought this indigeſted matter into that forme, which it now retayneth, then did the earth bud forth the herbe, which ſeedeth ſeede, and the fruitfull tree according to his kind, and God ſaw that it was good; which attribute attribute was not giuen to the Earth, while it was confuſed; nor to the Heauens, before they had motion, and adornement. God ſaw that it was good; that is, made perfect: for perfection is that, to which nothing is wanting. Et perfecti Dei perfecta ſunt opera; The works of the perfect God, are perfect.

From this lump of imperfect Matter had the ancient Poets their inuention of Demogorgon: Heſiodus and Anaxagoras the knowledge of that Chaos, of which Ouid:

Ante Mare, & Terras, & (quod tegit omnia) Cœlum,
Vnus erat toto naturæ vultus in Orbe,
Quem dixêre Chaos, rudis indigeſtaq́; moles. Ouid. in Meta. lib. 1.

Before the Sea and Land was made, and Heauen, that all doth hide,
In all the World one onely face of Nature did abide:
Which Chaos hight, a huge rude heape.

§. VI.

How it is to bee vnderſtood that the Spirit of God mooued vpon the Waters, and that this is not to bee ſearched curiouſly.

AFter the Creation of Heauen and Earth, then void and without forme, the Spirit of God moued vpon the Waters. The Seuenty Interpreters vſe the word ſuperferebatur, moued vpon or ouer: incubabat, or fouebat (ſaith Hierome) out of Baſil; and Baſil out of a Syrian Doctor; Equidem non meam tibi, ſed viri cuiuſdam Syri ſententiam recenſebo (ſaith Baſil:) which words incubare or fouere importing warmth, hatching, or quickning, haue a ſpeciall likeneſſe. Verbum tranſlatum eſt ab auibus pullities ſuæ incubantibus, quamuis ſpirituali, & planè inenarrabili, non autem corporali modo; The word is taken of birds hatching their yong, not corporally, but in a ſpirituall and vnexpreſſible manner. Baſil. Hexam. Iunius.

Some of the Hebrewes conuert it to this effect, Spiritus Dei volitabat; The Spirit of God did flutter: the Chaldæan Paraphraſt in this ſenſe, Ventus à conſpectu Dei ſufflabat: or as other vnderſtand the Chaldæan, Flabat, pellebat, remouebat: The wind from the face of God did blow vnder, driue, or remoue, or did blow vpon, according to the 147. Pſalme, He cauſed his wind to blow, and the waters increaſe: but there was yet no wind nor exhalation. Arias Montanus in theſe words, Et Spiritus Elohim Meracheſet, id eſt, efficaciter motitans, confouens, ac agitans ſuper facies gemini liquoris; The Spirit of God effectually and often mouing, keeping warme, and cheriſhing, quickning and ſtirring vpon the face of this double liquor. Pſal. 147. 18. Ar. Mont. vt ſup. Eugub. in Coſ. fol. 13.

For he maketh foure originals, whereof three are agents, and the laſt paſſiue and materiall, to wit, Cauſa, which is the diuine goodneſſe: Iehi, which is, fiat, ſiue erit, Let it be, or it ſhall be. Quæ vox verbo Dei prima prolata fuit: Which voice (ſaith he) was the firſt that was vttered by the word of God. The third, Spiritus Elohim, the Spirit of God, id eſt, vis quædam diuina, agilis ac præſens, per omnia pertingens, omnia complens, that is, A certayne diuine power, or ſtrength euery where, actiue and extending, and ſtretching through all, filling and finiſhing all things. The fourth he calleth Maim, id eſt, materies ad omnem rem conficiendam habilis; Matter apt to become euery thing. For my ſelfe I am reſolued (Cùm Deus ſit ſuperrationale omni ratione; Seeing God is in all reaſon aboue reaſon) that although the effects which follow his wonderfull wayes of working, may in a meaſure be perceiued by mans vnderſtanding, yet the manner & firſt operation of his diuine power, cannot be conceiued by any mind, or ſpirit, compaſſed with a mortall body. Animalis homo quæ Dei ſunt non percipit: For my thoughts (ſaith the Lord in ESAY) are not your thoughts, neither are your wayes my wayes. And as the world hath not knowne God himſelfe: ſo are his wayes (according to S. PAVL) paſt finding out. O righteous Father, the world hath not knowne thee, ſaith Chriſt. And therefore, whether that motion, vitalitie and operation, were by incubation or how elſe, the manner is onely knowne to God, Quomodo in omnibus ſit rebus vel per eſſentiam, vel per potentiam, intellectus noſter non capit; For, how God (ſaith S. Auguſtine, ſpeaking of his Vbiquitie) is in all things, either by eſſence, preſence, or power, our vnderſtanding cannot comprehend. Nihil inter Deum hominemq́; diſtaret, ſi conſilia, & diſpoſitiones illius maieſtatis æternæ, cogitatio aſſequeretur humana: There would be no difference betweene God and Man, if mans vnderſtanding could conceiue the counſels and diſpoſing of that eternall Maieſtie; and therefore to bee ouer-curious in ſearching how the all-powerfull Word of God wrought in the Creation of the World, or his all-piercing and operatiue Spirit diſtinguiſhing, gaue forme to the Matter Esay 55. 8. Aug. Tract. 20. in Iohan. 17. 25. Lact. in Præfat.

of the Vniuerſall, is a labour and ſearch like vnto his, who not contented with a knowne and ſafe Foord, will preſume to paſſe ouer the greateſt Riuer in all parts, where he is ignorant of their depths: for ſo doth the one loſe his life, and the other his vnderſtanding. We behold the Sunne, and enioy his light, as long as we looke towards it, but tenderly, and circumſpectly: we warme our ſelues ſafely, while we ſtand neare the fire; but if we ſeeke to out-face the one, to enter into the other, we forthwith become blind or burnt.

But to eſchew curioſitie: this is true, that the Engliſh word (moued) is moſt proper and ſignificant: for of motion proceedeth all production, and all whatſoeuer is effected. And this omnipotent Spirit of God, which may indeed be truely called, Principium motus, and with MIRANDVLA, Vis cauſæ efficientis; The force of the efficient cauſe, S. Auguſtine ſometimes taketh for the holy Ghoſt; ſometime for a wind or breath, Sub nomine Spiritus, vnder the name of a Spirit, which is ſometimes ſo taken: or for virtualis creatura, For a created virtuality: Tertullian and Theodoret call it alſo a breath or wind: Mercurius nameth it, Spiritum tenuem intelligibilem, A pure or thin intelligible Spirit: ANAXAGORAS, Mentem: TOSTATVS, Voluntatem & mentem Dei; The will and minde of God; which mens, Plato in Timæo, maketh Animam mundi, The ſoule of the world: and in his ſixt Booke de Republica, he calleth it the Law of Heauen; in his Epiſtles, The Leader of things to come, and the preſence of things paſt. But as Cyprian wrote of the Incarnation of Chriſt our Sauiour, Mens deficit, vox ſilet, & non mea tantùm, ſed etiam Angelorum; My minde fayleth, my voice is ſilent, and not mine onely, but euen the voice of Angels: ſo may all men elſe ſay in the vnderſtanding, and vtterance of the wayes and works of the Creation; for to him (ſaith Nazianzenus) there is not one ſubſtance by which he is, and another, by which he can, Sed conſubſtantiale illi eſt, quicquid eius eſt, & quicquid eſt; Whatſoeuer attribute of him there is, and whatſoeuer he is, it is the very ſame ſubſtance that himſelfe is.

Nazian. lib. 2. Theol.

But the Spirit of God which moued vpon the waters, cannot be taken for a breath or wind, nor for any other creature, ſeparate from the infinite actiue power of God, which then formed and diſtinguiſhed, and which now ſuſtayneth, and giueth continuance to the Vniuerſall. For the Spirit of the Lord filleth all the world; and the ſame is it which maintayneth all things, ſaith SALOMON. If thou ſend forth thy Spirit (ſaith DAVID) they are created: And GREGORY, Deus ſuo præſentiali eſſe, dat omnibus rebus eſſe, ita quòd, ſi ſe rebus ſubtraheret, ſicut de nihilo facta ſunt omnia, ſic in nihilum defluerent vniuerſa; God giueth being to all things, by being preſent with all things, ſo as if he ſhould withdraw himſelfe from them, then as of nothing the world was made, it would againe fall away and vaniſh into nothing. And this working of Gods Spirit in all things, Virgil hath expreſt excellently:

Wiſd. cap. 1. v. 7.

Virg. Æneid. lib. 8. 724.

Principio Cœlum ac Terras, camposq́; liquentes,
Lucentemq́; globum Lunæ, Titaniaq́; aſtra,
Spiritus intus alit: totamq́; infuſa per artus,
Mens agitat molem, & magno ſe corpore miſcet.

The Heauen, the Earth, and all the liquid Mayne,
The Moones bright Globe, and Starres Titanian,
A Spirit within maintaynes: and their whole maſſe,
A Mind, which through each part infus'd doth paſſe,
Faſhions, and works, and wholly doth tranſpierce
All this great Body of the Vniuerſe.

And this was the ſame Spirit, which moued in the Vniuerſall, and thereby both diſtinguiſhed and adorned it. His Spirit hath garniſhed the Heauens, ſaith Iob. So then the Spirit of God moued vpon the waters, and created in them their ſpiritualitie, and naturall motion; motion brought forth heate; and heate rarifaction, and ſubtilitie of parts. By this Spirit (which gaue heate and motion, and thereby, operation to euery nature, while it moued vpon the waters, which were in one indigeſted lump, and Chaos, diſpoſed to all formes alike) was begotten Aire: an element ſuperior, as lighter then the waters, through whoſe vaſt, open, ſubtile, diaphanicke, or tranſparent body, the light afterwards created might eaſily tranſpierce: Light, for the excellency thereof, being the firſt creature which God called good, whoſe creation immediately followed. This Spirit Chryſoſtome calleth a vitall Operation, Aquis à Deo inſitam, ex qua aqua non ſolùm motionem, ſed & vim procreandi animalia habuerint. He calleth it, A vitall Operation giuen by God vnto the waters, whereby the waters had not onely motion, but alſo power to procreate or bring forth liuing Creatures.

§. VII.

Of the light created, as the materiall substance of the Sunne: and of the nature of it, and difficultie of knowledge of it: and of the excellency and vse of it: and of motion, and heate annexed vnto it.

THese waters were afterwards congregated, and called the Sea: and this Light afterwards (in the fourth day) gathered and vnited, and called the Sunne, the Organ, and instrument of created light. For this first and dispersed light did not (as I conceiue) distinguish the night from the day, but with a reference to the Sunnes creation, and the vniting of the dispersed light therein. This is proued by these words, Let there be lights in the Firmament, to separate the day from the night: which lights in the firmament of Heauen were also made for signes, and for seasons, and for dayes, and for yeares, implying a motion instantly to follow, by which, dayes and yeares are distinguished; after which succeeded Time, or together with which, that Time (which was the measure of motion) began. For that space of the first three dayes which preceded the Sunnes creation, or formall perfection, when as yet there was not any motion to be measured, and the day named in the fift Verse, was but such a space, as afterwards by the Sunnes motion made a ciuill or naturall day. And as Waters were the matter of Aire, of the firmament, and of the lower and vpper waters; and of the Seas, and Creatures therein: Earth, the matter of Beasts, Plants, Minerals, and Mans body: so may Light (for expression sake) be called the Chaos, or materiall substance of the Sunne, & other lights of heauen: Howbeit, neither the Sunne, nor any thing sensible, is that Light it selfe, Quæ causa est lucidorum, Which is the cause that things are lightsome (though it make it selfe & all things else visible) but a body most illightned, which illuminateth the Moone, by whom the neighbouring Region (which the Greeks call Æther, the place of the supposed Element of fire) is affected and qualified, and by it all bodies liuing in this our aire. For this light Auicenna calleth vehiculum & fomentum omnium cælestium virtutum, & impressionum: The conducter, and preseruer or nourisher of all celestiall vertues and impressions, nothing descending of heauenly influences, but by the medium, or meanes of light. Aristotle calleth light, a qualitie, inherent, or cleauing to a Diaphanous body, Lumen est qualitas inherens Diaphano: but this may be better auouched of the heate, which it transporteth and bringeth with it, or conducteth: which heate (say the Platonicks) Abeunte lumine residet in subiecto, The light being departed, doth reside in the subiect, as warmth in the aire, though the same be depriued of light. This light Plotinus and all the Academikes make incorporall, and so doth MONTANVS, Cui nec duritia resistit, nec spatium; Which neither hardnesse resisteth, nor space leaueth.

Aristotle findeth corporalitie in the beames of light; but it is but by way of repetition of other mens opinions, saith Picolomineus, Democritus, Leucippus, and Epicurus, giue materialitie to light it selfe, but improperly: for it passeth at an instant, from the Heauen to the Earth, nor is it resisted by any hardnesse, because it pierceth through the solid body of glasse, or other Cristalline matter; and whereas it is withstood by vncleane, and vnpure earthy substances, lesse hard, and more easie to inuade then the former, the same is, Quòd obstaculum naturâ terreum atq; sordidum, non capit candidam luminis puritatem; Because an obstacle, by nature earthy and foule, doth not receiue the pure clearnesse of light: alluding to that most diuine Light, which onely shineth on those minds, which are purged from all worldly drosse, and humane vncleannesse.

Plotin.

But of this created light, there is no agreement in opinion; neither doe I maruaile at it, for it cannot be found either in the Fathers, Philosophers, or Schoole-men, or other ancient or later Writers, that any of them vnderstood either it or themselues therein: all men (to cast off ignorance) haue disputed hereof, but there is no man that hath beene taught thereby. Thomas Aquinas (not inferiour to any in wit) as hee hath shewed little strength of argument in refuting the opinions of Beda, Hugo, Lombard, Lyranus, and others: so is his owne iudgement herein, as weake as any mans; and most of the Schoolemen were rather curious in the nature of termes, and more subtile in distinguishing vpon the parts of doctrine already laid downe, then discouerers of any thing hidden, either in Philosophie or Diuinitie: of whom it may be truely said, Nihil sapientiæ odiosiùs acumine nimio; Nothing is more odious to true wisedome, then too acute sharpnesse. Neither hath the length of time, and the search of many learned men, (which the same time hath brought forth and deuoured) resolued vs, whether this light be substantiall, corporall, or incorporall: Corporall they say it cannot bee, because then it could neither pierce the aire, nor those hard, solid, and Diaphanous bodies, which it doth, and yet euery day we see the aire illightned: incorporall it cannot bee, because it sometime affecteth the sight of the eye with offence, and therefore by most of the Fathers so esteemed: others say, (as Patricius) that it cannot be matter, because no forme so excellent as it selfe to informe it: neither can it be any accident, which is not separable without the destruction of the subiect: for light being taken from the Sunne, the Sunne is no more the Sunne in existence. Secondly, if light were proceeding from matter and forme, then either, or both must be one of these, lucide or bright, darke or opake, Diaphanous or transparent; but darknesse cannot be parent of light; and things Diaphanous (being neither light, nor darknesse, but capable of either) cannot be the cause of either, and therefore must the matter, or forme, or both, be lucide and shining. Lucide and shining obtayne their so being of the light; and therefore, if wee deriue this being of light from a former, then would the progresse goe on infinitely, and against nature; and therefore he concludeth, that light in the Sunne hath his being primarily, and immediately of it selfe, and is therefore the Sunnes forme, and the forme of all lucide and shining bodies: but what is taught hereby, let others iudge.

Lucida corpora sunt plena sua luce, alienis tenebris imperuia. Opaca sunt plena suis tenebris alieno lumine. Transparentia seu Diaphana carent suis & lumine & tenebris: alienis & lumine & tenebris permeantur. Scal. subt. ex. 71.

But in my vnderstanding, Lumen, (which may be Englished by the word Shine) is an intentionall Species of that, which may be Englished by Light, and so, this shining which proceedeth from the Sunne, or other lights of Heauen, or from any other light, is an Image, or intentionall Species thereof; and an intentionall Species may be vnderstood by the example of a red, or greene colour, occasioned by the shining of the Sun through red or greene glasse: for then we perceiue the same colour cast vpon any thing opposite; which redneſse or other colour, we call the intentionall Species of the colour in that glasse. And againe, as this light, touching his simple nature, is no way yet vnderstood: so it is disputed, whether this light first created, bee the same which the Sunne inholdeth and casteth forth, or whether it had continuance any longer then till the Sunnes creation.

Genes. 1. But by the most wise and vnchanged order, which God obserued in the worke of the World, I gather, that the Light, in the first day created, was the substance of the Sunne: Vers. 12. for Moses repeateth twice the mayne parts of the Vniuersall; first, as they were created in matter; secondly, as they were adorned with forme: first, naming the Heauens, the Earth, the Waters, all confused; and afterward, the Waters congregated, the Earth made drie Land, and the Heauens distinguished from both, and beautified. And therefore the Earth, as it was earth, before it was vncouered, and before it was called Arida, or drie Land; and the Waters were waters, before they were congregated, and called the Sea, though neither of them perfect, or inriched with their vertuall formes: so the Sunne, although it had not his formall perfection, his circle, beautie, and bounded magnitude, till the fourth day, yet was the substance thereof in the first day (vnder the name of Light) created; and this Light formerly dispersed, was in the same fourth day vnited, and set in the Firmament of Heauen: for to Light created in the first day, God gaue no proper place or fixation; and therefore the effects named by Anticipation, (which was, to separate day from night) were precisely performed, after this Light was congregated, and had obtayned life and motion. Neither did the wisedome of God finde cause why it should mooue (by which motion, dayes and nights are distinguished) till then: because there was not yet any Creature produced, to which, by mouing, the Sunne might giue light, heate, and operation.

But after the Earth (distinguished from Waters) began to bud forth the bud of the herbe, &c. God caused the Sunne to moue, and (by interchange of time) to visite euery part of the inferiour world; by his heate to stirre vp the fire of generation, and to giue actiuitie to the seeds of all natures: For, as a King, which commandeth some goodly building to be erected, doth accommodate the same to that vse and end, to which it was ordayned; so it pleased God (saith Procopius) to command the Light to be; which by his all-powerfull Word he approued, and approuing it, disposed thereof, to the vse and comfort of his future Creatures.

Iob 38. 24. But in that it pleased God to aske of IOB, By what way is the light parted, and where is the way where light dwelleth? we thereby know, that the nature thereof falleth not vnder mans vnderstanding; and therefore let it suffice, that by Gods grace we enioy the effects fects thereof. For this light is of the treaſure of God (ſaith ESDRAS.) And thoſe which inhabite the Heauens, doe onely know the Eſſence thereof. Nihil ignotum in cœlo, nihil notum in terra: Nothing vnknowne in Heauen, nothing perfectly knowne on earth. Res veræ ſunt in mundo inuiſibili, in mundo viſibili vmbræ rerum: Things themſelues are in the inuiſible world, in the world viſible, but their ſhadowes: Surely, if this Light be not ſpirituall, yet it approcheth neareſt vnto ſpiritualitie; and if it haue any corporalitie, then of all other the moſt ſubtile and pure; for howſoeuer, it is of all things ſeene, the moſt beautifull, and of the ſwifteſt motion, of all other the moſt neceſſary and beneficiall. For it miniſtreth to men, and other creatures, all celeſtiall influences; it diſſipateth thoſe ſad thoughts and ſorrowes, which the darkneſſe both begetteth and maintayneth; it diſcouereth vnto vs the glorious works of God, and carryeth vp with an Angelicall ſwiftneſſe, our eyes vnto Heauen, that by the ſight thereof, our minds being informed of his viſible maruailes, may continually trauaile to ſurmount theſe perceiued Heauens, and to finde out their omnipotent Cauſe and Creator. Cognitio non quieſcit in rebus creatis; Our knowledge doth not quiet it ſelfe in things created. Et ipſa lux facit, vt cætera mundi membra digna ſint laudibus, cùm ſuam bonitatem & decorem omnibus communicet; It is the Light (ſaith Saint AMBROSE) that maketh the other parts of the world ſo worthy of praiſe, ſeeing that it ſelfe communicateth its goodneſſe and beauty vnto all: of which Ouid out of Orpheus:

The World diſcernes it ſelfe, while I the World behold,
By me the longeſt yeares, and other times are told,
I the worlds eye.

Laſtly, if we may behold in any creature, any one ſparke of that eternall fire, or any far-off dawning of Gods glorious brightneſſe, the ſame in the beautie, motion, and vertue of this Light, may be perceiued. Therefore was God called Lux ipſa, and the Light, by Hermes named Lux ſancta, and Chriſt our Sauiour ſaid to be that Light, which lighteth euery man that commeth into the world. Yet in reſpect of Gods incomprehenſible ſublimitie, and puritie, this is alſo true, that God is neither a minde, nor a Spirit of the nature of other ſpirits; nor a light, ſuch as can be diſcerned. Deus profectò non mens eſt, at verò vt ſit mens cauſa eſt; nec ſpiritus, ſed cauſa qua ſpiritus extat; nec lumen, ſed cauſa qua lumen exiſtit. God (ſaith HERMES in Pœmandro) certainly is not a minde, but the cauſe that the minde hath his being; nor ſpirit, but the cauſe by which euery ſpirit is; nor light, but the cauſe by which the light exiſteth.

Ioh. 1. 9. & 14. 46.

So then the Maſſe and Chaos being firſt created, void, darke, and imformed, was by the operatiue Spirit of God, pierced and quickned, and the Waters hauing now receiued Spirit and motion, reſolued their thinner parts into Aire, which God illightned: the Earth alſo by being contiguat, and mixt with waters (participating the ſame diuine vertue) brought forth the bud of the herbe that ſeedeth ſeede, &c. and for a meane and organ, by which this operatiue vertue might be continued, God appointed the Light to be vnited, and gaue it alſo motion and heate, which heate cauſed a continuance of thoſe ſeuerall ſpecies, which the Earth (being made fruitfull by the Spirit) produced, and with motion begate the time and times ſucceeding.

Gen. 1. 10.

§. VIII.

Of the Firmament, and of the waters aboue the Firmament: and whether there be any Criſtalline Heauen, or any Primum mobile.

AFter that the Spirit of God had moued vpon the waters, and light was created, God ſaid, Let there be a Firmament in the middeſt of the waters, and let it ſeparate the waters from the waters: that is, thoſe waters which by rarifaction and euaporation were aſcended, and thoſe of the Earth and Sea.

But theſe waters ſeparate aboue this extenſion, which the Latine Tranſlation calleth firmamentum, or expanſum (for ſo Vatablus, Pagninus, and Iunius turne it) are not the Criſtalline Heauens, created in the imaginations of men; which opinion Baſilius Magnus calleth a childiſh ſuppoſition, making in the ſame place many learned arguments againſt against this fancy. For the waters aboue the Firmament, are the waters in the Aire aboue vs, where the same is more solid and condense, which God separated from the neather waters by a Firmament, that is, by an extended distance and vast space: the words Raquia, which Montanus writeth Rakiagh, and Shamaïm, being indifferently taken for the Heauen and for Aire, and more properly for the Aire and Æther, then for the Heauens, as the best Hebricians vnderstand them, Quo suprema ac tenuia ab infimis crassis ducta, intersectáq; distarent, for that whereby the supreme and thin bodies were placed in distance, being seuered and cut off from low and grosse matters: and the waters aboue the Firmament, expresst in the word Maïm, are in that tongue taken properly for the waters aboue the Aire, or in the vppermost Region of the same.

Mont. Nat. hist. fol. 152.

And that the word Heauen is vsed for the Aire, the Scriptures euerywhere witnesse, as in the blessings of Ioseph, and in the 104. Psalme. * By these Springs shall the fowle of the Heauen dwell; and [a] vpon Sodom and Gomorrha it rayned brimstone and fire out of the Heauen; and in Isaacs blessing to Iacob, GOD giue thee therefore of the dew of Heauen; and in Deuteronomie the 11. But the land whither you goe to possesse it, is a land, that drinketh water of the rayne of Heauen; and in IOB, Who hath ingendred the frosts of Heauen; and in S. MATTHEW, Behold the Fowles of Heauen, for they sow not. So as in all the Scriptures of the old Testament throughout, is the word Heauen very often vsed for aire, and taken also hyperbolically for any great heigth, as, Let vs build vs a Tower, whose top may reach to Heauen, &c. And in this very place Basil auoucheth, that this appellation of Heauen for the Firmament, is but by way of similitude: his owne words be these; Et vocauit Deus firmamentum cœlum. Hæc appellatio alij quidem propriè accommodatur, huic autem nunc ad similitudinem; And God called the firmament Heauen: This appellation (saith Basil) is properly applyed to another (that is, to the Starry Heauen) but to this, (that is, to the Firmament diuiding the waters) it is imposed by similitude: and if there were no other proofe, that by the Firmament was meant the Ayre, and not the Heauen, the words of MOSES in the eighth Verse, conferred with the same word Firmament in the twentieth Verse, makes it manifest: for in the eighth Verse it is written, that God called the Firmament, which diuided waters from waters, Heauen; and in the 20. Verse he calleth the Firmament of Heauen, Ayre, in these words: And let the Fowle flye vpon the earth in the open firmament of Heauen. And what vse there should be of this ycie, or cristalline, or waterie Heauen, I conceiue not, except it be to moderate and temper the heate, which the Primummobile would otherwise gather and increase: though in verie truth, in stead of this helpe, it would adde an vnmeasurable greatnesse of circle, whereby the swiftnesse of that first Moueable would exceede all possibilitie of beliefe. Sed nemo tenetur ad impossibilia; but no man ought to be held to impossibilities; and saith it selfe (which surmounteth the heighth of all humane reason) hath for a forcible Conducter, the Word of Truth, which also may be called lumen omnis rationis & intellectus; the light of all reason and vnderstanding. Now that this supposed first Moueable, turneth it selfe so many hundred thousand miles in an instant (seeing the Scriptures teach it not) let those that can beleeue mens imaginations, apprehend it, for I cannot. But of these many Heauens, let the Reader that desireth satisfaction, search Orontius, and of this waterie Heauen, Basilius Magnus in his Hexam. fol. 40. 41. &c. and Matth. Beroaldus, his second Booke, and sixt Chapter. For my selfe, I am perswaded, that the waters, called, The waters aboue the Heauens, are but the cloudes and waters ingendred in the vppermost Ayre.

A conclusion repeating the summe of the workes in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter, The forming of it, The finishing of it.

THO conclude, it may be gathered out of the first Chapter of Genesis, that this was the order of the most wise GOD in the beginning, and when there was no other nature, or being, but Gods incomprehensible eternitie. First, hee created the matter of all things: and in the first three dayes he distinguished and gaue to euery nature his proper forme; the forme of leuitie to that which ascended, to that which descended, the forme of grauitie: for he separated light from darkenesse, diuided waters from waters, and gathered the waters vnder the Firmament into one place. In the last three three daies, God adorned, beautified, and replenished the World: he set in the Firmament of Heauen, the Sunne, Moone, and Starres; filled the Earth with Beasts, the Aire with Fowle, and the Sea with Fish, giuing to all that haue life, a power generatiue, thereby to continue their Species and kindes; to Creatures vegetatiue and growing, their seedes in themselues; for he created all things, that they might haue their being: and the generations of the world are preserued. Wisd. Sal. c. 1. 14.

That Nature is no Principium per se; nor forme the giuer of being: and of our ignorance, how second causes should haue any proportion with their effects.

AND for this working power, which we call Nature, the beginning of motion and rest, according to Aristotle, the same is nothing else, but the strength and faculty, which God hath infused into euerie creature, hauing no other seife-abilitie, then a Clocke, after it is wound vp by a mans hand, hath. These therefore that atttribute vnto this facultie, any first or sole power, haue therein no other vnderstanding, then such a one hath, who looking into the Sterne of a Ship, and finding it guided by the Helme and Rudder, doth ascribe some absolute vertue to the peece of wood, without all consideration of the hand that guides it, or of the iudgement, which also directeth and commandeth that hand; forgetting in this and in all else, that by the vertue of the first act, all Agents worke whatsoeuer they worke: Virtute primi actus agunt agentia omnia quicquid agunt: for as the minde of man seeth by the Organ of the eye, heareth by the eares, and maketh choyce by the will: and therefore we attribute sight to the eye, and hearing to the eares, &c. and yet it is the minde onely, that giueth abilitie, life, and motion to all these his instruments and Organs; so God worketh by Angels, by the Sunne, by the Starres, by Nature, or infused properties, and by men, as by seuerall Organs, seuerall effects; all second causes whatsoeuer, being but instruments, conduits, and pipes, which carrie and disperse what they haue receyued from the head and fountaine of the Vniuersall. For as it is Gods infinite power, and eueriewhere-presence (compassing, embracing, and piercing all things) that giueth to the Sunne power to draw vp vapours, to vapours to be made cloudes, cloudes to containe raine, and raine to fall: so all second and instrumentall causes, together with Nature it selfe, without that operatiue facultie which God gaue them, would become altogether silent, vertulesse, and dead: of which excellentlie ORPHEVS; Per te virescunt omnia, All things by thee spring forth in youthfull greene. I enforce not these things, thereby to annihilate those variable vertues which God hath giuen to his creatures, animate and inanimate, to heauenly and earthly bodies, &c. for all his workes in their vertues prayse him: but of the manner how God worketh in them, or they in or with each other, which the Heathen Philosophers, and those that follow them, haue taken on them to teach: I say, there is not any one among them, nor any one among vs, that could euer yet conceiue it, or expresse it, euer enrich his owne vnderstanding with any certaine truth, or euer edifie others (not foolish by selfe-flatterie) therein. For (saith Lactantius, speaking of the wisedome of the Philosophers) Si facultas inueniendæ veritatis huic studio subiaceret, aliquando esset inuenta; cùm verò tot temporibus, tot ingeniis in eius inquisitione contritis, non sit comprehensa, apparet nullam ibi esse sapientiam; If in this studie (saith he) were meanes to find out the truth, it had ere this beene found out: but seeing it is not yet comprehended, after that so much time, and so many wits haue beene worne out in the inquirie of it, it appeareth, that there is no wisedome there to be had. Nam si de vna re præcisa scientia haberetur, omnium rerum scientia necessariò haberetur: If the precise knowledge of any one thing were to be had, it should necessarily follow, that the knowledge of all things were to be had. And as the Philosophers were ignorant in Nature, and the wayes of her working: so were they more curious, then knowing, in their first matter and Physicall forme. For if their first matter had any being, it were not then the first matter: for, as it is the first matter, it hath only a power of being, which it altogether leaueth, when it doth subsist. And seeing it is neither a substance perfect, nor a substance inchoate, or in the way of perfection, how any other substance should thence take concrescence, it hath not beene taught, neyther are these formes (saith a learned Author) any thing, si ex ea exprimatur potentia, quæ nihil est. Againe, how this first matter should be subiectum icctum formarum, and passiue, which is vnderstood to precede the forme, it is hard to conceiue: for to make forme which is the cause, to be subsequent to the thing caused (to wit, to the first matter) is contrarie to all reason, diuine and humane: onely it may be said, that originally there is no other difference betweene matter and forme; then betweene heate and fire, of which the one cannot subsist without the other, but in a kinde of rationall consideration. Leauing therefore these Riddles to their Louers, who by certaine scholasticall distinctions wrest and peruert the truth of all things, and by which Aristotle hath laboured to proue a false eternitie of the World, I thinke it farre safer to affirme with Saint AVGVSTINE, That all species and kindes are from God, from whom, whatsoeuer is naturall proceedeth, of what kinde or estimation soeuer, from whence are the seedes of all formes, and the formes of all seedes and their motions; A quo est omnis species, à quo est quicquid naturaliter est, cuiuscunq; generis est, cuiuscunq; æstimationis est, à quo sunt semina formarum, formæ seminum, motus seminum atq; formarum. And thus much Auerrois is forced to confesse. For all formes (saith hee) are in primo motore; which is also the opinion of Aristotle in the twelfth of his Metaph. and of Albertus vpon Dionysius.

Of Fate; and that the Starres haue great influence: and that their operations may diuersly be preuented or furthered.

AND, as of Nature, such is the dispute and contention concerning Fate or Destinie, of which the opinions of those learned men that haue written thereof, may be safely receiued, had they not thereunto annexed and fastened an ineuitable necessitie, and made it more generall, and vniuersally powerfull then it is, by giuing it Dominion ouer the minde of man, and ouer his will; of which Ouid and Iuuenal:

An errour of the Chaldæans, and after them of the Stoicks, the Pharisees, Priscillianists, the Bardisanists, and others, as Basil, Augustine, and Thomas haue obserued: but that Fate is an obedience of second causes to the first, was well conceiued of Hermes, and Apuleius the Platonist. Plotinus out of the Astronomers calleth it a disposition from the acts of celestiall Orbes, vnchangeably working in inferiour bodies, the same being also true enough, in respect of all those things, which a rationall minde doth not order nor direct. Ptolomie, Seneca, Democritus, Epicurus, Chrysippus, Empedocles, and the Stoicks, some of them more largely, others more strictly, ascribe to Fate a binding and ineuitable necessitie; and that it is the same which is spoken and determined by God (quod de vnoquoq; nostrum fatus est Deus) and the definite lot of all liuing. And certainely it cannot be doubted, but the Starres are instruments of farre greater vse, then to giue an obscure light, and for men to gaze on after Sunne-set: it being manifest, that the diuersitie of seasons, the Winters, and Summers, more hote and colde, are not so vncertained by the Sunne and Moone alone, who alway keepe one and the same course, but that the Starres haue also their working therein.

And if we cannot denie, but that God hath giuen vertues to Springs and Fountaines, to colde earth, to plants and stones, Mineralls, and to the excrementall parts of the basest liuing creatures, why should we robbe the beautifull Starres of their working powers? for seeing they are many in number, and of eminent beautie and magnitude, wee may not thinke, that in the treasurie of his wisedome, who is infinite, there can be wanting (euen for euerie Starre) a peculiar vertue and operation; as euery herbe, plant, fruit, and flower adorning the face of the Earth, hath the like. For as these were not created to beutifie the earth alone, and to couer & shadow her dustie face, but otherwise for the vse of man and beast, to feed them and cure them; so were not those vncountable glorious bodies set in the Firmament, to no other end, then to adorne it, but for instruments and Organs of his diuine prouidence, so farre as it hath pleased his iust will

to determine. Origen vpon this place of Genesis, Let there be light in the Firmament, &c. affirmeth, that the Starres are not causes (meaning perchance binding causes) but are as open Bookes, wherein are contained and set downe all things whatsoeuer to come; but not to be read by the eyes of humane wisedome: which latter part I beleeue well, and this saying of Syracides withall; That there are hid yet greater things then these be, and we haue seene but a few of his workes. And though, for the capacitie of men, wee know somewhat, yet in the true and vttermost vertues of herbes and plants, which our selues sow and set, and which grow vnder our feet, wee are in effect ignorant; much more in the powers and working of celestiall bodies, for hardly (saith SALOMON) can we discerne the things that are vpon the Earth, and with great labour finde we out those things that are before vs: who can then inuestigate the things that are in Heauen? Multum est de rebus cœlestibus aliquid cognoscere: It is much to know a little of heauenly things. But in this question of Fate, the middle course is to be followed, that as with the Heathen wee doe not binde God to his creatures, in this supposed necessitie of destinie, so on the contrarie, wee doe not robbe those beautifull creatures of their powers and offices. For had any of these second causes despoyled God of his prerogatiue, or had God himselfe constrayned the minde and will of man to impious acts by any celestiall inforcements, then sure the impious excuse of some were iustifiable; of whom Saint AVGVSTINE: Impiâ peruersitate in malis factis rectissimè reprehendendis ingerunt accusandum potius auctorẽ syderum, quàm commissorem scelerum. Where we reprehend them of euill deeds, they againe with wicked peruersenesse vrge, that rather the Author and Creatour of the Starres, then the doer of the euill is to be accused.

Aristotle.

Aug.2.super Gen.ad lit.

But that the Starres and other celestiall bodies incline the will by mediation of the sensitiue appetite, which is also stirred by the constitution and complexion, it cannot be doubted. Corpora cœlestia (saith DAMASCENE) constituunt in nobis habitus, complexiones, & dispositiones, The heauenly bodies (saith hee) make in vs habits, complexions, and dispositions: for the bodie (though Galen inforce it further) hath vndoubtedly a kinde of drawing after it the affections of the minde, especially bodies strong in humour, and weake in vertues; for those of cholericke complexion are subiect to anger, and the furious effects thereof; by which they suffer themselues to bee transported, where the minde hath not reason to remember, that passions ought to be her Vassals, not her Masters. And that they wholly direct the reasonlesse mind I am resolued: For of all those which were created mortall, as birds, beasts, and the like, are left to their naturall appetites, ouer all which, celestiall bodies (as instruments and Executioners of Gods prouidence) haue absolute dominion. What we should iudge of men, who little differ from beasts, I cannot tell: for as hee that contendeth against those inforcements, may easily master or resist them: so whosoeuer shall neglect the remedies by vertue and pietie prepared, putteth himselfe altogether vnder the power of his sensuall appetite; Vincitur fatum si resistas, vincit si contempseris: Fate will be ouercome, if thou resist it, if thou neglect, it conquereth.

Gal.Lmm.&c. seq.tom.

But that either the Starres or the Sunne haue any power ouer the mindes of men immediately, it is absurd to thinke, other then as aforesaid, as the same by the bodies temper may be effected. Lumen solis ad generationem sensibilium corporum confert, & ad vitam ipsam mouet, & nutrit, & auget, & perficit: The light of the Sunne (saith Saint AVGVSTINE) helpeth the generation of sensible bodies, moueth them to life, and nourisheth, augmenteth, and perfecteth them: yet still as a Minister, not as a Master: Bonus quidem est Sol, in ministerio, non imperio; The Sunne is good to serue, not to sway (saith S. Ambrose.) And Saint AVGVSTINE: Deus regit inferiora corpora per superiora; God ruleth the bodies below by those aboue, but hee auoucheth not, that superiour bodies haue rule ouer mens mindes, which are incorporeall.

Hex.lib.4.determ.3.

But howsoeuer we are by the Starres inclined at our birth, yet there are many things both in Nature and Art, that encounter the same, and weaken their operation: and Aristotle himselfe confesseth, that the Heauens doe not alwaies worke their effects in inferiour bodies, no more then the signes of raine and winde doe alwaies come to passe. And it is diuers times seene, that paternall vertue and vice hath his counter-working to these inclinations. Est in Iuuencis patrum virtus; In the young off-spring the Fathers vertue is, and so the contrarie, patrum vitia: and herein also there is often found an enterchange; the Sonnes of vertuous men, by an ill constellation become inclinable to vice, and of vicious men, to vertue.

Hor.lib.4.Od.30.

Egregia eſt ſoboles, ſceleratò nata parente.
A worthie ſonne is borne of a wicked father.

But there is nothing (after Gods reſerued power) that ſo much ſetteth this art of influence out of ſquare and rule, as education doth: for there are none in the World ſo wickedly inclined, but that a religious inſtruction and bringing vp may faſhion anew and reforme them; nor any ſo well diſpoſed, whom (the reines being let looſe) the continuall fellowſhip and familiaritie, and the examples of diſſolute men may not corrupt and deforme. Veſſels will euer retaine a ſauour of their firſt liquor: it being equally difficult eyther to cleanſe the minde once corrupted, or to extinguiſh the ſweet ſauour of vertue firſt receyued, when the minde was yet tender, ſopen, and eaſily ſeaſoned; but where a fauourable conſtellation (allowing that the Starres incline the will) and a vertuous education doe happily arriue, or the contrarie in both, thereby it is that men are found ſo exceeding vertuous or vicious, Heauen and Earth (as it were) running together, and agreeing in one: for as the ſeedes of vertue may by the art and huſbandrie of Chriſtian counſaile produce better and more beautifull fruit, then the ſtrength of ſelfe-nature and kind could haue yeelded them; ſo the plants apt to grow wilde, and to change themſelues into weedes, by beeing ſet in a ſoyle ſutable, and like themſelues, are made more vnſauourie and filled with poyſon. It was therefore truely affirmed, Sapiens adiuuabit opus aſtrorum, quemadmodum agricola terræ naturam; A wiſe man aſſiſteth the worke of the Starres, as the Husbandman helpeth the nature of the ſoyle. And Ptolomie himſelfe confeſſeth thus much, Sapiens, & omina ſapientiæ medici dominabuntur aſtris, A wiſeman, and the ominous art of a wiſe Phyſician ſhall preuaile againſt the Starres. Laſtly, we ought all to know, that God created the Starres, as he did the reſt of the Vniuerſal, whoſe influences may be called his reſerued and vnwritten Lawes. But let vs conſider how they bind: euen as the Lawes of men doe; for although the Kings and Princes of the World haue by their Lawes decreed, that a Thiefe and a Murderer ſhall ſuffer death; and though their Ordinances are daily by Iudges and Magiſtrates (the Starres of Kings) executed accordingly, yet theſe Lawes doe not depriue Kings of their naturall or religious compaſſion, or binde them without prerogatiue, to ſuch a ſeuere execution, as that there ſhould be nothing left of libertie to iudgement, power, or conſcience: the Law in his owne nature, being no other then a deafe Tyrant. But ſeeing that it is otherwiſe, and that Princes (who ought to imitate God in all they can) doe ſometimes for cauſes to themſelues knowne, and by mediation, pardon offences both againſt others and themſelues, it were then impious to take that power and libertie from God himſelfe, which his Subſtitutes enioy; God being mercie, goodneſſe, and charitie it ſelfe. Otherwiſe that example of Prayer by our Sauiour taught; And let vs not be led into temptation, but deliuer vs from euill, had beene no other but an expence of words and time; but that God (which onely knoweth the operation of his owne creatures truely) hath aſſured vs, that there is no inclination or temptation ſo forcible, which our humble Prayers and deſires may not make fruſtrate, and breake aſunder: for were it (as the Stoicks conceiue) that Fate or Deſtinie, though depending vpon eternall power, yet being once ordered and diſpoſed, had ſuch a connexion and immutable dependencie, that God himſelfe ſhould in a kind haue ſhut vp himſelfe therein: How miſerable then were the condition of men (ſaith S. AVGVSTINE) left altogether without hope! And if this ſtrength of the Starres were ſo transferred, as that God had quitted vnto them all dominion ouer his creatures; be hee Pagan or Chriſtian that ſo beleeueth, the onely true God of the one, and the imaginarie gods of the other would thereby be deſpoyled of all worſhip, reuerence, or reſpect.

Mat. 6. 13.

And certainly, God which hath promiſed vs the reward of well-doing, which Chriſt himſelfe claimed at the hands of the Father, (I haue finiſhed the worke which thou gaueſt mee to doe:) and the ſame God, who hath threatned vnto vs the ſorrow and torment of offences, could not contrary to his mercifull nature be ſo vniuſt, as to bind vs ineuitably to the Deſtinies or influences of the Starres, or ſubiect our ſoules to any impoſed neceſſitie. But it was well ſaid of Plotinus, that the Starres were ſignificant, but not efficient, giuing them yet ſomething leſſe then their due: and therefore as I do not conſent with them, who would make thoſe glorious creatures of God vertueleſſe: ſo I thinke that wee derogate from his eternall and abſolute power and prouidence, to aſcribe to them them the ſame dominion ouer our immortall ſoules, which they haue ouer all bodily ſubſtances, and periſhable natures: for the ſoules of men, louing and fearing God, receiue influence from that diuine light it ſelfe, whereof the Sunnes claritie, and that of the Starres is by Plato called but a ſhadow. Lumen eſt vmbra Dei, & Deus eſt lumen luminis; Light is the ſhadow of Gods brightneſſe, who is the light of light: But to end this queſtion, becauſe this Deſtinie, together with Prouidence, Preſcience, and Predeſtination are often confounded, I thinke it not impertinent to touch the difference in a word or two, for euery man hath not obſerued it, though all learned men haue. Plat. pol. 6. Ficin. in l. 7. pol.

§. XII.

Of Preſcience.

PReſcience, or fore-knowledge (which the Greekes call Prognoſis, the Latines præcognitio, or præſcientia) conſidered in order and nature (if we may ſpeake of God after the manner of men) goeth before Prouidence: for God fore-knew all things, before he had created them, or before they had being to be cared for; and Preſcience is no other then an infallible fore-knowledge. For whatſoeuer our ſelues fore-know, except the ſame be to ſucceede accordingly, it cannot be true that we fore-know it. But this Preſcience of God (as it is Preſcience onely) is not the cauſe of any thing futurely ſucceeding: neyther doth Gods foreknowlege impoſe any neceſſitie, or binde. For in that we fore-know that the Sunne will riſe, and ſet; that all men borne in the World ſhall dye againe; that after Winter, the Spring ſhall come; after the Spring Summer and Harueſt, and that according to the ſeuerall ſeedes that we ſow, we ſhall reape ſeuerall ſorts of graine, yet is not our fore-knowledge the cauſe of this, or any of theſe: neyther doth the knowledge in vs binde or conſtraine the Sunne to riſe and ſet, or men to dye; for the cauſes (as men perſwade themſelues) are otherwiſe manifeſt and knowne to all. The eye of man (ſaith BOETIVS) beholdeth thoſe things ſubiect to ſenſe, as they are; the eye ſeeth that ſuch a beaſt is an horſe, it ſeeth men, trees, and houſes, &c. but our ſeeing of them (as they are) is not the cauſe of their ſo being, for ſuch they be in their owne nature. And againe out of the ſame Authour; Diuina prouidentia rebus generandis non imponit neceſſitatem, quia ſi omnia euenirent ex neceſſitate, præmia bonorum, & pœna malorũ periret; Diuine Prouidence (ſaith he) impoſeth no neceſſity vpon things that are to exiſt, for if all came to paſſe of neceſſity, there ſhould neither be reward of good, nor puniſhment of euil. Boetius de conſol.

§. XIII.

Of Prouidence.

NOw Prouidence (which the Greekes call Pronoia) is an intellectuall knowledge, both fore-ſeeing, caring for, and ordering all things, and doth not onely behold all paſt, all preſent, and all to come, but is the cauſe of their ſo being, which Preſcience (ſimply taken) is not: and therefore Prouidence by the Philoſophers (ſaith S. Auguſtine) is diuided into Memorie, Knowledge, and Care: Memorie of the paſt, Knowledge of the preſent, and Care of the future: and wee our ſelues account ſuch a man for prouident, as, remembring things paſt, and obſeruing things preſent, can by iudgement, and comparing the one with the other, prouide for the future, and times ſucceeding. That ſuch a thing there is as Prouidence, the Scriptures euery-where teach vs, Moſes in many places, the Prophets in their Predictions: Chriſt himſelfe and his Apoſtles aſſure vs hereof; and, beſides the Scriptures, Hermes, Orpheus, Euripides, Pythagoras, Plato, Plotinus, and (in effect) all learned men acknowledge the Prouidence of God: yea the Turkes themſelues are ſo confident therein, as they refuſe not to accompany and viſit each other, in the moſt peſtilent diſeaſes, nor ſhun any perill whatſoeuer, though death therein doe manifeſtly preſent it ſelfe.

The places of Scripture prooving prouidence, are ſo many, both in generall and particular, as I ſhall need to repeate but a few of them in this place. Sing vnto God (ſaith DAVID) which couereth the Heauens with cloudes, and prepareth raine for the earth, and maketh the graſſe to grow vpon the Mountaines, which giueth to beaſts their food, and feedeth the yong Rauen that cries: All theſe wait vpon thee, that thou mayeſt giue them food in due ſeaſon. And thou ſhalt drinke of the Riuer Cheareth (ſaith God to ELIAH) and I haue Pſal. 147. 8. 9. Pſal. 104. 27. 145. 15.

1.Reg.17.4. Matth.6.26. Luke 12.6.7. 1.Pet 5.7. Pſal.36.6.

commanded the Rauens to feed thee there. Behold, the Fowles of the Ayre, they ſow not, nor reape, and yet your heauenly Father feedeth them: Againe, Are not two Sparrowes ſold for a farthing? and one of them ſhall not fall on the ground without your Father: yea all the haires of your head are numbred: And S. PETER, Caſt all your care on him, for he careth for you: And his iudgements are written, ſaith DAVID.

Ier.23.24.

God therefore, who is euerie-where preſent, who filleth the Heauens and the Earth, whoſe eyes are vpon the righteous, and his countenance againſt them that doe euill, was therefore by Orpheus called, oculus infinitus, an infinite eye, beholding all things, and cannot therefore be eſteemed as an idle looker on, as if he had transferred his power to any other: for it is contrary to his owne Word: Gloriam meam alteri non dabo: I will not giue my glorie to another. No man commandeth in the Kings preſence, but by the Kings direction; but God is euery-where preſent, and King of Kings. The example of Gods vniuerſall Prouidence is ſeene in his creatures. The Father prouideth for his children: beaſts and birds and all liuings for their young ones. If prouidence bee found in ſecond Fathers, much more in the firſt and Vniuerſall: and if there be a naturall louing care in men, and beaſts, much more in God, who hath formed this nature, and whoſe Diuine loue was the beginning, and is the bond of the Vniuerſall: Amor diuinus rerum omnium eſt principium, & vinculum vniuerſi (ſaith PLATO.) Amor Dei eſt nodus perpetuus, mundi copula, partiumq; eius immobile ſuſtentaculum, ac vniuerſa machinæ fundamentum; The loue of God is the perpetuall knot, and linke or chayne of the world, and the immoueable pillar of euery part thereof, and the Baſis and foundation of the vniuerſall. God therefore who could only be the cauſe of all, can only prouide for all, and ſuſtaine all; ſo as to abſolute power; to euery-where preſence; to perfect goodneſſe; to pure and diuine loue; this attribute tranſcendent hability of Prouidence is only proper and belonging.

Eſai.42.8.

Iob.ep.1.c.4. ver.8. God is loue.

§. XIV.

Of Predeſtination.

NOw for Predeſtination; we can difference it no otherwiſe, from Prouidence and Preſcience, then in this, that Preſcience onely fore-ſeeth: Prouidence fore-ſeeth & careth for, and hath reſpect to all creatures, euen from the brightſt Angels of Heauen, to the vnworthieſt Wormes of the Earth, and Predeſtination (as it is vſed ſpecially by Diuines) is onely of men, and yet not of all to men belonging, but of their ſaluation properly, in the common vſe of Diuines, or perdition, as ſome haue vſed it. Yet Peter Lombard, Thomas, Bernenſis Theologus, and others, take the word Predeſtination more ſtrictly, and for a preparation to felicitie: diuers of the Fathers take it more largely ſometimes: among whom S. Auguſtine ſpeaking of two Cities, and two Societies, vſeth theſe words, Quarum eſt vna, quæ prædeſtinata eſt in æternũ regnare cum Deo, altera æternum ſupplicium ſubire cum Diabolo; Whereof one is it, which is predeſtinated to reigne for euer with God, but the other is to vndergoe euerlaſting torment with the Deuill: for according to NONIVS MARCELLVS, deſtinare eſt præparare; and of the ſame opinion are many Proteſtant writers, as Caluin, Beza, Buchanus, Daneus, and ſuch like: and as for the manifold queſtions hereof ariſing, I leaue them to the Diuines; and why it hath pleaſed God to create ſome veſſels of honour, and ſome of diſhonour, I will anſwer with Gregorie, who ſaith, Qui in factis Dei rationem non videt, infirmitatem ſuam conſiderans, cur non videat, rationem videt; He that ſeeth no reaſon in the actions of God, by conſideration of his owne infirmity perceyueth the reaſon of his blindneſſe. And againe with S. AVGVSTINE, Occulta eſſe cauſa poteſt, iniuſta eſſe non poteſt; Hidden the cauſe of his Predeſtination may be, vniuſt it cannot be.

§. XV.

Of Fortune; and of the reaſon of ſome things that ſeeme to be by fortune, and againſt Reaſon and Prouidence.

LAſtly, ſeeing Deſtinie or Neceſſitie is ſubſequent to Gods prouidence, and ſeeing that the Starres haue no other dominion, then is before ſpoken, and that Nature is nothing, but as Plato calleth it, Dei artem, vel artificioſum Dei Organum; The art, or artificiall Organ of God: and CYSANVS, Diuini præcepti inſtrumentum;

The art, or artificiall Organ of God: and CVSANVS, Diuini præcepti inſtrumentum; The inſtrument of the diuine precept: we may then with better reaſon reiect that kinde of Idolatrie, or God of fooles, called Fortune or Chance: a Goddeſſe, the moſt reuerenced, and the moſt reuiled of all other, but not ancient; for Homer maketh her the Daughter of Oceanus, as Pauſanias witneſſeth in his Meſſeniacks. The Greekes call her τύχη, ſignifying a relatiue being, or betiding, ſo as before Homers time this great Ladie was ſcarce heard of; and Heſiodus, who hath taught the birth and beginning of all theſe counterfait gods, hath not a word of Fortune: yet afterward ſhe grew ſo great and omnipotent, as from Kings and Kingdomes, to Beggers and Cottages, ſhe ordered all things, reſiſting the wiſdome of the wiſeſt, by making the Poſſeſſor therof miſerable: valuing the folly of the moſt fooliſh by making their ſucceſſe proſperous, inſomuch as the actions of men were ſaid to be but the ſports of Fortune, and the variable accidents happening in mens liues, but her paſtimes: of which *PALLADIVS, Vita hominum ludus fortunæ eſt; The life of man is the play of Fortune: and becauſe it often falleth out, that enterpriſes guided by ill counſels haue equal ſucceſſe to thoſe by the beſt iudgement conducted, therfore had Fortune the ſame external figure with Sapience: wherof Athenæus:

Longiſſimè à Sapientia Fors diſſidet,
Sed multa perficit tamen ſimillima:

From Wiſedome Fortune differs farre,
And yet in workes moſt like they are.

*Sen. Ep. 91. Aur. vict. de peritiaæ Sen. ep. 74 Demetrius Poliorcetes in the great and often changes of his Fortune, is ſaid to haue vſed to crye out vpon Fortune, applying to her a Verſe of Æſchylus, Tu me extulisti, eadem me ia (ſentio) perditum.

But I will forbeare to be curious in that, which (as it is commonly vnderſtood) is nothing elſe but a power imaginarie, to which the ſucceſſe of humane actions and endeuours were for their varietie aſcribed; for when a manifeſt cauſe could not be giuen, then was it attributed to fortune, as if there were no cauſe of thoſe things, of which moſt men are ignorant, contrary to this true ground of PLATO: Nihil eſt ortum ſub Sole, cuius cauſa legitima non præceſſerit; Nothing euer came to paſſe vnder the Sunne, of which there was not a iuſt preceding cauſe. But Aquinas hath herein anſwered in one diſtinction, whatſoeuer may be obiected; for many things there are (ſaith he) which happen, beſides the intention of the Inferior, but not beſides the intention of the Superior; Præter intentionem inferioris, ſed non præter intentionem ſuperioris, (to wit, the ordinance of God;) and therefore (ſaith MELANCHTON) Quod Poetæ fortunam, nos Deum appellamus; Whom the Poets call Fortune, we know to be God, and that this is true, the Scripture in many places teacheth vs, as in the Law of Murder. He that ſmiteth a man, and he die, ſhall die the death; and if a man hath not laid waite, but God hath offered him into his hands, then I will appoint thee a place whither he ſhall flee. Now, where the Scripture hath theſe words, God hath offered him into his hands, we ſay, if he hurt him by Chance: and in Deuteronomie the nineteenth, where the ſlipping of an Axe from the helue, whereby another is ſlaine, was the worke of God himſelfe, we in our phraſe attribute this accident to Chance or Fortune: and in the Prouerbs the ſixteenth, The lot is caſt into the lap, but the whole diſpoſition thereof is of the Lord: ſo as that which ſeemeth moſt caſuall and ſubiect to Fortune, is yet diſpoſed by the ordinance of God, as all things elſe; and hereof the wiſer ſort, and the beſt learned of the Philoſophers were not ignorant, as Cicero witneſſeth for them, gathering the opinion of Ariſtotle and his Sectators, with thoſe of Plato, and the Academicks to this effect, That the ſame power which they called animam mundi; The ſoule of the World, was no other then that incomprehenſible wiſdome, which we expreſſe by the name of God, gouerning euery being aſwell in heauen as in earth; to which wiſdome and power they ſometime gaue the title of Neceſſitie or Fate, becauſe it bindeth by inexitable ordinance: ſometime, the ſtyle of Fortune, becauſe of many effects there appeare vnto vs no certain cauſes. To this effect ſpeaketh S. Auguſtine in his queſtions vpon Geneſis the firſt Booke: the ſame hath Seneca in his fourth of Benefits; which was alſo the doctrine of the Stoicks, of which Sect he was: For whatſoeuer (ſaith he) thou calleſt God, be it Nature, Fate, or Fortune, all are but one and the ſame, differenced by diuers termes, according as he vſeth, and exerciſeth his power diuerſly.

Te facimus Fortuna Deam, coeloq; locamus. Sat. 10. 366. Exod. 21. 12. 13. Verſ. 5. Verſ. 33. Cic. ac. quæſt. l. 1 Sen. l. 4. c. 7.

But it may be obiected, that if Fortune and Chance were not ſometimes the cauſes of good and euill in men, but an idle voice, whereby we expreſſe ſucceſſe; how comes it then, that ſo many worthie and wiſe men depend vpon ſo many vnworthy and emptie-headed fooles; that riches and honor are giuen to externall men, and without kernell:

nell: and ſo many learned, vertuous, and valiant men weare out their liues in poore and deiected eſtates. In a word, there is no other inferior, or apparent cauſe, beſide the partialitie of mans affection, but the faſhioning and not faſhioning of our ſelues according to the nature of the time wherein we liue: for whoſoeuer is moſt able, and beſt ſufficient to diſcerne, and hath withall an honeſt and open heart and louing truth; if Princes, or thoſe that gouerne, endure no other diſcourſe then their owne flatteries, then I ſay ſuch an one, whoſe vertue and courage forbiddeth him to be baſe and a diſſembler, ſhall euermore hang vnder the wheele; which kinde of deſeruing well and receiuing ill, we alwaies falſly charge Fortune withall. For whoſoeuer ſhall tell any great Man or Magiſtrate, that he is not iuſt; the Generall of an Armie, that he is not valiant, and great Ladies that they are not faire; ſhall neuer be made a Counſeller, a Captaine, or a Courtier. Neither is it ſufficient to be wiſe with a wiſe Prince, valiant with a valiant, and iuſt with him that is iuſt, for ſuch a one hath no eſtate in his proſperitie; but he muſt alſo change with the ſucceſſor, if he be of contrarie qualities; ſaile with the tyde of the time, and alter forme and condition, as the Eſtate or the Eſtates Maſter changeth: Otherwiſe how were it poſſible, that the moſt baſe men, and ſeparate from all imitable qualities, could ſo often attaine to honour and riches, but by ſuch an obſeruant ſlauiſh courſe? Theſe men hauing nothing elſe to value themſelues by, but a counterfait kinde of wondring at other men, and by making them beleeue that all their vices are vertues, and all their duſtie actions cryſtalline, haue yet in all ages proſpered equally with the moſt vertuous, if not exceeded them. For according to MENANDER, Omnis inſipiens arrogantia & plauſibus capitur; Euerie foole is wonne with his owne pride, and others flattering applauſe: ſo as whoſoeuer will liue altogether out of himſelfe, and ſtudie other mens humours, and obſerue them, ſhall neuer be vnfortunate; and on the contrarie, that man which prizeth truth and vertue (except the ſeaſon wherein he liueth be of all theſe, and of all ſorts of goodneſſe fruitfull) ſhall neuer proſper by the poſſeſſion or profeſſion thereof. It is alſo a token of a worldly wiſe man, not to warre or contend in vaine againſt the nature of times wherein he liueth: for ſuch a one is often the authour of his owne miſerie; but beſt it were to follow the aduice, which the Pope gaue the Biſhops of that age, out of Ouid, while the Arian Hereſie raged:

Ouid rem. am. lib. 1.

Dum furor in curſu eſt, currenti cede furori.

While furie gallops on the way,
Let no man furies gallop ſtay.

And if Cicero (then whom that world begat not a man of more reputed iudgement) had followed the counſaile of his brother QVINTVS, Potuiſſet (ſaith PETRARCH) in lectulo ſuo mori, potuiſſet integro cadauere ſepeliri; He might then haue dyed the death of nature, and beene with an vntorne and vndiſſeuered bodie buried; for as Petrach in the ſame place noteth: Quid ſtultius quàm deſperantem (praſertim de effectu) litibus perpetuis implicari; What more fooliſh then for him that deſpaires, eſpecially of the effect, to be intangled with endleſſe contentions? Whoſoeuer therefore will ſet before him MACHIAVELS two markes to ſhoote at (to wit) riches, and glorie, muſt ſet on and take off a back of yron to a weak woodden Bow, that it may fit both the ſtrong and the feeble: for as he, that firſt deuiſed to adde ſayles to rowing veſſels, did eyther ſo proportion them, as being faſtened aloft, and towards the head of his Maſt, he might abide all windes and ſtormes, or elſe he ſometime or other periſhed by his owne inuention: ſo that man which prizeth vertue for it ſelfe, and cannot endure to hoiſe and ſtrike his ſailes, as the diuers natures of calmes and ſtormes require, muſt cut his ſailes and his cloth, of meane length and bredth, and content himſelfe with a ſlow and ſure nauigation, (to wit) a meane and free eſtate. But of this diſpute of Fortune, and the reſt, or of whatſoeuer Lords or Gods, imaginarie powers, or cauſes, the wit (or rather fooliſhneſſe) of man hath found out: let vs reſolue with S. Paul, who hath taught vs, that there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; and one Lord, Ieſus Chriſt, by whom are all things, and we by him; there are diuerſities of operations, but God is the ſame which worketh all in all.

A liuing creature wants, to rule all made before:
So man began to be.

Of this Image and similitude of God, there is much dispute among the Fathers, Schoole-men, and late Writers: Some of the Fathers conceiue, that man was made after the Image of God, in respect chiefly of Empire and Dominion, as S. Chrysostome, Ambrose, and some others: which S. Ambrose denieth to the woman in these words, Vt sicut Deus vnus, ab eo fieret homo vnus, & quomodò ex Deo vno omnia, ità ex vno homine omne genus esset super faciem totius terræ: Vnus igitur vnum fecit, qui vnitatis eius haberet imaginem; That as God is one, one man might be made by him, and that in what manner all things are of one God, likewise of one man the whole kinde should be vpon the face of the whole earth: Therefore he being one, made one, that should haue the Image of his vnitie. But whereas it is gathered out of the following words of the same Verse, that man was after the Image of God in respect of rule and power, it is written Dominamini in the plurall number, and let them rule ouer the fish in the Sea, &c. and therefore cannot the woman be excluded. Others conceiue, that man is said to be after the image of God in respect of his immortall soule onely, because as God is inuisible, so the soule of man is inuisible; as God is immortall and incorporall, so is the soule of man immortall and incorporall; and as there is but one God which gouerneth the world, so but one soule which gouerneth the bodie of man; and as God is wholly in euery part of the world, so is the soule of man wholly in euery part of the bodie: Anima est tota in toto, & tota in qualibet parte; The soule is wholly in the whole bodie, and wholly in euery part thereof, according to Aristotle; though Chalcidius, and other learned men denie that doctrine; which that it is otherwise then potentially true, all the Aristotelians in the world shall neuer proue. These and the like arguments doe the Iewes make (saith Tostatus) and these resemblances, betweene the infinite God, and the finite Man.

The Schoole-men resemble the Minde or Soule of Man to God, in this respect especially; because that as in the Minde there are three distinct powers, or faculties (to wit) Memorie, Vnderstanding, and Will; and yet all these, being of reall differences, are but one minde: so in God there are three distinct persons, the Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost, and yet but one God. They also make the Image and Similitude diuers; and againe, they distinguish betweene imaginem Dei, and ad imaginem Dei, and spinne into small threds, with subtile distinctions, many times the plainenesse and sincerities of the Scriptures: their wits being like that strong water, that eateth thorow and dissolueth the purest gold. Victorinus also maketh the Image of God to be substantiall, but not the similitude: sed in substantia nomen qualitatis declarationum; A word declaring qualitie in the substance. Out of which words, and that which followeth, it is inferd, that as the image and similitude doe greatly differ: so the sinfull soule doth not therefore leaue to be the image of God, but it hath not his similitude, except it be holy and righteous. S. Augustine also against Adimantus the Manichee affirmeth, that by sinne, the perfection of this image is lost in man, and in his Retractations maintayneth the same opinion, and also affirmeth that the Similitude is more largely taken, then the Image.

But howsoeuer the Schoole-men and others distinguish, or whatsoeuer the Fathers conceiue, sure I am that S. Paul maketh the same sense of the image, which Victorinus
1.Cor. 15.49. doth of the similitude, who saith: As we haue borne the image of the earthly, so shall we beare the image of the heauenly; and it cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, that the words image and similitude were vsed but in one sense, and in this place the better to expresse each other; whatsoeuer Lombard hath said to the contrarie. For God knowes, what a multitude of meanings the wit of man imagineth to himselfe in the Scriptures, which neither Moses, the Prophets, or Apostles, euer conceiued. Now as S. Paul vseth the word (image) for both: so S. Iames vseth the word (similitude) for both in these
Iam. 3.9. words: Therewith blesse we God euen the Father, and therewith curse we Men, which are made after the similitude of God: Howsoeuer therefore S. Augustine seemeth, out of a kind
Vt supra. of elegancie in writing, to make some difference, as where he writeth, Confitemur imaginem in æternitate, similitudinem in moribus inueniri; We confesse that this image is found in eternitie, but his similitude in manners, that is, in the spirituall dispositions and qualities of the minde; yet thus he elsewhere speaketh plainely: Quasi verò possit esse imago
Aug. vt supr. aliqua in qua similitudo non sit: si enim omninò similis non est, procul dubio nec imago est; As if (saith he) there could be any image, where the similitude is not: no, out of doubt, where there is no likenesse, there is no image. The verie words of the Text make this most manifest, as, Let vs make man in our image, according to our likenesse: which is, Let vs make man in our image, that he may be like vs; and in the next Verse following, God himselfe maketh it plaine, for there he vseth the word (image) onely, as thus: God created the man in his image, in the image of God created he him. And to take away all dispute or ambiguitie, in the first Verse of the fift Chapter, the word (similitude) is vsed againe by it selfe, as, In the day that God created ADAM, in the likenesse of God made he him. And Vers. 1. this similitude S. Paul Colos. the third, calleth the image. Put on (saith he) the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him, that created him. And in Syracides it is written, He made them according to his image. Now if we may beleeue S. Paul before Peter Lombard and other Schoole-men, then it is as manifest as wordes can make it, that the image and similitude is but the same, for S. Paul vseth both the wordes directRom. 1.23. ly in one sense. For they turned the glorie of the incorruptible God, to the similitude of the image of a corruptible man.

Zanchius laboureth to proue, that man was formed after the image of God, both Zanch. de op. Dei l. 3. ca. 1. in bodie and minde: Nulla pars in homine quæ non fuerit huiusce imaginis particeps, No part in a man (saith he) which was not participating Gods image: for God said, Let vs make man according to our owne image. But the soule alone is not man, but the Hypostasis or whole man compounded of bodie and soule. The bodie of man (saith he) is the image of the world, and called therefore Microcosmus; but the Idea and exemplar of the world was first in God, so that man, according to his bodie must needes be the image of God. Against which opinion of this learned man, his owne obiection seemeth to me sufficient, where he alleageth, that it may be said, that Moses spake by the figure Synecdoche, as when a man is called a mortall man, yet is not the whole man mortall, but the bodie onely: so when God said, Let vs make man after our image, he meant the soule of man, and not the bodie of earth and dust: Maledictus qui deitatem ad hominis lineamenta refert (saith S. AVGVSTINE,) Cursed is he that referreth the Deitie of God to the lineaments of mans bodie. Deus enim non est humanæ formæ particeps, neque corpus humanum diuinæ (saith PHILO,) God is not partaker of humane forme, nor humane body of the forme diuine. The Hebrew word for image, is Tselem, which signifieth a shadow or obscure resemblance: In imagine pertransit homo; Man passeth away in a shaddow. Let vs then know and consider, that God, who is eternall and infinite, hath not any bodily shape or composition, for it is both against his Nature and his Word; an error of the Anthropomorphitæ, against the verie essence and Maiestie of God.

In Gen.

Surely

Surely Cicero, who was but a Heathen, had yet a more diuine vnderſtanding then theſe groſſe Heretikes: Ad ſimilitudinem Dei proprius accedebat humana virtus, quàm figura; The vertue which is in man (ſaith he) came neerer the ſimilitude of God, then the figure. For God is a ſpirituall ſubſtance, inuiſible, and moſt ſimple; God is a iuſt God: God is Mercifull: God is Charitie it ſelfe, and (in a word) Goodneſſe it ſelfe, and none elſe ſimply good. And thus much it hath pleaſed God himſelfe to teach vs, and to make vs know of himſelfe. What then can be the ſhadow of ſuch a ſubſtance, the image of ſuch a nature, or wherein can man be ſaid to reſemble his vnexcogitable power and perfectneſſe? certainely, not in dominion alone: for the Deuill is ſaid to be the Prince of this World, and the Kingdome of Chriſt was not thereof, who was the true and perfect image of his Father; neither, becauſe man hath an immortall ſoule, and therein the faculties of Memorie, Vnderſtanding, and Will, for the Deuils are alſo immortall, and participate thoſe faculties, being called Dæmones, becauſe ſcientes of Knowledge, and ſubtilitie; neither becauſe we are reaſonable creatures, by which we are diſtinguiſhed from beaſts: for who haue rebelled againſt God? who haue made Gods of the vileſt beaſts, of Serpents, of Cats, of Owles, yea, euen of ſhamefull parts, of luſts and pleaſures, but reaſonable men? Yet doe I not condemne the opinion of S. Chryſoſtome and Ambroſe, as touching dominion, but that, in reſpect thereof, man was in ſome ſort after the image of God, if we take Dominion, ſuch as it ought to be, that is, accompanied with Iuſtice and Pietie: for God did not onely make man a Ruler and Gouernor ouer the Fiſhes of the Sea, the Fowles of Heauen (or of the aire) and ouer the Beaſts of the Field; but God gaue vnto man a dominion ouer men, he appointed Kings to gouerne them, and Iudges, to iudge them in equitie. Neither doe I exclude Reaſon, as it is the abilitie of Vnderſtanding. For I doe not conceiue, that Ireneus did therefore call man, the image of God, becauſe he was animal rationale onely; but that he vnderſtood it better, with SYBILLA: Imago mea eſt homo, rectam rationem habens: Man, that is endued with right reaſon, is ſaid to reſemble God, (that is) by right reaſon to know and confeſſe God his Creatour, and the ſame God to ſerue, loue, and obey: and therefore ſaid Saint Auguſtine (who herein came neerer the Truth) Fecit Deus hominem ad imaginem & ſimilitudinem ſuam in mente, God made man, in reſpect of the intellect, after his owne Image and ſimilitude; and REYNERIVS; Homo, quòd habet mentem, factus eſt ad imaginem Dei, Man was made after the Image of God, in minde, or in that he had a minde.

Of the intellectuall minde of man, in which there is much of the Image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by Sinne.

BVt Mens is not taken here for anima phyſica, according to Ariſtotle, which is forma, vel natura hominis: The forme or nature of man; but this facultie or gift of God, called Mens, is taken for prima vis animi, the principall ſtrength of the minde, or ſoule, cuius actus eſt perpetua veritatis contemplatio; whoſe act, exerciſe, or office, is the perpetuall contemplation of truth; and therefore it is alſo called intellectus diuinus, intellectus contemplatiuus, & anima contemplatiua, A diuine vnderſtanding, and an intellect or minde contemplatiue. Eſt autem mens noſtra (ſaith CVSANVS) vis comprehendendi, & totum virtuale ex omnibus comprehendendi virtutibus compoſitum: Our intellectuall minde (ſaith he) is a power of comprehending, euen the whole, that is in this kinde powerfull, compounded of all the powers of comprehenſion: vnto which Mercurius attributeth ſo much (if his meaning accompany his words) that hee eſteemeth it to be the very eſſence of God (which was alſo the errour of the Manichees, and others) and no otherwiſe ſeparate from God (ſaith he) then the light from the Sunne: for this Mens or vnderſtanding (ſaith MERCVRIVS) eſt Deus in hominibus: Is God in men, or rather (and which I take to be his meaning) is the image of God in man. For as the Sunne is not of the ſame eſſence or nature with the diuine light, but a body illightned, and an illumination created; ſo is this Mens or vnderſtanding in men, not of the eſſence of Gods infinite vnderſtanding, but a power and facultie of our ſoules the pureſt; or the lumen animæ rationalis, by the true and eternall light illightned. And this Mens others call animam animæ, The ſoule of the ſoule, or with S. Auguſtine, the eye of the ſoule, or receptacle of Sapience and diuine knowledge, quæ amorē ſapientiæ tanquàm ducē ſequitur, Which followeth

after

after the loue of ſapience as her guide (ſaith Philo) betweene which and reaſon, betweene which and the mind, called anima, between which & that power which the Latines call animus, there is this difference. Reaſon is that facultie by which we iudge and diſcourſe; Anima, by which we liue. Hereof it is ſaid, Anima corpus animat, id eſt, viuificat; or the ſoule is that which doth animate the body, that is, giueth it life: for death is the ſeparation of body and ſoule; and the ſame ſtrength (ſaith Philo) which God the great Director hath in the World, the ſame hath this Anima, or mind, or ſoule in man. Animus, is that, by which we will and make election; and to this Baſil agreeth, which calleth this Mens, or diuine vnderſtanding, perſpicacem animæ partem, the perceiuing part of the mind, or the light by which the Soule diſcerneth: dormientium mens, non anima, ſopitur, & in furioſis mens extinguitur, anima manet, In men that ſleepe it is this (mens) or vnderſtanding, and not the mind or ſoule, which reſteth, during which time it is but habitual in wiſe men, & in mad men this (mens) is extinguiſhed, and not the ſoule: for mad men doe liue, though diſtract.

Therefore this word being often vſed for the Soule giuing life, is attributed abuſiuely to mad men, when we ſay that they are of a diſtract minde, in ſtead of a broken vnderſtanding, which word (mind) we vſe alſo for opinion, as, I am of this minde, or that mind: and ſometimes for mens conditions or vertues, as, he is of an honeſt minde, or, a man of a iuſt minde: ſometimes for affection, as, I do this for my mindes ſake; and Ariſtotle ſometimes vſeth this word (Mens) for the phantaſie, which is the ſtrength of the imagination: ſometimes for the knowledge of principles, which we haue without diſcourſe: oftentimes for Spirits, Angels and Intelligences: but as it is vſed in the proper ſignification, including both the vnderſtanding agent and poſſible, it is deſcribed to bee a pure, ſimple, ſubſtantiall act, not depending vpon matter, but hauing relation to th at which is intelligible, as to his firſt obiect: or more at large thus; a part or particle of the Soule, whereby it doth vnderſtand, not depending vpon matter, nor needing any organ, free from paſſion comming from without, and apt to bee diſſeuered, as, eternall from that which is mortall. Hereof excellently MERCVRIVS: Anima eſt imago mentis, mens imago Dei. Deus menti præeſt, mens animæ, anima corpori; The Soule (meaning that which giueth life) is the Image of this vnderſtanding, or Mens, and this (Mens) or vnderſtanding is the Image of God. God is Preſident or Ruler ouer this vnderſtanding, this vnderſtanding ouer the Soule, and this Soule ouer the bodie. This diuiſion and diſtinction out of the Platonikes and Peripatetickes, I leaue to the Reader to iudge of. That, Mens humana hath no need of any organ, Marſilius Ficinus in his ninth Booke of the Soules immortalitie laboureth to proue. Zanchius doth not differ from Ficinus in words, for (ſayth he) Ad facultatem intelligentem exercendam non eget Mens organo, tanquàm medio, per quod intelligat, quanquàm eget obiecto in quod intueatur, & ex quo intellectionem concipiat: hoc autem obiectum ſunt phantaſmata, ſeù rerum à ſenſibus perceptarum ſimulachra ad phantaſiam prolata: To exerciſe the facultie of vnderſtanding, the mind of man (ſayth he) needeth no inſtrument, as a meane, by which it may vnderſtand: but it needeth an obiect, whereon to looke, and whence to concciue the act of vnderſtanding. This obiect are the phantaſmes, or the reſemblances of things receiued from the ſenſe & caryed to the phantaſie: But in effect his concluſion ſeemeth to carry a contrary ſenſe, when he maketh the Phantaſie, in repreſenting the obiect to the vnderſtanding, to be a corporall Organum; neither can it be vnderſtood to be an Organũ of any thing; but of the vnderſtanding. And he addeth that the reſemblance of things in mans imaginatiõ, are to his vnderſtanding & mind, as colours are to the ſight: whence it ſo followeth, that the imagination or phantaſie it ſelf is to the facultie of vnderſtanding, as the eye is to the faculty of ſeeing; & as this is an organum, ſo that. Of this queſtion, How the minde in all her actions maketh vſe of the bodie, & hath communion with the body, I referre the Reader to a moſt graue & learned Diſcourſe in the laſt Reply of M. D. Bilſon, late Biſhop of Wincheſter, vnto Henry Iacob. Howſoeuer the Truth be determined, we muſt conclude, that it is neither in reſpect of reaſon alone, by which we diſcourſe, nor in reſpect of the minde it ſelfe by which wee liue, nor in reſpect of our ſoules ſimply, by which we are immortall, that wee are made after the Image of God. But moſt ſafely may we reſemble our ſelues to God in mente, and in reſpect of that pure facultie which is neuer ſeparate from the contemplation and loue of God. Yet this is not all. For Saint Bernard maketh a true difference betweene the nature and faculties of the Minde or Soule, and betweene the infuſion of qualities, endowments and gifts of grace, wherewith it is adorned and enriched, which, being being added to the nature, essence, and faculties, maketh it altogether to bee after the Image of God, whose wotds are these: Non propterea imago Dei est, quia sui memini, Mens, sed, intelligit & diligit (which also was the opinion of Saint AVGVSTINE) sed quia potest meminisse, intelligere ac diligere eum à quo facta est, (that is) The minde (or Soule) was not therefore the Image of God, because it remembreth, vnderstandeth, and loueth selfe, but because it can remember, vnderstand, and loue God, who created it. And the Image may be deformed and made vnprofitable, heare BASIL: Homo ad imaginem & similitudinem Dei factus est, peccatum vero imaginis huius pulchritudinem deformauit: & inutilem reddidit, dum animam corruptis concupiscentiæ affectibus immersit. Man was made after the Image and similitude of GOD, but sinne hath deformed the beautie of this Image, and made it vnprofitable by drawing our minds into corrupt concupiscence.

It is not therefore (as aforesaid) by reason of Immortalitie, nor in Reason, nor in Dominion, nor in any one of these by it selfe, nor in all these joyned, by any of which, or by all which we resemble, or may be called the shaddow of God, though by reason and vnderstanding, with the other faculties of the Soule, wee are made capable of this print; but chiefly, in respect of the habit of Originall righteousnesse, most perfectly infused by God into the minde and Soule of man in his first Creation. For it is not by nature, nor by her liberalitie, that we were printed with the seale of Gods Image (though Reason may be said to be of her gift, which joyned to the soule is a part of the Essentiall Constitution of our proper Species) but from the bountifull grace of the Lord of all goodnesse, who breathed life into Earth, and contriued within the Trunke of Dust and Clay, the inimitable habilitie of his owne Pietie, and Righteousnesse.

So long therefore (for that resemblance which Dominion hath) doe those that are powerfull retaine the Image of God, as according to his Commandements they exercise the Office or Magistracie to which they are called, and sincerely walke in the wayes of God, which in the Scriptures is called, walking with God; and all other men so long retayne this Image, as they feare, loue and serue God truly, that is, for the loue of God alone, and doe not bruise and deface his Seale by the weight of manifold and voluntary offences, and obstinate sinnes. For the vniust minde cannot be after the Image of God, seeing God is Iustice it selfe; The bloud-thirstie hath it not; for God is Charitie, and Mercie it selfe: Fallhood, cunning practice, and ambition, are properties of Sathan; and therefore cannot dwell in one soule, together with GOD; and to be short, there is no likelihood betweene pure light and blacke darknesse, betweene beautie & deformity, or betweene righteousnesse and reprobation. And though Nature, according to common vnderstanding, haue made vs capable by the power of reason, and apt enough to receiue this Image of Gods goodnesse which the sensuall soules of beasts cannot perceiue; yet were that aptitude naturall more inclinable to follow and imbrace the false and dureleſse pleasures of this Stage-play World, then to become the shaddow of God by walking after him, had not the exceeding workmanshippe of GODS Wisedome, and the liberalitie of his Mercy, formed eyes to our soules, as to our bodies, which, piercing through the impuritie of our flesh, behold the highest Heauens, and thence bring Knowledge and Object to the Minde and Soule, to contemplate the euer-during Glorie, and termeleſse Joy, prepared for those, which retaine the Image and similitude of their Creatour, preseruing vndefiled and vnrent the garment of the new man, which, after the Image of GOD, is created in Righteousnes and Holinesse, as saith S. Paul. Now, whereas it is thought by some of the Fathers, as by Saint Augustine, with whom Saint Ambrose joyneth, that by sinne the perfection of the Image is lost, and not the Image it selfe; both opinions by this distinction may be well reconciled (to wit) that the Image of God, in man, may be taken two wayes; for either it is considered, according to naturall gifts, and consisteth therein: namely to haue a reasonable and vnderstanding nature, &c. and in this sense, the Image of God is not lost by sinne, then the very reasonable or vnderstanding nature, &c. is lost, (or sinne doth not abolish and take away these naturall gifts:) or, the Image of God is considered, according to supernaturall gifts, namely, of Diuine Grace and hequenly Glorie, which is indeed the perfection and accomplishment of the naturall Image; and this manner of similitude and Image of God is wholly blotted out and destroyed by sinne.

THe externall man God formed out of the dust of the Earth, or according to the signification of the word, Adam of Adamath, of red Earth, or, ex limo terræ, out of the slime of the Earth, or a mixed matter of Earth and Water. Non ex qualibet humo, sed ex ghaphar adamath (id est) ex pinguissima & mollissima: Not that God made an Image or Statue of Clay, but out of Clay, Earth or dust God formed and made flesh, blood, and bone, with all parts of man.

Arias Mont. de nat. f. 156.

That man was formed of Earth and Dust, did Abraham acknowledge, when in humble feare he called vnto God, to saue Sodome: Let not my Lord now be angry, if I speake, I that am but dust and ashes: And in these Houses of Clay, whose foundation is in the dust, doe our soules inhabite, according to Iob. And though our owne eyes doe euery-where behold the sudden and resistlesse assaults of Death, and Nature assureth vs by neuer-failing Experience, and Reason by infallible demonstration, that our times vpon the Earth haue neither certaintie nor durabilitie, that our Bodies are but the Anduiles of paine and diseases, and our Minds the Hiues of vnnumbred cares, sorrowes and passions: and that (when we are most glorified) we are but those painted posts, against which Enuie and Fortune direct their darts; yet such is the true vnhappinesse of our condition, and the darke ignorance which couereth the eyes of our vnderstanding, that wee only prize, pamper, and exalt this Vassall and Slaue of death, and forget altogether (or only remember at our cast-away leisure) the imprisoned immortall Soule, which can neither dye with the Reprobate, nor perish with the mortall parts of vertuous men: seeing Gods Iustice in the one, and his goodnesse in the other is exercised for euermore, as the euer-liuing subiects of his reward and punishment. But when is it that wee examine this great account? Neuer while we haue one vanitie left vs to spend: wee plead for Titles, till our breath faile vs; digge for Riches whiles our strength enableth vs; exercise malice, while we can reuenge; and then, when Time hath beaten from vs both youth, pleasure, and health, and that Nature it selfe hateth the house of old age, we remember with Iob, that we must goe the way from whence we shall not returne, and that our bed is made ready for vs in the darke: And then I say, looking ouer-late into the bottome of our conscience (which Pleasure and Ambition had locked vp from vs all our liues,) we behold therein the fearefull Images of our actions past, and withall this terrible Inscription: That God will bring euery worke into iudgement, that man hath done vnder the Sunne.

But let vs not flatter our immortall Soules herein: for to neglect God all our liues, and know that wee neglect him, to offend God voluntarily, and know that wee offend him, casting our hopes on the Peace, which wee trust to make at parting, is no other then a rebellious presumption, and (that which is the worst of all) euen a contemptuous laughing to scorne, and deriding of God, his Lawes and Precepts. Frustrà sperant, qui sic de misericordia Dei sibi blandiuntur; They hope in vaine, saith BERNARD, which in this sort flatter themselues with Gods mercie.

§. IV.

§. III.

Of the Spirit of Life, which God breathed into man in his Creation.

IN this frame and careasse God breathed the breath of life; and the man was a liuing Soule: (that is) God gaue a body of Earth and of corruptible matter, a Soule spirituall and incorruptible; not that God had any such bodily instruments as men vse, but God breathed the Spirit of Life and Immortalitie into man, as hee breatheth his grace daily into such as loue and feare him. The Spirit of God (saith ELIHV in IOB) hath made mee, and the breath of the Almighty hath giuen me Life: In qua sententia (saith RABANVS) vitanda est paupertas sensus carnalis, ne forte putemus Deum, vel manibus corporeis de limo formasse corpus hominis, vel faucibus aut labijs suis inspirasse in faciem formati, vt viuere posset & spiraculum vita habere: Nam & Propheta cum ait, Manus tuæ fecerunt me, &c. Tropica hac locutione magis quàm propria, (id est) iuxta consuetudinem, qua solent homines operari, loquutus est: In which sentence (saith hee) the beggarlinesse of carnall sense is to bee auoided, lest perhaps wee should thinke, either that God with bodily hands made mans body of slime, or breathed with iawes or lips vpon his face (being formed) that he might liue, and haue the Spirit of Life: for the Prophet also when he saith, Thy hands haue made mee, spake this Tropically, rather than properly (that is) according to the custome which men vse in working. Quantum est periculi his, qui Scripturas sensu corporeo legunt? In what danger are they that reade the Scriptures in a carnall sense? By this breath was infused into man both life and soule; and therefore this (Soule) the Philosophers call Animam, quæ viuificat corpus, & animat; which doth animate, and giue life to the body. The inspiration of the Almighty giueth vnderstanding, saith IOB; and this spirit, which God breathed into man, which is the reasonable soule of man, returneth againe to God that gaue it, as the body returneth vnto the Earth, out of which it was taken, according to Ecclesiastes: And dust shall returne to the Earth, out of which it was taken, and the spirit shall returne to God that gaue it. Neither is this word (Spirit) vsually otherwise taken in the Scriptures, than for the soule; as when Stephen cried vnto God: Domine, suscipe spiritum meum; Lord Iesus receiue my spirit: and in S. IOHN, And Iesus bowed his head, and gaue vp the Ghost, or Spirit; (which was) that his life and soule left his body dead. And that the immortall soule of man differeth from the soules of beasts, the manner of creation maketh it manifest: for it is written, Let the waters bring forth in abundance euery creeping thing, and let the Earth bring forth the liuing thing, according to his kinde, the beast of the Earth, &c. But of Man it is written, Let vs make man in our owne Image, &c. and further, that the Lord breathed in his face the breath of life. Wherefore, as from the Water and Earth were those creatures brought forth, and thence receiued life: so shall they again be dissolued into the same first matter, whence they were taken: but the life of breath euerlasting, which God breathed into man, shall according to Ecclesiastes, returne againe to God that gaue it.

§. V.

That man is (as it were) a little world: with a digression touching our mortality.

MAN, thus compounded and formed by God, was an abstract or modell, or briefe Storie of the Vniuersall: in whom God concluded the Creation, and worke of the World, and whom hee made the last and most excellent of his Creatures, being internally endued with a diuine vnderstanding, by which hee might contemplate and serue his Creatour, after whose image hee was formed, and endued with the powers and faculties of Reason and other abilities, that therby also he might gouerne and rule the World, and all other Gods creatures therein. And whereas God created three sorts of liuing natures, (to wit) Angelicall, Rationall, and Brutall; giuing to Angels an intellectuall, and to Beasts a sensuall nature, he vouchsafed vnto Man, both the intellectuall of Angels, the sensitiue of Beasts, and the proper rationall belonging vnto man: and therefore (saith GREGORY NAZIANZENE,) Homo est vtriusq; naturæ vinculum, Man is the bond and chaine which tyeth together both natures: and because in the little frame of mans body there is a representation of the Vniuersall, and (by allusion) a kinde of participation of all the parts there, therefore was man called Microcosmos, or the little World. Deus igitur hominem fecit, velut alterum quendam mundum, dum, in breui magnum, at q. exiguo totum, in terris statuit; God therefore placed in the Earth the man whom he had made, as it were another World; the great and large World in the small and little World: for out of the Earth and Dust was formed the flesh of man, and therefore heauie and lumpish: the bones of his body we may compare to the hard Rockes and Stones, and therefore strong and durable; of which OVID:

Ouid. Met. l. 1. Indeginis durum sumus, experiensq; laborum,
Et documenta damus qua simus origine nati.

From thence our Kind hard-hearted is, enduring paine and care, Approouing, that our bodies of a stonie nature are.

His bloud, which disperseth it selfe by the branches of veines through all the body, may be resembled to those waters, which are carryed by Brookes and Riuers ouer all the Earth; his breath to the Aire, his naturall heate to the inclosed warmth which the Earth hath in it selfe, which stirred vp by the heate of the Sunne, assisteth Nature in the speedier procreation of those varieties, which the Earth bringeth forth; Our radicall moisture, Oyle, or Balsamum (whereon the naturall heate feedeth and is maintained) is resembled to the fat and fertilitie of the Earth; the haires of mans bodie, which addornes or ouer-shadowes it, to the grasse, which coureth the vpper face and skin of the Earth; our generatiue power, to Nature, which produceth all things; our determinations, to the light, wandering & vnstable clouds, carried euery where with vncertaine winds; our eies, to the light of the Sun and Moone; and the beautie of our youth, to the flowers of the Spring, which, either in a very short time, or with the Sunnes heat, dry vp, and wither away, or the fierce puffes of winde blow them from the stalkes; the thoughts of our mind, to the motion of Angels; and our pure vnderstanding (formerly called Mens, and that which alwayes looketh vpwards) to those intellectuall natures, which are alwayes present with God; and lastly our immortall soules (while they are righteous) are by God himselfe beautified with the title of his owne image and similitude. And although, in respect of God, there is no man iust, or good, or righteous: for

Iob. 4. 18. in Angelis deprehensa est stultitia, Behold; hee found folly in his Angels (saith Iob) yet with such a kind of difference, as there is betweene the substance and the shadow, there may be found a goodnesse in man: which God being pleased to accept, hath therefore called man, the image and similitude of his owne righteousnesse. In this also is the little World of man compared, and made more like the vniuersall (man being the measure of all things; Homo est mensura omnium rerum, saith Aristotle and Pithagoras) that the foure Complexions resemble the foure Elements, and the seuen Ages of man the seuen Planets:

Arist. 10. Metaph. c. 1. s. Whereof our Infancie is compared to the Moone, in which wee seeme onely to liue and grow, as Plants; the second Age to Mercurie, wherein wee are taught and instructed; our third Age to Venus, the dayes of Loue, Desire, and Vanitie; the fourth to the Sunne, the strong, flourishing, and beautifull age of mans life; the fifth to Mars, in which we seeke honour and victorie, and in which our thoughts trauaile to ambitious ends; the sixth Age is ascribed to Iupiter, in which we beginne to take accompt of our times, iudge of our selues, and grow to the perfection of our vnderstanding; the last and seuenth to Saturne, wherin our dayes are sad and ouer-cast, and in which we find by deare and lamentable experience, & by the losse which can neuer be repaired, that of all our vaine passions and affections past, the sorrow only abideth: Our attendants are sicknesses, and variable infirmities, and by how much the more wee are accompanied with plentie, by so much the more greedily is our end desired, whom when Time hath made vnseruiceable to others, we become a burthen to our selues: being of no other vse, than to hold the riches we haue, from our Successors. In this time it is, when (as aforesaid) we, for the most part, and neuer before, prepare for our eternall habitation, which we passe on vnto, with many sighes, grones, and sad thoughts, and in the end, by the workmanship of death, finish the sorrowfull businesse of a wretched life, towards which wee alwaies trauel both sleeping and waking: neither haue those beloued companions of honor & riches any power at all, to hold vs any one day, by the glorious promise of entertainments; but by what crooked path soeuer we walk, the same leadeth on directly to the house of death, whose doores lye open at all houres, and to all persons. For this tyde of mans life, after it once turneth and declineth, euer runneth with a perpetuall Ebbe and falling Streame, but neuer floweth againe: our Leafe once fallen, springeth no more, neither neither doth the Sunne or the Summer adorne vs againe, with the garments of new Leaues and Flowers.

Redditur arboribus florens reuirentibus ætas,
Ergo non homini, quod fuit antè, redit.

To which I giue this sense.

The Plants and Trees made poore and old	But neuer Man repayr'd againe
By Winter enuious,	His youth and beautie lost,
The Spring-time bounteous	Though Art, and care, and cost,
Couers againe from shame and cold:	Doe promise Natures helpe in vaine:

And of which,

Soles occidere & redire possunt:	Nox est perpetua vna dormienda.
The Sunne may set and rise:	Sleepe after our short light
But we contrariwise	One euerlasting night.

For if there were any bayting place, or rest, in the course or race of mans life, then according to the doctrine of the Academicks, the same might also perpetually be maintained; but as there is a continuance of motion in naturall liuing things, and as the sap and iuyce, wherein the life of Plants is preserued, doth euermore ascend or descend: so is it with the life of man, which is alwayes either increasing towards ripenesse and perfection, or declining and decreasing towards rottennesse and dissolution.

§. VI.

Of the free power, which man had in his first Creation, to dispose of himselfe.

THese be the miseries which our first Parents brought on all Mankinde, vnto whom God in his creation gaue a free and vnconstrained will, and on whom he bestowed the liberall choice of all things, with one onely prohibition, to try his gratitude and obedience. God set before him, a mortall and immortall Life, a nature celestiall and terrene, and (indeed) God gaue man to himselfe, to bee his owne Guide, his owne Workeman, and his owne Painter, that hee might frame or describe vnto himselfe what hee pleased, and make election of his owne forme. God made man in the beginning (saith SIRACIDES) and left him in the hands of his own counsaile. Ecclus. 15. 14. Such was the liberalitie of God, and mans felicitie: whereas beasts, and all other creatures reasonlesse, brought with them into the World (saith Lucilius) and that euen when they first fell from the bodies of their Dams, the nature, which they could not change; and the supernall Spirits or Angels were from the beginning, or soone after, of that condition, in which they remaine in perpetuall eternitie. But (as aforesaid) God gaue vnto man all kind of Seeds & Grafts of life (to wit) the vegetatiue life of Plants, the sensuall of Beasts, the rationall of Man, and the intellectuall of Angels; whereof which soeuer he tooke pleasure to plant and cultiue, the same should futurely grow in him, and bring forth fruit, agreeable to his owne choice and plantation. This freedom of the first man Adam, and our first Father, was enigmatically described by Asclepius Atheniensis (saith Mirandola) in the person and Fable of Proteus, who was said, as often as he pleased, to change his shape. To the same end were all those celebrated Metamorphoses among the Pythagorians, and ancient Poets, wherein it was fained, that men were transformed into diuers shapes of beasts, thereby to shew the change of mens conditions, from Reason to Brutalitie, from Vertue to Vice, from Meeknesse to Crueltie, and from Iustice to Oppression. For by the liuely Image of other creatures did those Ancients represent the variable passions and affections of mortall men; as by Serpents were signified Deceiuers; by Lyons, Oppressors, and cruell men; by Swine, Men giuen ouer to lust and sensualitie; by Wolues, rauening, and greedie Men; which also S. Matthew resembleth to false prophets, which come to you in sheepes clothing, but inwardly they are rauening Wolues: by the Images of stones and stockes, foolish and ignorant Men; by Vipers, vngratefull Men: of which S. IOHN BAPTIST, O yee generation of Vipers, &c. Matth. 7. 15. Matth. 3. 7.

§. VII.

Of Gods ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the Vniuersall created was exceeding good.

IN this worke of Man, God finished the Creation; not that God laboured as a man, and therefore rested: for God commanded, and it was finished. Cui valuisse est posse, & perfecisse, velle, & facere, saith Beda. Neither did God so rest, that hee left the World made, and the creatures therein to themselues: for my Father worketh to this day, saith (Christ) and I worke, but God rested (that is) he created no new species or kinds of creatures, but (as afore-said) gaue vnto man a power generatiue, and so to the rest of liuing creatures, and to Plants and Flowers their seeds in themselues; and commanded man to multiply and fill the Earth, and the Earth and Sea to bring forth creatures according to their seuerall kinds: all which being finished, God saw that his works were good, for that he foreknew not, and comprehended not the beginning and end before they were; for God made euery Plant of the field before it was in the Earth, but he gaue to all things which hee had created the nature of good, thereby to teach men, that from so good a God there was nothing made, but that which was perfect good and from whose simple purity and from so excellent a cause, there could proceed no impure or imperfect effect. For man hauing a free will and liberall choice, purchased by disobedience his owne death and mortalitie, and for the crueltie of mans heart, was the Earth afterward cursed, and all creatures of the first Age destroyed: but the righteous man Noah and his Family, with those creatures which the Arke contayned, reserued by God to repleniſh the Earth.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

§. I.

That the seate of Paradise is greatly mistaken, and that is in no maruell that mens bould erre.

COncerning the first Habitation of man, we reade, that the Lord God planted a Garden Eastward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he made, GEN. 2.8. Of this seate and place of Paradise, all Ages haue held dispute: and the opinions and iudgements haue beene, in effect, as diuers, among those that haue written vpon this part of Genesis, as vpon any one place therein, seeming most obscure: some there are, that haue conceiued the being of the terrestriall Paradise, without all regard of the Worlds Geographie, and without any respect of East and West, or any consideration of the place where Moses wrote, and from whence he directed (by the quarters of the Heauens) the way how to find out and iudge, in what Region of the World this Garden was by God planted, wherein hee was exceeding respectiue and precise. Others, by being themselues ignorant in the Hebrew, followed the first Interpretation, or trusting to their owne iudgements, vnderstood one place for another; and one Errour is so fruitfull, as it begetteth a thousand Children, if the licentiousnesse thereof bee not timely restrayned. And thirdly, those Writers which gaue themselues to follow and imitate others, were in all things so obseruant Sectators of those Masters, whom they admired and beleeued in, as they thought it safer to condemne their owne vnderstanding, than to examine theirs. For (saith Radanus in his Epistle of Paradise) Magnos errores, magnarum virorum auctoritate persuasi, transmittimus; wee passe ouer many grosse errours, by the authority of great men led, and perswaded. And it is true, that many of the Fathers were farre wide from the vnderstanding of this place. I speake it not, that I my selfe dare presume to censure them, for I reuerence both their Learning and their Pietie, and yet not bound to follow them any further, than they are guided by truth: for they were men; Et humanum est errare. And to the end that no man should bee proude of himselfe, God hath distributed vnto men such a proportion of Knowledge, as the wisest may behold in themselues their owne weakenesse:

Nulli

Nulli vnquam dedit omnia Deus; God neuer gaue the knowledge of all things to any one. Saint Paul confest that hee knew not, whether he were taken vp into the third heauen in the flesh, or out of the flesh; and Christ himselfe acknowledgeth in this much, that neither Men, nor Angels knew of the latter day; and therfore, seeing knowledge is infinite, it is God (according to S. Iude) who is only wise. Sapientia vbi inuenitur? (saith IOB) but where is wisedome found? and where is the place of vnderstanding? man knoweth not the price thereof, for it is not found in the Land of the liuing. And therefore seeing GOD found folly in his Angels, mens iudgements (which inhabite in houses of clay) cannot be without their mistakings: and so the Fathers, and other learned men, excusable in particulars, especially in those whereupon our saluation dependeth not.

§. II.

A recitall of strange opinions, touching Paradise.

NOw touching Paradise, first it is to bee inquired, whether there were a Paradise, or no: or whether Moses description were altogether mysticall, & allegoricall: as Origen, Philo, Fran. Georgius, with others haue affirmed; and that vnder the names of those foure Riuers, Pison, Gehon, Hidekel, and Perath, the tree of life, and the tree of Knowledge, there were deliuered vnto vs other mysteries and significations; as, that by the foure Riuers were meant the foure Cardinall vertues, Iustice, Temperance, Fortitude, and Prudence, or (by other) Oyle, Wine, Milke, and Honny. This Allegoricall vnderstanding of Paradise by Origen diuulged, was againe by Franciscus Georgius receiued (saith Sixtus Senensis) whose friuolous imaginations Sixtus himselfe doth fully and learnedly answer, in the 34. Annotation of his fift Booke fol. 338. the last Edition. Bartas. sem. 2. l. 1. 143.

S. Ambrose also leaned wholly to the Allegoricall construction, and set Paradise in the third Heauen, and in the vertues of the minde, & in nostro principali, which is, as I conceiue it, in mente, or in our soules: to the particulars whereof he alludeth in this sort. By the place or garden of Paradise, was meant the soule or minde; by Adam, Mens, or Vnderstanding; by Eue, the Sense; by the Serpent, Delectation; by the Tree of good and euill, Sapience; and by the rest of the Trees, the vertues of the minde, or in the minde planted, or from thence springing. Notwithstanding all which, vpon the first of the Corinth, cap. 6. he in direct words alloweth both of a celestiall and terrestriall Paradise; the one, into which S. Paul was rapt; the other, into which Adam was put by God. Aug. Chrysamensis was of opinion, that a Paradise had beene, but that there was not now any marke thereof on the earth: the same being not only defaced, but withall the places now not so much as existing. To which Luther seemeth to adhere. Amb. de Parad.

The Manichees also vnderstood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth; to which opinion, Vadianus inclineth, as I conceiue his words in two seuerall places. First, vpon this: Fill the earth, GEN. 10. Of which he giueth this iudgement. Hoc ipso etiam quod dixit, Replete terram, dominamini vniuersis animantibus, subijcite terram, clarissimè docet, totam terram extantem, & omnigenis (vt tum erat) fructibus consitam, sedem & hortum illum Adæ, & posteritatis futuræ fuisse; These words (saith he) in which God said, Bring forth fruite and multiply, and fill the earth, and subdue it, and rule ouer euery creature, doe cleerely shew, that the Vniuersall earth set or filled with all sorts of fruits (as then it was) was the garden and seate of ADAM, and of his future posteritie. And afterward hee acknowledgeth the place, out of the Acts, Cap. 17. Apostolus ex vno sanguine omne genus humanum adeo factum docet, vt habitarent super vniuersam faciem terræ: tota igitur terra Paradisus ille erat; The Apostle (saith he) teacheth, that God hath made of one bloud all mankinde, to dwell ouer all the face of the earth: and therefore all the earth (saith hee) was that Paradise. Which coniectures I will answer in order. Goropius Becanus differeth not much from this opinion, but yet hee acknowledgeth that Adam was first planted by God in one certaine place, and peculiar Garden; which place Goropius findeth neere the Riuer of Acesines, in the confines of India. Verse 26.

Tertullian, Bonauenture, and Durandus, make Paradise vnder the Equinoctiall, and Postellus, quite contrary, vnder the North pole: the Chaldæans also for the most part, & all their Sectators, followed the opinion of Origen, or rather Origen theirs, who would either make Paradise a figure, or Sacrament only, or else would haue it seated out of this sensible word, or raised into some high and remote Region of the Aire. Strabus, and Bart. 16. 126.

Bed. in Gen. Pet. Comest. l. 1. cap. 3. Moses Barc. de Par.

Rabanus, were both ſicke of this vanitie, with Origen, and Philo: ſo was our venerable Beda, and Pet. Comeſtor, and Moſes Barcephas the Syrian, tranſlated by Maſius. But as Hopkins ſaies of Philo Iudæus, that hee wondred, Quo malo genio afflatus; By what euill Angell he was blowne vp into this errour: ſo can I not but greatly maruaile at the learned men, who ſo groſſely & blindly wandred; ſeeing Moſes, and after him the Prophets, do ſo plainly deſcribe this place, by the Region in which it was planted, by the kingdomes and prouinces bordering it, by the Riuers which watered it, and by the points of the Compaſſe vpon which it lay, in reſpect of Iudæa, or Canaan.

Neuiomagus alſo, vpon Beda, De natura rerum, beleeueth that all the earth was taken for Paradiſe, and not any one place. For the whole earth (ſaith he) hath the ſame beauty adſcribed to Paradiſe. He addeth, that the Ocean was that fountaine, from whence the foure Riuers, Piſon, Gehon, Tigris, and Euphrates, had their beginning: for he could not thinke it poſſible, that theſe Riuers of Ganges, Nilus, Tigris, and Euphrates, (whereof the one ranne through India, the other through Egypt, and the other through Meſopotamia and Armenia) could riſe out of one fountaine, were it not out of the Fountaine of the Ocean.

§. III.

That there was a true locall Paradiſe Eaſtward, in the Countrey of Eden.

Gen. cap. 2.

TO the firſt therefore, that ſuch a place there was vpon the earth, the wordes of Moſes make it manifeſt, where it is written, And the Lord God planted a garden Eaſtward in Eden, and there hee put the man whom hee had made. And howſoeuer the vulgar tranſlation, called Hieromes tranſlation, hath conuerted this place thus, Plantauerat Dominus Deus Paradiſum voluptatis à principio; The Lord God planted a Paradiſe of pleaſure from the beginning; putting the word (pleaſure) for Eden, and (from the beginning) for Eaſtward: it is manifeſt, that in this place Eden is the proper name of a Region. For what ſenſe hath this tranſlation (ſaith our Hopkins, in his Treatiſe of Paradiſe) that hee planted a garden in pleaſure, or that a Riuer went out of pleaſure to water the garden? But the ſeuenty Interpreters call it Paradiſum Edenis, the Paradiſe of Eden, and ſo doth the Chaldæan Paraphraſt truely take it for the proper name of a place, and for a Noune appellatiue; which Region, in reſpect of the fertilitie of the ſoyle, of the many beautifull Riuers, and goodly Woods, and that the trees (as in the Indies) doe alwaies keepe their leaues, was called Eden, which ſignifieth in the Hebrew, pleaſantneſſe, or delicacie, as the Spaniards call the Country, oppoſite to the Iſle of Cuba, Florida: and this is the miſtaking, which may end the diſpute, as touching the double ſenſe of the word; that as Florida was a Countrey, ſo called for the flouriſhing beauty thereof, ſo was Eden a Region called pleaſure, or delicacie, for its pleaſure, or delicacy: and as Florida ſignifieth flouriſhing; ſo Eden ſignifieth pleaſure: & yet both are the proper names of Countries; for Eden being the proper name of a Region (called pleaſure in the Hebrew) and Paradiſe being the choice ſeate of all that Region, Paradiſe was truely the Garden of Eden, and truly the Garden of pleaſure.

Now, for Eaſtward, to tranſlate it, from the beginning, it is alſo contrary to the tranſlation of the Seuenty; to the ancient Greeke Fathers, as Baſil, Chryſoſtome, Theodoret, Gregorie, and to the Rabines, as Rambam, Rabbi Salomon, R. Abraham, and Chimchi; and of the Latines, Seuerinus, Damaſcenus, &c. who plainly take Eden for the proper name of a Region, and ſet the word (Eaſtward) for ab initio: for Damaſcens owne wordes are theſe, Paradiſus eſt locus Dei manibus in Eden ad Orientem mirabiliter conſitus; Paradiſe is a place, maruailouſly planted by the hands of God, in Eden, toward the Eaſt.

And after all theſe Fathers, Guilhelmus Pariſienſis, a great learned man, and Sixtus Senenſis, of later times, doe both vnderſtand theſe words of Eden, and of the Eaſt, contrary to the vulgar tranſlation; Pariſienſis, as indifferent to both, and Sixtus Senenſis, directly againſt the vulgar: of which theſe are their owne words: After this I will begin to ſpeake of Paradiſe terreſtriall, which God planted from the beginning, or Eaſtward, &c. Poſt hæc incipiam loqui de Paradiſo terreſtri, quem plantâſſe Deum ab initio vel ad Orientem, &c. And then Senenſis; MOSES enim clariſsimè prodit, Paradiſum à Deo conſitum in regione terræ Orientalis, quæ dicitur Heden: Heden autem eſſe proprium nomen apparet ex quarto capite Gen. vbi legimus CHAM habitâſſe ad Orientalem plagam Heden; For MOSES (ſaith (saith he) doth shew most cleerely, that Paradise was planted of God in a Region of the East Countrie, which is called Heden: but that Heden is a proper name, it appeareth by the fourth Chapter of Genesis, where we reade, that CHAM dwelt on the East border of Heden. PERERIVS endeuoureth to qualifie this translation: for this particle (saith he) ab initio, is referred to all the time of the creation, and not to the very first day; alleaging this place of Christ, that although the Deuill was said to be a man-slayer from the beginning, yet that was meant but after the sixth day. But surely, as I thinke (referring my selfe to better iudgement) the Deuill was from the instant of his fall a man-slayer in disposition, though he had not whereon to practise till mans creation. And for conclusion, S. Hierome (if that bee his translation) aduiseth himselfe better in the end of the third Chapter of Genesis, conuerting the word (Eden) by (ante) and not (à principio) as, God did set a Cherubin before the Garden of Eden; Collocauit Deus ante Paradisum voluptatis Cherubin; and Pererius himselfe acknowledgeth, that this is the true sense of this place, precisely taken, according to the Hebrew. Posuit à parte Orientali horti Heden, Cherubin; Hee set on the East side of the Garden of Heden, Cherubin. BEGANVS affirmeth, that the Hebrew word (Be) signifieth (with) as well as (in) and so the Text beareth this sense; That God planted a Garden with pleasure (that is to say) full of pleasure. But Beganus followeth this construction, onely to the end, to finde Paradise vpon the Riuer of Acesines: for there he hath heard of the Indian Fig-tree in great abundance, which hee supposeth to bee the tree of Knowledge of good and euill, and would therefore draw Paradise to the Fig-tree: which conceit of his I will answer hereafter.

Vers. 16. Iohn 8. 44. Gen. 3. 24.

Now, because Paradise was seated by Moses toward the East, thence came the custome of praying towards the East, and not by imitation of the Chaldæans: and therefore all our Churches are built East and West, as to the point where the Sun riseth in March, which is directly ouer Paradise (saith Damascenus:) affirming, that wee alwaies pray towards the East, as looking towards Paradise, whence wee were cast out; and yet the Temple of Salomon had their Priests and Sacrifices, which turned themselues in their seruice and diuine ceremonies, alwaies towards the West, thereby to auoide the superstition of the Egyptians and Chaldæans.

But because East and West are but in respect of places; (for although Paradise were East from Iudæa, yet it was West from Persia) and the seruing of God is euery where in the world, the matter is not great which way we turne our faces, so our hearts stand right, other than this, that we who dwell West from Paradise, and pray turning our selues towards the East, may remember thereby to beseech God, that as by Adams fall wee haue lost the Paradise on earth; so by Christs death and passion wee may be made partakers of the Paradise celestiall, & the Kingdom of heauen. To conclude, I conceiue, that there was no other mysterie in adding the word (East) to Eden by Moses, than to shew, that the Region of Eden, in which Paradise vvas, lay Eastward from Iudæa and Canaan; for the Scriptures alwaies called the people of those Nations, the Sonnes of the East, vvhich inhabited Arabia, Mesopotamia, Chaldæa, and Persia: of which Ouid:

Eurus ad Auroram, Nabataeaq; regna recessit,
Persidaq; & radijs iuga subdita matutinis.

The East winde with Aurora hath abiding
Among th' Arabians, and the Persian Hils, Whom Phœbus first salutes at his vp-rising.

And if it bee obiected, that Hiermy the Prophet threatning the destruction of Hierusalem, doth often make mention of Northerne Nations, it is to bee noted, that the North is there named, in respect of those nations that followed Nabuchodonozor, and of vvhom the greatest part of his Army vvas compounded; not that Babylon it selfe stood North from Hierusalem, though inclining from the East towards the North.

Now to the difference of this Translation, Peter Comestor giueth best satisfaction: for he vseth the vvord, From the beginning, that is, from the first part of the world, (à principio) id est, (saith hee) à prima orbis parte; and afterward hee affirmeth, that à principio, and ad Orientem, haue the same signification; From the beginning & East-ward is all one, à principio idem est quod ad Orientem.

But to returne to the proofe of this place, and that this Story of Mankind was not Allegoricall, it followeth in the Text of the 2. Chap. & 9. Verse, in these vvords: For out of the ground made the Lord God to grow euery Tree pleasant to the sight, and good for meate, &c. so as first it appeared that God created Adam elsewhere, as in the World at large, and then, put him into the Garden: and the end why, is expresst: that he might dresse it and

keepe it; Paradise being a Garden or Orchard filled with Plants, and Trees, of the Verse 18. most excellent kinds, pleasant to behold, and (withall) good for meate: which proueth that Paradise was a terrestriall Garden, garnished with Fruits, delighting both the eye and taste. And to make it more plaine, and to take away all opinion of Allegoricall construction, he affirmeth that it was watered and beautified with a Riuer; expressing Verse 10. also the Region, out of which this Riuer sprang, which hee calleth Heden; and that Ezech. 27. 23. Heden is also a Countrie neere vnto Charan in Mesopotamia, Ezechiel witnesseth.

But to all these Cabalists, which draw the Truth and Storie of the Scriptures into Allegories, Epiphanius answereth in these wordes: Si Paradisus non est sensibilis, non est etiam fons, si non est fons, non est flumen, si non est flumen, non sunt quatuor principia, non Pison, non Gehon, non Tigris, nec Euphrates, non est ficus, non folia, non commedit EVA de arbore, non est ADAM, non sunt homines, sed veritas iam fabula est, & omnia ad Allegorias reuocantur: If Paradise bee not sensible, then there was no fountaine, and then no riuer, if no riuer, then no such foure heads or branches, and then not any such riuer as Pison, or Gehon, Tigris, or Euphrates, no such fig-tree, or fruit, or leaues, EVE then did not eate of the fruit, neither was there any ADAM, or any man, the truth was but a fable, and all things esteemed are called backe into Allegories. Wordes to the same effect hath S. Hierome vpon DANIEL: Contiteseant eorum deliramenta, qui vmbras & imagines in veritate sequentes, ipsam conantur euertere veritatem, vt. Paradisum & flumina, & arbores putent Allegoriæ Legibus se debere subruere; Let the dotage of them bee silent, who following shadowes and images in the Truth, endeuour to subuert the Truth it selfe, and thinke that they ought to bring Paradise, and the Riuers and the Trees vnder the Rules of Allegorie.

Furthermore, by the continuation and order of the Storie is the place made more manifest. For, God gaue Adam free libertie to eate of euery Tree of the Garden, (the Tree of knowledge excepted) which Trees Moses in the ninth verse saith that they were good to eat; meaning the fruit which they bare. Besides, God left all beasts to Adam to be named, which hee had formerly made; and these beasts were neither in the third Heauen, nor neere the Circle of the Moone, nor beasts in imagination: for if all these things were Enigmaticall or Mysticall, the same might also bee said of the creation of all things. And Ezechiel, speaking of the glory of the Assyrian Kings, vseth this speech:
Ezech. 31. 9. All the Trees of Eden, which were in the Garden of God, enuied him; which proueth both Eden, and Paradise therin seated, to be terrestriall: for the Prophets made no imaginary comparisons. But Moses wrote plainely, and in a simple stile, fit for the capacities of ignorant men, and hee was more large and precise in the description of Paradise, than in any other place of Scripture; of purpose to take away all scruple from the incredulitie of future ages, whom he knew (out of the gift of Prophecie) to bee apt to fabulous inuentions, and that if hee had not described both the Region and the Riuers, and how it stood from Canaan, many of the vnbeleeuing Israelites and others after them, would haue misconstrued this Storie of Mankinde. And is it likely, there would haue been so often mention made of Paradise in the Scriptures, if the same had beene an Vtopia? For we finde that the Valley, wherein Sodome and Gomorrha stood, (sometimes called Pentapolis, of the fiue principall Cities therin) was before the destruction (which their vnnaturall sinne purchased) compared to the Paradise of the Lord, and like to the Land
Gen. 13. 10. of Egypt toward Zoar: In like manner was Israel resembled to the Paradise of GOD, before the Babylonians wasted it: which proueth plainly, that Paradise it selfe exceeded in beauty and fertility, and that these places had but a resemblance thereof: being compared to a seate and soyle of farre exceeding excellency.

Besides, whence had Homer his inuention of Alcinous Gardens, as Iustin Martyr noteth, but out of Moses his description of Paradise? Gen. 2. and whence are their praises of the Elizian fields, but out of the storie of Paradise? to which also appertaine those Verses of the Golden Age in Ouid:

Ouid. Metam. l. 1

Ver erat æternum, placidique tepentibus auris
Mulcebant Zephyri natos sine semine flores.

The ioyfull Spring did euer last, | Sweete flowers by his gentle blast,
And Zephyrus did breede | Without the helpe of seed.

And it is manifest, that Orpheus, Linus, Pindarus, Hesiodus, and Homer, and after him, Ouid, one out of another, and all these together with Pythagoras and Plato, and their Secta-

Sectators, did greatly enrich their inuentions, by vending the stoine Treasures of Diuine Letters, altered by prophane additions, and disguised by poeticall conuersions, as if they had bin conceiued out of their owne speculations and contemplations.

But besides all these testimonies, if we find what Region Heden or Eden was; if wee proue the Riuer that ran out of it, and that the same afterwards was diuided into foure branches; together with the Kingdomes of Hauila and Cush, and that all these are Eastward from Canaan, or the Deserts of the Amorites, where Moses wrote; I then conceiue, that there is no man that will doubt, but that such a place there was. And yet I doe not exclude the Allegoricall sense of the Scripture; for as well in this there were many figures of Christ, as in all the old Testament throughout: the Storie being directly true notwithstanding. And to this purpose (saith Saint Augustine) Tres sunt de Paradiso generales sententiæ: vna est eorum, qui tantummodo corporaliter Paradisum intelligi volunt: alia eorum, qui spiritualiter tantum (id est) Ecclesiam: tertia eorum, qui vtroque modo Paradisum accipiunt, (that is) There are three opinions of Paradise: the one of those men, which will haue it altogether corporall: a second of those, which conceiue it altogether spirituall, and to be a figure of the Church: the third of those which take it in both senses; which third opinion S. Augustine approueth, and of which Suidas giueth this allowable iudgement: Quemadmodum homo sensibilis, & intelligibilis simul conditus erat: sic & huius sanctissimam nomus, sensibile simul & intelligibile, & duplici specie est traditum, (that is) As man was created at one time both sensible and intelligible: so was this holy Groue or Garden to be taken both wayes, and endued with a double forme. Aug. de Ciuit. Dei. l. 13. c. 21. Suidas in verbo Paradisus.

§. IV.

Why it should be needfull to intreate diligently of the place of Paradise.

BVt it may be obiected, that it is needlesse, and a kind of curiositie to enquire so diligently after this place of Paradise, and that the knowledge thereof is of little or no vse. To which I answer, that there is nothing written in the Scripture, but for our instruction; and if the truth of the Storie be necessarie, then by the place proued, the same is also made more apparent. For if wee should conceiue that Paradise were not on the Earth, but lifted vp as high as the Moone; or that it were beyond all the Ocean, and in no part of the knowne World, from whence Adam was said to wade through the Sea, & thence to haue come into Iudea, (out of doubt) there would be few men in the World, that would giue any credit vnto it. For what could seeme more ridiculous than the report of such a place: and besides, what maketh this seate of Paradise so much disputed and doubted of, but the conceit that Pishon should be Ganges, which watereth the East India, and Gehon, Nilus, which enricheth Egypt, and these two Riuers so farre distant, as (except all the World were Paradise) those streames can no way be comprized therein?

Secondly, if the birth and workes, and death of our Sauiour, were said to haue beene in some such Countrey, of which no man euer heard tell, and that his Miracles had bin performed in the Ayre, or no place certainly knowne: I assure my selfe, that the Christian Religion would haue taken but a tender roote in the mindes of men: for times and places are approued witnesses of worldly actions.

Thirdly, if we should rely, or giue place to the iudgement of some Writers vpon this place of Genesis (though otherwise for their doctrine in generall, they are worthy of honour & reuerence) I say that there is no fable among the Greekish or Egyptian more ridiculous: for who would beleeue that there were a piece of the World so set by it selfe & separated as to hang in the Aire vnder the circle of the Moone? or who so doltish to conceiue, that from thence the foure riuers of Ganges, Nilus, Euphrates, and Tygris, should fall downe, and run vnder all the Ocean, and rise vp againe in this our habitable world, & in those places where they are now found? Which if (I say) any man thinke, that I enforce or straine to the worst, these are Peter Comestor owne words. Est autem locus amœnissimus longe terra & maris & aliis nostra habitabili Zona seiunctus, adeo elevatus, vt vsq. ad lunare globum attingat, etc. (that is) It is a most pleasant place, seuered from our habitable Zone by a long tract of land & Sea, elevated so high, as it touches the globe of the Moone.

And Marc. Barcephas vpon this place writeth in this manner: Dicunt hoc quoq. respondentes Paradisum in sublimiori positum esse regione, quam nostra habet terra, ferri vt Bar. conuersed by Masius.

vt illinc per præcipitium delabantur fluuij tanto cum impetu, quantum verbis exprimere non possis, eoq; impetu impulsi pressiq; sub Oceani vada rapiuntur, vnde rursus prosiliant ebulliantq; in hoc à nobis culto orbe: which haue this sense: Furthermore (saith he) we giue this for an answer, that Paradise is set in a Region farre raised aboue this part which we inhabite; whereby it comes to passe, that from thence these Riuers fall downe with such a headlong violence, as words cannot expresse; and with that force so impulsed and prest, they are carried vnder the deepe Ocean, and doe againe rise and boyle vp in this our habitable world: and to this he addeth the opinion of Ephram, which is this. Ephram dicit Paradisum ambire terram, atq; vltra Oceanum ita positum esse, vt totum terrarum orbem ab omni circumdet regione, non aliter atq; Luna orbis Lunam cingit, (which is) That Paradise doth compasse or embrace the whole Earth, and is so set beyond the Ocean Sea, as it enuironeth the whole Orbe of the Earth on euery side, as the Orbe of the Moone doth embrace the Moone. To the end therefore that these ridiculous expositions and opinions doe not bring question vnto Truth it selfe, or make the same subiect to doubts or disputes, it is necessarie to discouer the true place of Paradise, which God in his wisedome appointed in the very Nauell of this our World, and (as Melanchton saies) in parte terra meliore, in the best part thereof, that from thence, as from a Centre, the Vniuersall might be filled with people and planted; and by knowing this place, we shall the better iudge of the beginning of Nations, & of the worlds inhabitation: for neere vnto this did the Sons of Noah also disperse themselues after the floud, into all other remote regions & countries. And if it be a generous desire in men, to know from whence their owne forefathers haue come, and out of what regions and Nations, it cannot be displeasing to vnderstand the place of our first Ancester, from whence all the streames and branches of Mankind haue followed & bin deduced. If then it doe appeare by the former, that such a place there was as Paradise, and that the knowledge of this place cannot be vnprofitable, it followeth in order to examine seueral opinions before remembred, by the Truth it selfe, & to see how they agree with the sense of the Scripture, and with common reason, and afterward to proue directly, and to delineate the Region in which God first planted this delightfull Garden.

§. V.

That the Floud hath not vtterly defaced the markes of Paradise, nor caused Hils in the Earth.

AND first, whereas it is supposed by Aug. Chyssamensis, that the Floud hath altered, deformed, or rather annihilated this place, in such sort, as no man can finde any marke or memorie thereof: (of which opinion there were others also, ascribing to the Floud the cause of those high Mountaines, which are found on all the Earth ouer, with many other strange effects) for mine owne opinion, I thinke neither the one nor the other to be true. For although I cannot deny, but that the face of Paradise was after the Floud withered, and growne old, in respect of the first beautie; (for both the ages of men, and the nature of all things Time hath changed) yet if there had beene no signe of any such place, or if the soile and seate had not remained, then would not Moses, who wrote of Paradise about 850. yeeres after the Floud, haue described it so particularly, and the Prophets long after Moses would not haue made so often mention thereof. And though the verie Garden it selfe were not then to be found, but that the Floud, and other accidents of time made it one common field and pasture with the Land of Eden, yet the place is still the same, and the Riuers still remaine the same Riuers. By two of which (neuer doubted of) to wit, Tygris, and Euphrates, we are sure to finde in what longitude Paradise lay; & learning out one of these Riuers, which afterward doth diuide it selfe into foure branches, wee are sure that the partition is at the very border of the Garden it selfe. For it is written, that out of Eden went a Riuer to water the Garden, and from thence it was diuided and became into foure heads. Now whether the word in the Latine Translation (Inde) from thence, be referred to Eden it selfe, or to Paradise, yet the diuision & branching of those riuers must be in the North or South side of the very Garden (if the riuers run as they doe, North & South) and therefore these riuers yet remaining, & Eden manifestly known, there could be no such defacing by the floud, as is supposed. Furthermore, as there is no likelihood, that the place could be so altered as future ages knew it not, so is there no probability, that that eyther these Riuers were runned out of their courses, or new Riuers created by the Floud which were not, or that the Floud (as aforesaid) by a violent motion, when it began to decrease, was the cause of high Hills or deepe Vallies. For what descent of waters could there be in a Sphericall and round bodie, wherein there is neither high nor low: seeing that all violent force, as of waters is caused by the strength of winde, by descent from a higher to a lower, or by the ebbe or flouds of the Sea. But that there was anie winde (whereby the Seas are most troubled) it appeareth not, rather the contrarie is probable: for it is written, Therefore God made a winde to passe vpon the Earth, and the waters ceased. So as it appeareth not, that vntill the waters fained, there was any winde at all, but that God afterward, out of his goodnesse, caused the winde to blow, to drye vp the abundant slime and mudde of the Earth, and make the Land more fruitfull, and to cleanse the Ayre of thicke vapours, and vnwholsome mists: and this we know by experience, that all downe-right raines doe euermore disseuer the violence of outragious windes, and beat downe, and leuell the swelling and mountainous billow of the Sea: for anie ebbes and flouds there could be none, when the waters were equall and of one heighth ouer all the face of the Earth, and when there were no Indraughts, Bayes, or Gulfes to receiue a Floud, or any descent, or violent falling of waters in the round forme of the Earth and Waters, as aforesaid: and therefore it seemeth most agreeable to reason, that the waters rather stood in a quiet calme, than that they moued with any raging or ouer-bearing violence. And for a more direct proofe that the Floud made no such destroying alteration, Iosephus auoweth that one of those pillars erected by Seth, the third from Adam, was to be seene in his dayes; which pillars were set vp aboue 1426. years before the Floud, counting Seth to be an hundred years old at the erection of them; and Ioseph himselfe to haue liued some fortie or fiftie yeares after Christ: of whom although there be no cause to beleeue all that hee wrote, yet that which hee auouched of his owne time, cannot (without great derogation) bee called in question. And therefore it may be possible, that some foundation or ruine thereof might then be seene. Now that such pillars were raised by Seth, all Antiquitie hath auowed. It is also written in Berosus (to whom although I giue little credite, yet I cannot condemne him in all) that the Citie of Enoch, built by Cain about the mountaines of Libanus, was not defaced by length of time: yea the ruines thereof Annius (who commented vpon that inuented fragment) saith, were to be seene in his dayes, who liued in the reigne of Ferdinand and Isabella of Castile. And if these his words be not true, then was he exceeding impudent: for, speaking of this citie of Enoch, he concludeth in this sort: Cuius maxima & ingentis molis fundamenta visuntur, & vocatur ab incolis regionis, Ciuitas Cain, vt nostri mercatores, & peregrini referunt; The foundation of which huge Masse is now to be seene, and the place is called by the people of that Region, the Citie of Cain, as both our strangers and merchants report. It is also auowed by Pomponius Mela (to whom I giue more credite in these things) that the citie of Ioppa was built before the Floud, ouer which Cepha was King: whose name, with his brother Phineus, together with the grounds and principles of their Religion, was found grauen vpon certaine altars of stone. And it is not impossible, that the ruines of this other citie, called Enoch by Annius, might be seene, though founded in the first Age: but it could not be of the first citie of the world, built by Cain, the place rather than the time denying it.

Gen. 8. 1.

Gen. 4. 17.

And to proue directly that the Floud was not the cause of mountaines, but that there were mountaines from the creation, it is written, that the waters of the Floud ouerflowed by fifteene Cubits the highest Mountaines. And Masius Damascenus (speaking of the Floud) writeth in this manner: Est supra Minyadam excelsus mons in Armenia (qui Baris appellatur) in quo confugientes multos fermò est diluuij tempore liberatos. And vpon Minyada there is an high Mountaine in Armenia (called Baris) vnto which (as it is said) that many fled in the time of the Deluge, and that they saued themselues thereon. Now although it is contrarie to Gods Word, that any more were saued than eight persons (which Masius doth not auouch, but by report) yet it is a testimonie, that such Mountaines were before the Floud, which were afterwards, and euer since, knowne by the same names; & on which Mountaines it is generally receiued that the Arke rested: but vntruely, as I shall proue hereafter. And againe it appeareth, that the Mount Sion (though by another name) was knowne before the Floud; on which the Thalmudists report, that many Giants saued themselues also; but, as Annius saith, without all authoritie eyther diuine or humane.

Lastly,

Lastly, it appeareth that the Floud did not so turne vpside downe the face of the Earth, as thereby it was made past knowledge, after the waters were decreased, by this
Gen. 8. 11. that when NOAH sent out the Done the second time, shee returned with an Olive-leafe in her mouth, which shee had pluckt, and which (vntill the Trees were discouered) shee found not: for otherwise she might haue found them floting on the water; a manifest proofe, that the Trees were not come vp by the roots, nor swamme vpon the waters, for it is written folium Oliuæ, raptum or decerptum, a leafe plucke, (which is) to take from a Tree, or to tear off. By this it is apparant, (there being nothing written to the contrary) that the Floud made no such alteration, as was supposed, but that the place of Paradise might be seene to succeeding Ages, especially vnto Moses, by whom it pleased God to teach the truth of the Worlds Creation, and vnto the Prophets which succeeded him: both which I take for my warrant, and to guide me in this Discouery.

§. VI.

That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some haue thought: making the Ocean to bee the fountaine of those foure Riuers.

THis conceit of Aug. Chysamensis being answered, who onely giueth his opinion for reason, I will in a few words examine that of the Manichees, of Noniomagus, Vadianus, Goropius, Becanus, and all those that vnderstood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth. But in this I shall not trouble the Reader with many wordes, because by those places of Scripture formerly remembred, this Vniuersalitie will appeare altogether improper. The places which Vadianus alleageth, Bring forth fruit and
Gen. 1. 28. multiply, fill the Earth and subdue it, rule ouer euery Creature, &c. with this of the Acts 17. 26. Acts, and hath made of one blood all Mankinde, to dwell on all the face of the Earth, doe no way proue such a generalitie: for the World was made for man, of which hee vvas Lord and Gouernor, and all things therein were ordained of God for his vse. Now although all men vvere of one and the same fountaine of bloud originally; and Adams posteritie inhabited in processe of time ouer all the face of the earth; yet it disproueth in nothing the particular Garden, assigned to Adam, to dresse and cultiue, in which hee liued in so
Gen. 2. 8. blessed an estate before his transgression. For if there had beene no other choyce, but that Adam had bin left to the Vniuersall; Moses vvould not then haue said, Eastward
3. 24. in Eden, seeing the World hath nor East nor West, but respectiuely. And to what end had the Angell of God beene set to keepe the East-side, and entrance into Paradise after Adams expulsion, if the Vniuersall had beene Paradise? for then must Adam haue been chased also out of the World. For if All the earth vvere Paradise, that place can receiue no better construction than this, That Adam vvas driuen out of the World into the World, and out of Paradise into Paradise, except vvee should beleeue vvith Metrodorus, that there were infinite Worlds. Which to deny, he thinkes all one, as to affirme, That in so large a field, as the Vniuersall, there should grow but one Thistle. NOVIOMAGVS vpon Beda, seemeth to bee led by this, that it vvas vnpossible for those three Riuers, Ganges, Nilus, and Euphrates (vvhich vvater three portions of the World so far distant) to rise out of one Fountaine, except the Ocean bee taken for the Well, and the World for the Garden.

And it is true, that those foure Riuers, being so vnderstood, there could bee no coniecture more probable: but it shall plainly appeare, that Pison was falsly taken for Ganges, and Gehon falsly for Nilus, although Ganges be a Riuer by Hauilah in India, & Nilus run through Ethiopia. The Seuenty vvrite Chus for Ethiopia, and therby the errors of the Manichees, and the mistakings of Noniomagus, Goropius, & Vadianus, vvith others, are made manifest. Yet was their coniecture farre more probable, than that of Ephrem, Cyrillus, and Athanasius: That Paradise vvas seated far beyond the Ocean Sea, and that Adam vvaded through it, and at last came toward the Country in vvhich hee was created, and vvas buried at Mount Caluery in Hierusalem. And certainely, though all those of the first Age were of great stature, and so continued many yeeres after the Floud, yet Adams shin-bones must haue contained a thousand fadome, and much more, if hee had foorded the Ocean; but this opinion is so ridiculous, as it needes no argument to disproue it.

§. VII.

§. VII.

Of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the Moone: and of others, which make it higher then the middle Region of the Ayre.

THirdly, whereas Beda saith, and as the Schoolemen affirme, Paradise to bee a place, altogether remoued from the knowledge of men (locus à conuersione hominum remotissimus) and Barcephas conceiued, that Paradise was farre in the East, but mounted aboue the Ocean, and all the Earth, and neere the Orbe of the Moone (which opinion, though the Schoolemen charge Beda withall, yet Pererius layes it off from Beda vpon Strabus, and his Master Rabanus:) and whereas Rupertus, in his Geographie of Paradise, doth not much differ from the rest, but findes it seated next or neerest heauen; It may seeme, that all these borrowed this doctrine out of Plato, and Plato out of Socrates: but neither of them (as I conceiue) well vnderstood; who (vndoubtedly) tooke this place for Heauen it selfe, into which the Soules of the blessed were carried after death.

True it is, that these Philosophers durst not for feare of the Areopagites (in this and many other diuine apprehensions) set downe what they beleeued in plaine termes, especially Plato: though Socrates in the end suffered death, for acknowledging one onely powerfull God; and therefore did the Deuill himselfe doe him that right, as by an Oracle, to pronounce him the wisest man. Iustine Martyr affirmeth, that Plato had read the Scriptures; and St. Augustine gaue this iudgement of him, as his opinion, that (few things changed) hee might be counted a Christian. And it seemeth to mee, that both Tertullian and Eusebius conceiue, that Socrates, by that place aforesaid, meant the celestiall Paradise, and not this of Eden. Solinus, I grant, reporteth, that there is a place exceeding delightfull and healthfull, vpon the top of Mount Atho (called Acrothonos) which being aboue all Clouds of Raine, or other Inconuenience, the people (by reason of their so many yeeres) are called Macrobii (that is) Long-liued. A further Argument is vsed, for proofe of the heighth of this place, because therein was Enoch preserued from the violence of the Flood: approued by Isidore, and Peter Lombard; in which place also Tertullian conceiued, that the blessed Soules were preserued till the last iudgement; which Irenæus and Iustine Martyr also beleeued. But this opinion was of all Catholique Diuines reproued, and in the Florentine Councell damned; of which Saint Augustine more modestly gaue this iudgement: Sicut certum est, ENOCH & ELIAM nunc viuere sit a vbi nunt sunt: an in Paradiso an alibi, incertum est; (that is) As it is certaine that ENOCH and ELIAS doe now liue: so where they liue, in Paradise or elsewhere, it is vncertaine. But Barcephas giues a third cause, though of all other the weakest. For (saith he) it was necessary that Paradise should be set at such a distance and heighth, because the foure Riuers (had they not fallen so precipitate) could not haue had sufficient force to haue thrust themselues vnder the great Ocean, and afterward haue forced their passage through the earth, and haue risen againe in the farre distant Regions of India, Egypt, and Arcadia.

Plog. Laert. in Soc.

Iustin. Mart. adm. ad Gent. Aug.

These strange fancies and dreames haue beene answered by diuers learned men long since, and lately by Hopkins, and Pererius, writing vpon this subiect; of whose arguments I will repeate these few: for to vse long discourse against those things, which are both against Scripture and Reason, might rightly bee iudged a vanity in the Answerer, not much inferior to that of the Inuenter.

It is first therefore alleadged, that such a place cannot be commodious to liue in: for being set so neere the Moone, it had beene too neere the Sunne, and other heauenly bodies. Secondly, because it must haue beene too ioynct a Neighbour to the Element of fire. Thirdly, because the Ayre in that Region is so violently moued, and carried about with such swiftnesse, as nothing in that place can consist or haue abiding. Fourthly, because the place betweene the Earth and the Moone (according to Ptolomie and Alfraganus) is seuenteene times the Diameter of the Earth, which makes in a grosse account about one hundred and twenty thousand miles. Hereupon it must follow, that Paradise being raised to this heighth, must haue the compasse of the whole earth for a Basis and foundation. But had it bin so raised, it could hardly be hidden from the knowledge, or eyes of men: seeing it would deprive vs of the Sunnes light, all the fore-part of the day, being seated in the East, as they suppose. Now, to fortifie the former opinions, Tostatus addeth this, that those people which dwell neere those fals of waters, are deafe from their infancy, like those which dwel neer the Catadupa, or ouer-fals of Nilus. But this I hold as fained. For I haue seen in the Indies, far greater water-falls, than those of Nilus, and yet the people dwelling neere them are not deafe at all. Tostatus (the better to strengthen himselfe) citeth Basil and Ambrose together: to which Pererius, Sed ego hæc apud Basilium & Ambrosium in eorum scriptis, quæ nunc extant, nusquam me legere memini; But I do not remember (saith he) that I ever read those things, either in Basil or Ambrose.

Cicero Somn. Scip.

But for the bodies of Enoch & Elias, God hath disposed of them according to his wisdome. Their taking vp might be into the celestiall Paradise, for ought we know. For although flesh and bloud, subiect to corruption, cannot inherit the Kingdome of heauen, and the seed must rot in the ground before it grow, yet we shall not all die (saith S. Paul) but all shall be changed: which change, in Enoch & Elias, was easie to him that is Almightie. But for the rest, the Scriptures are manifest, that by the Floud all perished on the earth, sauing eight persons, and therefore in the terrestriall Paradise they could not be.

1. Cor. 15. 36. 51.

1. Pet. 3. 20.

For Tostatus his owne opinion, who soared not altogether so high as the rest, but beleeued that Paradise was raised aboue the middle Region of the Aire, and twenty cubits aboue all Mountaines, that the Floud did not therfore reach it: (which Scotus and other later Schoole-men also beleeued; for, say they, there were no sinners in Paradise, and therefore no cause to ouer-whelme it:) this is also contrary to the expresse letter of the Scripture: which directly, and without admitting of any distinction, teacheth vs, that the waters ouer-flowed all the mountaines vnder heauen. And were it otherwise, then might we aswell giue credit to Masius, Damascenus, & the Thalmudists, who affirme, that there were of the Giants that saued themselues on the Mountaine Baris, and on Sion. But to helpe this, Scotus, being (as the rest of the Schoolemen are) full of distinctions, saith; That the waters stood at Paradise, as they did in the Read Sea, and at Iordan; and as the Floud was not naturall, so was Paradise saued by miracle. And Thomas Aquinas qualifieth this high conceit with this supposition, That it was not beleeued, that Paradise was so seated, as Beda and others seeme to affirme in words, but by Hyperbole and comparatiuely, for the delicacie and beautie so resembled. But this I dare auow of all those Schoole-men, that though they were exceeding witty, yet they better teach all their Followers to shift, than to resolue by their distinctions. Wherefore not to stay long in answering this opinion of Tostatus, I confesse that it is written, that the Mountains of Olympus, Atho, and Atlas, ouer-reach and surmount all windes and clouds, and that (notwithstanding) there is found on the heads of the Hils both springs and fruits; and the Pagan Priests, sacrificing on these mountaine tops, do not find the ashes (remaining of their sacrifices) blowne thence, nor thence washt off by raines, when they returne: yet experience hath resolued vs, that these reports are fabulous, and Pliny himself (who was not sparing in the report of wonders) auoweth the contrary. But were it granted, yet the heighth of these Mountaines is far vnder the supposed place of Paradise; and on these selfe Hils the ayre is so thin (saith S. Augustine, whom herein I mistrust) that it is not sufficient to beare vp the body of a bird, hauing therein no feeling of her wings, or any sensible resistance of ayre to mount her selfe by.

§. VIII.

Of their opinion that seate Paradise vnder the Æquinoctiall: and of the pleasant habitation vnder those Climats.

THose which come neerer vnto Reason, finde Paradise vnder the Æquinoctiall line, as Tertullian, Bonauenture, and Durandus: iudging, that thereunder might be found most pleasure, and the greatest fertility of soile: but against it Thomas Aquinas obiecteth the distemperate heat, which he supposeth to be in all places so directly vnder the Sunne; but this is (non causa pro causa,) for although Paradise could not bee vnder the Line, because Eden is farre from it, in which Paradise was; & because there is no part of Euphrates, Tigris, or Ganges vnder it, (Ganges being one of the foure riuers, as they suppose) yet this conceit of distemper, (being but an old opinion) is found to be very vntrue, though for the coniecture not to bee condemned, considering the age when those Fathers wrote, grounded chiefly on this: that whereas it appeared, that euerie Countrie, as it lay by degrees neerer the Tropick, and ſo toward the Aequinoctiall, did ſo much the more exceede in heat; It was therefore a reaſonable coniecture, that thoſe Countries which were ſituated directly vnder it, were of a diſtemper vninhabitable: but it ſeemeth that Tertullian conceiued better, and ſo did Auicenne, for they both thought them habitable enough; and though (perchance) in thoſe daies it might be thought a fantaſticall opinion (as all are which goe againſt the vulgar) yet we now find, that if there be any place vpon the earth of that nature, beautie, and delight that Paradiſe had, the ſame muſt be found within that ſuppoſed vninhabitable burnt Zone, or within the Tropicks, and neereſt to the line it ſelfe. For hereof experience hath informed Reaſon, and Time hath made thoſe things apparant, which were hidden and could not by any contemplation be diſcouered. Indeed it hath ſo pleaſed God to prouide for all liuing creatures, wherewith he hath filled the world, that ſuch inconueniences which we contemplate a farre off, are found by triall and the witneſſe of mens trauailes, to be ſo qualified, as there is no portion of the earth made in vaine, or as a fruitleſſe lump to faſhion out the reſt. For God himſelfe (ſaith ISAY) that formed the earth and made it, he that prepared it, he created it not in vaine, he formed it to be inhabited. Now we finde that theſe hotteſt Regions of the world, ſeated vnder the Aequinoctiall line, or neere it, are ſo refreſhed with a daily gale of Eaſterne winde (which the Spaniards call the Brize) that doth euermore blow ſtrongeſt in the heate of the day, as the downe-right beames of the Sun cannot ſo much maſter it, that there is any inconuenience or diſtemperate heat found thereby. Secondly, the nights are ſo cold, freſh, and equall, by reaſon of the entire interpoſition of the earth, as (for thoſe places which my ſelfe haue ſeen, neere the Line & vnder it) I know no other part of the world of better, or equall temper: Onely there are ſome tracts, which by accident of high Mountaines are barr'd from this ayre and freſh wind, and ſome few ſandie parts without trees, which are not therefore ſo well inhabited as the reſt; and ſuch difference of ſoiles we finde alſo in all other parts of the world. But (for the greateſt part) thoſe Regions haue ſo many goodly Riuers, Fountaines, and little Brookes, abundance of high Cedars, and other ſtately trees caſting ſhade, ſo many ſorts of delicate fruits, euer bearing, and at all times beautified with bloſſome and fruit both greene and ripe, as it may of all other parts be beſt compared to the Paradiſe of Eden: the boughes and branches are neuer vnclothed and left naked, their ſap creepeth not vnder ground into the root, fearing the iniury of the froſt: neither doth Pomana at any time deſpiſe her withered Husband Vertumnus, in his winter quarters and old age. Therefore are theſe Countries called Terra vitioſa, Vicious Countries: for Nature being liberall to all without labour, neceſſitie impoſing no induſtrie or trauell, idleneſſe bringeth forth no other fruits than vaine thoughts, and licentious pleaſures. So that to conclude this part, Tertullian and thoſe of his opinion were not deceiued in the nature of the place: but Aquinas, who miſliked this opinion, and followed a worſe. And (to ſay the truth) all the Schoolemen were groſſe in this particular.

Iſay 45. 18.

Of the change of the names of places: and that beſides that Eden in Celeſyria, there is a Country in Babylon, once of this name, as is proued out of ESA. 37. and EZEC. 27.

THeſe opinions anſwered, and the region of Eden not found in any of thoſe imaginary vvorlds, nor vnder Torrida Zona; it followeth that now vve diſcouer and find out the ſeat thereof, for in it vvas Paradiſe by God planted. The difficultie of vvhich ſearch reſteth chiefly in this, That as all Nations haue often changed names vvith their Maſters; ſo are moſt of theſe places, by Moſes remembred; forgotten by thoſe names of all Hiſtorians and Geographers, as vvell ancient as moderne.

Beſides, vve find that the Aſſyrians, Babylonians, Medes and Perſians (Cyrus onely and a few other excepted) ſought to extinguiſh the Hebrewes. The Grecians hated both their Nation and their Religion; and the Romanes deſpiſed once to remember them in any of their Stories. And as thoſe three Monarchies ſucceeded each other: ſo did they transforme the names of all thoſe principall Places and Cities in the Eaſt: and after them, the Turke hath ſought (vvhat he could) to extinguiſh in all things, the ancient memorie of thoſe people; vvhich he hath ſubiected and inthralled.

Now besides those notable markes, Euphrates and Tigris, the better to find the way which leadeth to the Country of Eden, we are to take for guides these two considerations (to wit) That it lay Eastward from Canaan and Iudea; and that it was of all other the most beautifull and fertile. First then in respect of situation, the next Country to Iudea Eastward was Arabia Petræa; but in this Region was Moses himselfe when he wrote: and the next vnto it Eastward also was Arabia the Desart, both which in respect of the infertility could not bee Eden, neither haue any of the Arabians any such Riuers, as are expreſt to run out of it: So as it followeth of necessitie, that Eden must be Eastward, and beyond both Arabia Petræa, and Deserta. But because Eden is by Moses named by it selfe, and by the fertility, & the riuers only described, we must seeke it in other Scriptures, and where it is by the additions of the neighbour Nations better described. In the Prophet Isay I find it coupled and accompanied with other adjacent Countries, in these words, spoken in the person of Senacherib by RABSAKEH: Haue the gods of the Nations deliuered them, which my Fathers haue destroyed, as GOSAN, and HARAN, & RESEPH, and the children of EDEN, which were at Telassar? and in Ezechiel, where he prophecieth against the Tyrians: They of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, the merchants of Sheba, Asshur, and Chilmad, were thy merchants, &c.

Isa. 37. v. 12.

Cap. 27. vers. 23.

But to auoid confusion, wee must vnderstand that there were two Edens, one of which the Prophet Amos remembreth, where he diuideth Syria into three Prouinces, whereof, the first he maketh Syria Damascene, or Decapolitan: the second part is that Valley called Auenis, otherwise Conuallis, or the tract of Chamath, where Assyria is ioyned to Arabia the Desart, & where Ptolomie placeth the City of Auaria: & the third is knowne by the name of Domus Edenis, or Cœlesyria, otherwise Vallis cana, or the hollow Valley, because the mountaines of Libanus and Antilibanus, take all the length of it on both sides, and border it: for Coele in Greeke is Cana in Latine. But this is not that Eden, which we seeke: neither doth this Prouince lye East from Canaan, but North, and so ioyneth vnto it, as it could not be vnknowne to the Hebrewes. Yet, because there is a little Citie therein called Paradise, the Iewes beleeued this Cœlesyria to be the same which Moses describeth. For the same cause doth Hopkins in his Treatise of Paradise reprehend Beroaldus, in that he confoundeth this Eden, with the other Eden of Paradise; though, to giue Beroaldus his right, I conceiue that he led the way to Hopkins, and to all other later Writers, saying, That hee fayled in distinguishing these two Regions, both called Eden: and that he altogether mis-understood two of the foure Riuers (to wit) Pison and Gehon, as shall appeare hereafter. Now to finde out Eden, which (as Moses teacheth vs) lay Eastward from the Desarts, where he wrote, after he had passed the Red Sea; wee must consider where those other Countries are found, which the Prophet Isay and Ezechiel ioyneth with it. For (saith ESAIAH) Gosan, Haran, and Reseph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telassar. Also Ezechiel ioyneth Haran with Eden, who, together with those of Sheba, Asshur, and Chilmad, were the Merchants that traded with the Citie of Tyre, which was then (saith EZECHIEL) the Mart of the people for many Iles. And it hath euer beene the custome, that the Persians conueyed their Merchandise to Babylon, and to those Cities vpon Euphrates, and Tigris, and from thence transported them into Syria, now Soria, and to the Port of the Mediterrane Sea: as in ancient times to the Citie of Tyre, afterward to Tripoly, and now to Aleppo, from whence they imbarque them at the Port of Alexandretta, in the Bay of Issicus, now Laiazzo. Ezechiel in the description of the magnificence of Tyre, and of the exceeding trade that it had with all the Nations of the East, as the onely Mart-towne of that part of the world, reciteth both the people, with whom they had commerce, and also what commodities euerie Countrie yeelded: and hauing counted the seuerall People and Countries, he addeth the particular trade, which each of them exercised: They were thy merchants (saith the Prophet) in all sorts of things, in rayments of blue silke, and of broydered workes, fine linnen, corrall, and pearle: and afterwards speaking of the Merchants of Sheba and Raamah, and what kinds they traded, he hath these words: The merchants of Sheba & Raamah were thy merchants, they occupied in thy Faires, with the chiefe of all Spices, and with all precious stones and gold. Now these be indeed the riches which Persia and Arabia Fœlix yeeld: & because Sheba & Raamah are those parts of Arabia, which border the Sea, called the Persian Gulfe, therefore did those Nations both vent such Spice, sweet Gummes, and Pearles, as their owne Countries yeelded, and and (withall) hauing trade with their Neighbours of India, had from them also all sorts of spices, and plenty of gold. The better to conuey these commodities to that great Mart of Tyre, the Shebans or Arabians entred by the mouth of Tigris, and from the Citie of Terredon (built or enlarged by Nebuchodonozor, now called Balsara) thence sent vp all these rich merchandises by boat to Babylon, from whence by the body of Euphrates, as farre as it bended Westward, and afterward by a branch thereof, which reacheth within three daies iourney of Aleppo, and then ouer Land they past to Tyre, as they did afterward to Tripoly, (formerly Hieropolis) and thence to Alexandretta, as aforesaid. Now the Merchants of Canneh, which Ezechiel ioyneth with Eden, inhabited farre vp the Riuer, and receiued this trade from Arabia and India, besides those proper commodities which themselues had, and which they receiued out of Persia, which bordered them. S. Hierome vnderstandeth by Canneth, Seleucia, which is seated vpon Euphrates, where it breaketh into foure heads, and which tooke that name from Seleucus, who made thereof a magnificent City. Hierosolymitanus thinkes it to be Ctesiphon: but Ctesiphon is seated downe low vpon Tigris, and Canneh cannot be on that side, I mean on the East-side of Tigris; for then were it out of the Valley of Shinar. Plinie placeth the Schenita vpon Euphrates, where the same beginneth to be foordable, which is toward the border of Syria, after it leaueth to bee the bound of Arabia the Desart, and where the Riuer of Euphrates reflecteth from the Desart of Palmirena: for these people of Canneh (afterward Schenita) inhabited both borders of Euphrates, stretching themselues from their owne Citie of Canneh in Shinar Westward along the bankes of Euphrates, as far as the City of Thapsacus, where Ptolomy appointed the Foords of Euphrates: which also agreeth with the description of the Schenita by Strabo, whose words are these: Mercatoribus ex Syria Seleuciam & Babylonem euntibus iter est per Schenitas; The Merchants which trauaile from Syria to Seleucia and Babylon, take their way by the Schenites. Therefore those which take Canneh for Charran, doe much mistake it. For Charran, to which Abraham came from Vr in Chaldæa (called by God) standeth also in Mesopotamia, not vpon Euphrates it selfe, but vpon the Riuer of Chaboras, which falleth into Euphrates: and the Merchants of Charran are distinctly named with those of Canneh in Ezechiel (as) They of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, the merchants of Sheba, Asshur, and Chilmad were thy merchants. Wherefore Charran, which is sometime called Charre, & Haran, & Aran, is but the same Charran of Mesopotamia; & when it is written Aran, then it is taken for the region of Mesopotamia: or Aram fluuiorum, the Greek word (Mesopotamia) importing, a country between riuers: for Mesos in Greeke, is Medius in Latine: and Potamos, fluuius; and when it is written Haran or Aran, it is then taken for the City it selfe, to which Abraham came from Vr (as aforesaid.) For Strabo in the description of Arabia, giueth that tract of land from the borders of Cœlesyria, to the edge of Mesopotamia, to the Schenites, who also inhabited on both sides of Euphrates, & were in after-ages accounted of these Arabians which inhabite Batanea, & the North part of the Desarts, stretching themselues toward the vnhabited solitude of Palmirena, which lyeth between Syria, and Arabia the Desart. So as these of Canneh lay in the very high-way from Babylon to Tyre, & were neighbours (indifferent) to Charran and to Eden: and therefore they are by the Prophet Ezechiel coupled together, They of Haran, and Canneh, & Eden, &c. But S. Hierome made a good interpretation of Canneh, or Chalne, by Seleucia: for Seleucia was anciently called Chalanne (witnesse Appian, and Io Rabanus Maurus calleth it in his Commentaries vpon Genesis) the name by time and mixture of languages being changed from Chalne or Canneh, to Chalanne: of which name there are two other cities, standing in Triangle with Seleucia, & almost the next vnto it, (as) Thelbe-canne, & Mann-canne, the one a little to the West of Seleucia, & the other oppolite vnto it, where these riuers of Tigris and Euphrates are ready to ioyne. Therefore, which of these the ancient Canne was, (being all three within the bound of the valley Shinar) it is vncertaine: but it is a note as well of the importance of the place, as of the certaine seate thereof, that so many other cities did retaine a part of the name in so many ages after. Neither is it vnlikely, that these additions of Thelbe and Mann to the word Canne, were but to make difference betweene the East and the West, or the greater and the lesse Canne, or between Canne the old and the new: which additions to distinguish cities by, are ordinary in all the Regions of the World.

Now of the other city ioyned with Eden, as Haran or Charran, S. Hierome on the Iud. 3. Iudges speaketh thereof in these words: Cumq; reuertentur, peruenerunt ad Charran, quæ est in media itinere contra Niniuen, undecimo die; When they returned, they came to Charran, (which is the mid-way against Nineue) the eleuenth day.

Act. 7. 2. This city is by the Martyr Stephen named Charran (speaking to the high Priest:) Ye Men, Brethren, and Fathers, hearken: The God of glory appeared to our Father ABRAHAM, while he was in Mesopotamia, before hee dwelt in Charran. But the seate of this city is not doubted of: for it is not onely remembred in many Scriptures, but, withall, exceeding famous for the death and ouerthrow of Crassus the Romane, who for his vnsatiable greedinesse was called Gurges auaritiæ; The gulfe of auarice. Whereof Lucan:

With Roman bloud th' Assyrian Carre he defil'd.

But this city Canne or Chalne is made manifest by Moses himself, where it is written Gen. 10. 10. of NIMROD: And the beginning of his Kingdomes was Babel, & Ereth, & Acad, & Chalne, in the land of Sinaar or Shinar: where Moses sheweth the first composition of the Babylonian Empire, and what cities and people were subiect vnto Nimrod, all which lay in the said Valley of Shinar, or neere it; and this Valley of Shinar is that Tract, afterwards called Babylonia and Chaldæa, into which also Eden stretcheth it selfe. Chaldæa, Babylonia, Sinaar; idem sunt (saith COMESTOR.) Three names of one Country: which Region of Babylonia took name of the Towre Babel, & the Towre, of the confusion of tongues. And that Shinar was Babylonia, it is proued in the eleuenth chapter of Genesis, in these words: And as they went from the East, they found a Plaine in the Land of Shinar, and there they abode: in which Playne Babylon was built (as aforesaid.)

Vers. 2.

Now Shinar being Babylonia, & Canneh, in the first beginning of Nimrods greatnes, and before he had subdued any strange, or far-off Nations, being one part of his Dominion, and also named by Moses to be in Shinar, it proueth, that Canneh ioyneth to Babylonia; which also Ezechiel coupleth with Eden, and (further) affirmeth, that those of Eden were also the Merchants which traded with the Tyrians: and Esay in the threates of Senacherib against Ierusalem (with other Nations that Senacherib vaunted that his Fathers had destroyed) nameth the children of Eden which were at Telassar. But before I conclude where Eden it selfe lyeth, it is necessary to describe, those other Countries, which Ezechiel ioyneth therewith in the places before remembred, as, those of Sheba and Raamah. It is written in Genesis the tenth: Moreouer the sonnes of HAM were CVSH, &c. And the sonnes of CVSH were SEBA, and HAVILAH, and SABTAH, and RAAMAH, and the sonnes of RAAMAH were SHEBA, &c. and anon after; CVSH begat NIMROD, so as Sheba was the grand-child of Cush, and Nimrod the sonne of Cush, whose elder brother was Sebah, though some there are that conceiue to the contrarie, that Nimrod was the elder in valour and vnderstanding, though not in time and precedence of birth; who inhabited that part of Shinar, where Babel was built, afterwards Babylonia. Hauing left her Raamah or Regma tooke that part adioyning to Shinar, toward the Sea side and Persian gulfe (called afterward Raama and Sheba, by the Father and his Sonne, which possessed it.) For (saith EZECHIEL) the merchants of Raamah and Sheba were thy merchants, they occupied in thy Faires with the chiefe of all spices, and all precious stones, and gold. So as Sheba was that Tract of Country, which parteth Arabia Deserta from Arabia Felix, and which ioyneth to the Sea where Tigris and Euphrates fall out, and render themselues to the Ocean. This part, and the confining Country, Strabo calleth Strabo, l. 16. Catabria, where the best Myrrhe and Frankincense is gathered, which people haue an interchange or trade with Elana, lying on the East side of the Persian gulfe. By this it appeareth who were the Sheebans, spoken of by Ezechiel, and said to haue beene the Merchants of Tyre for gold, spices, and precious stones; of which they had not onely plenty of their owne, but were also furnished from that part of India (called Elana, according to Strabo) for exchange of their Aromatiques and other proper commodities. For as Strabo reporteth out of ERATOSTHENES: In Persico mari insula est, in qua multæ & pretiosæ vniones gignuntur: in aliis vero, cheri & perlucidi lapilli. ERATOSTHENES (saith Strabo) affirmeth, that in the beginning of the Persian gulfe, there is an Island, in which there are many precious pearles bred: and in other, very cleare and shining stones. Now, the difference betweene Sheba, the sonne of Raamah, and Seba, the sonne of Cush, is in this, That Seba is written with the Hebrew (Samech;) and Sheba with (Schin:)

but whatsoeuer the difference may bee in the Hebrew Orthography, their Countries and Habitations are diuers. For Sheba is that which bordereth the Persian Sea, & Saba (whence the Queene of Saba) neighboured the Red Sea, and so that place of the 72. Psalme, expounded Reges Arabum & Saba, hath in the Hebrew this sense: Reges Sheba & Seba.

The Shebans, Ezechiel nameth together with the Edenites, because they inhabited vpon the Out-let of the same Riuer, vpon which the Edenites were seated: and so those of Sheba, towards the Sea-coast, and vpon it, past vp the Countrey, by Tigris and Euphrates, being ioyned in one maine streame, and so through the Region of Eden, which Tigris bounderh, thereby the better to conuey their merchandise toward Tyre. And as the cities of Charran, and Canneh, border Eden on the West and Northwest: so doth Sheba on the South, and Chilmad on the North-east: Chilmad being a Region of the higher Media, as appeareth in the Chaldæan Paraphrast; which Countrey by the Geographers is called Coromitena, (L) placed by exchange for (R) which change the Hebrewes also often vse.

Thus much of those Countries which border Eden, and who altogether traded with the Tyrians: of which, the chiefe were the Edenites, inhabiting Telassar: for these Senacherib vaunted, that his Fathers had destroyed, and this place of Telassar lay most conuenient, both to receiue the Trade from Sheba and Arabia, and also to conuey it ouer into Syria, and to Tyrus. Now to make these things the more plaine, wee must remember, that before the death of Senacherib, many parts of the Babylonian Empire fell from his obedience, and after his death these Monarchies were vtterly disioyned.

For it appeareth both in Esay the 37. and in the second of Kings, by the threates of Rabsacha, the while the Army of Assyria lay before Ierusalem, that the Cities of Gosan, Haran, Reseph, and the Edenites at Telassar, had resisted the Assyrians, though by them (in a sort) mastered and recouered. Haue the gods of the Nations deliuered them, whom my Fathers haue destroyed, as Gosan, and Haran, Reseph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telassar? But it appeared manifestly after Senacheribs death, that these Nations formerly contending, were then freed from the others subiection: for Esarhaddon held Assyria, and Merodach Baladan, Babylonia. And after that the Army of Senacherib commanded by Rabsacha which lay before Ierusalem (Ezechias then reigning) while Senacherib was in Egypt, was by the Angell of God destroyed, the King of Babel sent to Ezechias, both to congratulate the recouery of his health, and his victory obtained ouer the Assyrians. After which ouerthrow, Senacherib himselfe was slaine by his owne sonnes in the Temple of his Idols, Esarhaddon succeeding him in Assyria. To the Babylonian Ambassadours sent by Merodach, Ezechias shewed all his treasures, as well proper as consecrate, which inuited the kings of Babylon afterward to vndertake their conquest and subiection. So as, the suspition of warre encreasing betweene Babylon and Assyria, the Edenites which inhabited the borders of Shinar towards the North, and towards Assyria, were imployed to beare off the incursions of the Assyrians, and their Garrison-place was at Telassar: and the very word (Telassar) saith Iunius, signifying as much, as a bulwarke against the Assyrians. This place Hieroselymitanus Iunius takes for Resen, others for Seleucia: but this Telassar is the same, which Amm. Marcellinus in the History of Iulian (whom hee followed in the enterprize of Persia) calleth Thilutha in stead of Telassar, who describeth the exceeding strength thereof in his time: It is seated in an Iland of Euphrates vpon a steepe and vnassaultable Rocke, in so much as the Emperour Iulian durst not attempt it; and therefore it was a conuenient place for a Garrison against the Assyrians, being also a passage out of Mesopotamia into Babylonia, and in which the Edenites of the Countrey adioyning were lodged to defend the same. This place Ptolomy calleth Teridata, hauing Reseph (which he calleth Resepha) on the left hand, & Canneh (which he calleth Thelbe-canne) on the right hand, not farre from whence is also found the City of Maan-canne vpon Tigris; and all these seated together, as Esay and Ezechiel haue sorted them. But the vnderstanding of these places is the more difficult, because Assyria (which the Chaldæans call Atturia) and Mesopotamia, were so often confounded: the one taken for the other by interchange of Dominion. Assyria & Mesopotamia in Babyloniæ nomen transierunt (saith Nicolaus) Assyria and Mesopotamia tooke the name of Babylonia. Lastly, it appeareth by those adiacent Regions by the Prophets named, in what part of the World Eden is seated, seated, as by Charran or Haran in Mesopotamia: also by Canneh and Reseph, according to the opinion of Vatablus, who in these words translateth this place: Plantauerat autem IEHOVAH Deus hortum in Eden, ab Oriente, The Lord God planted a Garden in Eden, Eastward: that is (saith hee in his Annotations) Iussérat nasci arbores in Eden, Regione Orientali, in finibus Arabiæ & Mesopotamiæ, He commanded Trees to grow in Eden, an Easterne Region in the borders of Arabia and Mesopotamia.

§. X.

Of diuers other testimonies of the Land of Eden; and that this is the Eden of Paradise.

AND for a more particular pointing out of this Eden, it seemes by the two Epistles of the Nestorian Christians, that inhabit Mesopotamia; which Epistles in the yeare 1552. they sent to the Pope about the confirming of their Patriarch, & Andreas Masius hath published them, translated out of Syriac into Latine. By these Epistles (I say) it seemes wee may haue some farther light for the proofe of that, which we haue said about the Region of Eden in those parts. For in them both there is mention of the Island of Eden in the Riuer Tigris, or at least, Tigris in both these Epistles is called the Riuer of Eden. This Island, as Masius, in his Preface to these Epistles saith, is commonly called Gezoria (as it were, the Island, by an eminency.) It hath (saith hee) ten miles in circuit, and was sometimes walled round about, which name of the Island Eden may (doubtlesse) remaine to this day; though in the rest of the Region so called, this name be swallowed vp, with the fame of those flourishing Kingdomes of Mesopotamia, Assyria, Babylonia, and Chaldæa. This Island of Eden hath vp the Riuer, and not farre beyond it, the City of Hasan-Cepha, otherwise Fortis Petra: below it, it hath Mosal or Mosel, from which (as in that which followeth it shall appeare out of Masius) it is not aboue twelue miles distant. Neither is it to trouble vs, that Mosal or Mosel, by Matius Niger is remembred among the Cities higher vp Tigris, in these words. Iuxta autem Tigrim, Ciuitates sunt Dorbeta prope Taurum montem, quæ nunc Mosel dicitur; magna sanè, &c. (that is) By Tigris are these Cities, Dorbeta neere vnto mount Taurus (which is now called Mosel) which is a great one, &c. This opinion of Niger, displacing Mosel, and making it to be Dorbeta (I say) needs not here to trouble vs: seeing for this matter, the testimony of Masius, informed by the Christians that dwelt there (the Seat of whose Patriach it is) ought to be of credit, auowing that this Mosal (or Mozal) is in the Confines of Mesopotamia & Assyria, seated vpon Tigris, & in the neighbour-hood of Ninetie; and that it is the famous Selencia Partharum. The Nestorian Christians in their former Epistle, call it Attur in these words: Ex omnibus Ciuitatibus & pagis quæ sunt circum Ciuitatem Mosal (hoc est) Attur in vicinia Ninues; Of all the Cities and Townes which are about the Citie of Mozal (that is) Attur in the neighbour-hood of Ninene. As also Niger acknowledgeth Ctesiphon, a City thereabout to be called Assur, (which is the same as Attur, after the Dialect of those Nations, which change Sh into T.) Neither is it much that he should mistake Ctesiphon, (which is not far off Seleucia) for Seleucia, to be Assur. By this then we may come somewhat neere the end of our purpose. For the Ile of Eden, which lieth in the brest of Tigris, is but twelue miles from Mosal, and that ancient City, which Ptolomy and Tacitus call Ninus, and the Scriptures Ninene; Philostratus, and Simeon Sethi, Mosula, and Iohn Leon, Mosal, others Mosse, (though it bee not the same with Mosal) is set but a little higher vpon the same Riuer of Tigris, neere Mosal: so that we are like to find this Ile of Eden hereabout. For the same Andreas Masius, which placeth it aboue Mosal, makes it to be below Hasan-cepha, which is vpon the same Riuer of Tigris.

The onely difficulty is this, that some perhaps may thinke, that the words of the Nestorians in both their Epistles, speake not of any Ile in Tigris, called the Ile of Eden, but of an Ile in Tigris, a Riuer of Eden. But this sense of their words in my opinion seemeth the more vnprobable. And yet if this were the meaning here, we haue a testimonie from the Learned of those parts, that not onely Euphrates, but also Tigris was a Riuer of Eden, and that the name of Eden in those parts is not yet quite worne out, though the Region hath bin subiect to the same change, that all other Kingdomes of the world haue beene, and hath by conquest, and corruption of other Languages, receiued new and differing names. For the South part of Eden, which stretcheth ouer Euphrates, was after the floud called Shinar, and then of the Tower of Babel, Babylonia; and the North part of Eden is that Tract of Mesopotamia, Assyria, and Armenia, which embraceth both the bankes of Tigris betweene Mount Taurus, and Seleucia. And of this Region of Eden that ancient Æthicus maketh mention, (not that latter Æthicus, Disciple of Gallinicus, otherwise by Plutarch and Athenæus called Istri, who liued in Egypt in the Reigne of Philadelphus, but another of a farre higher and remote time) the same being made Latine out of the Greeke by Saint Hierome. And though by corruption of the ancient Copie it be written in Aethicus, Adonis for Edenis; yet Adonis being a Riuer of Phœnicia, cannot be vnderstood to be the Region named by Æthicus. For Aethicus makes it a Countrey, and not a Riuer, and ioyneth it with Mesopotamia and Aethiopia, calling the land of Chus Aethiopia, after the Vulgar, and Septuagint. And lastly, the Riuer which watereth the Regions, (saith Aethicus) falleth into the Gulfe of Persia: which Riuer he called Armodius, for Tigris; Tigris being but a name imposed for the swiftnesse thereof. And out of Armenia both Tigris and Euphrates haue their originall: for out of Eden came a Riuer, or Riuers, to water the Garden; both which Riuers (to wit) Tigris and Euphrates, come out of Armenia, and both of them trauerse Mesopotamia, Regions first of all knowne by the name of Eden for their beautie and fertilitie. And it is very probable, that Eden contained also some part of Armenia; and the excellent fertilitie thereof in diuers places, is not vnworthy the name of Eden. For in some part thereof (saith Strabo) the leaues are alway green, & therefore therein a perpetuall Spring. Also STEPHANVS de vrbibus, mentioneth the Citie of Adana vpon Euphrates: and the name of Eden was in vse in Amos time, though he speake not of Eden in the East, but of Eden in Celesyria. But to the end I may not burden the Readers patience with too long a Discourse, it may suffice to know, that Euphrates and Tigris (once ioyned together, and afterward separate) are two of those foure heads, into which these Riuers which are said to water the Garden of Paradise, were diuided: whose courses being knowne, Eden, (out of which they are said to come) cannot be vnknowne. Now that Hiddekel and Perath were Tigris and Euphrates, it is agreed by all: for the Seuentie and all others conuert Perath by Euphrates: & Hiddekel Tigrim omnes exponunt: & all men vnderstand Hiddekel by Tigris (saith Vatablus.) And because that which I haue said of the Ile of Eden, shall not be subiect to the censure of selfe-inuention, I haue heere-vnder set downe the words out of the two generall Epistles of the Nestorians, as MASIVS (ad verbum) hath conuerted them into Latine. The occasion of those Letters and Supplications to the Pope, were, that the Nestorian Christians, which inhabit Mesopotamia, Assyria, Persia, Babylonia, & haue to this day (at least in Queen Martes time they had) fifteene Churches in one Citie called Seleucia Parthorum, or Mosel vpon the Riuer of Tigris, hauing no sufficient authoritie to choose themselues a Patriarch (which cannot bee done without foure or three Metropolitane Bishop at least) sent to the Bishop of Rome, in the yeare of Christ 1552. (as afore-said) a Petition to obtaine allowance vnto such an Election as themselues had made: hauing three hundred yeare before that vpon the like defect, sent one Marius thither to be confirmed; and in this negotiation they made knowne to the Bishop of Rome the state of the Christian Church in those parts: for vpon the death of their Patriarch (vvho of a couetous desire to enrich himselfe had forborne to institute Metropolitane Bishops, when the places fell void) they all assembled themselues together to consult of the Church-gouernment. And because all the Patriarchs for an hundred yeares had beene of one House and Family to the preiudice of the Church, and that there yet remained one Bishop of the same Stocke and Kindred, vvho aspired to the same dignitie vvhich his Predecessors had held, the rest of the Professors refused to allow him. Vpon vvhich occasion, and for the choice of a Gouernour more sufficient, the Teachers in all the Churches assembled themselues. The vvords of the generall Epistle to the Pope are these about the middle of the said Epistle: Verùm nos non suscepimus neq; proclamauimus ipsum, sed subitò conuenimus ex omnibus locis Orientalibus, & ex omnibus Ciuitatibus & Pagis quæ sunt circum Ciuitatem Mosel (hoc est) Attur, in vicinia Nineues, ex Babylonia, ex Charra, ex Arbella, ex insula quæ est in medio Tigris, fluminis Eden, ex Tauris Persiæ, ex Nisibi, &c. which is: But we did neither accept of this man, neither pronounced him: but suddenly we assembled our selues out of all parts of the East, and out of all the Cities and Villages which are about Mosel (or Attur) neighbouring Nineue, & out of Babylon, Carrha, Arbella, and out of the Hand which lyeth in the middle of Ti- gris,

gris, a Riuer of Eden, or father, out of the Ile of Eden, which lyeth in the Riuer Tigris. And in a second Epistle at the same time sent, they vse these vvords: Nec̃, supersunt apud nos Metropolitæ, quorum est ordinare Catholicum, sed soli pauci Episcopi, Episcopus Arbela, Episcopus Salmasii, Episcopus Adurbeigan; ergò vestigio conuenimus in Insulam, quæ est, intra Tigrim flumen, Eden, fecimusq̃, compactum inter nos, &c. (vvhich is) Neither are there remaining among vs any Metropolitan Bishops, to whom it belongs to ordaine a Patriarch, but onely a few Bishops, as the Bishop of Arbela, the Bishop of Salmastus, and the Bishop of Adurbeigan: but lo, we assembled speedily in the Iland Eden, which is in Tigris, and agreed betweene our selues, &c.

Now this Iland of Eden Masius describeth with other places; which being well conceiued, the Nestorian Epistles, and the state of the Church may be in those parts (saith he) the better vnderstood. And after he hath distinguished the foure sorts of Christians in those parts of the World; and in the South part of Africa, which hee calleth Nestorians, Iacobites, Maronites, and Cophti, he goeth on in these vvords: Mox audita illius morte, concurrisse aiebant tumultuariò in illam quam modò dixi Tigris Insulam, quæ duodecim circiter passuum millibus supra Mosal posita, decem ferè millia passuum suo ambitu continet, vnuis vndiq; cincta, & à paucis alijs quam Christianis hominibus habitata: which is, Now hearing of the death of the Patriarch, (as those that came to Rome reported) they ran tumultuously together into that Iland of Tigris or Eden before spoken of, which Iland is situated about twelue miles aboue Mosel, containing very neere ten miles in compasse, and euerie where inuironed with a wall, inhabited by a few other men than Christians. And afterward he maketh a recapitulation of the Christian Churches; among the rest hee addeth the Ile of Eden by the name of Geserta, Insula Tigris: siue Geserta. Furthermore, describing the Citie of Hosan-cepha, or Fortis Petra, he placeth it supra prædictam Tigris Insulam rupi asperæ impositam; Aboue the aforesaid Iland of Tigris, being seated on a steepe Rocke. Of this Iland of Geserta, Andrew Theuet maketh mention in his tenth Booke of his generall Cosmographie in these words: Geserta ou Gesire est au milieu de la Riuiere du Tigre, & pense que c'est vne terre des plus fertiles de toute l'Asie, Geserta or Gesire is in the middle of Tigris, the Soyle the most fertile of all Asia.

By this we see that the ancient name of Eden liueth, and of that Eden which lyeth Eastward from Arabia Petræa, and the Desert where Moses wrote, and that Eden which bordereth Charran according to Ezechiel, and that Eden which is seated according to the assertion of the said Prophet, and ioyned with those Nations of Reseph, Canneh, and Charran, and the rest which traded with the Tyrians, and is found at this day in the parting of the two Regions of Assyria and Babylonia, where the Edenites in Thelassar were garrisond to resist the Assyrians, whose displantation Senacherib vaunted of (as aboue written;) and lastly, the same Eden, which embraceth Tigris, and looketh on Euphrates, two of the knowne Riuers of those foure, which are by all men ascribed to Paradise.

§. XI.

Of the difficultie in the Text, which seemeth to make the foure Riuers to rise from one streame.

But it may be obiected, that it is written in the Text, That a Riuer went out of Eden, and not Riuers, in the plurall; which scruple Matthew Beroaldus hath thus answered in his Chronologie: The Latine Translation, saith hee, hath these words: Et fluuius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis ad irrigandum Paradisum, qui inde diuidebatur in quatuor capita. Quæ verba melius consentient cum rei narratione, & eiusdem explicatione, si ita reddantur. Et fluuius erat egrediens ex Edene, (hoc est) fluuij procedebant ex Edene regione ad rigandum pomarium; & inde diuidebatur, & erat in quatuor capita: which is, And a Riuer went out of the place of pleasure to water Paradise, and thence was diuided into foure heads: Which words (saith Beroaldus) doe better agree with the narration and explication of the place, if they be thus translated: And a Riuer was going forth of Eden (that is) Riuers went forth, and ran out of the Region of Eden to water the Orchard; and from thence it was diuided, and they became foure heads. The Tigurine differs from the Vulgar or Latine; for it conuerts it thus: Et fluuius egrediebatur de delicijs; And a Riuer went out of pleasure, in stead of Eden; and the Latine addeth the word locus, or place, Et fluuius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis; And a Riuer went out of the place of pleasure: and so the word (place) may rightly be referred to Eden, which was (of all other) a Region most delightfull and fertile; and so also the word (inde) and thence was diuided, hath reference to the Countrey of Eden, and not to the Garden it selfe.

And for the word (Riuer) for Riuers, it is vsuall among the Hebrewes: for it is written: Let the Earth bud forth the bud of the Herbe that seedeth Seede, the fruitfull Tree, Gen. 1. 11. &c. Here the Hebrew vseth the Singular for the Plurall, Herbe and Tree, for Herbs and 3. 2. Trees; and againe, We eate of the fruit of the Tree, in stead of (Trees:) And thirdly, The 8. man and his wife hid themselues from the presence of God; In medio ligni Paradisi; In the middle of the Tree of the Garden, for (Trees.) And of this opinion is Dauid Kimchi, and Vatablus, who vpon this place of Genesis say, that the Hebrewes doe often put the Singular for the Plurall, as illud, for vnumquodq; illorum, and hee giueth an instance in this question it selfe, as, A Riuer (for Riuers) went out of Eden.

And this answer out of diuers of the Learned, may, not without good reason, bee giuen to the obiection, That Moses speaketh but of one Riuer, from which the heads should diuide themselues. Howbeit I deny not, but with as good (and perhaps better) reason, wee may expound the foure heads, to bee foure notable passages into famous Countries. And so we may take the word (Riuer) Verse the tenth for one Riuer (to wit) Euphrates, as this name comprehendeth all the branches thereof. For this Riuer, (after he is past the place, where we suppose Paradise to haue bin, diuides it selfe, and ere long yeeldeth foure notable passages into seuerall Countries, though not all the way downe streame, (for this is no where in the Text) where it is noted, that following the Riuer downward, there is conueyance into the Countries named in the Text, though part of the way to one of the Countries (to wit, to Assyria) were vp Tigris.

To this end the Text speaking of Hiddekel, as it riseth from the Riuer of Eden, doth not say it compasseth or washeth the whole Region of Assyria, (as it had vsed this phrase of Pison and Gehon) but that it runneth toward Assyria. The first branch Pison, is Nahar-malcha, (by interpretation) Basilius, or flumen regium, which runneth into Tigris vnder Apamia; whence ariseth the name of Pasi-tigris, (as it were) Piso-tigris. This leadeth to the Land of Hauila or Susiana. The second branch Gehon, is that which in Historians is Nabarsares or Narragas; for Nahar-ragas: both which names signifie flumen deriuatum (a Riuer deriued,) also Astracanus, quasi Ranosus, by reason of the froggie Fennes which it maketh: this Gehon leadeth to the first seate of Chus, about the borders of Chaldæa and Arabia, and it is lost at length in the Lakes of Chaldæa. The third branch Hiddekel, may be expounded the vpper streame of Pison, or Basilius, which runneth into Hiddekel, properly so called (that is, into Tigris) aboue Seleucia, where it sheweth a passage vp Tigris into Assyria: where, because at length it is called Hiddekel or Tigris, hauing before no knowne proper name, the Text in this place calleth it Hiddekel from the beginning. The fourth Perath, or Euphrates, so called per excellentiam, being the body of the Riuer Euphrates, which runneth through Babylon and Ctris. But, bee it a Riuer or Riuers, that come out of Eden, seeing that Tigris and Euphrates are noted in the Text, there can bee no doubt, but that Paradise was not farre from these Riuers: for that Perath in Moses is Euphrates, there can be no question; and (indeede) as plaine it is that Hiddekel is Tigris. For Hiddekel goeth (saith Moses) Eastward towards Assur, as we find, that Tigris is the Riuer of Assyria propriè dicta, whose chiefe City was Nineue, as in Genesis the tenth it is written: That out of that Land (to wit) Babylonia, Nimrod went into Assur; and builded Nineue, which was the chiefe City of Assyria.

And as for the kind of speech here vsed in the Text, speaking of foure heads; though the heads of Riuers be (properly) their Fountaines, yet here are they to be vnderstood, to be spoken of the beginning of their diuision from the first streame. Caput aquæ (saith VLPIANVS) illudest, vnde aqua nascitur; si ex fonte nascatur, fons, si ex flumine, vel ex lacu, primus initius, &c. If the beginning of the water bee out of a Fountaine, then is the Fountaine taken for the head: if out of a Lake, then the Lake; and if from a maine Riuer any branch be separate and diuided, then where that branch doth first bound it selfe with new bankes, there is that part of the Riuer, where the branch forsaketh the maine streame, called the head of the Riuer.

§. XII.

Of the strange fertilitie and happinesse of the Babylonian Soile, as it is certaine that Eden was such.

IT may also bee demanded, whether this Region of Eden, by vs described, bee of such fertilitie and beautie, as Eden the seate of Paradise was: which if it be denied, then must we also consider, that there was no part of the Earth, that retained that fertilitie and pleasure, that it had before the curse: neither can we ascribe the same fruitfulnesse to any part of the Earth, nor the same vertue to any plant there-
Herod. Clio. l. 1. on growing, that they had before the floud; and therefore this Region of Eden may be now no such flourishing Countrey, as it was when it was first created in his perfection. Yet this I finde written of it: First, in Herodotus, who was an eye-witnesse, and speaketh of the very place it selfe; for the Ile of Eden is but twelue miles or thereabout from Nineue, and so from Mosal. Ex Euphrate exiens in Tigrim, alterum flumen, iuxta quod Vrbs Ninus sita erat. Hec regio, omnium quas nos vidimus, optima est, &c. Where Euphrates runneth out into Tigris, not farre from the place where Ninus is seated. This Region, of all that we haue seene, is most excellent; and hee addeth afterward: Cereris autem fructu procreando adeo ferax est, vt nunquam non ferè ducenta reddat, &c. (that is) It is so fruitfull in bringing forth Corne, that it yeeldeth two hundred fold: The leaues of Wheate and Barley being almost foure fingers broad. As for the height of Millet and Sesame, they are euen in length like vnto Trees; which although I know to be true, yet I forbeare to speake hereof, well knowing, that those things which are reported of this fruitfulnesse, will seeme very incredible to those, which neuer were in the Country of Babylon. They haue commonly in all the Country Palme Trees growing of their owne accord, the most of them bearing fruit, out of which they make both Meates, and Wine, and Honey, ordering them as the Figge Trees. Thus farre Herodotus.

To this Palme-tree so much admired in the East India, Strabo and Niger adde a fourth excellency, which is, that it yeeldeth bread; Ex quibus panem, & mel, & vinum, & acetum conficiunt; Of which these people make Bread, Wine, Honey, and Vineger. But Antonius the Eremite findeth a fift commodity, not inferior to any of those foure, which is, that from this selfe-same Tree there is drawne a kinde of fine Flaxe, of which people make their garments, and with which in East India they prepare the cordage for their ships. And that this is true, Athanasius in the life of Antonius the Eremite, confesseth, saying: That hee receiued a Garment made thereof from the Eremite himselfe, which he brought with him out of this Region. So therefore those Trees, which the East Indies so highly esteeme and so much admire (as indeede the Earth yeeldeth no Plant comparable to this) those Trees (I say) are in this vpper Babylon, or Region of Eden, as common as any Trees of the Field. Sunt etiam (saith STRABO) passim per omnem Regionem Palmæ sua sponte nascentes; There are of Palmes ouer all the whole Region, growing of their owne accord. Of this place Quintus Curtius maketh this report: Ennibus à parte læua (Arabia odorum fertilitate nobilis) regio campestris interest inter Tigrim & Euphratem, adeo tam vbere & pingui solo, vt à pastu repelli pecora dicantur, ne fœtibus perimat; (that is) As you trauaile on the left hand of Arabia (famous for plentie of sweete Odours) there lyeth a Champaine Country placed betweene Tigris and Euphrates, and so fruitfull and fat a soile, that they are said to driue their Cattell from pasture, least they should perish by satiety. Bis in anno segetes Babylonij secant; The Babylonians cut their Corne twice a yeare (saith Niger.) And as Countries generally are more fruitfull to the Southward, than in the Northerne parts: so we may iudge the excellency of this by that report which Strabo maketh of the South part of America, which is the North border of Eden, or a part thereof. His words be these in the Latine: Tota enim hæc regio fructibus & arboribus abundat mansuetis, itemq; semper virentibus; This Region abounds with pleasant fruits, all Trees alwayes greene: which witnesseth a perpetuall Spring, not found elsewhere but in the Indies only, by reason of the Sunnes neighbourhood, the life & stirrer vp of Nature in a perpetuall actiuity. In briefe, so great is the fertility of the ground, that the people are constrained twice to mow downe their Corne fields, and a third time to eate them vp with Sheepe: which husbandry the Spaniards wanting in the Valley of Mexico, for the first forty yeares, could not make our kind of Wheate beare seed, but it grew vp as high as the Trees, and was fruitlesse. Besides, those fields are altogether without weedes

(saith Pliny) who addeth this singularitie to that soyle, That the second yeare the verie stubble (or rather falling downe of the seedes againe) yeeldeth them a harueſt of corne without any further labour: his words are these, Vbertatis tanta sunt, vt sequenti anno sponte restibilis fiat seges. Plin. Nat. hist. l. 18. c. 17.

§. XIII.

Of the Riuer Pison, and the land of Hauilah.

AFter the discouerie of Eden, and the testimonies of the fertilitie thereof, it resteth to proue that Pison and Gehon are branches of Tigris and Euphrates. For, that the knowledge and certaintie of these two Riuers should trouble so many wise men, it is strange to me, seeing necessitie it selfe (Tigris and Euphrates being knowne) findeth them out: for Euphrates, or Tigris, or both, be that Riuer or Riuers of Eden, which water Paradise, which riuer or riuers Moses witnesseth afterward diuided into foure heads, whereof the one is called Pison, the other Gehon &c. Could there be a stranger fancie in the world, than when we find both these (namely) Tigris and Euphrates in Assyria and Mesopotamia, to seeke the other two in India and Egypt, making the one Ganges, and the other Nilus? Two riuers as farre distant as any of fame knowne or discouered in the world: the Scriptures making it so plain, that these riuers were diuided into foure branches, and with the Scriptures, Nature, Reason, and Experience bearing witnesse. There is no errour, which hath not some slipperie and bad foundation, or some apparance of probabilitie, resembling truth, which when men (who studie to bee singular) finde out, (straining reason according to their fancies) they then publish to the world matter of contention & iangling; not doubting but in the variable deformitie of mens minds, to find some partakers or sectators, the better by their helpe to nurse and cherish such weake babes, as their owne inuentions haue begotten.

But this mistaking (and first for the Riuer of Pison) seemeth to haue growne out of the not-distinguishing of that Region in India, called Hauilah, from Hauilah which adioyneth to Babylonia, afterward knowne by the name of Susiana. For Hauilah vpon Tigris tooke name from Hauilah the sonne of Cush; and Hauilah in India, from Hauilah the sonne of Ioctan; the one remembred by Moses in the description of Paradise, the other where Moses setteth downe the generations of Noah, and his sonnes after the Floud. For the sonnes of Cush were Seba, Hauilah, Sabtah, and Raamah, and the sonnes of Ioctan were Ophir, and Hauilah &c. of which latter (to wit) of Ophir and Hauilah the sonnes of Ioctan, that Iland of Ophir, (whence Salomon had gold) and Hauilah adioyning, had their names. Now because Ganges is a great and a famous riuer of the East India, and Hauilah a Country of the same, and is situated vpon Ganges, hence it came that Ganges was taken for Pison, which riuer is said by Moses to water the land of Hauilah. Or perhaps it was supposed that those foure riuers named by Moses, must of necessitie be foure of the greatest in the world; whence (supposing that Ganges was the next great and famous riuer after Tigris and Euphrates) they chose out this riuer to make one of the foure. And yet certainly there is another riuer, whom in these respects they should rather haue chosen than Ganges: for the riuer Indus on this side India, for beauty, for neerenesse, & for ability, giueth no way place to Ganges, but exceedeth it in all. And how can any reasonable man conceiue, that Ganges, can be one of the foure heads, seeing Indus commeth betweene it and Tigris? and betweene Tigris and Indus is all that large Empire of Persia, consisting of many Kingdomes. And againe, farther towards the East, and beyond Indus, are all those ample Dominions of India intra Gangem, which lie betweene those two proud Riuers of Indus and Ganges, now called the Kingdome of Mogor. So as if Indus be not accounted for any of the foure, because it is remoued from Tigris by all the breadth of Persia, then how much lesse Ganges; which falleth into the Ocean little lesse than fortie degrees to the Eastward of Indus? Surely, whosoeuer readeth the Storie of Alexander, shall finde, that there is no Riuer in Asia, that can exceede Indus. For Hydaspis was of that breadth and depth, as Alexander thereon in great Gallies transported himselfe, and the greatest part of his armie, and in sayling downe that branch of Indus, found it so large and deepe, and by reason thereof so great a billow, as it endangered his whole Fleete, which was ready to bee swallowed vp therein: Hydaspis (as aforesaid) being but one of many branches of Indus, comparable to it, and as great as it, hauing beſides this, the Riuers of Coas, of Suaſtus, Aceſines, Adris (otherwiſe) Hirotis, Hiſpalis and Zaradus, all which make but one Indus, & by it are ſwallowed vp with all their Children and companions, which being all incorporated and made one ſtreame, it croſſeth athwart Aſia, and then at Cambaia viſiteth the Ocean Sea.

But becauſe Piſon, which compaſſeth Hauilah, as alſo Gehon, which watereth Cuſh, muſt
Gen. 2. 13. ſome-where be ioyned with the reſt in one bodie, or at leaſt be found to proceede out of the ſame Countrie of Eden, out of which the other two heads doe proceede; out of doubt they cannot eyther the one or the other, be Ganges, or Nilus: for Nilus riſeth in the vttermoſt of the South, and runneth Northward into the Mediterran Sea; and the Riuer Ganges riſeth out of the Mountaine Imaus, or (as others wil haue it) Caucaſus, which diuides the Northerne Scythia from Indica, and runneth from North to South into the Indian Ocean. And as for Perath and Hiddekel (that is, Euphrates and Tigris) the one of them is begotten in Armenia, neere Georgiana or Iberia, the others not farre off in the ſame Armenia, by the Gorgiean Mountaines; ſo as Ganges, who onely trauaileth in her owne India, and Nilus through Æthiopia and Egypt, neuer ſaw the land of Eden, or ioyned themſelues in one channell, either with themſelues, or with either of the other; and therefore could not at any time from thence be ſeparated, or diuided into foure heads or branches, according to Moſes.

Gen. 2. v. 11. Therefore the Riuer Piſon, which enricheth Hauilah, is the ſame which by ioyning it ſelfe with Tigris, was therefore called Piſi-tigris, or Piſo-tigris, of Piſon and Tigris, which Riuer watereth that Hauilah, which Hauilah the Sonne of Cuſh gaue name vnto, and not Hauilah of India, ſo called of Hauilah the Sonne of Ioctan, who inhabited with his brother Ophir in the Eaſt. And this Hauilah of the Cuſhites had alſo Gold, Bdellium, and the Onyx ſtone. This Bdellium is a Tree, of the bigneſſe of an Oliue, whereof Arabia hath great plenty, which yeeldeth a certaine Gum ſweet to ſmell to, but bitter in taſte, called alſo Bdellium. The Hebrewes take the Load-ſtone for Bdellium. Beroaldus affirmeth, that Bdela in Hebrew ſignifieth Pearle: ſo doth Eugubinus, and Hieronym calls it Oleaſter: be it what it will, a tree bearing Gum or Pearle: Hauilah or Suſiana hath plenty of both. Now this Countrie of Suſiana or Hauilah ſtretcheth it ſelfe toward the North as farre as the Altars of Hercules, and from thence imbraceth all the Tract of Land Southward, as farre as the Perſian Gulfe, on the Eaſt ſide thereof: from which Eaſt ſide had the Shebans (which traded with the Citie of Tyre according to Ezekiel) their great plenty of gold, which Strabo alſo witneſſeth, as was ſhewed before.

Steuch. Hopkins Par. The Greekes had a conceit, that Piſon was Danubius: the Rabbines take it for Nilus. Aben-Ezra (ſayth Hopkins) out of Rabbi Saadia, tranſlateth Piſon into Nilus: But Nilus findeth the ſame impoſſibility that Ganges doth: and Danubius hath the Sea of Helleſpont and all Aſia the leſſe, betweene it and Tigris. Now Piſon, which runneth through Hauilah or Suſiana, doth to this day retaine ſome ſigne of this name; for where it and Tigris embraceth each other vnder the Citie of Apamia, there doe they agree of a ioynt and compounded name, and are called Piſo-tigris. And it is ſtrange vnto me, that from ſo great antiquitie there ſhould be found remaining any reſembling ſound of the firſt name: for Babylon it ſelfe, which dwelleth ſo neere theſe Riuers, is by ſome writers
Poſt. Coſmog. Thenet. Coſmog. knowne by the name of Banda, as by Poſtellus, by Caſtaldus, of Balduch: by Barius, of Bagdad; and of Baughedor, by Andrew Thenet; and yet all thoſe that haue lately ſeene Aſia tab. 4. it call it Bagdet. To this Riuer of Piſon, Ptolemie indeede with many others giue the name of Baſilius or Regius, and Gehon they terme Mahar-ſares and Marſias, and Baarſares.
Plin. lib. 5. c. 24. So is Euphrates neere the Spring and Fountaine, by Strabo and Plinie called Pixirates: by Iunius, Puckperah, out of the Hebrew (that is) The profuſion, or comming forth of Euphrates: where it breaketh through the Mountaine Taurus, it takes the name of Omyra. Plutarch calls it Medus and Zarandi: the Hebrewes Parath, (ſaith Ar. Montanus:) Pagninus, Perath: Ioſephus, Pharah, Euſebius, Zozimus; Ammianus, Chalymicus: Giſilanus, and Calimatius terme it Cobar: which Ezechiel calleth Chebar; but this is but a branch of Euphrates. The Aſſirians know it by the name of Armalchar, or Nahor Malcha: but now commonly it is called Frat.

The ſame confuſion of names hath Tigris, as Diglito, and Diglath, Scilax, and Sellax: of the Hebrewes it was called Hiddekel: now of the inhabitants Tegil.

But Mercer vpon Geneſis conceiueth rightly of theſe Riuers: for Euphrates and Tigris (ſaith he) ſtreame into foure branches, two of which keepe their ancient names, and the other two are called Pison and Gehon. The reason, why these two riuers ioyned in one (below Apamia) lose their names, and are called Pisi-tigris, and the memorie of Euphrates extinguished, is, because the best part of Euphrates running through the channell of Gehon, sinketh into the Lakes of Chaldæa not farre from Vr, the Citie of Abraham; and fall not intirely into the Persian Sea, as Tigris accompanied with Pison, doth.

This errour that Pison was Ganges, was first broched by Iosephus, (whose fields, though they be fertile, yet are they exceeding full of weedes) and other men (who take his authoritie to be sufficient in matter of description, whereupon depended no other important consequence) were not curious in the examination thereof. For Epiphanius, Augustine, and Hierome, take this for currant; whereof it followed, that as Pison was transported into the East India, to find out Hauilah: so was Gehon drawne into Africa, to compasse Æthiopia. But if Hauilah, whereof Moses speaketh in the description of Paradise, be found to be a Region, adioyning to Babylon on the one side, and Cush (which is falsly interpreted Æthiopia) fastened to it on the other side, we shall not need then to worke wonders (that is) to impose vpon men the transportation of riuers, from one end of the world to the other, which (among other vses) were made to transport men. Now it was in the Valley of Shinar, where Cush the sonne of Ham first sate downe with his sonnes Shebah, Hauilah, Sabtah, Raamah, Nimrod, &c. and of Hauilah, the sonne of Cush, did that Region take name, which Pison compasseth; and the land (called Cush) which Gehon watereth, tooke name of Cush himselfe. For as the sonnes of Ioctan, Ophir and Hauilah, seated themselues as neere together as they could in India, so did the sons of Cush in Shinar or Babylonia, where Nimrod built Babel: for Hauilah or Chauilah was first Chusea of Cush; then Chusa, Susa, and Susiana.

From this Hauilah vnto the Desarts of Sur, did the Israelites and Amalekites possesse all the interiacent Countries: for Saul smote the Amalekites from Hauilah to Sur: 1. Sam. 15. 7. which Sur, the Chaldæan Paraphrast conuerteth Hagra, and Hagra bordereth the red Sea. But this was not meant from Sur vpon the Red Sea, to Hauilah in the East India; for Saul was no such trauailer or Conquerour, and therefore Hauilah must be found neerer home, where the sonnes of Ismael inhabited, and which countrie Saul wasted: for Amalec and the Amalekites possest that necke of Countrie, betweene the Persian Sea, and the Red Sea; Hauilah being the extreme of the one towards the East, and Sur of the other, towards Egypt and the West, leauing that great body of Arabia felix towards the South, and they spread themselues with the Midianites and Edumæans, from the East part, or backeside of the Holie Land, to the bankes of Euphrates, comprising the best part of Arabia Petræa and Deserta.

§. XIIII.

Of the Riuer Gehon and the Land of Cush, and of the ill translating of the Æthiopia for Cush, 2 CHRON. 21. 16.

NOw, as Hauilah in the East India drew Pison so farre out of his way thither, so I say did Cush (being by the Seuentie translated Æthiopia) force Gehon into Africa. For Cush being taken for Æthiopia by the Greekes, whom the Latines followed, Gehon cõsequently was esteemed for Nilus. But Æthiopians are, as much as blacke or burnt faces, whose proper Countries called Thebaides, lyeth to the Southward of all Egypt. And although there bee many other Regions of Æthiopians, and farre South in Africa, yet those of Thebaides are those so often remembred in the Egyptian stories, and out of which Nation they had many times their Kings of Egypt: all which Æthiopians are very neere, or else directly vnder the Equinoctial line, which is very far from that land inhabited by the Chusites, who are neither black of colour, nor in any sort neighbouring Torrida Zona. But this translation of the Septuagint, Pererius doth qualifie in this manner: There are (saith he) two Æthiopia's, the East, and the West: and this diuision he findeth in Strabo, out of Homer. Now because there is no colour to make Chus Æthiopia in Africa, Pererius will make Chush and the land of the Chusites (which is Arabia Petræa, and a part of Arabia the Happy, with the Region of Madian) to bee the East Æthiopia.

See more of this point, c. 7. §. 10.

Now if it be granted, that Chush and the land of the Chusites, be that tract from Sur to Hauilah, according to the Scriptures: Habitauit ISMAEL ab Hauilah vsq; Sur, quæ respicit Gen. 25. 18. Ægyptum

Ægyptum intrecuntibus Assyrios; Ismael dwelt from Hauilah vnto Sur, that is, towards Egypt, as thou goest toward Assyria. The same sufficeth to proue that Gehon cannot bee Nilus, but a Riuer which watereth Cush, and not Æthiopia. But this place of Scripture, Habitauit Ismael, &c. hath this sense: Ismael dwelt from Hauilah, which is the way of Assyria, or the Country bordering Assyria; and Sur, which lyeth toward Egypt, which is as much to say, as, The issues of Ismael (whereof there were twelue Princes) whom God had promised to make a great people, inhabited all those Regions betweene the border of Egypt and Assyria. And that they were (according to the Word of God) so increased and multiplyed, it well appeared, when Zerah the Chusite, which others call Tharantha, brought an Armie of ten hundred thousand against Asa King of Iuda. Which Armie came not out of Æthiopia beyond Egypt; for that had beene a strange progresse for such a multitude, as ten hundred thousand, hauing so mightie a King as the King of Egypt, betweene Palæstina and Æthiopia. But these were the Chusites, Amalekites, Madianites, Ismaelites, and Arabians. For it is written, that after Asa (strengthened by God) had defeated this world of an Armie, he in following his victorie tooke some of the Cities of King Zerah round about, as Gerar. Now that Gerar is a Citie of the Æthiopians, it cannot be suspected: for these bee the wordes of the Scripture disprouing it: And ABRAHAM departed thence toward the South Country, and dwelt betweene Cadesh and Sur, and sojourned in Gerar: Now Sur is that part, vpon which Moses and the Israelites first set their feete, after they passed the Red Sea, where the Amalekites in Rephidim set on them, supposing that they had beene wearie, and vnable to resist. Againe, in the storie of Isaac it is written: Wherefore ISAAC went to ABIMELECH, and the Philistims vnto Gerar: and I am sure Abimelech and the Philistims were no Æthiopians. And lastly, Moses himselfe, where hee describeth the bounds of Canaan, hath these words; Then the border of the Canaanites was from Sydon, as thou commest to Gerar: for Sydon was the frontier of Canaan towards the North, and Gerar by Gazah towards the South. But indeed, howsoeuer Pererius doth with an honest excuse salue his translation of Chus for Æthiopia, yet it appeareth plainely, that the Septuagint and Iosephus did altogether misunderstand this place. And first, for Homers East and West Æthiopia, they are both found elsewhere: For Plinie in his fift Booke and eighth Chapter, citeth Homer for an Authour of these two Æthiopia's. But the East Æthiopia is that which compasseth Nilus to the South of Egypt, and is the South border thereof; now a part of the Empire of the Abyssines, vnder Prester Iohn; And the West Æthiopia is that, which ioyneth it selfe with the Riuer Niger, which we call Senega & Gambra: for thereabouts are these Æthiopians called Perorsi, Daratites, with diuers other names, which Plinie numbreth. But all these are in Affrica, and beyond the Desarts thereof, saith Plinie out of Homer, Agrippa, and Iuba; which Regions indeede (I meane that of Niger, and that of Prester Iohn, and the Troglodytes) lye due East and West. But as for Cush and the Region of the Ismaelites, &c. they are extended directly North from that Æthiopia, which is beyond Egypt. Now, that Iosephus was exceeding grosse herein, it appeareth by that fiction, which hee hath of Moses when hee served Pharao, in the warres against the Æthiopians: for in that (to make Chus, Æthiopia) hee transporteth Madian by miracle ouer the Red Sea, and beyond all Egypt, and setteth it in Æthiopia, as shall bee shewed more at large in the Chapter of the Worlds Plantation. Againe, that Gehon was improperly translated Nilus, Pererius confesseth, and layeth it rather to the corruption of the Greeke Copie, than otherwise. And whereas the Septuagint haue conuerted this place of the Prophet Hieremie, And what hast thou now to doe in the way of Egypt, to drinke the water of Nilus? Quid tibi vis in via Egypti, vt bibas aquam Gehon? to this saith Pererius, profectò Hebraicè ibi non est vox Gehon, sed Sichor, quæ significat nigram & turbidam. Truely (saith Pererius) the word Gehon in this place is not found in the Hebrew, but Sichor, which signifieth blacke and troubled water.

Furthermore, this is a manifest and vnanswerable argument, that Chus was ill taken for Æthiopia. Moses married the daughter of Iethro, Prince and Priest of Madian, whom both the Greeke and Latine call a Madianite, and not Æthiopissam, as (with Iosephus) the Geneua conuerts it, though it helpe it a little with a marginall note. Now it is vvithout dispute, that Zipporah vvas of the Country of Madian, which is that part of gaine in the third of Exodus; When MOSES kept the sheepe of IETHRO his father in law, Vers.1.

Priest of Madian, &c. Indeede, these foure nations are euery where mixt in the Scriptures, because they dwell confusedly together (to wit) the Madianites, the Ismaelites, the Amalekites, and the Chusites, which were all in one generall word, Arabians, and in the Scriptures sometimes called by one of these names, and sometimes by another; as in Gen.37.v.25.27.& 28. that Ioseph was sold to the Ismaelites; and in the same Chapter, v.36. it is written, that the Madianites sold Ioseph to Putiphar, Pharao's Steward. The Geneuians, in a marginall note (to auoid this confounding of the Nations) say, that Moses wrote according to their opinion, who tooke the Madianites and Ismaelites to be all one. But Moses wrote not after any mans opinion; he wrote the truth, and these were all Arabians: & so in this very place it appeareth by their merchandise, which they brought with them, when they bought Ioseph: for their Camels were loden with Spicery, and Gen.37.25.
Balme, and Myrrhe, which are the trades of Arabia fœlix: from whence chiefly, and from the East India, all the World is serued with Myrrhe and Frankincense; and their spices they receiued from the East side of the Arabian Gulfe, as aforesaid. And in the 39 Chap. it is said: That Putiphar bought Ioseph of the Ismaelites; which the Chaldæan Paraphrast in the same place calleth Arabians. Now, to make this the more manifest, it is Vers.1.
written in the sixt of Iudges, That when Israel had sowne, then came vp the Madianites, Vers.3. and the Amalekites, and they of the East, and came vpon them: they of the East, were Arabians of the Desart; so as where before in the buying of Ioseph, the Madianites and the Ismaelites were confused, here the Madianites & Amalekites are made one nation. For in the prosecution of the Story of Gedeon, the Madianites only are named, as com- cap.7.
prehending both Nations, and in the eight Chapter, v.24. these Nations are all called Ismaelites, and neither Madianites nor Amalekites. As when Gedeon desired, that euery man would giue him the golden eare-rings, which they had taken after the victory a- c.8.v.24 gainst Zebah and Zalmunna, Kings of Arabia, amounting to 1700. shickles of gold, it is written: For they had golden eare-rings, because they were Ismaelites. And these Ismaelites were a great and valiant Nation, and euer in action of warre. Manus eius contra omnes, & manus omnium contra eum; His hand (saith God of ISMAEL) shall be against all men, and euery mans hand against him. Of these Ismaelites came the Mahometan Arabians, though some Writers thinke Mahomet to be of the Schenite. And these Ismaelites, Gen.16.12.
which inhabite chiefly in Cedar, and the Desarts of Sur and Pharan (saith Iosephus) vse poyson vpon their Arrowes, as the Indians doe. Towards the South-east are the Madianites, and Chusites: and beyond them, towards the Desarts of Arabia, the Amalekites; and all are one Nation, and all Arabians.

Lastly, the ill translation of Æthiopia for Chus, is among other places, made most apparant, in the second of Chronicles, in these words: So the Lord stirred vp against IEHORAM, the spirit of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine the Æthiopians; so Hierom readeth it: the Geneua translation hath it, which were besides the Æthiopians. Now how far it is off betweene the Philistines, & the Negro's or the Æthiopians, euery man that looketh in a Map may iudge. For the Philistines and Arabians doe mixe and ioyne with the Land of the Chusites, and are distant from Æthiopia about two and thirtie, or three and thirtie degrees, and therfore not their next neighbours, but all Egypt, and the Desarts of Sur and Pharan, are betweene them. So as this place of the second of Chronicles, should haue beene translated in these words: So the Lord stirred vp against Ieboram, the spirits of the Philistins, and the Arabians, which confine and border vpon the Chusites, who indeed are their next neighbours. * Nulla superest dubitatio quin Æthiopia in Sacris literis sit Arabiæ propinqua; There remaineth no doubt (saith Steuchus) but Æthiopia in the Scriptures, is taken for that Countrey, which ioyneth to Arabia. 2.Chron.21.16. * Steuch.Eugub.in Genes.2.

Now, may we thinke, is it probable, or possible, that Moses could be ignorant of Nilus? No, he knew it, no liuing man so well, and therefore would neuer haue named Gehon, for Nilus, or Nilus, for Gehon. Surely, if Moses had meant Nilus, when hee named Gehon, he would haue called the Riuer (into which he was cast vpon Reeds, and preserued by God, working compassion in the Daughter of Pharao) a Riuer of Egypt, where- Exod.2.
in he was borne & bred, & wrought so many miracles. Besides, the Riuer of Nilus is often named in the Scriptures, but neuer by the name of Gehon. And if Moses had told the Israelites, that Nilus had beene a Riuer of Paradise they might iustly haue thought, that he had derided them: for they had liued there all dayes of their liues, and found no such Paradise at all, nor nay memory, or speech thereof; except wee shall beleeue the Paradise of Hesperides, where (saith Plinie) there was nothing found in his time, but wilde Oliues in stead of golden Apples. But Nilus is twice called Sichor, once in Esay, & once in the Prophet Ieremie, and yet in those places it is not said to be a Riuer of Æthiopia, but of Egypt. For in a word, the Israelites had neuer any communion or affaires with the Æthiopians, nor any intelligence, or trade, beyond Egypt, to the South; but the Enemies which they had on the South, and East parts, were these Nations of the Chusites, Philistines, Ismaelites, Amalekites and Madianites: who being often gouerned by many little Kings, or Reguli, were distinguished in names, according to the Fathers and heads of those Nations; but in one generall name were all Arabians. On the North side of Canaan, they were afflicted with the Cœlesyrians, with the Magogians, Tubalines, and others their adherents; and thirdly within themselues, the Nations, which remained of the ancient Canaanites, held the strongest Cities vpon the Sea-coast (as) Tyre, Sidon, Acon, Gaza, and many others: yea, Ierusalem it selfe was with-held from Israel (from the dayes of Moses, euen vnto the time of Dauid) by the Iebusites.

C. 23. v. 3. C. 2. v. 18.

That which now remaineth of most difficultie, is, that it doth not appeare, that any part of Gehon watereth that part of Arabia the stony, which the Chusites inhabited in the times of the Kings of Israell: and in this Desart it was that Matt. Beroaldus lost himselfe in seeking out Paradise: for he was driuen (to my vnderstanding) to create two Riuers, and call them Gehon, and Pison; to the end that the one might water Chus, and the other Hauilah; for I find none such in rerum natura, as he hath described: by which Riuers, he also includeth within Paradise, euen Arabia the Desart.

And as he well proued that Pison was not Ganges, nor Gehon, Nilus; so where to find them else-where it seemeth he knew not. Certainely this Riuer of Gehon, which he maketh to fall into the Mediterran at Gaza, and whose Springs he findeth farre East in Arabia, is but imaginary: for the Current by Gaza is but a small streame, rising betweene it and the Red Sea, whose head from Gaza it selfe is little more than twentie English miles, as shall appeare hereafter. But questionlesse, hence it comes that many were mistaken. They all considered of the habitations of the Chusites, as they were planted when the state of Israel stood, and when it flourished, being then their neere Neighbours, and neuer looked backe to the first seates and plantation of Chus. For after the Floud, Chus and his Children neuer rested, till they found the Valley of Shinar, in which, and neere which himselfe, with his sonnes, first inhabited. Hauilah tooke the Riuer-side of Tigris chiefly on the East, which after his owne name he called Hauilah, (now Susiana:) Raamah, and Sheba farther downe the Riuer, in the entrance of Arabia fœlix. NIMROD seated himselfe in the best of the Valley, where he built Babel, whereof that Region had afterwards the name of Babylonia. Chus himself and his brother Mizraim first kept vpon Gehon, which falleth into the Lakes of Chaldæa, and in processe of time, and as their people increased, they drew themselues more Westerly towards the Red or Arabian Sea: from whence Mizraim past ouer into Egypt, in which Tract the Chusites remained for many yeeres after. Now because there could be no such Riuer found in Arabia the stonie, which they might entitle Gehon, they translated Chus, Æthiopia, and Gehon, Nilus. And if wee doe examine this mistaking by example, wee shall the better perceiue it as it was. For let vs suppose, that Brute, or whosoeuer else that first peopled this Iland, had arriued vpon the Riuer of Thames, and called the Iland after his name Britannia, it might bee said that Thames or Tems was a Riuer that watered Britannia: and when afterwards in processe of time, the same Brute had also discouered and conquered Scotland, which he also intituled by the same name of Britannia, after ages might conclude that Scotland, was no part thereof, because the Riuer of Tems is not found therein. Or let vs suppose that Europa, the Daughter of the King of Tyre in Phœnicia, gaue the name to Europe, according to Herodotus, and that the first discouerers thereof arriued in the mouth of the Riuer in Thrace, which then watered as much of Europe, as he first discouered, shall wee in like sort resolue that France, Spaine, and Italie, &c. are no parts of Europe, because that Riuer is not found in them, or any of them: in like manner was it said by Moses in his description of Gehon, that it watered the whole Land of Chus; but not the whole Land which the Chusites should or might in future time conquer, people, and inhabite, seeing in after-ages they became Lords of many Nations, and they might (perchance) haue beene Masters in time, (as the Saracens, which came of them, were) of a great part of the world. For, though the Babylonian Empire, which tooke beginning in Nimrod the sonne of Chus, consisted at the first but of foure Cities, (to wit) Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalne, yet we find, that his Successours within a few yeares after, commanded all the whole World in effect: & the fame of Babel consumed the memorie of Chusea. For of this Tower of Confusion did all that Land take the name of Babylonia: and the greatnesse of that Empire, founded by Nimrod a yonger sonne, obscured the name and nation of his father Cush in those parts, vntill they crept farther off, and in places not yet entituled, and farther from the Babylonian Empire, where the Chusites retained their names, which also they fastned to the Soile and Territorie by themselues afterwards inhabited and held. And we may not thinke, that Chus or any of his, could in haste creepe through those desart Regions, which the length of 130. yeares after the Floud had (as it were) fortified with Thickets, and permitted euery Bush and Bryar, Reede and Tree, to ioyne themselues (as it were) into one maine body and Forrest. For if we looke with iudgement and reason into the Worlds plantation, we shall find, that euery Family seated themselues as neare together as possible they could, and though necessitie enforced them, after they grew full of people, to spread themselues, and creepe out of Shinar or Babylonia, yet did they it with this aduice, as that they might at all times, resort and succour one another by Riuer, the fields being then (without all doubt) impassable. So Nimrod, who out of wit and strength vsurped dominion ouer the rest, sate downe in the very confluence of all those Riuers, which watered Paradise: for thither it was to which the greatest troupes of Noahs children repayred; and from the same place whence Mankind had his beginning, from thence had they againe their increase. The first Father of Men Adam, had therein his former habitation. The second Father of Mankind Noah, began from thence his dispersion.

Now as Nimrod the youngest, yet strongest, made his choice of Babel (as aforesaid) which both Tigris and Euphrates cleansed and enriched; so did Hauilah place himselfe vpon Pise-Tigris: Raamah and his sonne Sheba further downe vpon the same Riuer, on the Sea-coast of Arabia: Chus himselfe vpon Gehon, the faire st branch of Euphrates. And when they began to spread themselues farther off, yet they alwayes fastened themselues to the Riuers sides: for Ninive, Charran, Reseph, Canneh, Vr in Chaldea, and the other first-peopled Cities, were all founded vpon these nauigable Riuers, or their branches, by which the one might giue succour and assistance to the other; as is already often remembred.

§. XV.

A conclusion by way of repetition of something spoken of before.

BVt now to conclude this dispute, it appeareth to me by the testimonies of the Scriptures, that Paradise was a place created by God, and a part of this our Earth and habitable World, seated in the lower part of the Region of Eden, afterward called Aram fluuiorum, or Mesopotamia, which taketh into it also a portion of Shinar and Armenia: this Region standing in the most excellent temper of all other, (to wit) 35. degrees from the Æquinoctiall, and 55. from the North-pole: in which climate the most excellent Wines, Fruits, Oyle, Graine of all sorts are to this day found in abundance. And there is nothing that better proueth the excellency of this said soile and temper, than the abundant growing of the Palme-trees, without the care and labour of man. For wherein soeuer the Earth, Nature, and the Sunne can most vaunt, that they haue excelled, yet shall this Plant be the greatest wonder of all their workes: this Tree alone giueth vnto man whatsoeuer his life beggeth at Natures hand. And though it may beesaid, that these Trees are found both in the East and West Indies, which Countries are also blessed with a perpetuall Spring and Summer, yet, lay downe by those pleasures and benefits the fearefull and dangerous Thunders and Lightnings, the horrible and frequent Earthquakes, the dangerous diseases, the multitude of venimous Beasts and Wormes, with other inconueniences; and then there will be found no comparison betweene the one and the other.

What other excellencies this Garden of Paradiſe had, before God (for mans ingratitude and crueltie) curſed the Earth, we cannot iudge; but I may ſafely thinke, that by how much Adam exceeded all liuing men in perfection, by being the immediate workemanſhip of God, by ſo much did that choſen and particular Garden exceede all parts of the Vniuerſall World, in which God had planted (that is) made to grow the Trees of Life, of Knowledge; Plants onely proper, and becomming the Paradiſe, and Garden of ſo great a Lord.

The ſumme of all this is, That whereas the eyes of men in this Scripture haue beene dimme-ſighted (ſome of them finding Paradiſe beyond our knowne World: ſome, aboue the middle Region of the Ayre: ſome, eleuated neere the Moone: others, as farre South as the Line, or as farre North as the Pole, &c.) I hope that the reader will be ſufficiently ſatisfied, that theſe were but like Caſtles in the Aire, and in mens fancies, vainely imagined. For it was Eaſtward in Eden (ſaith Moſes) Eaſtward, in reſpect of Iudæa, that God planted this Garden; which Eden wee find in the Prophets where it was, and whereof the name (in ſome part) remaineth to this day. A riuer went out of Eden to water this Garden, and from thence diuided it ſelfe into foure branches; and we find that both Tigris and Euphrates ſwimming through Eden, doe ioyne in one, and afterward taking wayes apart, doe water Chus and Hauilah, according to Moſes. the true ſeats of Chus and his Sonnes then being in the Valley of Shinar, in which Nimrod built Babel. That Piſon was Ganges, the Scripture, Reaſon, and experience teach the contrary: for that which was neuer ioyned, cannot be diuided; Ganges, which inhabiteth India, cannot be a branch of the riuers of Eden; That Gehon was Nilus, the ſame diſtance maketh the ſame impoſſibilitie; and this riuer is a greater ſtranger to Tigris and Euphrates, than Ganges is: for although there are betweene Tigris and Ganges aboue foure thouſand miles, yet they both riſe in the ſame quarter of the World; but Nilus is begotten in the Mountaines of the Moone, almoſt as farre off as the Cape of good hope, and falleth into the Mediterran Sea: and Euphrates diſtilleth out of the Mountaines of Armenia, and falleth into the Gulfe of Perſia: the one riſeth in the South, and trauaileth North: the other riſeth in the North, and runneth South, threeſcore and three degrees the one from the other. In this leafe following, I haue added a Chorographicall deſcription of this terreſtriall Paradiſe, that the Reader may thereby the better conceiue the preceding Diſcourſe; and this is the reward I looke for, that my labour may but receiue an allowance ſuſpended, vntil ſuch time as this deſcription of mine be reproued by a better.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the two chiefe Trees in the Garden of Paradiſe.

§. I.

That the tree of Life was a materiall tree: and in what ſenſe it is to be taken, that man by his eating the forbidden fruit, is made ſubiect to death.

FOr eating the forbidden fruit of the tree of Knowledge was Adam driuen out of Paradiſe, in exilium vitæ temporalis, into the baniſhment of temporall life, ſaith Beda. That theſe Trees of Life and Knowleddge were materiall Trees (though Figures of the Law and of the Goſpell) it is not doubted by the moſt religious and learned Writers: although the wits of men, which are ſo volatile, as nothing can fixe them, and ſo ſlipperie, as nothing can faſten them, haue in this alſo delinered to the World, an imaginarie doctrine.

The Tree of Life (ſay the Hebrewes) hath a plurall conſtruction, and is to be vnderſtood, Lignum vitarum, The Tree of liues, becauſe the fruit thereof had a propertie, to preſerue both the growing, ſenſitiue, and rationall life of man; and not onely (but for Adams tranſgreſſion) had prolonged his owne dayes, but alſo giuen a durefull continuance to all poſteritie; and that, ſo long, as a body compounded of Elements could laſt.

Bart. ſept. 2. l. 1. 174.

And although it is hard to thinke, that fleſh and bloud could be immortall, but that it muſt once periſh and rot, by the vnchanged Law of God impoſed on his creatures, Man (notwithstanding) should haue enioyned thereby a long, healthfull, and vngreiued life: after which (according to the opinion of most Diuines) he should haue beene translated, as Enoch was. And as before the Floud, the dayes of men had the long measure of eight hundred or nine hundred yeeres; and soone after the floud, of two hundred yeers and vpwards, euen to fiue hundred: so if Adam had not disobeyed Gods first and easie Commandement, the liues of men on Earth might haue continued double, treble, or quadruple to any of the longest times of the first age, as many learned men haue conceiued. Chrysostome, Rupertus, Tostatus, and others were of beleefe, that (but for Adams fall and transgression) Adam and his Posteritie had beene immortall. But such is the infinite Wisedom of God, as he foresaw that the earth could not haue contained Mankind, or else, that millions of soules must haue beene vngenerated, and haue had no being, if the first number, wherewith the Earth was replenished, had abode thereon for euer: and therefore that of Chrysostome must bee vnderstood of immortalitie of bodies, which should haue beene translated and glorified.

But of what kind or Species this Tree of Life was, no man hath taken on him to teach: in which respect many haue conceiued, that the same was not materiall, but a meere Allegorie, taking their strength out of Salomon, where Wisedome is compared to the Tree of Life, and from other places, where also Christ is called the Tree of Life; and out of the Apocalypsis, I will giue to him that ouer commeth, to eate of the Tree of Life which is in the Paradise of God. Apocal. 2. 7. But to this place Saint Augustines answer may suffice, (which is) That the one doth not exclude the other, but that, as there was a terrestriall Paradise, so there was a celestiall. For although Agar and Sara were Figures of the Old, and New Testament, yet to thinke that they were not Women, and the Maide and Wife of Abraham, were meere foolishnesse. And so in this place the sense of the Scripture is manifest. For God brought out of the earth euery Tree faire to the sight, and sweete to taste; the Tree also of Life in the midst of the Garden: which sheweth, that among the trees, which the Earth by Gods commandement produced, the tree of Life was one, and that the fruit thereof was also to be eaten. The report of this Tree was also brought to the ancient Poets: for as from the indigested matter or Chaos, Hesiodus, Homer, Ouid, and others, steale the inuention of the created World; so from the Garden of Paradise they tooke the Plat-forme of the Orchard of Alcinous, and another of the Hesperides: and from the Tree of Life, their Nectar and Ambrosia; for Nectar, according to Suidas, signifieth making young, and Ambrosia, immortalitie; and therefore said to be the meate and drinke of the gods.

§. II.

Of Becanvs his opinion, that the Tree of knowledge was Ficus Indica.

NOw for the Tree of Knowledge of good and euill, some men haue presumed farther, especially Goropius Becanus, who giueth himselfe the honour to haue found out the kind of this Tree, which none of the Writers of former times could euer ghesse at, whereat Goropius much marualleth. But as hee had an inuentiue braine, so there neuer liued any man, that beleeued better thereof, and of himselfe. Surely, howsoeuer his opinion may be valued, yet he vsurpeth the praise due to others, at least if the inuention be at that price at which he setteth it. For Moses Bar-Cephas fastened on this coniecture aboue sixe hundred yeeres before Becanus was borne: and Bar-Cephas himselfe referreth the inuention to an antiquitie more remote, citing for his Author Philoxenus Maburgensis, and others, whose very words Goropius vseth, both concerning the Tree, and the reasons wherewith he would induce other men to that beliefe. For Moses Bar-Cephas in his Treatise of Paradise (the first Part and fol. 48.) saith, That the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica; The Indian Fig-Tree, of which the greatest plentie (saith Becanus) are found vpon the bankes of Acesines, one of the Riuers which falleth into Indus, where Alexander built his Fleete of Gallies, in or neere the Kingdome of Porus.

This Tree beareth a fruit of the bignesse of a great Peaze, or (as Plinie reporteth) somewhat bigger: and that it is a tree, Semper serens, alwaies planting it selfe, that it spreadeth it selfe so farre abroade, as that a troope of horsemen may hide themselues vnder it. Strabo saith, that it hath branches bending downewards, & leaues no lesse than a shield. Plin. l. 12. c. 5. Lib. 15. p. 2.

Aristobulus

Aristobulus affirmeth, that fiftie Horsemen may shadow themselues vnder one of these Trees. Onesicritus rayseth this number to foure hundred. This tree (saith Theophrastus) exceedeth all other in bignesse, which also Plinie & Onesicritus confirme: to the trunke of which, these Authors giue such a magnitude, as I shame to repeate. But it may bee, they all speake by an ill-vnderstood report. For this Indian Fig-tree is not so rare a plant, as Becanus conceiueth, who because hee found it no where else, would needes draw the Garden of Paradise to the Tree, and set it by the riuer Acesines. But many parts of the world haue them, and I my selfe haue seene twentie thousand of them in one Valley, not farre from Paria in America. They grow in moist grounds, and in this manner: After they are first shot vp some twentie or thirtie foot in length (some more, some lesse, according to the soile) they spread a very large top, hauing no bough nor twigge in the trunke or stemme: for from the vtmost end of the head branches there issueth out a gummy iuyce, which hangeth downeward like a cord or sinew, and within a few moneths reacheth the ground; which it no sooner toucheth but it taketh roote, and then being filled both from the top boughes, and from his owne proper roote, this cord maketh it selfe a Tree exceeding hastily. From the vtmost boughes of these young Trees there fall againe the like cords, which in one yeare and lesse (in that World of a perpetuall Spring) become also trees of the bignesse of the neather part of a Lance, and as straight as art or nature can make any thing, casting such a shade, and making such a kind of Groue, as no other Tree in the world can doe. Now, one of these Trees considered with all his young ones, may (indeed) shrowd foure hundred or foure thousand Horsemen, if they please; for they couer whole Vallies of ground where these Trees grow neare the Sea-banke, as they doe by thousands in the inner parts of Trinidado. The cordes which fall dovvne ouer the bankes into the Sea, shooting alway downeward to finde roote vnder water, are in those Seas of the Indies, where Oysters breede, intangled in their beds, so as by pulling vp one of these cordes out of the Sea, I haue seene fiue hundred Oysters hanging in a heape thereon; wherof the report came, that Oysters grew on Trees in India. But that they beare any such huge leaues, or any such delicate fruit, I could neuer finde, and yet I haue trauailed a dozon miles together vnder them: but to returne to Goropius Becanus. This Tree (saith he) was good for meate and pleasing to the sight, as the Tree of knowledge of good and euill is described to be.

Secondly, this Tree hauing so huge a trunke (as the former Authors report, and Becanus beleeueth) it was in this Tree that Adam and Eue hid themselues from the presence of God; for no other tree (saith he) could containe them. But first it is certaine, that this Tree hath no extraordinarie magnitude, as touching the trunke or stemme, for among ten thousand of them it is hard to finde any one bigger than the rest, and these are all but of a meane size. Secondly, the words of Moses translated, in medio ligni, are by all the Interpreters vnderstood in the plurall number (that is) in the middest of the Trees. But his third argument (or rather the argument of Adoses Bar-Cephas, word for word) is,

Gen. 3. 7. That when Adam and Eue found themselues naked, they made them breeches of Fig-leaues; which proueth (indeed) that either the tree it selfe was a Fig-tree, or that a Fig-tree grew neare it: because Adam being possest with shame, did not run vp and downe the Garden to seeke out leaues to couer him, but found them in the place it selfe; and

Plin. l. 12. c. 5. these leaues of all other were most commodious by reason of their largenesse; which Plinie auoweth in these words: Latitudo foliorum pelta effigiem Amazonia habet; The breadth of the leaues hath the shape of an Amazonian shield: which also Theophrast confirmeth; the forme of which Targets Virgil toucheth:

PENTHESILEA furens.
The Amazons with Crescent-formed shield
PENTHESILAE A leades into the field.

Here Becanus desireth to be beleeued, or rather threatneth vs all that reade him, to giue credit to this his borrowed discouerie, vsing this confident (or rather cholericke) speech: Quis erit tam impudenter obstinatus, si hæc à nobis de ficu hac ex antiquis scriptoribus cum Mosis narratione comparet, vt audeat dicere aliam arborem inueniri posse, quæ cum illa magis quadret? Who will be so impudently obstinate, if he compare these things which we haue reported of this Fig-tree, and out of ancient writers deliuered, with the narration of MOSES, as to dare to auow, that any other Tree can bee found, which doth more properly answer, or agree therewith? But for my selfe, because I neither find this Tree, sorting in body, in largenesse of leaues, nor in fruit to this report, I rather incline to the opinion of Philo: That the Earth neuer brought forth any of these trees neither before nor after; but I leaue euery man to his owne beliefe, for the matter is of no great weight as touching his kinde: onely thereby, and by the easie Commandement by God giuen to Adam, to forbeare to feede thereon, it pleased God to make triall of his obedience: Prohibita, non propter aliud, quam ad commendandum pure at simplicis Obedientia bonum; Being forbidden, not for any other respect, than thereby to commend the goodnesse of pure and simple Obedience. August. de Ciuit. Dei, l. 13. c. 20.

§. III.

Of BEGANVS his not vnwitty allegorizing of the story of his Ficus Indica.

BVt in this I must doe Beganius right, that he hath very wittily allegorized this Tree, allowing his supposition of the Tree it selfe to bee true. The effects whereof, because his discourses are exceeding ample, I haue gathered in these few words. As this Tree (saith he) so did Man grow straight and vpright towards God, vntill such time as he had transgressed and broken the Commandement of his Creator, and then like vnto the boughes of this tree, he began to bend downeward, and stooped toward the earth, which all the rest of Adams posteritie after him haue done, rooting themselues therein, and fastning themselues to this corrupt world. The exceeding vmbragiousnesse of this tree, he compareth to the darke & shadowed life of man, through which the Sunne of iustice being not able to pierce, wee haue all remained in the shadow of death, till it pleased Christ to climbe the tree of the Crosse for our enlightning and redemption. The little fruite which it beareth, and which is hard to find among so many large leaues, may be compared (saith hee) to the little vertue, and vnperceiued knowledge among so large vanities, which obscure and shadow it ouer. And as this fruit is exceeding sweet, and delicate to the taste and palate: So are the delights and pleasures of the world most pleasing, while they dure. But as all those things which are most mellifluous, are soonest changed into choler and bitternesse; so are our vanities and pleasures conuerted into the bittrest sorrowes and repentances. That the leaues are so exceeding large, the fruit (for such leaues) exceeding little, in this, by comparison we behold (saith he) the many cares and great labours of worldly men, their sollicitude, their outward shewes, and publike ostentation, their apparant pride and large vanities; and if we seeke for the fruit, which ought to bee their vertuous and pious actions, we find it of the bignesse of the smallest peaze, glorie, to all the world apparant, goodnesse, to all the world inuisible. And furthermore, as the leaues, body, and boughts of this Tree, by so much exceede all other Plants, as the greatest men of power and worldly abilitie surpasse the meanest: so is the little fruit of such men, and such trees, rather fitting and becomming the vnworthiest Shrub, and humblest Bryar, or the poorest and basest Man, than such a flourishing statelinesse, and magnitude. Lastly, whereas Adam, after hee had disobeyed God, and beheld his owne nakednesse and shame, sought for leaues to couer himselfe withall, this may serue to put vs in minde of his and our sinnes, as often as we put on our garments, to couer and adorne our rotten and mortall bodies: to pamper and maintaine which, wee vse so many vncharitable and cruell practices in this world.

§. IIII.

Of the name of the tree of knowledge of good and euill: with some other notes touching the storie of ADAMS sinne.

NOw as touching the sense of this tree of Knowledge of good and euill, and what operation the fruit thereof had, and as touching the propertie of the Tree it selfe, Moses Bar Cephas an ancient Syrian Doctor (translated by Masius) giueth this iudgement: That the fruit of this Tree had no such vertue or qualitie, as that by the tasting thereof, there was any such knowledge created in Adam, as if hee had beene ignorant before; but as Iunius also noteth: Arbor scientiæ boni & mali (id est) experientia boni & mali ab euentu; The Tree of knowledge of good and euill (that is) the experience of good and euill by the euent. For thus much we may conceiue, that Adam being made (according to the Hebrew phrase) by the workmanship of Gods owne hand, in greater perfection than euer anie man was produced by generation, being (as it were) the created Plant, out of whose seed, all men liuing, haue growne vp; and hauing receiued immortalitie from the breath or spirit of God, hee could not (for these respects) be ignorant, that the disobeying of Gods commandement was the fearefullest euill, and the obseruation of his precepts the happiest good. But as men in perfect health do (notwithstanding) conceiue, that sickenesse is grieuous, and yet in no such degree of torment, as by the suffering & experience in themselues they afterwards witnesse: so was it with Adam, who could not be ignorant of the punishments, due to neglect and disobedience; and yet felt by the proofe therof in himselfe, another terror than he had fore-thought, or could imagine. For looking into the glasse of his owne guiltie soule, he beheld therin the horror of Gods iudgements, so as he then knew, he feelingly knew, and had triall of the late good, which could not be prized, and of the new purchased euil, which could not be expreſt. He then saw himselfe naked both in bodie and mind; that is, depriued of Gods grace and former felicitie: and therefore was this tree called the tree of Knowledge, and not because the fruit thereof had anie such operation, by anie selfe qualitie or effect: for the same phrase is vsed in many places of the Scriptures, and names are giuen to Signes and Sacraments, as to acts performed, and things done. In such sort, as this tree was called the tree of Knowledge, because of the euent, as is aforesaid: so was the Well of contention therefore called Esek, and the Well of hatred Sitnath, because the Heardsmen of Isaac and Gerar contended for them; and the heape of Stones called the heape of witnesse, betweene Iacob and Laban; not that the stones bare witnesse, but for a memorie of the couenant. So Iacob called the house of God Bethel; and Hagar, the Well in the Desart, Viuentis & videntis.

But Adam being both betrayed and mastered by his affections, ambitious of a farther knowledge than he had perceiued in himselfe, and looking but slightly (as all his issues doe) into the miseries and sorrowes incident, and greatly affecting the supposed glory which he might obtaine by tasting the fruit forbidden, he was transported and blowne forward, by the gentle winde of pleasing perswasions, vnawares; his progression being strengthened by the subtile arguments of Sathan, who laboured to poison mankind in the verie roote, which he moistned with the liquor of the same ambition, by which himselfe perished for euer.

But what meanes did the Diuell find out, or what instruments did his owne subtilty present him, as fittest and aptest to worke this mischiefe by? euen the vnquiet vanity of the woman; so as by Adams harkning to the voyce of his wife, contrarie to the expresse commandement of the liuing God, Mankind by that her incantation became the subiect of labour, sorrow, and death: the woman being giuen to man for a comforter and companion, but not for a counsellor. But because thou hast obeyed the voyce of thy wife &c. (said God himselfe) Cursed is the earth for thy sake, in sorrow shalt thou eate of it all thy life. It is also to be noted, by whom the woman was tempted, euen by the most vgly and vnworthy of all beasts, into whom the Diuell entred and perswaded.

Secondly, what was the motiue of her disobedience? euen a desire to know what was most vnfitting her knowledge; an affection which hath euer since remained in all the posteritie of her sexe. Thirdly, what was it that moued the man to yeeld to her perswasions? euen the same cause which hath moued all men since to the like consent, namely, an vnwillingnesse to grieue her and make her sad, lest she should pine and be ouercome with sorrow. But if Adam in the state of perfection, and Salomon the sonne of Dauid, Gods chosen seruant, and himselfe a man endued with the greatest wisedome, did both of them disobey their Creator, by the perswasion and for the loue they bare to a woman, it is not so wonderfull as lamentable, that other men in succeeding ages haue been allured to so many inconuenient and wicked practices, by the perswasions of their wiues, or other beloued darlings, who couer ouer and shadow many malicious purposes with a counterfait passion of dissimulate sorrow and vnquietnesse.

Of diuers memorable things betweene the Fall of ADAM, and the Floud of NOAH.

§. I.

Of the cause and the reuenge of CAINS sinne: and of his going out from God.

THe same Pride and Ambition which began in Angels, and afterward possest Adam, Cain also inherited: for Cain (enuious of the acceptation of his Brothers Prayer and Sacrifice) slew him, making himselfe the first Manslayer, and his Brother the first Martyr: the reuenge of which vnnaturall Murther, although it pleased God to mitigate, when Cain cryed out that his punishment was greater than he could beare. For the same offence chiefly (wherwith the Sonnes of Adam, as it were, vrged and prouoked God) hee destroyed all Mankind, but Noah and his Family: for it is written, The Earth also was corrupt before God: of which in the same place Moses giueth a reason, for saith he, The Earth was filled with cruelty: and anon after, God himselfe made the cause knowne vnto Noah, saying; An end of all flesh is come before me, for the Earth is filled with cruelty thorough them, and behold, I will destroy them with the Earth, or from the Earth. Neither was this cruelty meant to haue beene in taking away the liues of men onely, but in all sorts of Iniustice and Oppression. After this Murther of ABEL, CAIN went out from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, towards the East-side of Eden: in which words, The going out of Cain from the presence of the Lord, is not to be vnderstood after the litterall sense; God being wholly in all parts of the World: Totus in cœlo est, totus in terra, non alternis temporibus, sed vniuersa simul; God (saith S. AVGVSTINE) is wholly in Heauen, and wholly in Earth, not by enterchanged times, but all at once; And that this is true, Dauid witnesseth: If I be in Heauen (saith DAVID) thou art there; in Hell, thou art there also. But what is meant therby? Exijt a facie Dei (saith CHRYSOSTOME) CAIN went out from the presence of the Lord (that is) he was left of God, disfauoured and bereaued of his protection.

§. II.

Of CAINS dwelling in the Land of Nod: and of his City Enoch.

THis word Nod or Naid, S. Hierome and many others vnderstand to signifie wandring or incertaine habitation: vexation or agitation, saith Iunius; but the Seuenty conuert it otherwise, and take Nod for the proper name of a Country, and so doth Iosephus. But it seemeth to me, that Cain was rather a Vagabond or Wanderer in his cogitations, than any thing else, and that his thoughts and conscience had no quiet or rest, in regard of the Murther committed, iustly fearing (by his owne words) the like violence: And whosoeuer findeth me (saith CAIN) shall slay me. Now that Nod or Naid was a Region wherein Cain inhabited, appeareth by the word (dwelt) for dwelling signifieth an abiding: and wee call those people Wanderers and Vagabonds that haue no dwelling place. And to make this dwelling & abiding more manifest, Moses teacheth in what part of the Earth this his habitation was, which he affirmeth towards the East-side of Eden. Secondly, it is said by Moses, that after Cain departed from the presence or fauour of God, he built a City, and called it by the name of his first-borne, Enoch; which sheweth that he feared to wander, and rather sought to fortifie himselfe against reuenge. Cyrillus saith, that Cain and Abel were figures of Christ, and of the Iewes; and that as Cain after that he had slaine Abel vniustly, had thence-forth no certaine abiding in the World: so the Iewes after they had crucified the Sonne of God, became Runnegates; and it is true, that the Iewes had neuer since any certaine Estate, Common-weale, or Prince of their own vpon the Earth. Now this Land of Nod, Iunius taketh to be in Arabia Deserta, a Region of Nomades; but Arabia the Desert is not Eastward, or on the East part of Eden, neither are these Nomades any particular People or Nation. For all these, in what part of the World soeuer, which in old time liued by Pastorage, and fed (as we call it in Ireland) vpon white meate, without tilling of the ground, are called by the Greekes, Nomades, and by the Latines Pastores vagi; as the Northren Tartarians, the Getulians, and Numidians in Africa, the ancient Brittans, and the Northren Irish: yea, such were the Inhabitants of Italy it selfe, till such time as Italus (who gaue them that name) taught them the Husbandry of tillage, vsed at this day. But the Region Eastward from Eden is that part of Assyria, called by Ptolomy Calena, which also might bee deriued of Carena, the country of Cain. And that Cain inhabited in those parts, it may be gathered by the first possession of his Father Adam; for thus it is written, Genes. 3. Therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the Garden of Eden to till the Earth whence he was taken: and in the Verse following: Thus hee cast out man, &c. and at the East side of the Garden of Eden hee set the Cherubins: which sheweth, that the entrie into Paradise was from the East, by which entrance Adam was cast out, and therefore inhabiting on that side of Paradise which was Eastward, according to the Text. Cain also in the same Region sought his dwelling place. Now, if the word Nod or Naid doe signifie profugus, that is, a fugitiue, we can giue no longer time to this vncertaine habitation of Cain, than till he built the City of Enoch, the first of the World, which hee inclosed either, for his owne defence, or (as Iosephus writeth) to oppresse others therby. So as for mine own opinion, I am resolued with the Septuagint, that Nod was the proper name of a Region; and for the word (Vagabond) which Cain vseth of himselfe, it seemeth by the perclose of the same Verse, that (Vagabond) is therein vnderstood for such an one as trauaileth in feare of reuengement: for whosoeuer findeth me (saith CAIN) shall slay me; or else (Vagabond) is taken for a man without protection, and cast out from the fauour of God.

Vers. 23. 24.

And because these Henochians, so called of the City of Henoch, were the first society & ciuill assembly of all other, it is likely that the fame of these people (either for cruelty, strength, or other actions) liued in the memory of Noah and his Sonnes; so that after the Floud (as there were of all sorts of natures, some vertuously, some impiously disposed, and euery actiue minde setting before it whom to follow or imitate) those people, which delighted in cruelty and oppression, tooke on them their names whose natures they most liked and allowed; of whom these Henochians were not the least. Perchance the place it selfe where Henoch stood before the Floud, and whereof the Monuments might remain (as the Pillars or the foundation of Ioppe did) gaue occasion to the Planters of that place to call themselues by the same name: for of those Henochians there were many Nations in the borders of Pontus, & Colchis in Iberia, Segdiana, & Bactria; of the same name many Mountains, as those which are otherwise called Coraxici. And seeing that it is hard to find out the truth of these things, which the most aged Time hath couered ouer or defaced, we may (according to the counsell of Plato) exceedingly reioyce, and therwith satisfie our selues, if of so great and almost worn-out Antiquity, if of the eldest peoples names & nations, there remain any print or foot-steps to Posterity.

Quotidiè aliquid in hoc magno orbe mutatur, noua vrbium fundamenta iaciuntur, vetus Gentium nomina (extinctis nominibus prioribus) oriuntur. Senec. ad Albinum.

In Pliny, Pomela, Strabo, Valerius Flaccus, Lucan, Stephanus, wee finde those Henoches described, though diuersly written, as in Pliny, sometimes Heniochi, in Mela Enioche, in Flaccus Heniochi, in Lucan Enochij, all which inhabit vpon the Sea Euxinus, but yet none of these are on the East-side of Eden, or (according to Moses words) Eastward from Eden. For Moses, in all places where he describeth any Region, was so exceeding precise, as sometime he vseth the word East or South without borrowing or addition, at other times with a borrowing, as Eastward or Southward, or towards the East or South. In the place of Genesis the eleuenth, hee writeth the word (East) simply and directly. And as they went from the East, they found a Plaine in the Land of Shinar; but in this of Cain he addeth the word (towards) as, in the Land of Nod towards the East side of Eden; which may be taken, as inclining some one point or two either to the North or to the South of the East.

But as we may coniecture that these Nations took name of Henoch the City of Cain, or of the Region wherein it stood, when the same was repeopled after the Floud: so it is probable that these Henochij of Colchis, & other parts adioining, were not the first of that name, after the Sons of Noah began to fill the World againe: because, had this Henoch the City of Cain stood in any of these parts, it had then bin seated North, & not East or Eastward from Eden. But as Pliny findeth their habitation towards Pontus, so afterwards hee goeth on Eastward, till hee tracke them or trace them out to their originall. For he calleth these of Colchis (now Mengrelia) Sanni Heniochi; Ptolomy, Zani; beyond which an hundred and fifty mile Eastward hee findeth another Nation of them about Iberia and Albania; and beyond these hee againe discouereth a third Nation, from whence all the rest tooke beginning, which inhabited on the West side of the Mountains of Paropamisus, betweene them and the great Riuer of Oxus, which bordereth Bactria on the North side; and these Henochii are due East from the Region of Eden, and Eastward from the very Garden it selfe.

And although wee cannot bee assured that these Henochii tooke name from the memory of the City of Enoch directly, yet because they inhabited due East from Paradise, and afterwards spred themselues Westward (as all Noahs Sons did (that came into Shinar) the coniecture is farre more probable, than that of Annius the Frier, who sets Henoch in Phoenicia, quite contrary to Moses word: Phoenicia from all parts of Eden being directly West.

And besides these seuerall Nations of the Henochii, Stephanus findeth a Region called Henochia, & the same also in the East, with diuers Mountaines about Bactria and Sogdiana, of the same name. Only the Grecians (according to their fabulous inuentions of all things else) out of the word (Heniochi) which signifieth Carts or Coach-men; make these Nations to haue sprung from the Waggoners of Castor and Pollux (to wit) Amphites and Telchius, who attended them in the enterprise of Iason into Colchis. And though I doe not deny, but that Iason with other Greeks ranged the Coasts of Asia the lesse in an open Boat or kind of small Galley, * of whom I shall speake in his owne time: yet no man doubteth but that the Tale of the Golden Fleece was for the most part Poeticall; and withall that in such an open Boat, which could hardly carry their owne Rowers, being 54. there was no place, and lesse vse of Coach-horses or Waggoners.

§. III.

Of Moses his omitting sundry things concerning Cains Generation.

BVt of the remembrance and testimonies of the name of the City of Henoch in prophane Story, thus much may suffice; Now it followeth to answer some few Obiections against certaine particulars in the fourth and fifth Chapter of Genesis: against which for the first it is demanded, how it was possible for Cain (hauing no other assistance than his Sonne Henoch) to performe such a Work as the building of a City, seeing there is thereto required so many hands, and so great a masse of all sorts of Materials? To which it is answered, that we are first to consider, That of Cain (because he was the Parent of an impious Race) Moses vseth no ample declaration; and so it best agreeth with his diuine Reason, seeing that he containeth the whole Story of the first Race, which wasted by the least account, 1656. yeares, in fiue short Chapters. Yet thus much may euery man borrow of his owne weakest reason, That seeing it pleased God to bestow on the first generations of mens liues so long a measure, as 800. & 900. yeares, that in such a space Cain had not want of leisure and means to build many such Cities as Henoch, be the capacity answering to what other of the World soeuer: for in what Age of Cains life he built it, the Scriptures are silent: as of whose times, and the times of his Issues Moses had the least care. And, as it was said of Cain, that he built a City: so it was said of Noah, that his three Sons peopled all the World, but in both, the processe of time required to be vnderstood: which aduice seeing Moses vseth where the space lesse requireth it, as knowing that hee writ the Scriptures to reasonable men, wee may easily vnderstand, that such was his meaning also in all reports of like nature. For in making but a difference betweene the Birth of Abel, and Oblation of Cain, he spake it in this sort, Fuit autem post dies multos or à fine dierum (that is) in processe of time, it came to passe that Cain brought an Oblation. And therefore it is in like sort to bee vnderstood of Cain, that many yeares fore-gone, and when his people were increased, he built the City of Enoch or Henoch. 2. Kin. 16.

And where it is written, as of Cain, that he built Enoch, so of Salomon, that hee built the Temple of Ierusalem; yet it is well knowne of Salomon, that hee employed in that Worke, 150000. Labourers: for this phrase or speech is common with our selues to say, The King inuaded, when he caused an inuasion to be made: & he built, when he cõmanded such a building. And therfore seeing we find that Moses had no regard to the ages, to the birth, or to the death of any of Cains Issues, it is not to be maruailed at, why he also passeth passeth ouer in a word the building of Enoch, without addition of any circumstance: for

Gen. 4. 17. of Cain, Moses writeth in this manner: CAIN also knew his wife, who conceiued and bare HENOCH, and he built a Citie, and called the name of the Citie after the name of his sonne HENOCH. And to HENOCH was borne IRAD, and IRAD begat MEHVIAEL, and MEHVIAEL begat METHVSAEL, and METHVSAEL LAMECH.

C. 5. v. 3. Now of Seth, Moses, writeth farre otherwise, and in this manner. And SETH lived an hundred and fiue yeares, and begat ENOCH, and SETH lived after he begat ENOCH 807. yeare, and begat Sonnes and Daughters: so as all the dayes of SETH were 912. yeares, and he dyed. as for the yeares & times of the wicked, they were not numbred in libro viuentium, saith Cyril. But in Seth was the Church of God established, from whom Christ descended, as touching his manhood: and therefore this way and worke Moses walked in, & finished it with care, passing ouer the Reprobate Generation (as aforesaid.) Of the Line of Adam by Cain, Moses remembreth but eight Generations, reckoning Adam for one, and of the Line of Adam by Seth ten, counting Adam also therein, as followeth:

I. ADAM.

2	Cain.	7	Lameth, who by Ada had Iubal and Tubal, & by Silla Tubalcain, and Noëma.	2	Seth.	7	Henoch.
3	Henoch.			3	Enosh.	8	Methusalem.
4	Irad.	8		4	Cainan,	9	Lamech, and
5	Mahuiael.			5	Mahaleel.
6	Methusael.			6	Iared.	10	Noah.

These be the Generations of Adam by Cain, which the Scriptures mention: but Iosephus giueth vnto Lamech threescore and seuenteene Sonnes and Daughters, by his two Wiues Ada and Silla: and to these three sonnes of Lamech, Moses ascribeth the Inuention of Pastorage, of Musique, and the working in Metall; for it seemeth that Iubal first gathered together, and made familiar those beasts which formerly were vntamed, and
Gen. [illegible] 21. 22 brought them into Heards and Droues: Tubal inuented Musicke, and Tubalcain the working in Brasse and Iron: the one being addicted to Husbandry, the other was Mechanicall, the third giuen to Idlenesse and Pleasure. In whom began these three meaner degrees of Shepheards, Handy-crafts-men, and Musicians. And in the Issues of Seth began the Seruices of God, Diuinity, Prophecy, and Astronomy: the Children of the one beheld the Heauens, the other the Earth.

§. IV.

Of the diuersities in the Ages of the Patriarchs when they begat their Children.

A Second scruple hath beene made, How it came to passe that the Patriarchs begat their Children at so diuers Ages, as Cainan or Cenan at seuenty yeares, Mahaleel and Enoch at threescore and fiue yeares, whereas Iared begat not any of his vntill he was 162. yeares old: Mathusalem begat at 187. Lamech at 182. and Noah at 500. yeares. Now this difference hath bin the more enforced, because it cannot bee coniectured, that either Iared, Mathusalem or Lamech abstained from Marriage out of the religion of Abstinence, seeing that Enoch, who was translated by God for his singular Sanctities, begat children before he was threescore and ten yeares old.

The apparant difference hereof ariseth in this, that Moses did not number the Generations before the Floud precisely, according to the first begotten and eldest sons of the Patriarchs, but hee drew downe the Line of Noah from Seth, and afterward from Noah to Abraham, by their true Ancestors, were they elder or yonguer, as he found them: for it is likely that Henoch was not the eldest of Iared, nor Lamech the first-borne of Mathusalem, nor Noah of Lamech; neither is there any thing knowne to the contrary, but that Noah might haue had many Sonnes before Shem, Ham and Iaphet, though these three were only named, & surviuing, & which by God were reserued to be the Fathers of Mankind after the Floud; and therefore when we find Mahaleel to bee begotten by Kenan at threescore and ten yeares who was the first Sonne of Kenan, and then reckon that Mathusalem begat Lamech in the 187. year of his life, the difference seemeth strange, where Lamech is taken for the eldest. But Moses reiecteth all the other sonnes of Mathusalem but Lamech only, because hee was the Father of Noah as aforesaid. Of this

Saint

Saint Augustine hath somewhat else in his twentieth and one and twentieth Chapters, De Ciuitate Dei.

But as Moses counted the Generations of the first Age, & so to Abraham, and the children of the Promise after him, so doth Saint Matthew recite the Genealogy of Christ, not by the eldest sonnes, but from those whom God had chosen and blessed, without respect of the first-borne, who haue hereby the prerogatiue in Estates, worldly and transitory only; and therefore the Euangelist nameth Isaac, and not Ismael, though Ismael were first in time: so doth he take Iacob the yonguer, and not Esau the elder; neither is Christ deriued from any of the three eldest Patriarchs, Reuben, Simeon, or Leui, but from Iuda a fourth Brother, and so from Dauid a yonguer sonne of Iessai; and lastly, we find, that the kingdome it selfe of Iuda was not giuen to the Heire in Nature, but to the Heire of Grace, namely Salomon.

Mat. 1. 2.

1. Kings 2.

§. V.

Of the long liues of the Patriarchs: and some of late memory.

THe third Obiection is, that the great difference of yeeres betweene those of the first Age, whereof some of them had well neere seene a thousand yeares, makes it disputable, whether the accouut of times were of the same measure as in after-Ages, seeing, that soone after the Floud, men liued not a third part of that time, and in succeeding Ages and to this day, not the tenth.

They that haue hereon resolued that those yeares were but Lunary yeeres, (to wit) of a Moneth or thereabouts, or Egyptian yeares, are easily confuted. For whereas Seth begat Enosh in the yeare of his life an hundred and fiue, if those yeares bee taken but for Moneths, then had Seth liued but eight yeares, and one Moneth when hee begat Enosh: & if the time of Enosh haue the same allowance, when he begat Kenan, then could Enosh at that time haue beene but sixe yeares and forty eight weekes old; and so it may bee gathered of the rest, excepting only Adam, who was created perfect in his kind, as were the Trees in their kinde, bearing fruit and seed. But this were too ridiculous to imagine. For to giue an ability of Generation at sixe, seuen or eight years, agreeth with the short liues of the Pigmies, and not with the constitutions of our first Fathers, who being descended from Adam, the workmanship of Gods hands, and begotten and borne in the strong youth of the Word, and length of dayes and ability of body agreeable. Againe, if we allow this idle conceit of the Lunary yeares, then there would follow this extremity, that those which liued longest, and vpwards of nine hundred yeares, had by that account but the time of fourescore and ten and odde yeares; which were not only lesse by farre than the Patriarchs liued after the Floud, but short of many mens liues in this decrepit Age of the World, wherein many exceed fourescore, & some a hundred yeers. Further (if need be) to disproue this reckoning, whereas it is written, Gen. 25. That Abraham dyed in a good Age, an old man, and of great yeares: all which (if the former account were of Lunary yeares) makes but seuenteene and an halfe of our yeares.

Sol. Pol. hist. c. 3. Macrob. Satur. lib. 1. cap. 8. Plin. l. 7. c. 48.

And if we seeke for a cause of this long life in Nature, then is it reasonable, that the first man, created in highest perfection, should also beget Children of equall strength or little differing: for of the first & purest seed there must of necessity spring vp the fairest and fruitfullest plants. Secondly, the Earth it selfe was then much lesse corrupt, which yeelded her increase, and brought forth fruit and food for man, without any such mixture of harmefull quality, as since that time the Curse of God, for the cruelty of mans heart, brought on it and Mankinde: Neither had the Waters of the Floud infused such an impurity as thereby the naturall and powerfull operation of all Plants, Herbes, and Fruits vpon the Earth receiued a qualification and harmefull change. And as all things vnder the Sunne haue one time of strength, and another of weakenesse, a youth & beautie, and then age and deformity: so time it selfe (vnder the deathfull shade of whose wings all things decay and wither) hath wasted and worne out that liuely vertue of Nature in Man, and Beasts, and Plants; yea, the Heauens themselues being of a most pure and clensed matter, shall waxe old as a garment; and then much more the power generatiue in inferiour Creatures, who by the ordinance of God receiue operatiue Vertue from the superiour.

Psal. 102. v. 26.

But besides the old age of the World, how farre doth our education and simplicity of liuing differ from that old time? the tender bringing vp of Children, first fedde and nourished with the Milke of a strange Dugge; an vnnaturall curiosity hauing taught all Women (but the Beggar) to finde out Nurses, which necessity only ought to commend vnto them: The hasty Marriages in tender yeares, wherein, Nature being but yet green and growing, we rent from her & replant her branches, while her selfe hath not yet any root sufficient to maintaine her owne top; and such halfe-ripe seedes (for the most part) in their growing vp wither in the bud, & waxe old euen in their Infancy. But aboue all things the exceeding luxuriousnesse of this gluttonous Age, wherein we presse Nature with ouer-weighty burdens, and finding her strength defectiue, wee take the worke out of her hands, and commit it to the artificiall helpe of strong Waters, hot Spices, and prouoking Sawces; of which Lucan hath these elegant Verses:

Pharsal.4.

——O prodiga rerum
Luxuries nunquam paruo contenta paratu:
Et quæsitorum terra pelagoq; ciborum
Ambitiosa fames, & lauta gloria mensæ,
Discite quàm paruo liceat producere vitam:
Et quantum Natura petat.
Non auro myrrhâq; bibunt: sed gurgite puro
Vita redit: satis est populis fluuiusq; Cereq;.

O wastfull Riot neuer well content
With low-priz'd fare; hunger ambitious
Of Cates by Land and Sea far fetcht and sent:
Vaine glory of a Table sumptuous,
Learne with how little life may be preserued.
In Gold and Myrrhe they need not to carouse,
But with the Brooke the peoples thirst is serued:
Who fed with Bread and Water are not sterued.

Pier. Hierog. l.2. The Egyptians affirme, that the longest time of mans life is a hundred yeares, because the heart in a perfect body waxeth and groweth to strength fifty yeares, and afterwards by the same degree decayeth and withereth. Epigenes findeth in his Philosophy, that the life of man may reach to the period of an hundred and twenty yeares, and Berosus to a hundred and seuenteene yeares. These opinions Pliny repeateth and reproueth, producing many examples to the contrary. In the last taxation, number and reuiew of the eighth Region of Italy, there were found in the Roll (saith Pliny) foure & fifty persons Plin. l.7.c.29. of an hundred yeares of age: seuen & fifty of an hundred and ten: two, of an hundred & fiue & twenty: foure, of an hundred and thirty: as many that were an hundred & fiue & thirty, or a hundred & seuen and thirty years old: & last of all three men of an hundred and forty: and this search was made in the times of Vespasian the Father and the Son.

The simple dyet and temperate life of the Essæans gaue them long account of many years: so did it to the Secretaries of Egyptian Ceremonies, to the Persians Magicians & Ioseph. l.13.c.8 Plin. l.7.c.48. Indian Brachmans. The Greeks affirme out of Homer, that Nestor liued three Ages, & Tiresias six, Sybilla three hundred years, Endymion of the lesse Asia little lesse: Also Masanissa of Numidia liued very long, & Dando of Illyria. Among the kings of Arcadia many liued three hundred yeares (saith Ephorus.) Hellanicus affirmeth of the Epeians, that some of them liue full two hundred yeare; and so doth Diodorus Siculus of the Egyptians: & that these reports are not fabulous, Iosephus bringeth many witnesses with himselfe; as Marethon, Berosus, Mochus, Estius, Hieronymus, Ægyptius, Hecatæus, Ephorus, and others. And Anthony Fume, an Historian of good reputation reporteth, that in the yeare 1570. there was an Indian presented to Solyman, Generall of the Turkes Army, who had out-liued three hundred years. I my selfe knew the old Countess of Desmond of Inchiquin in Mũster, who liued in the yeare 1589. & many years since, who was marryed in Edward the Fourths time, & held her Ioynture from all the Earles of Desmond since then; and that this is true, all the Noblemen & Gentlemen of Munster can witnesse. Strozzius Cicogna, out of Torquemada Maffeus, and the like Authors, telleth of some that haue not onely far exceeded the terme prescribed by Epigenes; but been repayred from the withered estate of decrepit Age to fresh Youth. But for length of life, if wee note but the difference betweene the ability of men in those daies wherin Galen the Physician liued, it may easily proue vnto vs what Reeds we are in respect of those Cedars of the first Age. For Galen did ordinarily let bloud six pound weight, wheras we (for the most part) stop at six ounces. But to conclude this part, there are three things (not counting Constellations) which are the naturall causes of a long and healthfull life; (to wit) strong Parents, a pure and and thin Ayre, and temperate vse of dyet, pleasure, and rest: for those which are built of rotten timber, or mouldring stone, cannot stand long vpright; on Ayre we feed alwayes and in euery instant, and on meates but at times: and yet the heauie load of abundance, wherwith we oppresse & ouercharge Nature, maketh her to sinke vnawares in the mid-way; and therefore with a good constitution, a pure Aire, and a temperate vse of those things which Nature wanteth, are the only friends and companions of a long life.

§. VI.

Of the Patriarchs deliuering their knowledge by Tradition: and that ENOCH writ before the Floud.

A Fourth scruple hath beene made, How the certaine knowledge of the Creation came to Moses, seeing there was no Story thereof written; and if any such had beene, yet it is conceiued, that all memory of Antiquity perished in the Vniuersall Floud.

But if we consider the curiosity and policy of elder ages, we shall find, that knowledge was the greatest treasure that men sought for, and which they also couered and hid from the vulgar sort, as Iewels of inestimable price, fearing the irreuerent construction of the ignorant and irreligious: so as whatsoeuer was attained vnto concerning God, and his working in nature, the same was not left to publike dispute, but deliuered ouer by heart and tradition from wise men to a posterity equally zealous; Ex animo in animum sine literis, medio intercedente verbo: From minde to minde without Letters, by way of tradition or word of mouth. And it was thought by Esdras, Origen, and Hilarius, (as Mirandula conceiueth) that Moses did not onely vpon the Mount receiue the Law from God, but withall, secretiorem & veram legis enarrationem; a more secret and true explanation of the Law; which (saith he, out of the same Authors,) hee deliuered by mouth to Iosuah, and Iosuah to the Elders: For to teach these mysteries, which he called secretiora, to the rude multitude, were no other quàm dare sanctum canibus, & inter porcos spargere Margaritas, than to giue holy things to Dogges, and to cast Pearles before Swine. In succeeding times this vnderstanding and wisedome began to be written in Ciphers, and Characters, and Letters bearing the forme of beasts, birds, and other creatures; and to be taught onely to such as serued in their Temples, and to their Kings and Priests. Of the first the Cabala of the Iewes was an imitation: the inuention of the other is ascribed to Zoroaster, Mercurius, Cadmus, and others; but falsely. Dion. Arcop. Fol. 18.

This Cabala importeth a Law, receiued by tradition and vnwritten. Cabala in Hebrew is receptio in Latine, and a receiuing in English. And this custome was also held by the Druids & Bards of our ancient Brittans, & of later times by the Irish Chroniclers called Rimers. If then such as would seem wisest in the vse of reason, wil not acknowledge, that the story of the Creation, or beginning of all things, was written by inspiration, the holy Ghost guiding the hand of Moses; yet it is manifest, that the knowledge thereof might by tradition (then vsed) be deliuered vnto him by a more certaine presumption, than any or all the testimonies which prophane antiquity had preserued & left to their successors: which their wise men (as they terme them) did lay vp and defend from the iniury of the time and other hazzards. For, leauing to remember that Adam instructed Seth, and Seth his children and successors, which cannot be doubted of, it is manifest, that Methusalem liued together with Adam himselfe two hundred forty and three yeares, and Noah with Methusalem no lesse than fiue hundred yeares: and before Noah died, Abraham was fifty and eight yeares old; from whence this knowledge by an easie and ordinary way might come to Israel, and so to Moses. Cabala est scientia Theologiæ non reuelata, P. M. 82. Miran. 110. fol.

But besides this tradition, it is questionlesse, that the vse of letters was found out in the very infancy of the World, proued by those prophecies written on pillars of stone and bricke by Enoch: of which Iosephus affirmeth, that one of them remained euen in his time (meaning belike some ruine or foundation thereof) which pillars by others are ascribed to Seth. But of these prophecies of Enoch, Saint Iude testifieth; and some part of his Bookes (which contained the course of the Starres, their names and motions) were afterward found in Arabia fœlix, in the Dominion of the Queen of Saba (saith Origen) of which Tertullian affirmeth, that hee had seene and read some whole Pages. It is not therefore strange, that Moses came to the knowledge of the Creation, and story Ioseph. l. 1. Iud. Ep. v. 14. Origen. Homil. 1. in Num.

of the first Age, seeing he might receiue it both by tradition and letters, had not the Spirit of God instructed and inspired him as it did: which also his many and strange miracles (performed before he wrote the Scriptures) make more manifest.

Orig. Homil. 28. in Num. & Comment. in Euang. Ioan. Gelas. dist. 15. Now for the Bookes of Enoch, howsoeuer some men make question of them, sure I am that Tertullian, Origen, Augustine, Beda, Procopius, Gazeus, (with others) cite them in their writings: although Medina, for an argument to proue them vnwritten traditions, alleadgeth that Pope Gelasius among other the Apochryphall Scriptures (which he reiecteth) named not these of Enoch; but that whatsoeuer was remembred out of them, the same was deliuered by Tradition from the Iewes. But I rather thinke with Pererius, that such a Book there was, & that the same was corrupted after the death of the Apostles, & many things added thereunto by Heretikes, who tooke occasion vpon the antiquity therof, and out of that place of Michael contending with the Deuill about the body of Moses, to frame and adde thereunto many inuentions of their owne. One of the greatest arguments against these Bookes, is, that neyther Philo nor Iosephus (the most diligent searchers of Antiquity) make mention thereof. But against it I will set this opinion of Saint AVGVSTINE, Scripsisse quidem nonnulla diuina ENOCH, illum septimum ab ADAM, negare non possumus: That ENOCH, the seuenth from ADAM, did write diuers diuine things, we cannot deny. Now his writings which came afterwards to light, were suspected because of the antiquity, and of fables of Giants, supposed to be begotten of Angels, and others; and by so much the more, because no such Book was found amongst those Canonicall Scriptures, kept by the diligence of the Hebrew Priests in Armario Iudaico (saith Tertullian) who yet affirmeth that this Booke might be preserued by Noah. Surely, that Enoch wrote the prophecies remembred by Iude, no man can deny; how they were deliuered to posterity, I know not; whether by the Iewes Cabala, or by what other meanes, the same is but mans coniecture. And (certainely) by the knowledge ascribed to Noah of the motions of the Heauens, and of the natures and coniunctions of the Starres; and afterwards to some of his sonnes, to Zoroaster, and then to Abraham, it is very probable that Noah had seene and might preserue this Booke. For it is not likely, that so exquisite knowledge therein (as these men had) was suddenly inuented and found out, but left by Seth to Enoch, and by Enoch to Noah, as hath beene said before. And therefore if letters and arts were knowne from the time of Seth to Enoch, and that Noah liued with Methusalem, who liued with Adam, and Abraham liued with Noah, it is not strange (I say) to conceiue how Moses came to the knowledge of the first Age, be it by letters, or by Cabala & tradition, had the vndoubted word of God need of any other proofe than self-authority.

Tert. de habit. mulierum.

Hebr. 11. 5.

§. VII.

Of the men of renowne before the Flood.

NOw let vs consider the relation of Moses, who nameth seuen descents of Cains children, and of Adam by Seth ten: Seth being giuen by God in stead of Abel; and of Seth was Enosh begotten, in whose time men began to professe Religion, and to offer sacrifice in publique. For although Adam instructed his children in the knowledge of God their Creator, as appeared by the sacrifice offered by Cain and Abel; yet it seemeth that after the birth of Enosh men began publiquely to call on the name of the Lord, that is, they serued and praised God by Communion and in publique manner, or calling vpon the Name of the Lord; and thereby were the sonnes of God or the godly distinguished from the wicked. From the birth of Enosh the sonne of Seth, to the time of Henoch the sonne of Iared, there is nothing remembred by Moses, but their owne births, the birthes of their sonnes, the length of their liues, and deaths. But of Henoch it is written, That hee walked with God, and hee was no more seene: for God tooke him away. By that, that he walked with God, was meant, that hee was a iust and vpright man, and that he feared, loued, and obeyed God. For the same phrase Moses vseth of Noah; NOAH was a iust and vpright man in his time, and NOAH walked with God. The Seuenty conuert it, ENOCH placuit Deo; ENOCH pleased God. And although Aben-Ezra and others vnderstand this place, (tulit eum Deus) scilicet, mortuus est; God tooke him away, (that is) hee dyed, which (indeede) agreeth both with the phrase of the Scripture, and with our manner of speech to this day, to say, God tooke him away, when he dyed; yet the difference which Moses maketh betweene the piety of Henoch, and the rest of the Patriarchs, triarchs, and by omitting the word (death) which he vseth to all elſe, makes it manifeſt, that Henoch was not diſſolued as the reſt. For to all the reſt of the Patriarchs, Moſes vſeth theſe words, And he dyed; but of Henoch he ſpake otherwiſe, ſaying onely, He was miſſing, or he was not ſeene. Et non inueniebatur (ſaith the Apoſtle to the Hebrewes) quia Deus eum tranſtulit; And he was not found, for the Lord tooke him away. In the ſame place it is expreſly added, that he ſaw not death.

Gen. 5. 24.

But whether this taking away of Henoch were not with the ſame kinde of changing, which S. Paul promiſeth, when he ſaith, that when the end ſhall come, wee ſhall not all dye, but all ſhall be changed, I leaue it to the learned Diuines. 1. Cor. 15. 51.

After Henoch, Moſes paſſeth ouer to Mathuſalem and Lamech, remembring (as of the reſt) the times of their birth and death: ſauing that Lamech propheſied of his ſonne Noah, ſaying, This ſame ſhall comfort vs concerning our worke, and ſorrow of our hands, as touching the earth which the Lord hath curſed. Of Noah, Moſes writeth more amply than of any of the reſt of Adams children by Seth, being the laſt of the ten generations of the firſt Age, whom God (with his Family) preſerued, becauſe he was an vpright man in his time, and feared God. Gen. 5. 29. Gen. 6. 9.

But of the warre, peace, gouernement, and policy of theſe ſtrong and mighty men, ſo able both in body and wit, there is no memory remaining: whoſe ſtories if they had bin preſerued, and what elſe was then performed in that newneſſe of the World, there could nothing of more delight haue been left to poſterity. For the exceeding long liues of men (who to their ſtrength of body and naturall wits, had the experience added of 800. and 900. yeares) how much of neceſſity muſt the ſame adde of wiſedome and vndertakings? Likely it is, that their workes excelled all whatſoeuer can be told of after-times, eſpecially in reſpect of this old age of the World, when wee no ſooner begin to know, but we begin to die; according to HIPPOCRATES: Vita breuis, ars longa, tempus præceps; (which is) Life is ſhort, art is long, and time is headlong. And that thoſe people of the firſt age performed many things worthy admiration, it may be gathered out of theſe words of MOSES; Theſe were mighty men, which in old time were men of renowne. But theſe men of renowne (whom the Scripture afterwards calleth Giants, both for ſtrength of body, and cruelty of mind) truſted ſo much to their owne abilities, as they forgat altogether the piety of Seth, and the waies wherein Henoch walked: for all the imaginations of their hearts were euill, onely euill, and continually euill. And this wickedneſſe was not only found in the iſſues of Cain, but it was then vniuerſall, when the children & ſons of God (or of the godly) were corrupted and miſ-led by their idolatrous wiues, the daughters of Cain, or of thoſe other men, louing themſelues and the world only. Aphor. 1. Gen. 6. 4. Verſ. 5.

That theſe ſonnes of God were Angels, which being taken with the beauty of women, accompanied them and begat Giants, ſome of the Fathers ſuppoſed, namely, Lanctantius, and Euſebius, miſ-led by Ioſephus: of whom I cannot doubt, but that they afterward changed their former opinions. And of this miſtaking many Writers haue taken great aduantage, and haue troubled themſelues with large anſwers, and very needeleſſe: the queſtion being vncapable of diſpute, eſpecially ſince S. Chryſoſtome and S. Auguſtine haue anſwered it largely long agoe. For, that good and godly men were honoured with the title of Gods children, it doth euery where appeare in the Scripture; & on the contrary, to thinke that Angels, who (as Chriſt witneſſeth) behold the face of God, (that is) alwaies attend his commandements, ſhould after a ſeparation from the reſt which fel with Lucifer, forſake the glorious preſence of their Creatour, and become Incubi, or Succubi, contrary both to Nature and Grace, were more than madneſſe to imagine. Gen. 6. v. 4.

§. VIII.

That the Giants by MOSES ſo called, were indeed men of huge bodies: & alſo diuers in later times.

OF theſe Giants which Moſes calleth mighty men, Georgius Becanus an Antuerpian (who thought his owne wit more Giganticall than the bodies of Nimrod or Hercules) hath written a large diſcourſe, intituled Gigantomachia, and ſtrayned his braines to proue, that there were neuer any ſuch men: his reaſons (whoſoeuer deſires to loſe time) he may finde them in the Treatiſes before named. It is true that Cyrillus reproues the Grecians Poets for their monſtrous fictions: who affirme ſhamelеſly,

That

That the Giants haue in elder times not onely cast vp Mountaines vpon Mountaines, but remoued Ilands out of the Sea, with like fooleries. And for that inuention of casting vp Hils, and making warre with the gods, no doubt but that the same was borrowed out of the story of Nimrod, as before remembred; and euen out of this Scripture, That the Sonnes of God saw the Daughters of Men, of whom the first Giants were begotten, was that conceit taken of Orpheus and Hesiodus, That Giants were the sonnes of the Heauen and the Earth; meaning by the Heauens the sonnes of God, and by the Earth the daughters of Men: which verses of Orpheus are by Iohn Cassan (who hath written a witty discourse of this subiect) thus changed into Latine:

Nomine cælestes illos dixêre Gigantes,
Orti quòd terrâ fuerint & sanguine cæli.
From the Earth, and from thy bloud, O heauen, they came,
Whom thereupon the gods did Giants name.

But what will not Opiniators and selfe-beleeuing men dispute of, and make doubt of, if they cannot conceine that there were in the first Age such kind of men; and of which there haue beene in all times since; seeing the Scriptures auow the one manifestly, and common experience the other?

And for that superlatiue strayning of words, and the meaning of them, that the name of Giants was giuen to Oppressors and Tyrants, and not to strength of body and eminent stature: such men might with better reason cal them Oppressors, because they were Giants; and therfore had ability to oppresse, than say, That they were called Gians only, because Oppressors. For first, Moses himselfe calleth them mighty men; which sheweth a strength surpassing others: and afterwards, men of renowne, (that is) of great vndertaking and aduenterous action. And if the same stature of body, and ability had not beene found among diuers Nations after the generall floud, then might this place of Moses haue more willingly hearkened to a dispute, and yeelded to interpretation.

But besides all these famous Giants found in prophane Histories (which I will reserue to accompany the Giants of Albion, in the story of Britanie) the Scriptures doe cleerly and without all allegoricall construction auow, That, besides Nimrod, there were found
Gen.14.5. of these Giants in the time of Abraham, of Moses, of Iosua, and of Dauid; namely, the Num.13.34. Rephaims in Asteroth; the Zuzæi or Zanzummims in Ham, and the Emims which Deut.2.v.21,20 dwelt anciently in the Land of Moab: whom Moses (for stature) compareth with the Anakims which dwelt in Hebron; for they also were taken for giants as the Anakims: Likewise where Moses speaketh of the Land of Ammon hee vseth these words: That also was Verse 21. taken for a land of Giants, for Giants dwelt therein afore-times: &, whom the Ammonites call Zamzummims: a people that was great, and many, and tall as the Anakims. And these Giants
Amos 1. called Rephaims in Asteroth and Karnaim, & the Zuzæi or Zanzummims, Chedorlaomer king of Elam ouerthrew, assisted by other kings his associates. Also the Prophet Amos found among the Ammonites men of giant-like stature, whom he compareth to the Ce-
Bar.3.v.26. dar, & whose strength to the Okes; and the Prophet BARVCH, These were the Giants famous from the beginning, that were of so great stature, and so expert in warre. Particularly it
Deut.3.v.11. is written of Og, king of Basan, that his bed of yron was nine cubits long, and foure cubits broad: for only Og king of Basan remained of the remnant of the Giants, who commanded the Kingdome of Basan, foure hundred yeares after the Expedition of Chedorlaomer. Moreouer, those Discouerers and Searchers of the Land of Promise (sent by Moses from Cadesbarne in Paran) made report at their returne of the great stature of those
Num.13.v.34. people in generall, and especially of the sonnes of Anak, in these words: All the people which we saw in it are men of great stature: for there we saw Giants, the sons of ANAK, which come of the Giants, so that we seemed in our sights like Grasse-hoppers, and so wee were in their sight, (that is) the Searchers found in their owne iudgements a maruellous difference between the Anakims and themselues: insomuch that the Israelites were so stricken with Iap.14.4. feare, as they rather sought and desired to return againe into Egypt, and were more willing to endure their former slauery, than to fall by the strokes of those fearfull Nations.
1.Sam.17.4. Furthermore, the Scriptures, put vs out of doubt, that Goliah the Philistine of Gath, was a Giant of sixe cubits & a span long: the Armour which he wore weighed fiue thousand shickles of brasse: the shaft of his speare was like a Weauers beame, and his speare-head of another Goliah, surnamed Gethæus, because he was of Gath: and of three other Giants; of which the first was slaine by Iehonathan, Dauids Nephew, who had twelue fingers, and as many toes: a man of great stature, and his fingers were by sixes, euen foure & twenty. 1. Chron. 20. 21.
2.Sam.21.v.19. weighed sixe hundred shickles of yron. Also in Samuel there is mention of another Goliah

Also that Sampson was of surpassing strength, no man doubteth, who tore a Lion as it had beene a Kid, and after slue thirty of the Philistines, & (after that) a thousand more of them with a Iaw-bone of an Asse: And lastly, hee tooke the gates of Azzah, and the two Posts, and lifted them away with the barres, and put them vpon his shoulders, and carried them to the top of the Mountaine before Ebron. If then it be approued by euery iudgement, that both Nature and the Heauens waxe old, and that the great age of Time hath (with it selfe) infeebled and almost worne out the vertue of all things, then, I say, That as in all other kindes the Earth (before that Sinne had increased the curse and corruption) brought forth her yongue ones more strong and beautifull, than it did in after-ages: so also those Giants, those mighty men, and men of renowne, as far exceeded the proportion, nature, and strength of those Giants, remembred by Moses of his own time, and after him their successors, as the ordinary proportion of all men in generall, soon after the floud and in times farre off, exceeded the bulkes and bodies of men which are now borne in the withered quarter and Winter of the World. If therefore Giants were common in the third and fourth age, much more in the first flourishing youth and newnesse of the world. Iud. 14. 6. 14. 19. 16. 3.

But the wickednesse (especially in cruelty and oppression) of these men was such, as God therfore by the floud gaue end to all flesh, but to the iust Noah and his Family. And God repented him that hee had made man: which S. Augustine thus expoundeth; Neq; enim sicut hominem, ita Deum fallit sui pœnitet, cuius est de omnibus omnino rebus tam fixa sententia, quam certa præscientia. Sed si non vtatur Scriptura talibus verbis, non se quodammodo familiarius insinuabit omni generi hominum, quibus vult esse consultum: vt & perterreat superbientes, & excitet negligentes, & exerceat quærentes, & alat intelligentes; God (saith he) doth not repent him of any thing which he hath done: (as men vse to doe) but if the Scripture did not vse those words or the like, it should not (in a sort) insinuate it selfe familiarly to all sorts of men, for whom it would prouide: that it might terrifie the proud, stirre vp the negligent, exercise the searchers of truth, and nourish those that vnderstand. Gen. 6. 6. De Ciuit. Dei, l. 15. c. 25.

CHAP. VI.

Of idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the world: and of the Reliques of Truth touching these ancient times, obscurely appearing in Fables and old Legends.

§. I.

That in old corruptions we may finde some signes of more ancient truth.

HEre before we proceede any further, the occasion offereth it selfe for vs to consider, how the Greekes and other more ancient Nations, by fabulous inuentions, and by breaking into parts the Story of the Creation, and by deliuering it ouer in a mysticall sense, wrapping it vp mixed with other their owne trumpery, haue sought to obscure the truth thereof; and haue hoped, that after-ages, being thereby brought into many doubts, might receiue those inter-mixt discourses of God and Nature, for the inuentions of Poets & Philosophers, and not as any thing borrowed or stolne out of the Bookes of God. But as a skilfull and learned Chymist can aswell by separation of visible elements draw helpfull medicines out of poyson, as poyson out of the most healthfull hearbs & plants (all things hauing in themselues both life and death) so, contrary to the purposes and hopes of the Heathen, may those which seeke after God and Truth, find out euery-where, and in all the ancient Poets and Philosophers, the Story of the first Age, with all the works and maruailes thereof, amply and liuely expreſt.

§. II.

That the corruptions themselues were very ancient: as in the Family of NOAH, and in the old Egyptians.

BVt this defection and falling away from God, which was first found in Angels, and afterwards in Men (the one hauing erred but once, the other euer) as concerning mankinde it tooke such effect, that thereby (the liberall grace of God being with-drawne) all the posterity of our first Parents were afterwards borne and bred in a world, suffering a perpetuall Eclipse of spirituall light. Hence it was that it produced plants of such imperfection and harmfull quality, as the waters of the generall floud could not so wash out or depure, but that the same defection hath had continuance in the very generation and nature of mankind. Yea, euen among the few sonnes of Noah, there were found strong effects of the former poyson. For as the children of Sem did inherite the vertues of Seth, Enoch and Noah; so the sonnes of Cham did possesse the vices of the sonnes of Cain, and of those wicked Giants of the first Age. Whence the Chaldæans began soone after the floud to ascribe diuine power and honour to the Creature, which was onely due to the Creatour. First, they worshipped the Sunne, and then the fire. So the Egyptians and Phœnicians did not onely learne to leaue the true God, but created twelue seuerall gods, and diuine powers, whom they worshipped, and vnto whom they built Altars and Temples. For Herodotus saith, Duodecim Deorum nomina primos Ægyptios in vsu habuisse, atque Græcos ab illis accepisse mutuatos, eosq; prius Aras, & Imagines, & Templa Dijs sibi erexisse. The Egyptians (saith he) first deuised the names of the twelue gods, which the Greekes receiued from them, who first erected vnto themselues Altars, Images, and Temples for the gods.

Herodin Euterpe.

§. III.

That in processe of time these lesser errours drew on greater: as appeareth in the grosse Superstitions of the Egyptians.

BVt as men once fallen away from vndoubted truth, doe then after wander for euermore in vices vnknowne, and daily trauaile towards their eternall perdition: so did these grosse and blinde Idolaters euery Age after other descend lower and lower, and shrinke and slide downwards from the knowledge of one true & very God; and did not thereby erre in worshipping mortall men onely, but they gaue diuine reuerence, and had the same respect to Beasts, Birds, Fishes, Fowles, Windes, Earth, Water, Ayre, Fire, to the Morning, to the Euening, to Plants, Trees and Rootes, to Passions and Affections of the Minde, to Paleneſſe, Sickneſſe, Sorrowes, yea to the most vnworthy and baſeſt of all these. Which barbarous blasphemy, Rhodius Anaxandrides derideth in this manner:

Nat. Com. l. 1. cap. 7.

Bouem colis, ego Deis macto bouem.
Tu maximum Anguillam Deum putas: ego
Obsoniorum credidi suauissimum.
Carnes suillas tu caues, at gaudeo
Hijs maximè: canem colis, quem verbero
Edentem vbi deprehendo fortè obsonium.

I sacrifice to God the Beefe, which you adore.
I broyle the Egyptian Eeles, which you (as god) implore:
You teare to eate the flesh of Swine, I finde it sweet.
You worship Dogges, to beate them I thinke meet,
When they my store deuoure.

And in this manner IVVENAL.

Porrum aut cepe nefas violare aut frangere morsu:
O sanctas gentes, quibus hæc nascuntur in hortis Numina!

The Egyptians thinke it sinne to roote vp, or to bite
Their Leekes or Onyons, which they serue with holy rite
O happy Nations, which of their owne sowing Haue store of gods in euery Garden growing!

§. IIII.

That from the reliques of ancient Records among the Egyptians and others, the firſt Idols and Fables were inuented: and that the firſt IVPITER was CAIN, VVLCAN, TVBALCAIN, &c.

BVt in ſo great a confuſion of vanities, where among the Heathens themſelues there is no agreement or certainty, it were hard to find out from what example the beginnings of theſe inuentions were borrowed, or after what ancient patterne they erected their building, were it not certaine, that the Egyptians had knowledge of the firſt Age, and of whatſoeuer was done therein, partly from ſome inſcriptions vpon ſtone or metall remaining after the Floud; and partly from Mizraim the ſon of Cham, who had learnt the ſame of Cham, and Cham of his father Noah: for all that the Egyptians write of their ancient Kings, & date of times, cannot be fayned. And though other Nations after them had by imitation their Iupiters alſo, their Saturnes, Vulcans, & Mercuries, with the reſt, which S. Auguſtine out of Varro; Euſebius out of many prophane Hiſtories; Cicero, Diodorus Siculus, Arnobius, and many more haue obſerued, to wit the Phœnicians, Phrygians, Cretians, Greeks, and other Nations; yet was Cain the ſonne of Adam (as ſome very learned men conceiue) called and reputed for the firſt and ancient Iupiter; and Adam for the firſt Stature: for Iupiter was ſaid to haue inuented the founding of Cities; and the firſt Citie of the World was built by Cain, which he called Enoch, of whom were the Henochij before remembred. And ſo much may be gathered out of Plato in Protagoræ, which alſo Higinus in his 275. Chapter confirmeth. For beſides that many Cities were founded by diuers men; Tamen primam latiſsimam à primo & antiquiſsimo IOVE ædificatam: yet the firſt and largeſt was built by the firſt and moſt ancient IVPITER, ſeated in the Eaſt parts, or in India, according to that of MOSES: And CAIN dwelt towards the Eaſt ſide of Eden, &c. where alſo the Henochij were found after the Floud. And therfore was Iupiter by the Athenians called Polieus, a Founder of Cities; and Herceios, an incloſer or ſtrengthener of Cities; (ſay Phornutus and Pauſanias) and that to Iupiter Herceios there were in very many places Altars and Temples erected. And that there were Cities built before the Floud, Plato alſo witneſſeth, as may be gathered in this his affirming, that ſoone after mankind began to increaſe, they built many Cities; which, as his meaning, he deliuereth in plaine termes, in his third Booke of Lawes: for he ſaith, that Cities were built an exceeding ſpace of time before the deſtruction by the great Floud.

This firſt Iupiter of the Ethnickes was then the ſame Cain, the ſonne of Adam, who marrying his owne Siſter (as alſo Iupiter is ſaid to haue done) inhabited the Eaſt, where Stephanus de vrbibus placeth the Citie Henochia. And beſides this Citie of Henoch, Philo Iudæus conceiueth that Cain built ſixe others, as Maich, Iared, Tebe, Ieſta, Selet and Gebat: but where Philo had this I know not. Now as Cain was the firſt Iupiter, and from whom alſo the Ethnicks had the inuention of Sacrifice: ſo were Iubal, Tubal and Tubalcain (inuentors of Paſtorage, Smiths-craft, and Muſick) the ſame, which were called by the ancient prophane Writers, Mercurius, Vulcan, and Apollo; and as there is a likelyhood of name betweene Tubalcain and Vulcan: ſo doth Auguſtine expound the name of Noema or Naamath, the ſiſter of Tubalcain, to ſignifie Venuſta, or beautifull, Voluptas, or pleaſure; as the wife of Vulcan is ſaid to be Venus, the Ladie of pleaſure and beautie. And as Adam was the ancient and firſt Saturne, Cain the eldeſt Iupiter, Eua, Rhea, and Nemea or Naamath the firſt Venus: ſo did the Fable of the diuiding of the World betweene the three Brethren the Sonnes of Saturne, ariſe from the true Storie of the diuiding of the Earth betweene the three Brethren the Sonnes of Noah: ſo alſo was the Fiction of thoſe Golden Aples kept by a Dragon, taken from the Serpent, which tempted Euah: ſo was Paradiſe it ſelfe tranſported out of Aſia into Africa, and made the Garden of the Heſperides: the prophecies, that Chriſt ſhould breake the Serpents head, & conquer the power of Hell, occaſioned the Fables of Hercules killing the Serpent of Heſperides, and deſcending into Hell, and captiuating Cerberus: ſo out of the taking vp of Henoch by God, was borrowed the conuerſion of their Heroes (the inuentors of Religion, and ſuch Arts as the life of man had profit by) into Starres and Heauenly Signes, and (withall) that leauing of the World, and aſcenſion of Aſtræa; of which Ouid:

For although thereby the Ethnicks would vnderstand Iustice it selfe to haue sayled, as it is a vertue abstract, and may bee considered without a person, yet as it is vsuall among the ancient Poets to describe Vertues and Vices by the persons of men and women, as Desire by Cupid, Valour by Mars, Beautie or Lust by Venus; so doe they also the persons of Men by like Vertues and Vices: and therefore by Iustice and Astraea, Enoch; the iustice and pietie of Enoch being in the same manner exprest, as that of Noah was by Moses: for Noah was said to be a iust man; And NOAH walked with God. And of Enoch it is written, That hee walked with God, and hee was no more seene: for God tooke him away.

Gen. 7.
Gen. 5. 22. 24.

From this storie also of the first Age, and from that part where Moses remembreth the Giants begotten by the sonnes of good men vpon the daughters of the wicked (whom Moses calleth mightie men, and men of renowne) did they steale those wondrous great acts of their ancient Kings, and powerfull Giants; and againe their warre vndertaken against the gods, from the building of the Tower of Babel by the Giant Nimrod, as Saint Augustine termeth him. Which warre of their Giants, Cornelius Severus thus describeth:

L. de Ciuit. Dei.

Tentauêre (nefas) olim detrudere mundo
Sydera, captiuiq. IOVIS transferre Gigantes
Imperium, & victo leges imponere cœlo.

The Giants did aduance their wicked hand
Against the Starres, to thrust them headlong downe;
And robbing Ioue of his Imperiall Crowne,
On conquered Heauens to lay their proud command.

Whereby was meant that Nimrod purposed to raise the building of Babel to that height, as God neither by drawing waters from the deepe, nor by any coniunction of the starres, should bury them vnder the moysture of a second Floud, but that by this building (if they had beene herein victorious) they would haue giuen the Law to Heauen it selfe. Also the making of leagues, peace and couenants among Heathen Nations and Kings, confirmed by sacrifice, whereof Virgil both in the eighth and twelfth of his Æneides hath a touch, was (as it seemeth) borrowed from Moses, Exod. 24. who when he read the Booke of the Couenant, sprinkled the people with bloud.

Iosep. l. 1. contra Appian.

We find also many remembrances of Seth, the paternall Ancestor of Henoch and Noah: for Amenophis, the same King of Ægypt, which reigned at such time as Moses carried thence the children of Israel, (as of late some learned men, mistaking his time, supposed) called his sonne and successour Setho, of Seth: and of the same Seth (as many men of good iudgement haue granted) were the Princes of Thrace, called Seuthes, whereof there were many very famous. But herein was the memorie of Seth most manifestly preserued, that the Ægyptians worshipped Seth, as their most ancient parent, and of the first tradition: in honour of whom they called a principall Prouince Setheitica. We also finde in Bithynia the Citie of Sethia, and others of the same name elsewhere. And sure, from the Ægyptians did the Græcians borrow this kinde of Theologie, though they scorned to acknowledge any antiquitie preceding their owne: and that they might not seeme to learne elsewhere, they gaue the same names to their owne Idols, which the Ægyptians did to theirs.

§. V.

Of the three chiefest IVPITERS; and the strange storie of the third.

BVt of all those armies of Iupiters remembred by the Ancients, Cicero maketh but three, because those were of most fame: which other Writers haue also done, who fought out, and laboured in their originals.

The first was Iupiter, the sonne of Æther and Dies, so called, because the one had reference to his celestiall conditions (for æther is as much as shining or pure fire;) the other discouered his naturall vertues; which dayes and times make more perfect, and are the witnesses of mens actions.

The second was said to be the sonne of Cœlum or Heauen, for the same former respect; and this Iupiter was an Arcadian, and King of Athens.

The

The third, of whom all the Grecian fables were deuiſed, was of Crete (now Candie) the ſonne of Saturne and Ops. The name deriued from the Latine is taken of Iuuans Pater, from the Greeke word Zeus; it ſignifieth life, but ſomewhat ſtrayned. Boccas in his Genealogie of the gods, conceiueth, that his name was borrowed from Iupiter the Planet; but whether that ſtarre had ſuch a name, before the ſame was giuen to men, I know not. Iupiter is hot and moiſt, temperate, modeſt, honeſt, aduenturous, liberall, mercifull, louing, and faithfull, (that is) giuing theſe inclinations. And therefore thoſe ancient Kings beautified with theſe conditions, might be called thereafter Iupiter; but howſoeuer they were, or were not with thoſe vertues enriched, yet, by imitation, all Kings, in the eldeſt times aſſumed thoſe Titles and Sir-names: great Princes affecting as high Titles of honour and reputation in the world, (howſoeuer deſerued) as the worthyeſt, that euer were, acquired by their well deſeruings. Ioues omnes Reges vocârunt antiqui; The Ancients called all Kings Iupiters, as Tzetzes in his Varia hiſtoria confirmeth: Reges olim IOVES vocârunt omnes; In old times all Nations called their Kings Iupiters. But where this laſt and moſt remembred Iupiter was borne, it is vncertaine. Some there are that make him of Crete: others, that hee was but ſent thither by his mother Ops or Opis, to be foſtered and hidden from the furie of Titan his vncle: becauſe it was conditioned betweene Saturne and Titan, that Saturne being a younger brother, and reigning (for his owne life) by Titans permiſſion, hee ſhould put to death all his male children, leſt the Titans might be interrupted by any of them in their ſucceſſion; which agreement, becauſe Saturne performed in his firſt borne, it is fayned that Saturne deuoured his owne children. Hereof Lycophron, thus turned into Latine; Nat. com. l. 1. c. 7

Haud ſit pinguior, | Saturne to be the fatter, is not knowne,
Crudis ſepulchrum quòd ſit ipſe filijs. | By being the graue and buriall of his owne.

This compoſition betweene Titan and Saturne, Sybilla alſo witneſſeth in theſe;

Conceptis verbis; TITAN iurare coegit
SATVRNVM, de ſe natum ne nutriat vllum,
Quo poſſint regnare ſenij poſt fata Nepotes.
Things thus agreed: Titan made Saturne ſweare
No ſonne to nouriſh; which by reigning might Vſurp the right of Titans lawfull heire.

But Opis the mother of Iupiter, being deliuered at once both of Iupiter and Iuno, conueyed Iupiter (firſt called Lyſanias) into Crete, as ſhee did afterwards his two brothers, Neptune and Pluto: where he was brought vp in Gnoſſus, the chiefe Citie of that Iland, by Creſta the King, or by the Curetes, a people and nation thereof. Euſeb. in Temp.

Other challenge him to be of Thebes and a Thebane: others call him an Arcadian: others make him of Meſſena. The like contention is found among the Greekes touching his education and firſt foſtering. Some affirme, that he was fed by Hony-bees: in recompence whereof he changed their blacke coats and skins into yellow; a reward well fitting ſuch a god: others, that he was nouriſhed by Beares: others, by Goates: and of all theſe the idle Greekes haue many pretty tales. But in the end when Titan had knowledge, that Saturne had broken his faith, he ſet on him, and tooke him & his wife priſoners, whom Iupiter againe reſcued and deliuered.

But laſtly, the father and the ſonne equally ambitious, the one doubted the other. Saturne being the leſſe powerfull, fled into Italie, & left his Kingdomes in Greece to his ſonne. And although this Prince at the firſt purchaſed great honour, and for his many vertues the name of Iupiter was giuen him; yet, after hee vvas once ſetled and became potent, he gaue himſelfe ouer wholly to palliardize and adulterie, without all reſpect of Honour, Law, or Religion. And it is reported by ſuch as doe aſcribe the actions of many to one Iupiter, that not therewith ſatisfied, hee was afterwards knowne to offend in the ſinne of Sodome with Ganimedes and others; and did not onely begin with inceſt, marrying his owne ſiſter Iuno, but he rauiſhed, betrayed, ſtole away, and tooke by ſtrong hand all the beautifull women borne in his time, within the limits of his owne Kingdomes, or bordering them. Among whom theſe hereafter written, were of greateſt fame; Niobe, Laodemia, and Alcmena, the wife of Amphitryon, by whome hee had Pelaſgus, Sarpedon, Argus, and Hercules: by Taygete he had Taygetus; of whom the Mountaine Taygetus tooke name, with another ſonne called Saon, of whom Saonia:

by Antiope he had Amphion and Zetus: by Leda, Castor and Pollux, Helen and Clytemnestra: by Danae, Perseus: by Iordana, Deucalion: by Charme (the daughter of Eubulus) Britomartis: by Protogenia, he had Athlius the father of Endymion: and by Io (the daughter of Inachus) Epaphus, the founder of Memphis in Egypt: which Epaphus married Libya, of whom that Countrey tooke name, for so the Greekes afterward called Africa. He rauished Aegina the daughter of Aesopus, and carryed her into the Iland Oenopia or Oenotria, afterward called Aegina, on whom he begat Aeacus: by Torrhebia he had Archesilaus and Carbius: by Ora, Colaxes: hee had also Dardanus by Electra, who built Dardanium, afterward Ilium and Troy. He begat the brothers Talici, on Thalia, and on Garamantis, Hiarbas. He had besides these (if they belye not their chiefe God) Phileus and Pilumnus, inuenters of the Bakers craft; and I know not how many more; but I know well that he could not be father to all these, who were borne in ages so farre differing. And of these his seuerall rauishments, betrayings, stealing away of mens wiues, daughters, and sonnes, buying of virgins, and the like, came in all those ancient fables of his transformations into showres of gold, eagles, buls, birds, and beasts; and of him, and by him (in effect) all that rabble of Gracian forgeries. And yet did not the Greekes and Romans feare to entitle this Monster, Optimus Maximus, though Cicero in his second Booke, de natura Deorum, affirme, that hee deserued nothing lesse; and in his Oration, pro domo sua, reprocheth Clodius for his incest, by the name of Iupiter. His buriall was in Crete (saith Lucian.) Cretenses non solùm natum apud se & sepultum Iouem testantur, sed etiam sepulchrum eius ostendunt; The Cretians or Candians doe not onely auow that Iupiter was borne and buried among them, but they shew his graue and sepulchre: which Epiphanius also confirmeth, for in his time there remayned the monuments of his tombe in the Mountaine Iasius. This Callimachus in his hymnes also witnesseth, but, as offended thereat, saith thus:

Luc in Sacrif.

The Cretians euer lyars were, they care not what they say:
For they a tombe haue built for thee, O King, that liu'st alway.

Diodorus Siculus tels by way of report from the Libyan fables, confirmed (as hee saith) by some Greeke Writers, that the originall of these gods was from the Westerne parts of Africa. For there among the Atlantida reigned one Vranus (which signifieth Heauen) called so for his great skill in Astrologie, and for his knowledge, and benefits to the people, honoured by them as a god after his death. He had by many wiues 45. sons; but by his principall wife Titea, he had seuenteene sonnes and two daughters, all which were called after their mothers name the Titanes. Of Titea, likewise it is said, that shee for her goodnesse was canonized as a goddesse, being dead, and called the Earth, as her husband was stiled Heauen. But of all the children of Titea, her daughter Basilea (which name sounding as Queene in English, shee is by the Latine translator of Diodorus called Regina) excelling the rest as farre in vertue as in yeares, was by generall consent of her brethren, and of the people, appointed to rule as Queene after her fathers death, being as yet a Virgin. Shee tooke to husband her brother Hyperion, to whom shee bare a sonne and a daughter, called Sunne and Moone. The beautie and towardlinesse of these children mooued her brethren to enuy, & bred in them a feare of being excluded from the succession: wherefore they tooke the boy and drowned him in the Riuer Eridanus, now called Poe. The losse of this child caused his sister to breake her owne necke; and the losse of both her children made the mother to play many mad pranks, dancing with Cymbals, after a wilde fashion, in sight of all the people, before whom shee is said to haue vanished away. Ere shee dyed, her sonne (as the fable hath it) signified vnto her in a dreame, that hee and his sister, by the prouidence of God, should become immortall, that also the Sunne and Moone should bee called by their names, and that their death should bee reuenged vpon the murderers. According to which it is said, that the people did so call those two Planets, and vvithall held her selfe as a goddesse, and termed her the great Mother, vvhich name they had formerly giuen to her, for her motherly care in cherishing her brethren vvhilest they were young. Hyperion and his Race being extinguished, the other sonnes of Vranus diuided the Kingdome. Of these Atlas and Saturne were chiefe. Atlas reigned ouer the countries lying about the Mountaines, which afterward bare his name; a iust and wise Prince, deepely skilfull in Astrologie, and for inuention of the Spheare, said to haue supported Heauen.

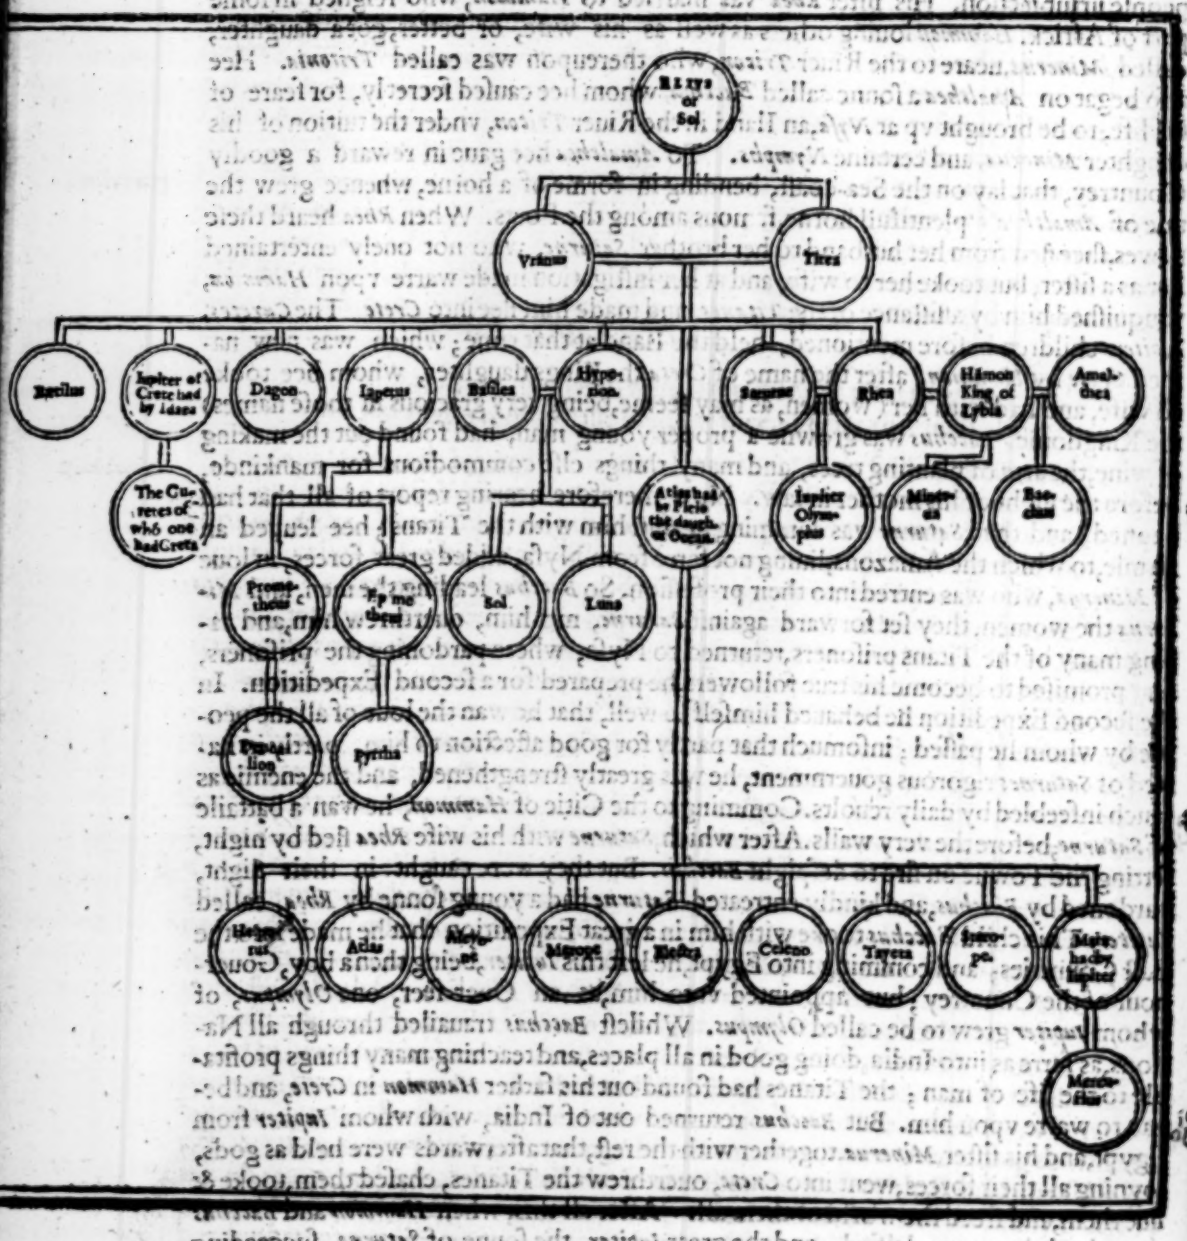
Diod. Lib. 5.

He

He had many sonnes; but the principall of them called Hesperus, being of his fathers qualities and studies, was said to haue beene carried away by the winde, from the top of an high Hill in the midst of his contemplations; and his name in honour of him, imposed by the people vpon the morning starre. The seuen daughters of Atlas were also said to haue beene excellent Ladies, who accompanying such as came to be Deified, or registred among the Worthies, brought forth children, answerable in qualitie to those that begat them. Of these it is held, that the seuen starres called Pleiades tooke name. Saturne, the brother of Atlas, reigned in Sicilia, part of Africk, and Italie. Iupiter, another of the sonnes of Vranus, reigned in Crete; who had ten sonnes which he called Curetes; he called that Iland after his wiues name, Idea; in which Isle hee dyed, and was buried. But this Iupiter must not haue beene that great one, but vncle to the great Iupiter, if these fables of the Libyans were true. Saturne (as these Libyans tell the tale) was a great Tyrant, and fortified strong places, the better to keepe his people in subiection. His sister Rhea was married to Hammon, who reigned in some part of Africk. Hammon louing others as well as his wife, or better, got a daughter, called Minerua, neare to the Riuer Triton, who thereupon was called Tritonia. Hee also begat on Amalthea a sonne called Bacchus, whom hee caused secretly, for feare of his life, to be brought vp at Nysa, an Iland in the Riuer Triton, vnder the tuition of his daughter Minerua, and certaine Nymphs. To Amalthea hee gaue in reward a goodly Countrey, that lay on the Sea-coast, bending in forme of a horne, whence grew the tale of Amalthea's plentifull horne, famous among the Poets. When Rhea heard these newes, shee fled from her husband to her brother Saturne, who not onely entertained her as a sister, but tooke her to wife, and at her instigation made warre vpon Hammon, vanquished him by assistance of the Titanes, and made him flee into Crete. The Curetes, Iupiters children before mentioned, held the Iland at that time; which was new named Crete by Hammon, after the name of Creta the Kings daughter, whom hee tooke to wife, and had with her (women, as may seeme, being very gracious in those names) the Kingdome. Bacchus was growne a proper young man, had found out the making of wine, the arte of planting trees, and many things else commodious for mankinde, before the flight of his mother in law. Now therefore hearing report of all that had hapned, and that Saturne was comming against him with the Titans; hee leuyed an Armie, to which the Amazons, liuing not farre from Nysa, added great forces, in loue of Minerua, who was entred into their profession. So Bacchus leading the men, and Minerua the women, they set forward against Saturne, met him, ouerthrew him, and taking many of the Titans prisoners, returned to Nysa; where pardoning the prisoners, that promised to become his true followers, he prepared for a second Expedition. In the second Expedition he behaued himself so well, that he wan the loue of all the people by whom he passed; insomuch that partly for good affection to him, partly in hatred of Saturnes rigorous gouernment, he was greatly strengthened, and the enemie as much infeebled by daily reuolts. Comming to the Citie of Hammon, he wan a battaile of Saturne, before the very walls. After which, Saturne with his wife Rhea fled by night, setting the Towne on fire to despight Bacchus. But they were caught in their flight, pardoned by Bacchus, and kindly entreated. Saturne had a young sonne by Rhea, called Iupiter. This child Bacchus tooke with him in a great Expedition that he made into the East Countries; and comming into Egypt, he left this Iupiter, being then a boy, Gouernour of the Countrey; but appointed vnto him, as an Ouer-seer, one Olympus, of whom Iupiter grew to be called Olympus. Whilest Bacchus trauailed through all Nations, as farre as into India, doing good in all places, and teaching many things profitable to the life of man; the Titanes had found out his father Hammon in Crete, and began to warre vpon him. But Bacchus returned out of India, with whom Iupiter from Egypt, and his sister Minerua, together with the rest, that afterwards were held as gods, ioyning all their forces, went into Crete, ouerthrew the Titanes, chased them, tooke & slue them, and freed the world of them all. After all this, when Hammon and Bacchus were dead, they were deified; and the great Iupiter, the sonne of Saturne, succeeding them, reigned Lord alone ouer all the world, hauing none of the Titans left aliue, nor any other to disturbe him. Betweene this tale of the Libyan gods, and the Egyptian fables of Osiris, there is a rude resemblance, that may cause them both to be taken for the crooked Images of some one true historie. For the Expeditions of Osiris, and of

Bacchus, the warres of the Giants in the one storie, of the Titanes in the other, the Kingdome of Egypt giuen by Hercules Lybicus to Orus, by Bacchus to Iupiter, the rattles of Isis, and the cymbals of Basilea, with many petty circumstances, neerely enough resemble each other, howsoeuer not alike fitted to the right persons. Sanchoniato (as Eusebius cites him) would haue all these to be Phœnicians, and is earnest in saying, That it is a true storie, and no allegorie. Yet he makes it seeme the more allegoricall, by giuing to Vranus or Heauen for daughters, Fate and Beautie, and the like, with addition of much fabulous matter, omitted by Diodorus, though Diodorus haue enough. To the Genealogie he addes Elius or the Sunne, as father of Vranus, and among the children of Vranus, Iapetus, Eurybus, and Dagon, (whom Diodorus doth not mention by their names,) giuing withall to Vranus the proper name of Terrenus or Indigena, and of Illus to Saturne, but omitting Iupiter of Creete. The Pedigree of them is this:

Euseb. l. 1. c. 7.



§. V I.

Of CHAM, and other wicked ones, whereof some got some affected the name of Gods.

OF Iupiter Belus, the sonne of Saturnus Babylonius, otherwise Nimrod, it seemeth that Cicero had not heard, (at least by that name) who was more ancient than any of the former three by him remembred: for long after these times were the Greekes but Saluages, if they seeke no further off for their Gods. But the Egyptians, euen after the flood, began (somewhat before this Chaldean Iupiter) to intitle Cham, the parent of their owne Mizraim, Iupiter Chammon, or Hammon. For the Etymologie of this word (Hammon) which the Greekes deduce ab arenis, from the sands, is ridiculous (saith Peucer;) neither yet is his owne much better, who brings it from Hammath, which signifieth heate: because the said Temple of Iupiter Hammon was seated in Libya, where the ayre is exceeding hot & scortching. And as for the antiquitie of the latter Iupiter (among the Greekes & Romans the most renowned) it is certaine that he was borne not long before the warre of Troy, as by many of his sonnes is made manifest; namely, Castor, Pollux, Hercules, Sarpedon, and others, which liued in that age of Priamus, vnder whom, and with whom Troy was destroyed. Peucer. de Oraculo.

Now seeing that mortall men, and the most wicked, were esteemed immortall among the Heathen, it was not to be wondred at, that Alexander Macedon, Tiberius, Nero, Caligula, & others, sought to be numbred among them, who were as deformed monsters as the rest: For by what reason could the same Deitie be denied vnto Laurentia and Flora, which was giuen to Venus? seeing they were as notorious and famous harlots as she was:

§. VII.

That the wiser of the ancient Heathen had farre better opinions of God.

BVt that euer Pythagoras, or Plato, or Orpheus, with many other ancient and excellently learned, beleeued in any of these fooleries, it cannot be suspected, though some of them (ouer-busily) haue mixed their owne inuentions with the Scriptures: for, in punishment for their fictions, did Pythagoras hang both Homer and Hesiodus in hell, where he fained that they were perpetually stung & pinched with Serpents. Yet it cannot be doubted, but that Homer had read ouer all the books of Moses, as by places stolne thence, almost word for word, may appeare; of which Iustine Martyr remembreth many in that Treatise conuerted by Miranduls. As for Plato, though hee dissembled in some things, for feare of the Inquisition of the Areopagites, yet Saint Augustine hath already answered for him (as before remembred). Et mirificè ex delectatus est, quæ de vno Deo tradita fuerant; And he was greatly delighted in the doctrine of one God, saith Iustine Martyr. Now howsoeuer Lactantius pleased to reprehend Plato, because (saith he) Plato sought knowledge from the Egyptians, and the Chaldeans, neglecting the Iewes, and bookes of Moses; Eusebius, Cyrillus, and Origen, finde reason to beleeue the contrarie, thinking that from thence hee tooke the grounds of all by him written of God, or fauouring of Diuinitie: and the fauourable opinion had Saint Ambrose of Pythagoras. Lact. Prap. Euang. lib. 11. Cyril. cont. Iulian. Origen. cont. Celsum. Ambr. ad Iren. Ep. 6. lib. 1.

But whether it were out of the same vanitie, which possest all those learned Philosophers and Poets, that Plato also published (not vnder the right Authors names) those things which he had read in the Scriptures, as feareing the seueritie of the Areopagites, and the example of his Master Socrates, by them put to death by poyson, I cannot iudge. Iustin Martyr (as it seemeth) ascribeth it wholly to Platoes feare, whose words, among many other of the same effect, are these; DIOMED MOSIS mentionem facere, ob id, quod vnum solum Deum docuerat, sibi apud Athenienses autum non putauit, veritus Areopagum; PLATO fearing the Areopagites, thought it not safe for him among the Athenians, to make mention of MOSES, that hee taught that there is but one God. But for that Diuinitie which he hath written in Timæo, id, ipsum de Deo disseruit quod & Moses; He discoursed and taught the same of God (saith Iustine Martyr) which Moses did. For where it pleased God by his Angell to answere Moses, Ego sum existens (which is) Iam; and existens misit me ad vos; I am hath sent me vnto you; herein did Plato (saith Iustine Martyr) no otherwise differ than that Moses vsed the word (qui) and Plato the word quod: MOSES enim qui existit (inquit,) PLATO quod Areopagus, or domus sæuorum Martis, Mars his hill: a house wherein capitall matters were tryed: so called at first because Mars therein first pleaded his cause for the murder of Halirrothos. Pausan in Attic. Nat. Com. l. 2. c. 7 Iust. Mart. adm. Gent. fol. 8. 14. vt sup. Exod. 3. 14.

quod existit; For Moses saith, He who is; Plato, That which is. Now of Gods incomprehensible nature, and of the difficultie either to conceiue, or expresse the same, hee giueth this testimonie: In Timæo. Genitorem Vniuersitatis tam difficile est inuenire, quàm inuentum impossibile dignè prosari; It is as hard to find out the Creator of the Vniuersall, as it is impossible, if he were found, to speake of him worthily. And what can be more agreeable to the Maiestie of Gods Nature, than this propertie by Plato acknowledged? De Legib. 1. 10. Deus bonus, & quidem, Deus causa bonorum: malorum autem omnium non causa; God is absolutely good, and so (assuredly) the cause of all that is good: but of any thing that is euill he is no cause at all: and againe, Charitas Dei fuit causa factionis mundi, & originis omnium rerum; The loue of God was the cause of the worlds creating, and the originall of all things. Apvleivs the Platonist; Summus Deus infinitus est, non solum loci exclusione, sed etiam naturæ dignitate: Et nihil est Deo similius & gratius, quam vir animo perfecto bonus; The most high God is also an infinite God, not onely by exclusion of place, but by the dignitie of nature: neither is there any thing more like or more acceptable to God than a man of a perfect heart. Laertius. Thales affirmed that God comprehended all things, and that God was of all things the most ancient: Quia nunquam esse cæpit; Because he neuer had any beginning. Zeno, that God beheld euen the thoughts of men. Athenodorus, that therefore all men ought to be carefull in the actions of their life, because God was euery where present & beheld all done. But what can be more agreeable to Moses storie of the Creation, than this opinion and description of the Worlds beginning in Euripides, Scholler of Anaxagoras?

Sed cum fuissent abiuncta amplexu mutuo,
Emersit omnis in lucem res progenita,
Arbores, aues, fera, quæq; affert mare,
Genusq; mortalium.

Heauen and Earth one forme did beare:
But when dis-joyned once they were
From mutuall embraces,
All things to light appeared then;
Of trees, birds, beasts, fishes, and men
The still-remayning races.

And as in Pythagoras, in Socrates, and in Plato: so we find the same excellent vnderstanding in Orpheus, who euery-where expressed the infinite and sole power of one God; though he vse the name of Iupiter, thereby to auoide the enuie and danger of the time: but that hee could attribute those things to the sonnes of men, and mortall creatures, which he doth to this Iupiter, there is no man who hath euer heard of God, that can imagine.

Nomina Deorum (saith Mirandvla) quos Orpheus canit, non decipientium dæmonum, à quibus malum & non bonum prouenit; sed naturalium virtutum diuinarumq; sunt nomina; The names of those Gods whom Orpheus doth sing, are not of deceiuing Deuils, from whom euill comes, and not goodnesse; but they are the names of naturall & diuine vertues. Yea, that he yet reacheth higher, and speaketh of God himselfe, this his instruction to Musæus, and the Hymne following, teach vs: Respiciens verò ad diuinum hunc sermonem ei diligenter animum aduerte, intendens cordis rationis capax conceptaculum: rectam autem ascende viam, & solum aspice mundi Regem. Vnus est ex se genitus, ex eo omnia nata sunt: ipse verò in illis versatur, nec quisquam eum intueri potest mortalium, sed ipse nihilominus omnes intuetur.

Then marking this my sacred speech, but truely lend
Thy heart, that's reasons sphere, and the right way ascend,
And see the worlds sole King. First, he is simply one Begotten of himselfe, from whom is borne alone
All else; in which hee's still: nor could it ere befall
A mortall eye to see him once, yet hee sees all.

And againe the same Author,

The first of all is GOD, and the same last is he.
GOD is the head and midst, yea from him all things be.
GOD is the Base of earth, and of the starred skie.
He is the male and female too, shall neuer die.
The spirit of all is GOD, the SVNNE and MOONE, and what is higher.
The King, th'originall of all, of all the end.
For close in holy brest he all did comprehend, Whence all to blessed light, his wondrous power did send.

Now besides these former testimonies, that all the learned men of ancient times were not so stupid and ignorant, as the Egyptians, Græcians, and other Nations by them infected were, I will onely repeate two or three other opinions, and leaue the Reader to those large and learned Collections of Iustine Martyr, Clemens, Lactantius, Eusebius, Eugubinus, Peucer, Plessis, Daneus, and others. For Cleanthes the Stoick, being demanded of what nature God was, described him by these attributes and properties: Bonus, iustus, sanctus, seipsum possidens, vtilis, speciosus, optimus, seuerus, liber, semper commodus, tutus, glorios us, charitas, &c. Good, iust, holy, possessing himselfe, profitable, beautifull, best, seuere, free, alwayes doing good, safe without feare, glorious and selfe-charitie. EPICHARMVS affirmed, that God who beheld all things, and pierced euery nature, was onely and euery where powerfull: agreeing with DEMOCRITVS: Rex omnium ipse solus; Hee is the only King of kings: and with Pindarus the Poet, Deus vnus, Pater, creator summus, atq; optimus artifex, qui progressus singulis diuersos secundum merita præbet; One God, the Father, the most high Creator, and best artificer, who giueth to euery thing diuers proceedings according to their deserts. This God (saith ANTISTHENES) cannot bee resembled to any thing, and therefore not elsewhere knowne; Nisi in patria illa perenni, cuius imaginem nullam habes: Saue onely in that euerlasting Countrey, whose image thou hast none at all. Hereof also XENOPHANES COLOPHONIVS: Vnus Deus inter deos & homines maximus, nec corpore, nec mente mortalibus similis; There is one God among gods and men most powerfull, neither corporally, nor mentally like vnto mortals: and XENOPHON, Deus qui omnia quatit, & omnia quiescere facit, magnus potensq; quod omnibus patet: qualis autem forma sit, nemini patet, n si ipsi soli, qui luce sua omnia perlustrat; God who shaketh all things, and setteth all things at rest, is great and mightie, as is manifest to all: but of what forme hee is, it is manifest to none, saue onely to himselfe, who illuminateth all things with his owne light. Finally, Plato saith: Totius rerum naturæ causa, & ratio, & origo Deus, summus animi genitor, æternus animantium sospitator, assiduus mundi sui opifex, sine propagatione genitor, neq; loco, neq; tempore vllo comprehensus, eoq; paucis cogitabilis, nemini effabilis; God is the cause, ground, and originall of the whole nature of things, the most high Father of the soule, the eternall preseruer of liuing creatures, the continuall framer of his world, a begetter without any propagation, comprehended neither in any place, nor time; therefore few can conceiue him in thought, none can expresse what hee is. Therefore was it said by S. HIEROME, Si enim cunctos Philosophorum reuoluas libros, necesse est, vt in eis reperias aliquam partem vasorum Dei, vt apud PLATONEM, fabricatorem mundi, Deum: apud ZENONEM, Stoicorum Principem, in eros & immortales animas &c. If thou consider all the bookes of the Philosophers, thou canst not but find in them some part of the Vessels of God, as in PLATO, God the Creator of the world: In ZENO, Prince of the Stoicks, Hell and immortall soules, &c. Hieron. in Com. in Dan. in princip.

And this is certaine, that if we looke into the wisedome of all Ages, we shall finde that there neuer was man of solid vnderstanding or excellent iudgement: neuer any man whose minde the Arte of education hath not bended; whose eyes a fooliish superstition hath not afterward blinded; whose apprehensions are sober, and by a pensiue inspection aduised; but that he hath found by an vnresistable necessitie, one true God, and euerlasting being, all for euer causing, and all for euer sustayning; which no man among the Heathen hath with more reuerence acknowledged, or more learnedly expresst, than that Egyptian Hermes, howsoeuer it fayled afterward in his posteritie: all being at length by deuilish policie of the Egyptian Priests purposely obscured; who inuented new gods, and those innumerable, best sorting (as the Deuill perswaded them) with vulgar capacities, and fittest to keepe in awe and order their common people.

§. VIII.

§. VIII.

That Heathenisme and Iudaisme, after many wounds, were at length about the same time vnder IVLIAN miraculously confounded.

BVt all these are againe vanished: for the inuentions of mortall men are no lesse mortall than themselues. The Fire, which the Chaldæans worshiped for a God, is crept into euery mans chimney, which the lacke of fuell starueth, water quencheth, and want of ayre suffocateth: Iupiter is no more vexed with Iunoes ielousies; Death hath perswaded him to chastitie, and her to patience; and that Time which hath deuoured it selfe, hath also eaten vp both the Bodies and Images of him and his: yea, their stately Temples of stone and durefull Marble. The houses and sumptuous buildings erected to Baal, can no where befound vpon the earth, nor any monument of that glorious Temple consecrated to Diana. There are none now in Phœnicia, that lament the death of Adonis; nor any in Libya, Creta, Thessalia, or elsewhere, that can aske counsaile or helpe from Iupiter. The great god Pan hath broken his Pipes, Apolloes Priests are become speechlesse, and the Trade of riddles in Oracles, with the Deuills telling mens fortunes therein, is taken vp by counterfait Egyptians, and coozening Astrologers.

But it was long ere the Deuill gaue way to these his ouer-throwes and dishonours: for after the Temple of Apollo at Delphos (one of his chiefe Mansions) was many times robbed, burnt, and destroyed; yet by his diligence the same was often enriched, repayred, and reedified againe, till by the hand of God himselfe it receiued the last and vtter subuersion. For it was first robbed of all the Idols and Ornaments therein by the Eubæan Pyrates: Secondly, by the Phlegians vtterly sackt: Thirdly, by Pyrrhus the sonne of Achilles: Fourthly, by the Armie of Xerxes: Fiftly, by the Captaines of the Phocenses: Sixtly, by Nero, who carried thence fiue hundred brazen Images: all which were new made, and therein againe set vp at the common charge. But whatsoeuer was gathered betweene the time of Nero and Constantine, the Christian Armie made spoile of, defacing as much as the time permitted them; notwithstanding all this, it was againe gloriously rebuilt, and so remained till such time as Iulian the Apostata sent thither to know the successe of his Parthian enterprise, at which time it was vtterly burnt and consumed with fire from Heauen; and the Image of Apollo himselfe, and all the rest of the Idols therein, molten downe and lost in the earth.

The like successe had the Iewes in the same Iulians time, when by his permission they assembled themselues to rebuild the Temple of Ierusalem: for while they were busied to lay the foundations, their buildings were ouerthrowne by an Earthquake, and many thousands of the Iewes were ouerwhelmed with the ruines, and others slaine, and scattered by Tempest and Thunder: though Am. Marcellinus report it more fauourably for the Iewes, ascribing this to the nature of that Element. For, saith hee, Allypius and the Ruler of the Prouince of Iudæa, being by Iulian busied in the reedifying of this Temple, flaming Balls of fire issuing neere the foundation, and oft consuming the Workemen, made the enterprize frustrate.

Am. Marl. 23. cap. 1.

Of the last refuges of the Deuill to maintaine his Kingdome.

NOw the Deuill, because hee cannot play vpon the open Stage of this World (as in those dayes) and being still as industrious as euer, findes it more for his aduantage to creepe into the mindes of men; and inhabiting in the Temples of their hearts, workes them to a more effectuall adoration of himselfe than euer. For whereas hee first taught them to sacrifice to Monsters, to dead Stones cut into faces of Beasts, Birds, and other mixt Natures; he now sets before them the high and shining Idoll of glorie, the All-commanding Image of bright Gold. He tels them that truth is the Goddesse of dangers and oppressions: that chastitie is the enemie of Nature; & lastly, that as all vertue (in generall) is without taste; so pleasure satisfieth and delighteth euery sense: for true wisedome (saith he) is exercised in nothing else, than in the obtayning of power to oppresse, and of riches to maintaine plentifully our worldly delights. And if this Arch-Politician find in his pupils any remorse, any feeling or feare of Gods future Iudgement, he perswades them that God hath so great neede of mens soules, that hee he will accept them at any time, and vpon any conditions: interrupting by his vigilant endeuours all offer of timefull returne towards God, by laying those great blockes of rugged pouertie, & despised contempt in the narrow passage leading to his diuine presence. But as the minde of man hath two Ports, the one alwaies frequented by the entrance of manifold vanities; the other desolate and ouer-growne with grasse, by which enter our charitable thoughts and diuine contemplations: so hath that of death a double and twofold opening: worldly miserie passing by the one, worldly prosperity by the other: at the entrance of the one we find our sufferings and patience to attend vs: (all which haue gone before vs to prepare our ioyes) at the other our cruelties, couetousnesse, licentiousnesse, iniustice, and oppressions (the Harbingers of most fearefull and terrible sorrow) staying for vs. And as the Deuill our most industrious enemie was euer most diligent: so is he now more laborious than euer; the long day of Mankind drawing fast towards an euening, and the Worlds Tragedie and time neere at an end.

CHAP. VII.

Of NOAHS Floud.

§. I.

Of Gods fore-warning: and some humane testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of NOAHS Floud.

OF this destruction it pleased God to giue warning vnto Noah: who (saith Iosephus) fearing to perish among the rest, Secedens cum suis in aliam regionem migrauit: He departed with his children, & trauailed into another Region. And of these Giants from whom Noah withdrew himselfe, Berosus writeth in this manner; That they exceeded in all sorts of inhumane and vnnaturall wickednesse, and that they were contemptores & religiouis & Deorum; contemners of religion and of the Gods: among which mightie men (saith Berosus) vnus erat qui Deorum, venerantior, & prudentior cunctis, &c. huic nomen erat NOAH, There was one more wise and reuerencing the Gods than the rest, whose name was NOAH: who with his three sons Sem, Iaphetus, and Cham, and with their Wiues, and the Wife of Noah, (namely, Titea the great, Pandora, Noela, and Noegla) preserued themselues in the Arke. This Arke God commanded Noah to prepare: And God sayd vnto NOAH, Make thee an Arke of Pine-trees: thou shalt make Cabines in the Arke, and shalt pitch it within, and without with Pitch. For God made Noah to know, that an end of all flesh was at hand, and that the graues of the rebellious and cruell Generations were already fashioned in the Cloudes, which soone after should swallow vp & couer all liuing creatures, which breathed in the Aire: Noah and his family excepted.

Gen. 6. 14. v. 13.

But this vniuersall graue of waters, and generall Deluge hath not beene receiued by all: for diuine testimonies doe not perswade all naturall men to those things, to which their owne reason cannot reach: Dum obuoluta in obscuro veritas latet: whilst the truth lieth wrapt vp in obscuritie. Many there are who haue disputed against the vniuersalitie of this ouerflowing, and haue iudged that this Floud of Noah fell but in some particular places and Kingdomes: moued so to thinke, because in elder ages there haue beene many other Flouds (as they suppose) of that nature. Hereof Nicholas Damascenus writeth in this manner, as his words are cited by Iosephus. Est super Minyadam excelsus mons in Armenia, qui Baris appellatur, in quo multos confugientes fermo est diluuij tempore liberatos, & quendam simul in Arca deuectum in huius vertice hasisse, lignorumq; reliquias multo tempore conseruatas, qui fortasse is fuit, de quo etiam MOSES Iudæorum Legislator scribit: thus farre this Author. There is (saith he) aboue Minyada (or the Countrey of Minya) an exceeding high Mountaine in Armenia, called Baris: on which it is reported, that many hauing fled thither, were saued in the time of the Deluge: and that one was carried in an Arke, and rested vpon the top of the Mountaine, whereon there remained a long time after certaine pieces thereof; and this might bee the same, of which MOSES the Law-giuer of the Iewes maketh mention. And of this opinion were the Thalegudiis (saith Annius) that many Giants saued themselues vpon Mount Sion.

But Berosus (who after Moses was one of the most ancient, howsoeuer he haue beene since deformed & corrupted) doth in the substance of all agree with Moses as touching the generall Floud, taking from thence the beginning of his History in these words: Ante aquarum cladem famosam, qua vniuersus perijt Orbis, &c. Before that famous destruction of Waters, by which the World vniuersall perished: witnessing withall, that Noah with his wife Titea, & his three Sons with their wiues (in all eight persons) were only saued.

§. II.

Of the Floud in the time of OGYGES: and that this was not NOAHS Floud.

BVt from the vanitie of the Greeks, the Corrupters of all truth, (saith Lactantius) who without all ground of certainty vaunt their Antiquitie, came the errour first of all: who therin flattering themselues also, sought to perswade the world that there was no Floud preceded the Fould of Ogyges, King of the Thebans in Bœotia, or rather of Attica; and therefore (saith Rhodoginus,) Ogygum id appellant Poetæ, tanquàm peruetus dixeris; ab Ogyge vetustissimo: The Poets gaue the name of Ogygia to things exceeding ancient, as of Ogyges the most ancient.

Rhod.l.15.c.33.

But let Ogyges be as ancient as those men can make him, yet it is manifest, that he liued but in Iacobs time (though Eusebius makes him later, and in Moses time) and was borne 67. yeeres after him. There is also an opinion, that Ogyges was Cadmus (and then was he farre latter) as Rhodoginus in the ninth Booke of his Antiquities remembreth: Sunt tamen qui in Ægypto regnâsse autument hunc: vnde sit CADMVS qui in Græciam profectus Thebas condidit, à Boue iugulato sic nuncupatas; quoniam Syrorum lingua Bos dicitur Thebe. There are (saith he) who thinke that this Ogyges did reigne in Egypt, whereby he should be CADMVS, who trauailing into Greece built Thebes, so named of a Beefe slaine: because in the Syrian Language, a Beefe is called Thebe.

Euseb.de præp. Euang.l.10.c.3. Ca.22.

But this Floud of Ogyges fell in the yeere of the World 3440. according to Eusebius, who followed the account of the Septuagint: and the Floud of Noah in the yeere 2242. after the same account; and so there came 1200. betweene these Flouds, wanting but two, though herein Eusebius was much mistaken, and corrected this opinion in his Chronologie. Now although the very yeere and time of this ouerflowing in Achaia, or rather Attica, be not precisely set downe, but that there is a great difference among Writers, yet whosoeuer makes it most ancient, finds aboue 500. yeeres difference betweene that and the generall Floud.

For Paulus Orosius affirmes, that this tempest fell vpon the Athenians, but 1040. yeeres before Rome was built. Bucholzerus saith, it was 1043. elder than Rome; which was founded (according to the same Bucholzerus) in the worlds yeere 3219. though after the account which I follow (and whereof I will giue my reasons in the Story of Abraham) it was built in the Worlds yeere 3280. Now the generall Floud preceded the building of Rome (saith Bucholzerus) 1563. yeeres: and the Floud of Ogyges (as before) 1043. Hence it followeth by easie calculation, that (if he place Ogyges in his true age) the difference betweene these two Flouds must be 520. yeeres, to which we (allowing 60. more) find 580. And that this of Ogyges was not the same of Noah (except we call Noah, Ogyges Priscus, as some doe) it appeares by this, that the Floud of Ogyges then King of Attica or Ogygia, did not extend it selfe any further than the bankes of Archi-Pelago, or the Ægæan Sea. For whereas Mela, Plinie, and Solinus witnesse, that the Cittie of Ioppe in Iudæa was founded before the Floud; and that (notwithstanding the waight of Waters) there remained on certaine Altars of stone the Title of the King, and of his Brother Phineus, with many of the grounds of their Religion: sure it is no where found among prophane Historians nor in the Scriptures, that euer the Floud of Ogyges spred it selfe ouer any part of Syria, much lesse ouer all the Earth. But that it drowned both the Regions of Attica about Athens, and that of Achaia in Peloponnesus, it is very probble. For it seemeth that at that time it was, when Helice and Bura were swallowed vp (Cities seated on the North part of Peloponnesus:) of which Ouid:

Bura and Helice, on Achaian ground
Are sought in vaine, but vnder Sea are found.

Of this Floud of Ogyges vvas inuented the Fable of Apollo and Diana. For Latona, the daughter of Caeus, the sonne of Titan, being beloued and forced by Iupiter, and by him gotten with child, Iuno thereat enraged, permitted her (as they say) no part of the Earth to be deliuered on; & withall, caused the monstrous Serpent Python to follow & affright her, whersoeuer she trauelled: till at length arriuing at the Ile of Ortygia, she was there receiued, in which she was deliuered, first of Diana, and then of Apollo, being Twins: whereof Barlaam makes this exposition: That at such time as the Deluge (which happened in Ogyges his reigne) ceased, out of the abundant moisture of the Earth (heat by putrifaction being thereto mixed) there were exhaled such thick mists and fogges, that in Attica, and along the Coasts of the Aegean Sea, neither the beames of the Sunne by day, nor of the Moone by night, could pierce the ayre, or be perceiued by the inhabitants: so as when at length (the Earth being dryed, and these vapours dissipated) the ayre began to be cleare, the people of Ortygia espyed the light of the Moone somewhat before day, & in the same morning the Sunne also appeared: fabulously (because Diana represented the Moone, and Apollo the Sunne) they were reported to be borne in the Ile of Ortygia, thereof afterwards called Delos, which signifieth manifestation. Nat. Com. l. 1. c. 8. Plin. l. 4. c. 11.

And surely it is not improbable, that the Floud of Ogyges, being so great, as Histories haue reported it, was accompanied with much alteration of the ayre, sensibly discerned in those parts, and some vnusuall face of the Skyes. Varro in his Bookes de gente populi Romani (as he is cited by Saint Augustine) reporteth out of Cassor, that so great a miracle happened in the Starre of Venus, as neuer was seene before, nor in after-times: For the colour, the greatnesse, the figure, and the course of it, were changed. This fell out, as Adrastus Cyzicenus, and Diuus Neapolites, famous Mathematicians, affirmed, in the time of Ogyges. Aug. de Ciuit. Dei, l. 21. cap. 8.

Now concerning the course of that or any other Planet, I doe not remember, that I haue any where read of so good Astrologers, flourishing among the Greeks, or elsewhere in those dayes, as were likely to make any calculation of the reuolutions of the Planets, so exact, that it should need no information of the colour and magnitude. I see no reason, why the difference found in the Starre of Venus, should be held miraculous, considering, that lesser mists and fogges than those which couered Greece with so long darknesse, doe familiarly present our senses with as great alterations in the Sunne and Moone. That the figure should varie, questionlesse it was very strange: Yet I cannot hold it any prodigie: for it stands well with good reason, that the side of Venus which the Sunne beholds, being enlightned by him, the opposite halfe should remaine shadowed; whereby that Planet would, vnto our eyes, descrying onely that part whereon the light falleth, appeare to be horned, as the Moone doth seeme; if distance (as in other things) did not hinder the apprehension of our senses.

A worthy Astrologer now liuing, who by the helpe of perspective Glasses hath found in the Starres many things vnknowne to the Ancients, affirmeth so much to haue been discouered in Venus, by his late obseruations. Whether some watrie disposition of the ayre might present as much to them that liued with Ogyges, as Galileus hath seene through his Instrument, I cannot tell: sure I am, that the discouerie of a truth formerly vnknowne, doth rather conuince Man of ignorance, than Nature of error. One thing herein is worthy to be noted, that this great, but particular Floud of Ogyges, was (as appeareth by this of Saint Augustine) accompanied with such vnusuall (and therefore the more dreadfull, though naturall) signes, testifying the concurrence of causes with effects in that inundation; whereas the Floud of Noah, which was generall, and altogether miraculous, may seeme to haue had no other token, or forc-shewing, than the long preaching of Noah himselfe, which was not regarded: for they were eating and drinking, when the Floud came suddenly, and tooke them all away. Luke 17. v. 27.

§. III.

Of DEVCALIONS Floud: and that this was not NOAHS Floud: nor the Vmbri in Italie a remnant of any vniuerſall Floud.

A Second Floud of great fame, and of which the time is more certaine, was that of Deucalion in Theſſalia; of which S. Auguſtine out of Varro: His temporibus (vt VARRO ſcribit) regnante Athenienſibus CRANAO, ſucceſſore CECROPIS (vt autem noſtri, EVSEBIVS & HIERONYMVS*) adhuc eodem* CECROPE permanente, diluuium fuit, quod appellatum eſt DEVCALIONIS: (that is) In theſe times (as VARRO reporteth) CRANAVS the ſucceſſor of CECROPS gouerning the Athenians, or (as our EVSEBIVS and HIEROME ſay) CECROPS yet liuing, that Floud (called DEVCALIONS*) happened.*

And in the beginning of the eleuenth Chapter of the ſame eighteenth Booke, he vſeth theſe words: Eduxit ergo MOSES ex Egypto populum Dei nouiſſimo tempore Cecropis Athenienſium Regis, cum apud Aſſyrios regnaret Aſcatades, apud Sicyonios Marathus, apud Argiuos Tripas: MOSES led the people of God out of Egypt about the latter time of Cercops King of the Athenians, Aſcatades raigning ouer the Aſſrians, ouer the Sicyonians Marathus, and ouer the Argiues Triopas. So as leauing the curioſitie of a few yeeres, more or leſſe, it appeareth, that this Floud of Deucalion was either at the egreſſion of the children of Iſrael out of Egypt, or neere it: and then after Noah 753. yeers, according to Funcius, who makes Cecrops to liue in the yeere of the World 2409. or if we follow Mercator, then 739. yeeres after Noah, and in the yeere of the World 2395. But if Deucalion were borne in the age of the World 2356. according to Codoman; then giuing vnto Deucalion 40. yeeres of age when this Floud happened, it falleth within one yeere of Mercators account. But Deucalion by all approued Hiſtorians is ſaid to haue beene 82. yeeres old at that time. Now Clemens Alexandrinus dates the time of this Floud of Deucalion, and the conflagration and burning in Phaëtons time, by the reigne of Crotopus, King of the Argiues; but Crotopus liued King of the Argiues fixe yeeres after Iſrael departed Egypt, which makes twenty yeeres difference, according to Funcius, who will haue this Floud and Burning to haue fallen 14. yeeres before Moſes left Egypt: for he gaue of the Worlds yeeres to the Floud and Burning the yeere 2440 and to Moſes his egreſſion the yeere 2454. And yet Cedrenus thinke that Moſes was more ancient, and liued with Inachus; but that cannot be true: for then had the Floud of Deucalion, and the burning of Phaëton, preceded the Floud of Ogyges, which is denyed by all: for that of Theſſalie (called Deucalions) followed that of Attica (called Ogygia) at leaſt 250. yeeres, or thereabours. Euſebius in his Chronologie makes it 230. & ſo doth Oroſius. Euſebius about the 50. yeere of Moſes life, and Cyrillus about the 67. and both after Noahs Floud 770. yeeres: for theſe be Clemens Alexandrinus his words: Fuit autem in Gracia tempore quidem Phornei, qui fuit poſt Inachum, inundatio que fuit tempore Ogygis: There happened in Greece in the time of Phorneus, who liued after Inachus, the Floud of Ogyges. Now if the Floud of Ogyges in Attica were 1020. or 1016. yeeres before the firſt Olympiad, according to Euſebius and Oroſius, (as before) then is it manifeſt, that taking 763. out of this number of 1020. it falls out, that Ogyges Floud, happened before the Hebrewes left Egypt 250. yeeres, or 260. yeeres, according to the difference betweene the opinions of Euſebius and Oroſius. And for my ſelfe (who rather follow thoſe Chronologers, which giue 60. yeeres more to Abraham after the Floud, than the reſt) I reckon the times which come betweene theſe Flouds in this ſort. The generall Floud was in the yeere of the World 1656. Iacob was borne in the yeere of the World 2169. ſo as from the beginning of the Floud to Iacobs birth, there were conſumed 513. yeeres. Ogyges Floud happened 100. yeeres after Iacob was borne; and therefore after the generall Floud 613. yeeres. Now Deucalion was borne in the yeere of the World 2356. and had liued 82. yeeres, when his Kingdome of Theſſalie was ouerwhelmed; (which added to 2356. make 2438.) his Floud was after Noahs Floud ended, 782. yeeres. And hereto Annius his Xenophon agreeth, who makes 700. yeeres betweene the generall Floud and Deucalions birth; to which adde 82. yeeres of his Age (as before) and then the Floud of Theſſalie followed the generall 782. yeeres. The words of that Xenophon are theſe: Ab inundatione terrarum ad ortum Deucalionis, ſecundo anno Sphæri, ſeptingenti ſupputantur anni, qui natus anno duos & octoginta Theſſaliam vidit inundatam: From the drowning of the World to the birth of Deucalion, in the ſecond yeere yeere of SPHÆRVS, are numbred 700. yeeres, and when DEVCALION was 82. yeeres old, he saw Thessalia drowned. This Floud happened in the Winter time about Parnassus: witnesse Aristotle in the first of his Meteors. And Varro (whom Saint Augustine so often citeth for his excellent Learning, especially in Antiquities) findeth this Floud of Deucalion to haue happened in the time of Cranaus, who succeeded Cecrops: Orosius thinkes it somewhat later, Amphytrion reigning in Athens, the third from Cecrops: Onely this of Deucalion was very great, and reached not onely ouer Thessalie it selfe, and the Regions adioyning Westward, but it couered the greatest part of Italie: and either the same, or some other particular Floud then happening, oppresst Egypt, saith Eusebius. And therefore did the Greekes eyther thinke it, or faine it to be vniuersall, and Deucalion then King, sauing himselfe and some others on the Mountaine of Thessalie (of all other the highest, saith Solinus) was by reason thereof (as Strabo witnesseth) said to be the preseruer of Mankind. That this Floud couered a great part of Italie, Plinie and Solinus make it probable, who affirme, that the people then inhabiting Italie, were therfore called αὐχενοι: quia ab imbribus diluuij superfuissent; and therefore also were they esteemed the most ancient Nation, as Strabo confirmeth in his first Booke, and Trezenius in his second: which Vmbri these Authors make the Parents of the Sabines, and the Sabines to be the Parents of the Samnites, Piceni, Lucani, Brutij, and all others inhabiting anciently the bankes of the Mediterrane Sea. But that these Vmbri were not the Inhabiters of Italie before the Floud of Noah, and so tooke name by sauing themselues vpon the Appenine Mountaines, the Scriptures teach vs; shewing who, and who onely then were preserued: which is sufficient. Report hath aduentured further, telling vs, that the first people which after the generall Floud inhabited Italie, were the Camesenes; (so named from Camese, whom CATO in originibus, another of Annius his Authors, names for a consort of Ianus) which people liued altogether a sauage life, till such time as Saturne arriuing on those Coasts, deuised Lawes to gouerne them by: the memorie of whose Acts in that Region, Diodor and Thallus among the Greekes, Nepos Cassius and Varro among the Latines, haue preserued; and of whom Virgil:

Primus ab æthereo venit SATVRNVS Olympo,
Arma IOVIS fugiens, & regnis exul ademptis,
Is genus indocile, ac dispersum montibus altis
Composuit, Legesq; dedit; Latiumq; vocari Maluit.

SATVRNE descending from the Heauens high,
Fearing the Armes of IVPITER his Sonne,
His Kingdome lost, and banisht thence, doth flie.
Rude people on the Mountaine tops he wonne
To liue together, and by Lawes: which done,
He chose to call it Latium.

And afterward in the Verses following he speaketh of the Ausones, and after them, of the Sicani: Nations, which againe sought to dis-plant the ancient Inhabiters:

Tum manus Ausonia, & gentes venêre Sicani.
Then came th' Ausonian Bands, and the Sicanian Tribes.

Of these Sicani (which left Spaine, and sat downe in Italie) Thucydides and Plinie giue testimonie: who were again expelled by the Ligij, saith Thucydides. After all these plantations & replantations, came the Vmbri, descended of the Gaules (saith Annius,) not of those Gaules of France, but of those of Scythia, who commanded a great part of Italie, euen all Hetruria and Campania; as Herodotus, Plinie, and Dionysius haue assured vs: and therfore this Floud of Deucalion was long after that of Noah. For all those Nations were planted in Italie, and dispossest of Italie again, before the Vmbri were euer heard of, or had being. So that Kingdome was first called Camasene, then Latium or Saturnia, then Ausonia, then Sicania; before the Vmbri (in whose time Deucalions Floud happened) possest the same, about 306. yeeres before the Warre of Troy: Lycaon then gouerning Arcadia; who being the father of two and twentie sonnes, the youngest called Oenotrius inuaded Italie, who gaue it the name of Oenotria. This name it held vntill Italus of the same Nation changed it into Italie, after his owne name, about 250. yeeres before the fall of Troy. After these, came

§. IIII.

Of some other Records testifying the vniuersall Floud: and of two ancient Deluges in Egypt: and of some elsewhere.

SAint Augustine out of Varro affirmeth, that the Greekes and Latines made not any mention of the Vniuersall Floud, because they had nothing of Antiquitie foregoing that of Ogyges; and therefore (according to Rhodoginus, before remembred) were all things among the Greekes (which antiquitie had worne out of knowledge) called Ogygia, which we in English commonly call (worme-eaten) or of defaced date. But as all the parts of the Earth were successiuely planted and peopled; and as all Nations had their proper times, and not their beginning at once and at the instant: so did euery Familie, which afterward became a great People, with whom the knowledge of diuine Letters was not receiued, finde no Parent of more antiquitie, than such as they had themselues, nor allow of any before their owne; and as the Gracians, so did others vaunt themselues to be Indigenæ, and growing out of the Earth, or inuent some other prophane or ridiculous beginning. But the Chaldæans had certaine knowledge of Noahs Floud, as Berosus witnesseth; and Nicolaus Damascenus maketh particular mention thereof (as is aforesaid) though he also affirme by heare-say, that some Giants saued themselues vpon the Mountaines Baris in Armenia, but speaketh not thereof as from any authoritie approued: vsing the word Sermo est; That such a speech there was. And Eusebius remembreth a place out of the ancient Historian Abydenus: who writteth, that Sisithrus, to preserue himselfe from a Floud fore-told him by Saturnus, fled to the Hils of Armenia by ship, ad Armenian nauigio confugiebat: who the third day (after the Waters were fallen) sent forth birds, that finding no land to rest on, returned againe; which hee also did a second time, but at the third returne the birds feet were couered with mudde and slime. To this effect are Eusebius words out of Abydenus, which may seeme a true description (though in other termes) of Noahs Floud.

Euseb. de prep. Euang. l. 9. c. 4.

Cyrillus also affirmeth, that Alex. Polyhistor maketh mention of this generall Floud. And Plato in Timæo produceth an Egyptian Priest, who recounted to Solon out of the holy Bookes of Egypt, the storie of the Floud vniuersal, which (saith he) happened long before the Gracian inundations. Fryer Annius his Xenophon remembreth a third Floud, which also Diodorus Siculus confirmeth, somewhat more ancient than that of Ogyges in Attica. For he named the generall Floud for the first, which happened (saith he) vnder the old Ogyges· Sub prisco Ogyge, which was Noah; he calleth the second Niliaca: Hercules and Prometheus then liuing, 44. yeeres before that of Attica, in the 34. yeere of Belochus King of the Assyrians, though I doe not beleeue him as touching the time. But this Floud couered a great part of the nether Egypt, especially all that Region subiect to Prometheus; and hereof came the fable of the Vulture on Prometheus his Liuer, afterward slaine by Hercules of Egypt: which fiction Diod. Siculus deliuereth in these words: Fluuium propter cursus velocitatem, profunditatemq; aquarum, Aquilam tunc appellatum, Hercvlem cum consilij magnitudine, tum virtute, volunt è vestigio compressisse, & aquarum impetum ad priorem cursum conuertisse: Vnde & Graci quidam Poeta rem gestam in fabulam vertentes, Hercvlem tradunt Aquilam Promethei iecur depascentem occidisse; This Floud (meaning of Nilus) for the swiftnesse of his course, as also for the depth, was in those dayes called the Eagle: but Hercvles by his great iudgement and vertue did againe compresse and straighten this Riuer, so farre extended and ouer-spred, turning it into the old channels: Whence certaine Greeke Poets (conuerting this labour and worke of Hercvles into a fable) fable) deuised, that HERCVLES slew the Eagle which fed on PROMETEVS Liuer; meaning, that he deliuered Prometheus of that sorrow & torment, which for the losse of his People and Countrey (by the Waters destroyed and couered ouer) he suffered.

A fourth Floud chanced about Pharus in Egypt, where Alexander Macedon built Alexandria, as Annius conceiueth out of his Xenophon, who in this briefe sort writeth of all these Inundations: Inundationes plures fuere: prima nouimestris inundatio terrarum sub priſco OGYGE: ſecunda Niliaca, &c. There were many Inundations (saith the same Xenophon:) the first, which was vniuersall, of nine Moneths, and this happened vnder the first OGYGES: the second was Niliaca, and of one Moneths continuance, in the time of Hercules and Prometheus, Egyptians: a third of two Moneths, vnder Ogyges Atticus: the fourth of three moneths, in Thessalia, vnder Deucalion: and a fifth of the like continuance (called Pharonica) vnder Proteus of Egypt, about the time of Helens rape. Diodorus in his fifth Booke and eleuenth Chapter, taking the Samothraces for his Authors, remembreth a Floud in Asia the lesse, and elsewhere, of no lesse destruction than any of the other particular Inundations, saying, that the same happened before that of Deucalion; the Sea of Pontus and Hellespont breaking in ouer the Land. Xenop. de aquin. Comm. ser Annium, fol. 37.

But there haue been many Flouds in diuers times, and ages, not inferior to any of these two last remembred, Niliaca and Pharonica in Egypt: as in the yeere of our Redemption 590. when in October of the same yeere, Gregory then being Bishop of Rome, there happened a maruellous ouerflowing in Italy, and especially in the Venetian Territorie, and in Liguria, accompanied with a most fearefull storme of thunder & lightning: after which followed the great Plague at Rome, by reason of the many dead Serpents cast vp & left vpon the Land, after the Waters decreased and returned. And in the yeere 1446. there perished 10000. people, by the breaking in of the Sea at Dordroch in Holland: of which kind I take that Floud to be of Achaia or Attica. Before that, and in the yeere 1238. Trithemius speaketh of an Earthquake, which swallowed many thousands: and after that, of a Floud in Friseland, in which there perished 100000. persons. Strozius Sigon. in his Magia omnifaria, telleth of an Inundation in Italie, in the time of Pope Damasus, in which also many Cities of Sicil were swallowed: another in the Papacie of Alexander the sixt: also in the yeere 1515. Maximilian being Emperor. He also remembreth a perillous ouer-flowing in Polonia, about Cracouia, by which many people perished. Likewise Viginier a French Historian speaketh of a great Floud in the South part of Languedoc, which fell in the yeere of our Lord 1557. with so dreadful a tempest, as all the people attended therein the very end of the World, and Iudgement Day; saying, That by the violent descent of the Waters from the Mountaines, about Nismes there were remoued diuers old heapes and mountures of ground, and many other places torne vp and rent: by which accident there was found both Coyne of Siluer and Gold, diuers pieces of Plate, and Vessels of other Mettall, supposed to be hidden at such time as the Gothes inuaded that Prouince, in the yeere 1156. Munster. Eclypsi, & terræ motus continui multa hominum milia oppresserunt. Frisia quoq; per maritimos fluctus tota penè submersa fuit & perierunt plusquam 100000.

§. V.

That the Floud of NOAH was supernaturall, though some say it might haue beene foreseene by the Starres.

NOw howsoeuer all these Flouds, and many other, which haue couered at seuerall times seuerall Regions, not only in these parts of the World, but in America also, (as I haue learned of some ancient Southsayers among them) may be ascribed to naturall causes and accidents; yet that vniuersall Floud (in the time of Noah) was powred ouer the whole face of the Earth by a power aboue Nature, and by the especial commandement of God himselfe, who at that time gaue strength of influence to the Starres, & abundance to the Fountaines of the Deepe: whereby the irruption of Waters was made more forcible, than any ability of nature could effect, or any second causes, by whatsoeuer vnion, could performe, without receiuing from the Fountain of all power strength, & faculties supernaturall. Henricus Mechlinienſis, a Scholler of Albertus Magnus, in his Commentaries vpon the great coniunctions of Albu Masar, obserueth, that before the Floud of Noah, the like coniunction of Iupiter and Saturne, happened in the last degree of Cancer, against that constellation since called the Ship of Argos; by which the Floud of Noah might be fore-told, because Cancer is both a watrie Signe, and the House of the Moone, which is the Ladie of the Sea, and of Moysture, according to the rules of Astronomie, and common experience. And this opinion Petrus de Aliaco vpon Genesis confirmeth, affirming, that although Noah did well know this Floud by diuine reuelation, yet (this coniunction being notorious) he could not be ignorant of the second causes thereof: for those were not onely signes, but also working causes, by strength receiued from the first cause, which is God himselfe: and further, that by * Catarractæ Cæli (Englished the Windores of Heauen) Moses meant this great and watrie coniunction; the word (Catarractæ) signifying flowing downe or comming downe. Now (saith P. de Aliaco) it pleased God to ordaine by the course of the Heauens such a constellation, by which all men might behold therein their destruction towards, and thereby forsake those wicked wayes wherein they walked, and call vnto God for mercy.

* The word ἀναπέτασμα properly signifieth any place of stoppage, against which the force of the water being naturally carryed downwards, dasheth and breaketh; of ἀράσσω, allido, or frango. Hence because Windores doe not only open, but also shut, the word hath been expounded (Windores) for Barres or Floud-gates.

Of this iudgement was Gul. Parisiensis, who vnderstood, that the words Catarractæ Cæli, or Windores of Heauen, were to be taken for the former coniunction, or for these watrie Signes, Cancer, Pisces, Pleiades, Hyades, and Orion; and of the Plants, Mars, Venus and the Moone: which are the forcible causes of the greatest Inundations. His owne words are these: Nondum intelligo Prophetam Hebræorum Catarractas Cæli vocâsse, nisi partes illas Cæli, quæ generatiuæ sunt Pluuiarum & Inundationum Aquarum, quales sunt signa aquatica, vt Cancer, &c. as aforesaid. As yet (saith he) I perceiue not what the Prophet of the Hebrewes meaneth by those words (Catarractæ Cæli, or Windores of Heauen) vnlesse he thereby vnderstanding those Celestiall powers, by whose influences are engendred the Raine, and Inundations of Waters, such as are the watrie Signes of Cancer, &c.

But in a word, as it might please God, that in the course of his vnsearchable Wisdom this coniunction should at such time be: so did he (as aforesaid) adde vigor and faculty, and gaue to euery operation encrease of vertues, violent eruptions to Springs & Fountaines, commanding them to cast out the whole treasure and heape of their waters; taking retention from the Clouds, and condensing ayre into water by the ministerie of his Angels, or howsoeuer else best pleased his All-powerfulnesse.

§. VI.

That there was no need of any new Creation of Matter to make the vniuersall Floud: And what are Catarractæ Cæli, Gen. 7. Vers. 11.

NOw if it be obiected, that God doth not create any thing of new; (for God resteth the seuenth day: (that is) he did not then after create any new species) which granted, it may seeme that then all the Earth and Ayre had not waters sufficient to couer the habitable World fifteene Cubits aboue the highest Mountaines. Of this proposition, whether God hath so restrayned himselfe, or no, I will not dispute; but for the consequent (which is) that the World had want of water to ouer-couer the highest Mountaines, I take that conceit to be vnlearned and foolish: for it is written, that the Fountaines of the great Deepe were broken vp (that is) the waters forsooke the very bowels of the Earth; and all whatsoeuer was dispersed therein, pierced & brake through the face thereof. Then let vs consider, that the Earth had aboue one and twentie thousand miles, the Diameter of the Earth, according to that circle, seuen thousand mile, and then from the Superficies to the Center some three thousand fiue hundred miles. Take then the highest Mountaine of the World, Caucasus, Taurus, Olympus, or Atlas, the Mountaines of Armenia or Scythia, or that (of all other the highest) in Tenuerif, and I doe not finde, that he that looketh highest, stretcheth aboue thirtie miles vpright. It is not then impossible, answering reason with reason, that all those waters mixed within the Earth three thousand fiue hundred miles deepe; should not well helpe to couer the space of thirtie miles in height, this thirtie miles vpright being found in the depths of the Earth one hundred and sixteene times: for the Fountaines of the great Deepe were broken vp, and the waters drawne out of the bowels of the Earth. Secondly, if we consider what proportion the Earth beareth to the extension of the Ayre ouer and aboue it, wee shall finde the difference exceeding great. If then it pleased God to condense but so much of this Ayre, as euery where compasseth and embraceth the Earth, which condensation is a conuersion of Ayre into Water, a change familiar in those Elements, it will not seeme strange to men of iudgement, yea but of ordinarie vnderstanding, that the Earth (God so pleasing) was couered ouer with Waters, without any new Creation.

Lastly,

Lastly, for the opinions of Gulielmus Parisiensis, and Aliacensis, to which I may adde Beroſus and others, That ſuch a coniunction there was, fore-ſhewing that deſtruction by Waters which followed; and that by the word Cataractæ Cœli, or Windores of Heauen, was meant this coniunction; there needes no other anſwer than that obſeruation of Ludouicus Viues, who affirmeth, That by the graueſt Aſtrologian it was obſerued, that in the yeere 1524. there ſhould happen the like coniunction as at Noahs Floud; than which (ſaith he) there was neuer a more faire, drie, and ſeaſonable yeere: the like deſtruction was prophecied of the yeere 1588. But Picus Earle of Mirandula proueth, that there could not be any ſuch coniunction at that time.

To conclude, I find no other myſterie in the word Catarractæ Cœli, than that the clouds were meant thereby: Moſes vſing the word Windores of Heauen (if that be the ſenſe of the word) to expreſſe the violence of the Raynes, and powring downe of Waters. For whoſoeuer hath ſeene thoſe fallings of water, which ſometimes happen in the Indies, which are called the Spowts, (where clouds do not breake into drops, but fall with a reſiſtleſſe violence in one body) may properly vſe that manner of ſpeech which Moſes did; That the Windores or Floud-gates of Heauen opened: (which is) That waters fell contrarie to cuſtome, and that order which we call naturall. God then looſened the power retentiue in the vppermoſt ayre, and the waters fell in abundance: Behold (ſayth IOB) he with-holdeth the Waters, and they drie vp (or better in Latine, Et omnia ſiccantur; And all things are dryed vp) but when he ſendeth them out, they deſtroy the Earth: And in the 26. Chapter: He bindeth the Waters in the Clouds. But theſe Bonds God looſed at that time of the generall Floud, & called vp the Waters which ſlept in the great Deepe; and theſe ioyning together, couered the Earth, till they had performed the worke of his will: which done, he then commanded them to returne into their darke and vaſt Caues, and the reſt (by a winde) rarified againe into ayre, formerly condenſed into drops. Iob c. 12. v. 15. Gen. 8. 1.

Of ſome remainder of the memorie of NOAH among the Heathen.

NOAH, commanded by God, before the fall of thoſe Waters, entred the Arke which he had built, with his own Wife, and his Sonnes, and his Sonnes Wiues, taking with them of euery Creature which tooke life by generation, ſeuen of the cleane, & of the vncleane, two. Noah, according to Philo, ſignifieth quietneſſe: after others, and according to the prophecie of his Father Lamech, ceſſation; to whom after-times gaue many Names, anſwering his antiquitie, zeale, vertue, and other qualities: as, The firſt Ogyges, becauſe in the time of the Grecian Ogyges there was alſo a great Floud of Achaia: Saturne they called him, becauſe he was the Father of Nations: Others gaue him the Name of Prometheus, who was ſaid to ſteale away Iupiters fire; fire in that place being taken and vnderſtood for the knowledge of God and heauenly things. Others thinke, that he was ſo called for his excellent wiſedome and foreſight. He had alſo the Name of Ianus, (id eſt) vinoſus, becauſe Iain ſignifieth Wine in the Hebrew. And ſo Tertullian findes him written in Libris Ritualibus, in the Bookes of Ceremonies, preceding both Saturne, Vranus, and Ioue: which three enioyed an elder time than all the other ancienteſt fayned gods. And this Name Iain is taken from the Hebrew and Syrian, and not from the Latine: for it was in vſe before there was any Latine Nation, or any Kingdome by that Name knowne. Of the antiquitie of Ianus, Fabius Pictor giueth this teſtimonie: IANI atate nulla erat Monarchia, quia mortalibus pectoribus nondum haſerat vlla regnandi cupiditas, &c. Vinum & Far primus populus docuit IANVS ad ſacrificia: primus enim Aras & Pomœria & ſacra docuit; In the time of IANVS (ſaith he) there was no Monarchie: for the deſire of rule had not then folded it ſelfe about the hearts of men. IANVS firſt taught the people to ſacrifice Wine and Meale: he firſt ſet vp Altars, inſtituted Gardens and ſolitarie Groues, wherein they vſed to pray; with other holy Rites and Ceremonies. A greater teſtimonie than this there cannot be found among the Heathen, which in all agreeth ſo well with the Scriptures. For firſt, whileſt Noah flouriſhed, there was not any King, or Monarch; Nimrod being the firſt that tooke on him ſoueraigne authority. Secondly, Noah after the Floud was the firſt that planted the Vine, and became a Huſbandman; and therefore offered the First-fruits of both (to wit) Wine and Meale. Thirdly, he was the firſt that rayſed an Altar, & offered ſacrifice to God; a thankſgiuing for Gen. 9. 20. Gen. 8. 20.

for his merciful goodneſſe towards him. Noah was alſo ſignified in the Name of Bifrons (which was giuen to Ianus) becauſe he beheld the times both before & after the Floud.

Arn. cont. Gent. lib. 6. Quia præterita nouerit, & futura proſpexerit, ſaith ARNOBIVS: Becauſe he knew what was paſt, and prouided for what was to come. He was alſo in the perſon of Ianus ſhadowed by the Name of Chaos, and Semen Orbis, The Seed of the World: becauſe as out of that confuſed Heape was drawne all the kinds of Beaſts and Plants, ſo from Noah came all Mankind. Whereof Ouid in the perſon of Ianus:

Ouid. de Faſti. lib. 1.

He was alſo intituled Cælum and Sol, Heauen and the Sunne, for his excellent knowledge in Aſtronomie: Vertumnus, Bacchus, and Liber Pater; not that latter, which Diod. Siculus and Alex. Aphrodiſeus ſo call, becauſe he was the reſtorer of the Greekes to their former libertie, but in reſpect of the Floud. For the Greekes called Liber Ὑης, and his Nurſes Hyades, of Rayne, becauſe Noah entred the Arke when the Sunne ioyned with the Starres Hyades, a conſtellation in the Brow or Necke of Taurus, and euer after a Monument of Noahs Floud. He was alſo by others ſurnamed Triton, a Marine god, the ſonne of Neptune; becauſe he liued in ſafetie on the Waters. So was he knowne by the name

Nat. Com. l. 5. c. 13. of Dionyſus, quaſi Διὸνοσον, mentem pungens, Bite-braine, or Wit-ſtinger; though Diodorus conceiue otherwiſe, and deriue that name à Patre & Loco; Of his Father, and the place of his Birth, (to wit) of Ioue, and Niſa, a Towne of Arabia fœlix, ſaith Suidas out of Orpheus. He had alſo the by-name of Taurus, or Taurophagus; becauſe he firſt yoked Cælius. Gen. 9. 20. Oxen, and tylled the ground: according to that of Moſes; And NOAH became an Huſbandman. Now howſoeuer the Grecians vaunt of their Theban Bacchus (otherwiſe Dionyſus) it is certaine, that the Name was borrowed, and the Inuention ſtolne from Noah.

Stuck. in libris conuiualibus, & Daneus de primamundi ætate. But this Name of Bacchus, more anciently Boëcus, was taken (ſaith Gul. Stuckius, and out of him Daneus) from Noachus, (N) being changed into (B); and it is the more probable, becauſe it cannot be doubted but that Noah was the firſt planter of the Vine after the Floud: and of Noah (the firſt and ancient Bacchus) were all thoſe fables deuiſed, of which Diodorus complayneth in his fourth Booke and fifth Chapter. This firſt Bacchus (to wit) Noah, was ſurnamed Nyſius, of the Mountaine Nyſa in India; where the Grecian Bacchus neuer came, whatſoeuer themſelues faine of his enterpriſes: and theſe Mountaines of Nyſa ioyne with thoſe of Paropaniſus, and thoſe other Eaſterne Mountaines, on which the Arke of Noah reſted after the Floud.

Furthermore, to the end that the memorie of this ſecond Parent of Mankind might the better be preſerued, there were founded by his Iſſues many great Cities, which bare his Name, with many Riuers & Mountaines; which oftentimes forgat that it was done

Plin. l. 6. Steph. de Verb. Herod. l. 4. Strabo l. 7. in his regard, becauſe the many Names giuen him brought the ſame confuſion to places as to himſelfe. Notwithſtanding all which, we find the Citie of Noah vpon the bankes of the red Sea, and elſewhere: the Riuer of Noas in Thrace, which Strabo calleth Noarus; Ptolomie, Danus; diuiding Illyria from Panonia. Thus much for the Name.

§. VIII.

Of ſundry particulars touching the Arke: as the place where it was made, the matter, faſhion, and name.

NOw in what part of the World Noah built the Arke, it doth not appeare in the Scriptures, neither doe I find any approued Author that hath written thereof: onely Goropius Becanus in his Indo-Scythia conceiueth, that Noah built his Arke neere the Mountains of Caucaſus, becauſe on thoſe Hils are found the goodlieſt Cedars: for when Alex. Macedon made the warre among a people, called Nyſæi, inhabiting the other ſide of Caucaſus, he found all their Burials & Sepulchers wrought ouer with Cedar. To this place (ſaith Becanus) Noah repaired, both to ſeparate himſelf from the reprobate Giants, who rebelled againſt God & Nature, as alſo becauſe he would not be interrupted in the building of the Arke; to which alſo he addeth the conueniencie of Riuers, to tranſport the Timber which he vſed, without troubling any other Carriages.

Onely

Onely this we are sure of, that the Arke was built in some part of the Easterne World, & to my vnderstanding, not far from the place where it rested after the Floud. For Noah did not vse any Mast or Sayle (as in other Ships) & therefore did the Arke no otherwise moue, than the Hulke or body of a Ship doth in a calme Sea. Also, because it is not probable, that during these continuall and downe-right Raines there were any Windes at all, therefore was the Arke little moued from the place where it was fashioned and set together: for it is written, God made a Wind to passe vpon the Earth, and the Waters ceased. And therefore it may be gathered, that during the fall of the Waters, there was not any Storme or forcible winde at all, which could driue the Arke any great distance from the place where it was first by the Waters lifted vp. This is also the more probable, if that ancient opinion be true, as it is very likely, that the Arke had fundum planum, a flat bottom, and not raysed in forme of a Ship, with a sharpenesse forward, to cut the waues, for the better speed. Gen. 8. a

This kind of Vessell the Hebrewes call Thebet, and the Greekes Larnax, for so they termed Deucalions Ship: and some say, that the Hill Parnassus, to which in eight dayes hee arriued, was first called Larnassus, and by the change of (L) into (P) Parnassus; but Pausanias thinkes that it tooke name of a Sonne of the Nymph Cleodore, called Parnassus, the Inuentor of Augurations. Steph. de Vrb. fol. 227.

Peucerus findes the word (Parnassus) to haue no affinitie with the Greeke, but thinkes it deriued from the Hebrew word Nahas, which signifieth Augurations and Diuinations: or from Har or Parai, as in his Chapter of Oracles in the Leafe before cited. De Oracul fol. 94.

Iosephus calls the Arke Machina, by the generall name of a huge Frame; and Epiphanius out of the Hebrew, Aron: but herein lyeth the difference betweene Aron and Thebet, That Aron signifieth properly the Arke of the Sanctuarie, but Thebet such a Vessell, as swimmeth, and beareth it selfe vpon the Waters. Epiph. in Ancor.

Lastly, this Arke of Noah differed from the fashion of a ship in this, that it had a Couer and Roofe, with a Crest in the middest thereof, and the sides declining like the Roofe of an House, to the end, both to cast off the Waters, and that thereunder Noah himself and his children might shelter, and separate themselues from the noysomnesse of the many Beasts, which filled the other roomes and parts of the Arke. Gen. 6. 4.

Of what Wood the Arke was built, it is vncertaine. The Hebrew word Gopher once and in this place onely vsed, is diuersly vnderstood: and though the matter be of little importance, yet this difference there is, That the Geneua Translation calls it Pine-tree; the Rabbine, Cedar; the Seuentie, square Timber; the Latine, smooth Timber. Others will haue it Cypres Trees, as dedicated to the dead, because Cypres is worne at Funerals. But out of doubt, if the word Gopher signifie any speciall kind of Timber, Noah obeyed the voyce of God therin; if not, he was not then curious as touching the kind or nature of the wood, hauing the promise of God, and his grace and mercie for his defence: For with Noah God promised to establish his couenant. Plinie affirmeth, that in Egypt it was the vse to build ships of Cedar, which the wormes eate not; and he auoweth, that he saw in Vtica, in the Temple of Apollo, Cedar beames, laid in the time of the foundation of the Citie, and that they were still sound in his time, which was about 1188. yeers after: prouing thereby, that this kind of wood was not subiect to putrifying or mouldring in a very long time. But in that it is easie to cut, light to carie, and of a sweete sauour, lasting also better than any other wood, & because neere the place where the Arke rested, there are found great store of these Cedar trees, as also in all the mountains of the East, besides those of Libanus, it is probable enough that the Arke might be of that wood: which hath, besides the other commodities, the greatest length of Timber, and therefore fittest to build ships withall. Pererius conceiueth, that the Arke had diuers sorts of Timber, & that the bottome had of one sort, the decke & partition of another; all which may be true or false, if Gopher may be taken for Timber in generall. True it is, that Cedar will serue for all parts of a Ship, as well for the body, as for Masts and Yards. But Noah had most respect to the direction receiued from God: to the length, breadth, and height, and to the partitions of the Arke; and to pitch it, and to diuide it into Cabines: thereby to seuer the cleane beasts from the vncleane, and to preserue their seuerall sorts of food; & that it might be capable of all kind of liuing creatures, according to the numbers by God appointed. All which when Noah had gathered together, he cast his confidence wholly on God; who by his Angels steered this Ship without a Rudder, and directed it without V. 18. Plin. l. 16. c. 40.

without the helpe of a Compasse, or the North star. The Pitch which Noah vsed, is by some supposed to haue beene a kind of Bitumen, whereof there is great quantitie about the Valley of Sodome and Gomorrha, now the dead Sea, or Asphaltes, and in the Region of Babylon, and in the West Indies: and herein it exceedeth other Pitch, that it melts not with the Sunne, but by the fire onely, after the manner of hard Waxe.

Petrus.

That the Arke was of sufficient capacitie.

THe Arke, according to Gods commandement, had of length three hundred Cubites, fiftie of bredth, and thirtie deepe or high: by which proportion, it had six parts of length to one of bredth, and ten times in length to one of depth; of which S. AVGVSTINE: Praeuidebat ergo figura est peregrinantis in hoc seculo Ciuitatis Dei, (hoc est) Ecclesiæ, quæ fit salua per lignum, in quo pependit Mediator Dei & hominum, homo Iesus Christus: nam & mensura ipsa longitudinis, altitudinis, latitudinisq; eius significat corpus humanum, in cuius veritate ad homines prænunciatus est venturus, & venit, &c. (without doubt (saith he) it is a figure of the Citie of God trauailing in this world as a stranger (that is) of the Church, saued by the Tree, whereupon the Mediator betweene God and Man, the Man Iesus Christ did hang: for euen the very measure of the length, height, and bredth, answereth the shape of Mans body, in the truth whereof the comming of Christ was fore-told and performed.

De Ciuit. Dei, l. 15. c. 26.

By what kind of Cubite the Arke was measured, it hath beene a disputed question among the Fathers, and others; and the differences are in effect these: The first kind of Cubit (called the Common) containeth one foot and a halfe, measured from the sharpe of the elbow to the point of the middle finger. The second (the Palme-Cubit) which taketh one handfull more than the common. The third is called Regius Cubitus, or the Persian Cubit, which exceedeth the common Cubit three ynches. The fourth is the sacred Cubit, which containeth the common or vulgar Cubit double, wanting but a quarter or fourth part. Lastly, there is a fift Cubit, called Geometrical, which containeth six common Cubits. But of all these sorts, which were commonly measured by the vulgar Cubit, the alteration and diminution of mens statures hath made the difference. For as there is now a lesse proportion of bodies, so is the common Cubit, from the sharpe of the elbow to the point of the middle finger, of lesse length than it was in elder times.

S. Augustine considering the many sorts of Beasts and Birds which the Arke held, with their food and water, was sometimes of opinion, that the Arke had proportion after the Geometricall Cubit, which containeth almost sixe of the Common: For, measuring the Arke by the vulgar Cubit, it did not exceed the capacitie of that Vessell built by Hiero of Syracuse, or the Ship of Ptolomie Philo-pater. But S. Augustine (who at the first was led by Origen) changed his iudgement as touching the Geometricall Cubit; and found, vpon better consideration, that there needed not so huge a Body to preserue all sorts of Creatures, by God appointed to be reserued. For it was not needfull to take any kindes of Fishes into the Arke, because they were kept liuing (saith S. Augustine) in their owne element: Non fuit necesse conseruare in Arca, quæ possent in aquis viuere; non solum mersa sicut Pisces, verùm super-natantia, sicut multa alites: It was not needfull to conserue those Creatures in the Arke, which could liue in the Waters; and not onely Fishes which can liue vnder water, but also those Fowles which sit and swim on them. And againe, Terra, non aqua, maledicta, quia ADAM non huius, sed illius fructum vetitum comedit: It was the Earth, and not the Waters, which God cursed; for of the forbidden fruite of the Earth, and not of the Sea, did ADAM eat. So as S. Augustine gathereth hereupon (as afore said) that so huge a Frame needed not.

Aug. de Ciuit. Dei, lib. 5. c. 27.

And if we looke with the eyes of iudgement hereunto, wee shall finde nothing monstrous therein; although the imaginations of men, who (for the most part) haue more of mischiefe and of ignorance, than of any reuerend reason, found many impossibilities in this worke of God. But it is manifest, and vndoubtedly true, that many of the Species, which now seeme differing, and of seuerall kindes, were not then in rerum natura. For those Beasts which are of mixt natures, either they were not in that age, or else it was not needfull to preserue them, seeing they might be generated againe by others: as the Mules, the Hyæna's, & the like; the one begotten by Asses and Mares, and the other

by

by Foxes and Wolues. And whereas by diſcouering of ſtrange Lands, wherein there are found diuers Beaſts & Birds, differing in colour or ſtature from thoſe of theſe Northerne parts; it may be ſuppoſed by a ſuperficiall conſideration, that all thoſe which weare red and pyed Skinnes, or Feathers, are differing from thoſe that are leſſe painted, and weare plaine ruſſet or blacke; they are much miſtaken that ſo thinke. And for my own opinion, I find no difference, but only in magnitude, betweene the Cat of Europe, and the Ownce of India; & euen thoſe Dogges which are become wilde in Hiſpaniola, with which the Spaniards vſed to deuoure the naked Indians, are now changed to Wolues, and begin to deſtroy the breed of their Cattell, and doe alſo oftentimes teare aſunder their owne Children. The common Crow and Rooke of India is full of red feathers in the drown'd and low Iſlands of Caribana; and the Black-bird and Thruſh hath his feathers mixt with blacke and carnation, in the North parts of Virginia. The Dog-fiſh of England is the Sharke of the South Ocean: For if colour or magnitude made a difference of Species, then were the Negro's, which we call the Blacke-Mores, non animalia rationalia, not Men, but ſome kind of ſtrange Beaſts: and ſo the Gyants of the South America ſhould be of another kind, than the people of this part of the World. We alſo ſee it daily, that the natures of Fruits are changed by tranſplantation, ſome to better, ſome to worſe, eſpecially with the change of Clymate. Crabs may be made good Fruit by often grafting, and the beſt Melons will change in a yeere or two to common Coweummers, by being ſet in a barren Soyle. Therefore taking the kindes preciſely of all Creatures, as they were by God created, or out of the Earth by his Ordinance produced; the Arke, after the meaſure of the common Cubit, was ſufficiently capacious to containe of all, according to the number by God appointed: For if we adde but halfe a foot of meaſure to the common Cubit, which had a foot and a halfe of Giantly ſtature (and leſſe allowance we cannot giue to the difference betweene them and vs) then did the Arke containe 600. foot in length, and 100. foot in bredth, and 60. foot deepe. Acoſt. hiſt. India

But firſt of all, to make it manifeſt that the Geometricall Cubit is not vſed in the Scripture, the ſtature of the Giants therein named may ſuffice. For if the Bed of Og, King of Baſan, had beene nine Geometricall Cubites long, it had taken 54. Cubites of the common, which make 80. foot: and Goliah, who had the length of ſix Cubites and a handfull, which makes nine foot and a handfull (a proportion credible) if theſe Cubites had beene Geometricall, then had beene 54. foot in height, and vpwards, which were monſtrous and moſt incredible; for (according to this proportion) had the head of Goliah beene nine foot long, and farre weightier and bigger than all Dauids bodie, who carried it away. Deut. 3. 11. 1. Sam. 17. 4.

Againe, if the Geometricall Cubit had beene vſed for a Meaſure in the Scripture, as many Commenters haue obſerued, then had the Altar (appointed to containe fiue Cubites of length, fiue of bredth, and three of height) haue reached the length of 27. foot vpright, and ſo muſt their Prieſts haue aſcended by ſteps or Ladders to haue performed their Sacrifices thereon, which was contrarie to Gods Commandement giuen in theſe words: Thou ſhalt not go vp with ſteppes vnto mine Altar, that thy ſhame be not diſcouered thereon; and therefore was the Altar but three common Cubits high, which make foure foot, that their Prieſts ſtanding thereby might execute their Office: Wherefore I may conclude, that the Cubit mentioned in the Scriptures was not the Geometricall, but the ordinarie Cubit of one foot and a halfe, according to the meaſure of Giantly ſtature, which meaſure (doubtleſſe) might giue much the more capacitie to the Arke, although it be alſo probable, that as the Men were, ſo were the Horſes whereon they rode, and all other creatures of a correſpondent ſize. And yet (as I take it) though by this meanes there were not any whit the more roome in the Arke, it were not hard to conceiue, how all the diſtinct Species of Animals, whoſe liues cannot be preſerued in the Waters, might according to their preſent quantities be contained in a Veſſell of thoſe dimenſions which the Arke had; allowing to the Cubit one foot and a halfe of our now vſuall meaſure: whence it followeth of neceſſitie, that thoſe large Bodies which were in the dayes of Noah might haue roome ſufficient in the Arke, which was meaſured by a Cubit of length proportionable. Exod. 20. 26.

How the appointed number of creatures to be ſaued, (that is) ſeuen of the cleane, two of the vncleane (with neceſſarie foode) might haue place in the Arke; Buteo hath very learlearnedly declared: the briefe summe of whose discourse to that purpose, is this. The length of the Arke was three hundred Cubites, which multiplied by the breadth, namely fiftie Cubits, and the product by the height of thirtie Cubites, sheweth the whole Concauitie to haue beene 450000. Now whereas the posts, walls, and other partitions of Lodgings may seeme to haue taken vp a great part of the hollow: the height of the roofe, which (the perpendicular being one Cubit) contained 7500. cubical Cubes, was a sufficient recompence: If therefore in a Ship of such greatnesse we seeke roome for 89. distinct Species of Beasts, or (lest any should be omitted) for 100. seuerall kinds, we shall easily find place both for them, and for the Birds, which in bignesse are no way answerable to them, and for meat to sustaine them all. For there are three sorts of Beasts, whose bodies are of a 10 quantitie best knowne, the Beefe, the Sheepe, and the Wolfe: to which the rest may be reduced, by saying, (according to Aristotle) that one Elephant is answerable to foure Beeues, one Lyon to two Wolues, and so of the rest. Of Beasts, some feede on vegetables, others on flesh. There are one and thirtie kinds of the greater sort, feeding on vegetables: of which number, onely three are cleane, according to the Law of Moses, whereof seuen of a kind entred into the Arke, namely, three couples for breede, and one odde one for sacrifice: the other eight and twentie kindes were taken by two of each kinde, so that in all there were in the Arke one and twenty great Beasts cleane, & six and fiftie vncleane, estimable for largenesse as ninetie one Beeues; yet for a supplement (lest perharps any Species be omitted) let them be valued as a hundred and twentie Beeues. 20 Of the lesser sort feeding on vegetables, were in the Arke sixe and twentie kinds, estimable with good allowance for supply, as fourescore Sheepe. Of those which deuoure flesh were two and thirtie kinds, answerable to threescore and foure Wolues. All these two hundred and eightie Beasts might be kept in one storie or roome of the Arke, in their seuerall Cabbines; their meate in a second: the Birds and their prouision in a third, with place to spare for Noah and his family, and all their necessaries.

§. X.

That the Arke rested vpon part of the Hill Taurus (or Caucasus) betweene the East Indies, and Scythia. 30

I. I.

A preterition of some questions lesse materiall: with a note of the vse of this question, to finde out the Metropolis of Nations.

What time Noah tooke to build the Arke, I leaue to others to dispute: but hee receiued the Commandement from God a hundred yeers before the waters fell; and had therefore choice of time and leysure sufficient. As for the number of Deckes & Partitions, which Origen diuides into foure, S. Augustine into three, I will not trouble the Reader with the controuersie: or whether those creatures which sometimes rest on the Land, other times in the Waters, as the Crocodiles (now called Alligatos) the 40 Sea-Cowes or Sea-Horses, were kept in the Arke, or no, I thinke it a needlesse curiositie; and yet to this saith Pererius, and others before him, that a Fish-poole might be made as well within the Arke, as in Hiero his Ship of Syracuse. Lastly, to consider or labour to disproue the fooleries of the Hebrewes, who suppose that the Arke was lightened by a Carbuncle, or had Windows of Crystall to receiue in Light, and keep out Water, were but to reuiue the buried vanities of former times. But that which I seeke most to satisfie my selfe and others in, is, in what part of the World the Arke rested after the Floud: because the true vnderstanding of some of these places (as the Seat of the terrestriall Paradise, and the resting of the Arke) doe onely and truly teach the Worlds Plantation, and the beginning of Nations, before and after the Floud, and all storie, as well generall as 50 particular, thereby may be the better vnderstood.

§. II.

A proposall, of the common opinion, that the Arke rested vpon some of the Hills of Armenia.

And first, for the true place where the Arke rested after the Floud, and from what part of the World the Children of Noah trauailed to their first settlement and plan-plantation, I am reſolued (without any preſumption) that therein the moſt writers were vtterly miſtaken. And I am not led ſo to thinke out of my Humour or newneſſe of opinion, or ſingularitie; but doe herein ground my ſelfe on the originall & firſt truth, which is the word of God, and after that vpon reaſon, and the moſt probable circumſtances thereon depending. For whereas it is written, that the Arke ſtaird vpon one of the mountaines of Ararat, which the Chaldean Paraphraſt hath conuerted Kardu, meaning the hils Gordai or Gordiai in Armenia the greater: (as the words Gordai and Kardu ſeeme to be one and the ſame) of which opinion alſo the moſt of our Interpreters are; I finde neither Scripture nor reaſon which teacheth any ſuch thing: (to wit) that it reſted on that part of Ararat, which is in the greater Armenia. Nicolaus Damaſcenus cals this mountaine of Ararat, Baris, being the ſame which the Chaldean nameth Kardu, to which mountaine the Fryer Annius (citing this place out of Ioſephus) makes him finde another adioyning, called Ocila, and to ſay that the Arke (of which Moſes the Lawgiuer of the Hebrewes wrote) did firſt take ground on this Ocila. But I doe not finde any ſuch mountaine in being, as this Ocila; neither is there any mention of it in the place of Ioſephus. Strabo remembreth a Promontorie in Arabia fælix, of that name; and Plinie findes a Mart-towne ſo called in the ſame, which Ptolomie cals Ocilis, Pinetus Acyla, and Niger Zidon. But this Ocila of Damaſcenus, or rather of Annius, ſeemeth to bee one and a part of the Armenian mountaines. Beroſus calleth thoſe mountaines of Armenia Gordiei, and Curtius Cordei: Ptolomie Gordei and Gordiai: of which the Countrie next adioyning is by this Nicolaus Damaſcenus called Niniyada, perhaps (as Becanus coniectures) for Milyada or rather Minni: which word is vſed for Armenia Minor. And the very word of Armenia ſeemes to be compounded of this word Minni, and Aram: as if we ſhould ſay Minni of Syria; for that Armenia alſo was a part of Syria, Plinie witneſſeth. Epiphanius placeth the Cardyes about theſe mountaines, whom others call Gordieni or Gordeni. The mountaines are ſeated apart from all other to the North of that Ledge of the mountaines called Taurus, or Niphates in the plaines of Armenia the great, neere the Lake Thoſpitis: whence the Riuer of Tigris floweth in 75. degrees of longitude, and 41. and 42. degrees of latitude. One of the mountaines Gordiai (that which ſurmounteth the reſt) Epiphanius cals Lubar, which in the Armenian ſignifieth a place of deſcent: but this out of Ioſephus; which name (ſaith Iunius) was of the euent, becauſe of Noahs comming downe with his children. But this alſo I take to be a ſuppoſed euent; ſeeing any hil from whence on euery ſide we muſt deſcend, may thus be called: as Iunius corrects the place in Ioſephus λοὐβαρι (Kubaris.) That the place is thus to be read, he coniectureth, becauſe Ioſep. l. 1. c. 4. ſayes, the place is called ἀποβατήριον (as it were the deſcent or comming downe) and Epiphan. l. 1. contr. Hæreſ. cals it λίβαρ. which word in the Armenian and Ægyptian tongue ſignifieth deſcent, of Lubar, which is to deſcend; whence alſo Lubra is a Synagogue, becauſe it was commonly built on ſome high place: whereof alſo the Latine Delubrum may ſeeme to bee deriued; and Act. 6. 9. they that belonged to the Synagogue of the Ægyptians are called Libertini, for Lubra tenu. Yet this opinion hath beene embraced from age to age, receiuing a habit of ſtrength by time, and allowance without any farther examination; although the name of Lubar might otherwiſe rightly bee giuen, eſpecially to that mountaine, by reaſon that the paſſage was more faire, vp and downe vnto it, than to any of the reſt adioyning.

The firſt argument againſt the common opinion. They that came to build Babel, would haue come ſooner, had they come from ſo neere a place as Armenia.

BVt there are many arguments to perſwade me, that the Arke of Noah did not reſt it ſelfe in any part of Armenia, and that the mountaine Ararat was not Baris, nor any one of the Gordiæan mountaines.

For the firſt, it is agreed by all which follow Beroſus, that it was in the 130. yeere, or in the yeere 131. after the floud, when Nimrod came into the valley of Shinar, which Valley was afterward called Babylonia, Chuſh, and Chaldæa. If then the Arke had firſt found land in Armenia, it is very vnprobable, that the children of Noah which came into that valley could haue ſpent ſo many yeeres in ſo ſhort a paſſage: ſeeing the Region of Meſopotamia war onely interiacent, which might by eaſie iourneyes haue beene paſt ouer in twentie dayes; and to haſten and helpe which paſſage, the nauigable riuer of Tygris offered it ſelfe, which is euery where tranſpaſſable by boates of great burden: ſo as where the Deſart on the one ſide reſiſted their expedition, the riuer on the contrary ſide ſerued to aduance it; the riuer riſing out of the ſame Ledge of mountaines, or at the foote of them, vvhere the Arke of Noah vvas firſt ſuppoſed to ſettle it ſelfe; Then if the Nations vvhich followed Nimrod ſtill doubted the ſurpriſe of a ſecond floud (according to the opinions of the ancient Hebrewes) it ſoundeth ill to the eare of reaſon, that they would haue ſpent many yeeres in that low and ouerflowne Valley of Meſopotamia, ſo called of the many Riuers which imbroyder or compaſſe it: for the effects witneſſed their affections, and the workes vvhich they vndertooke, their vnbeliefe; being no ſooner arriued in Shinar, but they began to prouide themſelues of a defence (by erecting Babel) againſt any future or feared inundation. Now at Babel it was that Nimrod began his Kingdome, the firſt known Citie of the world, founded after the floud about 131 yeers, or (as others ſuppoſe) ten yeeres later: though (for my ſelfe) I rather thinke, that they vndertooke that worke in two reſpects; firſt, to make themſelues famous, To get vs a name (ſaith the Text:) Secondly, thereby to vſurpe dominion ouer the reſt.

†. IIII.

The ſecond argument, That the Eaſterne people were moſt ancient in populoſitie, and in all humane glory.

FOr a ſecond Argument: The ciuilitie, magnificence and multitude of people (wherein the East parts of the world firſt abounded) hath more weight than any thing which hath beene, or can be ſaid for Armenia, and for Noahs taking land there. And that this is true, the vſe of Printing and Artillerie (among many other things which the East had) may eaſily perſwade vs, that thoſe Sunne-riſing Nations were the moſt ancient. The certaintie of this report, that the East Indians (time out of minde) haue had Gunnes and Ordnance of batterie, confirmed by the Portugals and others, make vs now to vnderſtand, That the place of Philoſtratus in vita Apollonij Tianæi, l. 2. c. 14. is no fable, though expreſt in fabulous words: vvhen he ſaith, that the vviſe men, vvhich dwell betweene Hyphaſis and Ganges, vſe not themſelues to goe forth into battaile: but that they driue away their enemies vvith thunder and lightning ſent from Iupiter. By which meanes there it is ſaid, that Hercules Ægyptius and Bacchus, ioyning their forces, were defeated there; and that this Hercules there caſt away his golden ſhield. For the inuention of letters vvas ignorantly aſcribed to Cadmus, becauſe hee brought them firſt into Greece: of which the people (then rude and ſauage) had reaſon to giue him the honour, from whom they receiued the benefit. But it is true, that letters are no leſſe ancient than Seth or Henoch were: for they are ſaid to haue written on pillars of ſtone (as before remembred) long before the floud. But from the Eaſterne world it was that Iohn Cuthenberg a Germane, brought the deuice of Printing: by whom Conradus being inſtructed, brought the practice thereof to Rome: and after that Nicholaus Gerſon a Frenchman, bettered both the letters and inuention. And notwithſtanding that this myſterie was then ſuppoſed to be but newly borne, the Chinaes had letters long before either the Egyptians or Phœnicians; and alſo the Art of Printing, when as the Greekes had neither any ciuill knowledge, or any letters among them.

And, that this is true, both the Portugals and Spaniards haue witneſſed, who about an hundred yeeres ſince diſcouered thoſe Kingdomes, & doe now enioy their rich trades therein: for the Chinaos account all other Nations but Saluages, in reſpect of themſelues.

And to adde ſtrength to this argument, the conqueſt and ſtorie of Alex. Macedon may iuſtly be called to witneſſe, who found more Cities and ſumptuoſitie in that little Kingdome of Porus, which lay ſide by ſide to the East India, than in all his other trauails & vndertakings. For in Alexanders time learning & greatneſſe had not trauailed ſo far to the West as Rome: Alexander eſteeming of Italie but as a barbarous Countrie, and of Rome as of a Village. But it was Babylon that ſtood in his eye, and the fame of the East pierced his eares. And if we looke as farre as the Sun-riſing, and heare Paulus Venetus what hee reporteth of the vttermoſt Angle and Iſland thereof, wee ſhall finde that thoſe Nations haue ſent out, and not receiued, ſent knowledge, & not borrowed it from the West. For the farther East (to this day) the more ciuill, the farther West the more ſaluage.

And

And of the Isle of Iapan (now Zipingari) Kanetus maketh this report: Incolæ religioni, literis, & sapientiæ sunt addictissimi, & veritatis indagatores acerrimi; nihil illis frequentius oratione, quam (more nostro) sacris in delubris exercent: vnum cognoscunt Principem, vnum Deum adorant, The Ilanders are exceedingly addicted to religion, letters, and Philosophie, and most diligent searchers out of truth: there is nothing among them more frequent than prayer, which they vse in their Churches, after the manner of Christians. They acknowldge one King, and worship one God. The antiquitie, magnificence, ciuilitie, riches, sumptuous buildings, and policie in gouernment, is reported to be such by those who haue bin employed into those parts, as it seemeth to exceede (in those formerly named, and diuers other particulars) all other Kingdomes of the world.

†. V.

The third argument, From the wonderfull resistance which SEMIRAMIS found in the East Indies.

BVt for a third argument, and also of a treble strength to the rest, I lay the inuasion of Semiramis before the indifferent and aduised Reader: who may consider in what age shee liued, and how soone after the worlds new birth shee gathered her Armie (as Diodorus Siculus out of Ctesias reporteth) of more than three Millions to inuade India, to which hee adioyned also 500000. Horse, and 100000. Waggons: whereof if we beleeue but a third part, it shall suffice to prooue that India was the first planted and peopled Countrie after the floud. Now as touching the time wherein shee liued: All Historians consent, that shee was the wife of Ninus; and the most approued Writers agree, that Ninus was the Sonne of Belus, and Belus of Nimrod, that Nimrod was the Sonne of Cush, Cush of Cham, and Cham of Noah. And at such time as Nimrod came to Shinaar, hee was then a great Nation, as by the building of the Citie and Tower of Babel may appeare; and being then so multiplied and increased, the two descents cast betweene Nimrod and Semiramus, brought forth in that time those multitudes, whereof her Armie was composed. Let vs then see with whom shee encountred in that warre with this her powerfull Armie: euen with a multitude, rather exceeding, than equalling, her owne, conducted by Staurobates King of India beyond Indus; of whose multitudes this is the witnesse of Diod. Siculus. STAVROBATES auitis maioribus quàm que erant SEMIRAMIDIS copijs: STAVROBATES gathering together greater troupes than those of SEMIRAMIS. If then these numbers of Indians had beene encreased but by a Colonie sent out from Shinaar, (and that also after Babel was built, which no doubt tooke some time in the performance) this encrease in the East, and this Armie of Staurobates must haue been made of stone, or somewhat else by miracle. For as the numbers which Semiramis gathered might easily grow vp in that time, from so great a Troupe as Nimrod brought with him into Babylonia (as shall be demonstrated hereafter in the Storie of Israel) so could not any such time, by any multiplication natural, produce so many bodies of men as were in the Indian Armie victorious ouer Semiramis, if the Colonies sent thither had beene so late as Bebel ouerturned, and the confusion of Languages. For if wee allow 65. yeeres time after the Floud, before Nimrod was borne: of which, thirty yeeres to Cush ere hee begat Seba, after whom hee had Hauilah, Sabtah, Raamah, and Sabtecha: Gen. 10. 7. and then thirtie yeeres to Raamah, ere hee begat Sheba and Dedan, both which were borne before Nimrod: and fiue yeeres to his fiue elder brothers, which make fixtie fiue, and then twice thirtie yeeres for two Generations more, as for Nimrod, Sheba and Dedan with others, to beget their sonnes; and that a third Generation might grow vp, which makes in all an hundred twenty fiue yeeres, there will then remaine sixe yeeres to haue bin spent in trauailing from the East, ere they arriued in Shinaar in the yeere after the Floud 131. And so the followers of Nimrod might bee of sufficient multitude. But as for those which make him to haue arriued at Shinaar in the yeere 101. and the confusion to haue beene at Peleg's birth, these men doe all by miracle: they beget whole Nations without the helpe of time, and build Nimrods Towre in the Ayre; and not on those low and marish grounds (which require sound foundations) in the Plaines of Shinaar. For except that huge Towre were built in a day, there could bee no confusion in that yeere 101. or at Peleg's birth. And therefore it is farre more probable, that Nimrod vsurped Regall authority in the 131. yeere after the Floud, (according to Berosus) and that the worke of Babel lasted forty yeeres (according to GLYCAS) Hominibus in ea perficienda totis 40. annis incassum laborantibus; Men labouring in vaine 40. yeeres to finish it. By which account it fals out, that it was 170. yeeres after the Floud, ere a Colonie was sent into East India; which granted (the one being the maine body, and the other but a Troupe taken thence) it can hardly be beleeued, that Staurobates could haue exceeded Semiramis in numbers: who being then Empresse of all that part of the world, gathered the most of Nations into one bodie.

†. VI.

The fourth Argument from diuers considerations in the person of NOAH.

FOurthly, it is no way probable, that Noah, who knew the world before the floud, & had liued therein the long time of 600 yeeres, was all that space 130. yeers after the floud, without any certaine habitation: No, it will fall out, and better agree with reason, that Nimrod was but the conducter of those people, by Noah destined and appointed to fill and inhabit that middle part of the earth and the Westerne world; (which trauailes Noah put ouer to young and able bodies) and that Noah himselfe then couered with many yeeres, planted himselfe in the same place which God had assigned him: which was where he first came downe out of the Arke from the waters: for it is witten, that after Noah came downe out of the Arke hee planted a Vineyard, and became a Husbandman: whose businesse was to dresse and manure the earth; and not to range ouer so many parts of the world, as from Armenia into Arabia fœlix, where hee should (if the tradition be sound) haue left certaine Colonies: thence into Africa towards Triton; then into Spaine, where they say he settled other companies, and built Cities after the names of Noela and Noegla his sonnes wiues: from thence into Italie, where they say hee found his sonne Cham the Saturne of Egypt, who had corrupted the people and subiects of Gomer in his absence: with whom Noah (as they make the storie) had patience for three yeeres; but then finding no amendement, they say he banisht him out of Italie. These be but the fancies of Berosus Annianus, a plaine imitation of the Græcian fables. For let euery reasonable man conceiue, what it was to trauaile farre in such a forrest as the World was, when after so great a rotting of the earth by the floud, the same lay waste and ouer-growne for 130. or 140. yeeres, and wherein there could hardly be found either part or passage through which men were able to creepe for woods, bushes and bryars that in those yeeres were growne vp.

And there are so many reasons, prouing that Noah neuer came into the valley of Shinaar, as we need not suspect his passage into Italie or Spaine: For Noah, who was Father of all those Nations, a man reuerenced both for his authority, knowledge, experience and pietie, would neuer haue permitted his children and issues to haue vndertaken that vnbeleeuing presumptuous worke of Babel. Rather by his presence and preualent perswasions he would haue bound their hands from so vaine labours, & by the authority which he receiued euen from God himselfe, hee would haue held them in that awfull subiection, as whatsoeuer they had vainely conceiued or feared, yet they durst not haue disobeyed the personall commandement of him, who in the beginning had a kinde of Regall authority ouer his children and people. Certainely, Noah knew right well, that the former destruction of mankinde was by themselues purchased through crueltie and disobedience; and that to distrust God, and to raise vp building against his Almighty power, was as much as in them lay, a prouocation of God to lay on them the same, if not a more sharpe affliction. Wherefore, there is no probabilitie, that euer he came so farre West as Babylonia; but rather, that hee sent those numbers, which came into Shinaar (being the greatest troupe, because they had the greatest part of the world to plant) vnder Nimrod, or those vpon whom he vsurped. Nauclerus and Cœlestinus take the testimony of Methodius Bishop of Tyre for currant, that there were three Leaders of the people after their encrease (to wit) Nimrod, Suphene, and Ioctan: of which Nimrod commanded the issues of Cham, Ioctan of Sem, and Suphene of Iaphet. This opinion I cannot iudge of, although I will not doubt, but that so great a worke as the worlds plantation, could not be effected without order and conduction.

Of the sonnes of Sem: Ioctan, Hauilah, and Ophir, are especially noted to haue dwelt in the East India. The rest of Sems issues had also the Regions of Persia and the other adioyning adioyning to Indus, and held also a part of Chaldea for a time: for Abraham inhabited Vr, till he was thence called by God; and whether they were of the Sonnes of Ioctan, or of all the rest a certaine number (Cham and his issue onely excepted) that Noah kept with himselfe; it cannot be knowne. Of which plantation I shall speake at large in the Chapter following.

Now another reason which mooues me to beleeue, that Noah stayed in the East far away from all those that came into Shinaar, is, that Moses doth not in any word make mention of Noah in all the story of the Hebrewes, or among any of those Nations which contended with them. And Noah, being the Father of all mankinde, and the chosen seruant of God, was too principall a person, to be either forgotten or neglected, had he not (in respect of his age and wearisome experience of the world) withdrawne himselfe, and rested a part with his best beloued, giuing himselfe to the seruice and contemplation of God and heauenly things, after he had directed his children to their destined portions. For he landed in a warme and fertile soile, where hee planted his Vineyard, and drest the earth; after which, and his thankes-giuing to God by sacrifice, hee is not remembred in the Scriptures, because he was so farre away from those Nations of which Moses wrote which were the Hebrewes chiefly, and their enemies and borderers.

†. VII.

Of the senseleſſe opinion of ANNIVS the Commentor vpon BEROSVS: who finds diuers places where the Arke rested; as the Caspian and Gordiean hils which are three hundred miles asunder; and also some place of Scythia.

IT remaineth now that we examine the Arguments & authorities of Frier Annius, who in his Commentaries vpon Berosus and others, laboureth maruailously to proue, that the Arke of Noah rested vpon the Armenian mountaines called Caspij; which mountaines separate Armenia from the vpper Media, and doe equally belong to both. And because all his Authours speake of the mountaines Gordiæi, he hath no other shift to vnite these opinions, but by vniting those farre-distant mountaines together. To effect which, hee hath found no other inuention, than to charge those men with errour, which haue carefully ouerseene, printed, and published Ptolimies Geographie, in which they are altogether disseuered. For that last edition of Mercators, sets these hills fiue degrees (which makes three hundred English miles) asunder. And certainely, if we looke into those more ancient copies of Villanouanus and others, we shall find nothing in them to helpe Annius withall: for in those the mountaines Caspij stand seuen degrees to the East of the Cordiei, which make 420. miles. And for those Authours by whose authoritie Annius strengtheneth himselfe, Diodorus whom he so much followeth, giueth this iudgment vpon them in the like dispute. Aberrârunt verò omnes, non negligentiâ, sed regnorum situs ignorantiâ, They haue all erred (saith he) not through negligence, but through ignorance of the situation of Kingdomes. But for an induction, to proue that the Arke of Noah stood on the mountaines of Armenia, he beginneth with the antiquity of the Scythians: and to proue the same he citeth Marcus Portius Cato, who auoweth that 250. yeeres before Ninus, the earth was ouerflowne with waters, & in Scythia Sagarenatum mortale genus; and that in Scythia the flocke of mortall men was renewed. The same Authour also teacheth that the Vmbri before remembred (who were so called, because saued from Deucalions floud) were the Sonnes of the Galli, a Nation of the Scythians. Ex his venisse IANVM cum DYRIM, & Gallis progenitoribus Vmbrorum; From these Sythians, he saith, that IANVS came with DYRIM, and with the Galli the progenitours of the Vmbri; And againe, Equidem principatus originis semper Scythis tribuitur, Certainely, the Prime antiquitie of off-spring is alway giuen to the Scythians. And herein truely I agree with Annius, that those Regions called Scythia and now Tartaria, and by some Writers Sarmatia, Asiatica, were among the first peopled: and they held the greatest part of Asia vnder tribute till Ninus time. Also Plinie called the Vmbri which long since inhabited Italie, Gens antiquissima, a most ancient Nation, who descended of these Scythians. Now that which Annius laboureth is to proue that these ancient Scythians (meaning the Nephewes of Noah) did first inhabite that Region of the mountaines, on which the Arke rested; and confessing that this great ship was grounded in Armenia, he faineth a nation of Scythians called Araxea, taking name of the mountain Ararat, neere the Riuer of Araxes. And because his Author Cato helpeth him in part

Diod. l. 2. 3.

Cato de orig. pars prima.

Plin. l. 3. c. 24.

(to wit, That in Scythia mankinde was restored after the great flood, 250. yeares before Ninus) and in part vtterly destroyeth his conceit of Armenia, by adding the vvord Saga;
Beros. l. 1. as, In Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus, In Scythia Saga mankind was restored, hee therefore in the Proœme of his Commentary vpon Berosus, leaueth out the addition of Saga
Ptol. Asiæ tab. 7. altogether in the repetition of Cato his words, and writes, homines in Scythia saluatos. For Scythia Saga or Sacæ, is vndoubtedly vnder the Mountaines of Paropanisus; on which, or neare which it is most probable that the Arke first tooke ground: and from Gene. 11. 2. those East parts (according to Moses) came all those companies which erected the Tower of Babel in Shinaar or Babylonia.

But now the best authority which Annius hath, is out of Diodorus: where hee hath read, that the Scythians were originally Armenians, taking name à Scytha Rege eorum, from Scytha their King. But (in a word) wee may see his vanity, or rather (indeede) his falshood in citing this place. For Diodorus, a most approoued and diligent Author, beginneth in that place vvith these words: Fabulantur Scythæ; The Scythians fable: and his Interpreter in the table of that worke giueth this title to that very Chapter. Scytharum origo & successus, fabula; The originall and successe of the Scythians, a fable. And (indeede) there needs no great disproofe hereof, since Ptolomy doth directly delineate Scythia Saga or Sacæ, and sets them in 130. degrees of longitude: and the Persians (saith Herodo-
l. 6. c. 17. tus) call all the Scythians, Sacæ which Pliny confirmeth: for in respect that these Sacæ (saith Pliny) are the next Scythians to the Persians, therefore they giue all the rest that name. Now that any Nation in Armenia can neighbour the Persians, there is no man beleeueth. But this supposed Scythea Araxea in Armenia lyeth in 78. degrees of longitude (that is) 42. degrees distant from the Sacæ; and the Country about Araxes Ptolomy calleth Colthene and Soducene and Sacapene without any mention of Scythia at all: and yet all those which are or were reputed Scythians either with Imatus or without, Tab. Asiæ. 7. & 8 to the number of 100. seuerall Nations, are by Ptolomy precisely set downe.

But to come to those later Authors, whereof some haue written, others haue seene a great part of those North-east Regions, and searched their antiquities with great diligence: First, Marius Niger boundeth Scythia within Imaus, in this manner: (for Scythia without these Mountaines is also beyond our purpose) Scythia inter Imaum montem ea est, quæ proprio vocabulo Gassaria hoc tempore dicitur: ab Occasu Sarmatia Asiatica: ab Oriente Imao monte: à Septentrione terra incognita: à Meridie Saccis, Sogdianis, Margianis, vsque ostia Oxeamnis in Hyrcanum mare exeuntis; & parte ipsius maris hinc vsq; ad Rha fluminis ostia terminatur: Scythia within the Mountaine Imaus is that part of the World, which in their owne speech is at this time called Gassaria; and the same is bounded on the West side by Sarmatia Asiatica (or of Asia:) on the East by the Imaan Mountaines: on the North by vnknowne Lands: on the South by the Sacce (which are in the Sacæ) the Sogdiani, and the Mar-
Rha now Wolga giani, to the mouth of Oxus, falling into the Hyrcan Sea, and by a part of the same Sea as farre as the mouth of Rha.

Now if Niger sets all Sarmatia Asiatica, to the West of Scythia, then Sarmatia (quæ
Com. 2. Asiæ. fol. 47. magna sanè Regio est, & quæ innumeras nationes complectitur) which is a great Region, comprehending innumerable Nations (saith Niger) much of it being betweene Scythia and Armenia, doth sufficiently warrant vs, that Armenia can be no part of Scythia; and to make it more plaine, he disseuereth Sarmatia it selfe from any part of Armenia, by the Regions of Colchis, Iberia, Albania, which he leaueth on the right hand of Sarmatia, and yet makes Sarmatia but the West bound of Scythia.

Ad meridiem flexo Bosphoro pars septentrionalis ponte Euxini vsq; in ostiũ Coracis fluuiũ: vnde reflectit à parte dextra Colchis, Iberia, Albaniq; in littus Hyrcani maris prouenit Spochist. l. 30.

And for Paulus Venetus, he hath not a word of Armenia among the Tartarian or Scythian Nations: neither doth his fellow Frier Iohn Plancarpio (cited by Vincentius in his description of Scythia) make any mention of Armenia; neyther doth Haytonus, an Armenian borne, of the bloud of those Kings (though afterward a Monke) euer acknowledge himselfe for a Tartarian, or of the Scythian Races descended: though he write that storie at large, gathered by Nicholaus Salcuni, and (by the commandement of Pope Clement the fifth) in the yeere 1307. published.

Neyther doth Mathias a Michou (a Canon of Cracouia in Polonia) a Sarmatian borne, and that trauailed a great part of Sarmatia Asiatica, finde Armenia any way within the compasse of Tartaria, Scythia, or Sarmatia, and yet no man (whose Trauailes are extant) hath obserued so much of those Regions as he hath done: prouing and disprouing many things, heretofore subiect to dispute. And among others he burieth that ancient and receiued opinion, That out of the Mountaines Riphei, and Hyperborei in Scythia, spring the Riuers of Tanais or Don, Volga or Edel; prouiding by vnanswerable experience, that there are no such Mountaines in rerum natura; and (indeed) the Heads and Fountaines of those famous Riuers are now by the Trade of Muscouia knowne to euery Merchant, and that they arise out of Lakes, low, Wooddie, and marish grounds. The Riuer of Tanais or Don, ariseth to the South of the Citie Tulla, some twentie English miles, out of a Lake called Iwanowesero, in the great Wood Okenitzkilies or Icpiphanelies. Volga, which Ptolomie calls Rha, and the Tartars call Edel, riseth out of a Lake called Frowaw, in the great Wood Vodkonzki: from which Lake the two other famous Riuers flow of Boysthenes (now Neyper) and Dsuina or Diuidna. And this learned Polonian doth in this sort bound the European Sarmatia. In Sarmatia of Europe are the Regions of Russians, Lithuanians, Muscouians, and those adioyning, bounded on the West by the Riuer of Vissa, the Name perchance mis-printed Vissa for Vistula, a Riuer which parts Germanie and Sarmatia: and for the East border he nameth Tanais, or Don. Sarmatia Asiatica he cutteth from Europe by the same Riuer of Tanais, and the Caspian Sea, to with-hold it from stretching farther East: this Asian Sarmatia being part of that Scythia which Ptolomie calleth Scythia intra Imaum montem: Scythia within the Mountaine Imaus. And the same Mathias Michon farther affirmeth, that the Scythians (which Frier Annius would make Armenians) came not into Saramatia Asiatica it self aboue three hundred and a few odde yeers before his owne time: these be his words: Constat eam esse gentem nouam, & aduentitiam à partibus Orientis (mutatis sedibus) paulò plus abhinc trecentis annis Asiæ Sarmatiam ingressam: It is manifest (saith he, speaking of the Scythian Nation) that this is a late planted Nation, come from the coasts of the East: from whence they entred into Asia, and gat new seates a little more than 300. yeeres since: For (indeed) before that time the Gothes or Pouloci inhabited Sarmatia, Asiatica. And this Mathias liued in the yeere 1511. and this his Discourse of Sarmatia was printed at Augusta in the yeere 1506. as Bucholzerus in his Chronologie witnesseth. Now these Scythians (saith he) came from the East, for in the East it was that the Arke of Noah rested, and the Scythæ Sacæ were those people which liued at the North foot of those Mountaines, of Taurus or Ararat, where they encounter or begin to mixe themselues with the great Imaus. And were there no other testimony than the generall description of the Earth now extant, and the witnesse of Ptolomie, it is plaine, that betweene all parts of Armenia, and Scythia, there are not only those three Regions of Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, but the Caspian Sea: on the East shore of which Sea, but not on the West, or on that part which any way toucheth Armenia, there are (indeed) a Nation of Scythians (called Ariaca) betweene Iaxartus and Iactus; but what are these Scythians to any Ariaca, or Scythia Araxea, which Annius placeth in Armenia, more than the Scythians of Europe?

The fift Argument, The Vine must grow naturally neere the place where the Arke rested.

TO this if we adde the consideration of this part of the Text, That NOAH planted a Vineyard, we shall find that the fruit of the Vine or Raysin did not grow naturally in that part of Armenia, where this resting of the Arke was supposed: for if the Vine was a stranger in Italie and France, and brought from other Countries thither, it is not probable that it grew naturally in Armenia, being a farre colder Country. For Tyrrhenus first brought Vines into France, and Saturnus into Latium: yea at such times as Brennus and the Gaules inuaded Italie, there were few or no Vines in France. For (saith Plutarch in the life of Camilus) the Gaules remained betweene the Pyrenæi and the Alpes, neere vnto the Senones, where they continued a long time, vntill they drunke Wine, which was first brought them out of Italie; and after they tasted thereof they hasted to inhabite that Countrey, which brought forth such pleasant fruit: so as it appeareth, that the Plant of the Vine was not naturall in France, but from Italie brought thither; as by Saturne from else where into Italy.

Gen. 9. 20.

Seruius Aenaid. Eutropius.

Now it is manifest, that Noah trauailed not farre to seeke out the Vine. For the Plantation therof is remembred, before there was any counsaile how to dispose of the World among his children: and the first thing he did, was, to till the ground, & to plant a Vineyard, after the Sacrifice and Thankesgiuing to God; and whereseouer the Arke rested, there

there did the Vine grow naturally. From whence it doth no where appeare, that he trauiled farre: for the Scriptures teach vs, that he was a Husband-man, & not a Wanderer.

An answer to an obiection out of the words of the Text: The Lord scattered them from thence vpon the face of the whole earth.

AND that all the children of Noah came together into Shinaar, it doth not appeare saying that it may be inferred out of these words (from thence) because it is written: So that the Lord scattered them from thence vpon all the earth; which hath no other sense, but that the Lord scattered them (to wit) those that built this Towre: for those were from thence dispersed into all the Regions of the North and South, and to the Westward. And by these words of Sybilla (as they be conuerted) it seemeth that all came not together into Shinaar; for they haue this limitation: Quidam eorum turrem ædificarunt altissimam, quasi per eam cœlum essent ascensuri: Certaine of them built a most high Towre, as if they meant thereby to haue scaled the Heauens.

¶. X.

An answer to the obiection of the name of Ararat, taken for Armenia: and the heighth of the Hils there.

BVt before I conclude this part, it is necessarie to see & consider, what part of Scripture, and what reason may be found out, to make it true or probable, that the Arke of Noah was forsaken by the waters on the Mountaines of Armenia. For the Text hath onely these words: The Arke rested on (or vpon) the Mountaines of Ararat; or Armenia, saith the marginall note of the Geneua: the Chaldean Paraphrast cals it Kardu; of which, the highest hath the name of Lubar, saith Epiphanius. Now this Ararat; (which the Septuagint doe not conuert at all, but keepe the same word) is taken to be a Mountaine of Armenia; because Armenia it selfe had anciently that name: so as first out of the name, and secondly out of the heighth (which they suppose exceeded all other) is the opinion taken, That the Arke first sate thereon.

Gen. 8. 14.

Epiph. l. 1. contra Hæres.

But these suppositions haue no foundation: for neither is Ararat of Armenia alone, neither is any part, or any of those Mountaines of equall stature to many other Mountains of the World; and yet it doth not follow, that the Arke found the highest Mountaine of all other to rest on: for the Plaines were also vncouered, before Noah came out of the Arke. Now, if there were any agreement among Writers of this Ararat, and that they did not differ altogether therein, we might giue more credit to the conceit. For in the Bookes of the Sybils it is written, that the Mountaines of Ararat are in Phrygia, vpon which it was supposed that the Arke stayed after the Floud. And the better to particularize the place and seate of these Mountaines, and to prooue them in Phrygia, and not Armenia, they are placed where the City of Cælenes was afterward built. Likewise in the same discription shee maketh mention of Marsyas, a Riuer which runneth through part of Phrygia, and afterward ioyneth it selfe with the Riuer Mæander, which is farre from the Gordiean Mountaines in Armenia. We may also finde a great mistaking in IOSEPHVS (though out of BEROSVS, who is in effect the Father of this opinion) that IOSEPHVS sets Ararat betweene ARMENIA and PARTHIA, toward ADIABENE, and affirmeth withall, that in the prouince of Cæron (by others Kairos and Arnos, so called by reason that the waters haue from thence no descent, nor issue out) the people vaunt that they had in those dayes reserued some peices of Noahs Arke. But Parthia toucheth no where vpon Armenia, for Armenia bordereth Adiabene, a Prouince of Assyria: so that all Media and a part of Assyria is betweene Parthia and Armenia. Now whereas the discouerie of the Mountaines Cordiei was first borrowed out of Berosus by Iosephus; yet the Text which Iosephus citeth out of Berosus, differs far from the words of that Berosus, which wandreth vp and downe in these dayes, set out by Annius. For Berosus, cited by Iosephus, hath these words: Fertur & nauigij huius pars in Armenia apud montem Cordiæorum superesse, & quosdam Bitumen inde abrasum secum reportare, quo vice amuleti loci huius homines vti solent: (which is) It is reported also that a part of this ship is yet remaining in Armenia vpon the Cordiean Mountaines, and that diuers doe scrape from it the Bitumen or Pitch, and carrying it with them, they vse it in stead of an amulet. But Annius his

Edition

Edition of the Fragment of Berosus vseth these words: Nam elenata ab aquis in Gordiæi montis vertice quieuit, cuius adhuc dicitur aliqua pars esse, & homines ex illa Bitumen tollere quo maxime vtuntur ad expiationem: For the whole Arke being lifted vp by the waters, rested on the top of the Gordiean Mountaines, of which it is reported that some parts remaine, and that men doe carry thence of the Bitumen to purge by Sacrifice therewith: so as in these two Texts (besides the difference of wordes) the name is diuersly written. The ancient Berosus writes Cordiæi with a (C.) and the Fragment Gordiæi with a (G.) the one that the Bitumen is vsed for a preseruatiue against Poyson or Inchantment; the other in Sacrifice. And if it be said that they agree in the generall, yet it is reported by neither from any certaine knowledge, nor from any approued Authour: for one of them, vseth the word (fertur) the other (dicitur) the one, that so it is reported, the other, that so it is sayd; and both but by heare-say, and therefore of no authority nor credit. For common bruit is so infamous an Historian, as wise men neither report after it, nor giue credit to any thing they receiue from it.

Furthermore, these Mountaines which Ptolomie cals Gordiæi, are not those Mountaines which himselfe giueth to Armenia, but he calleth the Mountaines of Armenia Moschici. These be his owne words: Montes Armeniæ nominantur, qui Moschici appellantur, qui protenduntur vsq; ad superiacentem partem Ponti Cappadocum; & mons qui Paryardes dicitur: The Mountaines of Armenia are they which are called Moschici, stretcht along to the higher part of Pontus of the Cappadocians: also the Hill which is called Paryades: Ptol. Asiæ tab. 5.

which Mountaines Plinie calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Gordiæi or Baris, in 43. and 44. and a halfe; and the Gordiean Mountaines in 39. and a halfe: from the Northermost of which did the Georgians take their names, who were first Gordians and then Georgians, who amidst all the strength of the greatest Infidels of Persia and Turkie, doe still remaine Christians. Concerning the other suppositions, that the Mountaines of Gordiæi, otherwise Baris Karda or Lubar (which Ptolomie calleth Torgodiaion) are the highest of the World, the fame is absolutely false. Plin. l. 6. c. 9.

†. XI.

Of Caucasus, and diuers farre higher hils than the Armenian.

FOr the best Cosmographers with other, that haue seene the Mountaines of Armenia find them farre inferiour, and vnder-set to diuers other Mountaines euen in that part of the World, and elsse where: as the Mountaine Athos betweene Macedon and Thrace, which Ptolomie cals Olympus, now called Lacui, (saith Castaldus) is farre surmounting any Mountaine that euer hath beene seene in Armenia: for it casteth shade three hundred furlongs, which is seuen and thirtie miles and vpwards: of which Plutarch: Athos adumbrat latera Lemniæ bouis: Athos shadoweth the Cow of Lemnos. Also the Mount of Olympus in Thessalie, is said to be of that heighth, as neither the Windes, Cloudes or Raine ouertop it. Againe, the Mountaine of Antandrus in Mysia, not farre from Ida, whence the Riuer Scamandrus floweth, which runneth through Troy, is also of a farre more admiration than any in Armenia, and may be seene from Constantinople. There are also in Mauritania neere the Sea, the famous Mountaines of Atlas, of which HERODOTVS: Extat in hoc mari Mons cui nomen Atlas, ita sublimis esse dicitur, vt ad illius verticem oculi mortalium peruenire non possint: Vpon this Coast there is a Mountaine called Atlas, whose heighth is sayd to be such, as the eye of no mortall man can discerne the top thereof. And if we may beleeue Aristotle, then are all these inferiour to Caucasus, which he maketh the most notorious both for breadth and height: Caucasus Mons omnium maximus, qui æstiuum ad ortum sunt, acumine atq; latitudine, cuius iuga a Sole radiantur vsq; ad conticinium ab ortu: & iterum ab occasu Caucasus (saith ARISTOTLE) is the greatest Mountaine both for breadth and heighth of all those in the North-east, whose tops are lightned by the Sun-beames, vsq; ad conticinium (which is, saith Macrobius) betweene the first crowing after mid-night and the breake of day: Others affirme, that the top of this Mountaine holds the Sunne-beames when it is darke in the Valley; but I cannot beleeue either: for the highest Mountaine of the World knowne is that of Tenerife in the Canaries: which although it hath nothing to the Westward of it for 1000. Leagues together but the Ocean Sea, yet doth it not enioy the Suns company at any such late houres. Besides these Mountaines which Aristotle calleth Caucasus, are those which separate Colchis from Iberia; Aristot. Met. cor. l. 1. c. 13.

Iberia; though (indeed) Caucasus doth diuide both Colchis, Iberia, and Albania from Sarmatia: for hee acknowledgeth that the Riuer of Phasis riseth in the same Mountaine, which himselfe calleth Caucasus, and that Phasis springeth from those Hils which sunder Colchis from Iberia, falling afterward into Euxinus: which Riuer (it is manifest) yeeldeth it selfe to the Sea, two degrees to the North of Trapezus (now Trabesunda) howsoeuer Mercator bring it from Paryardes.

†. XII.

Of diuers incongruities if in this Storie we should take Ararat for Armenia.

SO as it doth first appeare, that there is no certaintie what Mountaine Ararat was: for the Bookes of the Sybils set it in Phrygia, and Berosus in Armenia: and as for Berosus authoritie, those men haue great want of proofes that borrow from thence.

Secondly, that Barû was the highest Hill, and therefore most likely that the Arke grounded thereon, the assertion and supposition haue equall credit: for there are many Hils which exceed all those of Armenia; and if they did not, yet it doth not follow (as is before written) that the Arke should sit on the highest.

Thirdly, it cannot be proued that there is any such Hill in Armenia, or in rerum natura, as Baris: for Baris (sayth Hierome) signifieth high Towres: and so may all high Hils be called indifferently; and therefore we may better giue the name of Baris to the Hils of Caucasus (out of which Indus riseth) than to any Hils of Armenia. For those of Caucasus in the East, are vndoubtedly the highest of Asia.

Fourthly, the Authours themselues doe not agree in what Region the Mountaines Gordiei stand: for Ptolomie distinguisheth the Mountains of Armenia from the Gordiean, and calleth those of Armenia Moschici and Paryardes, as aforesaid. Now Paryardes is seated neere the middle of Armenia, out of which on the West-side riseth Euphrates, and out of the East-side Araxis: and the Mountaines Moschici are those Hils which dis-ioyne Colchis, Iberia, and Albania (now the Country of the Georgians) from Armenia.

†. XIII.

Of the contrary situation of Armenia, to the place noted in the Text: and that it is no marualle that the same Ledge of Hils running from Armenia to India, should keepe the same name all along: and euen in India be called Ararat.

LAstly, we must blow vp this Mountaine Ararat it selfe, or else we must digge it down, and carry it out of Armenia, or find it else where, and in a warmer Country, and (withall) set it East from Shinaar; or else we shall wound the Truth it selfe with the weapons of our owne vaine imaginations.

Therefore to make the mistaking open to euery eye, we must vnderstand, that Ararat (named by Moses) is not any one Hill, so called, no more than any one Hill among those Mountaines which diuide Italie from France is called, the Alpes: or any one among those which part France from Spaine is the Pyrenian; but as these, being continuations of many Hils, keep one name in diuers Countries: so all that long Ledge of Mountaines, which Plinie calleth by one name Taurus, and Ptolomie both Taurus, Niphates Coatras, Coronus, Sariphi, vntill they enconnter and crosse the Mountaines of the great Imaus, are of one generall name, and are called the Mountaines of Ararat or Armenia, because from thence or thereabout they seeme to arise. So all these Mountaines of Hyrcania, Armenia, Coraxis, Caspij, Moschici, Amazonici, Heniochi, Scythici, (thus diuersly called by Plinie and others) Ptolomie cals by one name Caucasus, lying betweene the Seas Caspium and Euxinus; as all those Mountaines which cut asunder America, euen from the new Kingdome of Granado, to the streight of Magellan, are by one name called Andes. And as these Mountaines of Ararat runne East and West, so doe those maruailous Mountaines of Imaus stretch themselues North and South; and being of like extent well-neere, are called by the name of Imaus, euen as Plinie calleth these former hils Taurus, and Moses the hils of Ararat. The reason of seuerall names giuen by Ptolomie, was, thereby the better to distinguish the great Regions and Kingdomes, which these great mountaines bound and disseuer; as Armenia, Mesopotamia, Assyria, Media, Susiana, Persia, Parthia, Caramania, Aria, Margiana, Bactria, Sogdiana, and Paropanisus: hauing uing all theſe Kingdomes either on the North or South ſide of them. For all the mountaines of Aſia (both the leſſe and the greater) haue three generall names, (to wit) Taurus, Imaus, and Caucaſus: and they receiue other titles, as they ſeuer and diuide particular places and regions. For theſe mountaines which ſunder Cilicia from the reſt of Aſia the leſſe on the North ſide, are called Taurus; and thoſe mountaines which part it from Comagena (a Prouince of Syria) are called Amanus: the mountaines called Taurus running East and Weſt, as Imaus doth North and South. Though Taurus the Riuer of Euphrates forceth her paſſage, leauing the name of Amanus to the mountains on her Weſt-banke; and on her East ſide the mountaines are ſometimes knowne by the name of Taurus, (as in Ptolomies three tables of Aſia) and ſometimes Niphates; (as in the fourth) retaining that vncertaine appellation ſo long as they bound Armenia from Meſopotamia: and after the Riuer of Tygris cutteth them aſunder, they then take the name of Niphates altogether, vntill they ſeparate Aſſyria and Media; but then they call themſelues Coatras, though betweene the vpper and nether Media, they doe not appeare, but altogether diſcontinue. For at Mazada in Media they are not found, but runne through the Eaſterne Media by pieces: in the middle of which Region they call themſelues Orontes, and towards the East part Coronus; out of the Southerne part whereof the Riuer of Bagradus riſeth, which diuideth the ancient Perſia from Caramania: and then continuing their courſe Eaſtward by the name of Coronus, they giue to the Parthians and Hyrcanians their proper Countries. This done, they change themſelues into the mountaines of Sariphi, out of which riſeth the Riuer Margus, afterward yeelding her ſelfe to Oxus (now Abia): and drawing now neere their wayes end, they firſt make themſelues the South border of Bactria, and are then honoured with the Title of Paropaniſus; and laſtly of Caucaſia, euen where the famous Riuer of Indus, with his principal companions Hydaſpis and Zaradrus, ſpring forth and take beginning. And here doe theſe Mountaines build themſelues exceeding high, to equall the ſtrong Hils called Imaus of Scythia, which encounter each other in 35. 36. and 37. degrees of Latitude, and in 140 of Longitude: of the which the Weſt parts are now called Delanguer, and the reſt Nagracot; and theſe Mountaines in this place onely are properly called Caucaſi (ſaith Ptolomie) that is, betweene Paropaniſus and Imaus: and improperly, betweene the two Seas of Caſpium and Pontus. Ptol. tab. Aſiæ 4.

†. XIIII.

Of the beſt Vine naturally growing on the South ſide of the Mountaines Caucaſi and toward the East Indies: and of other excellencies of the ſoile.

NOw in this part of the World it is, where the Mountaine and Riuer Ianus, and the Mountaine Nyſeus (ſo called of Bacchus Niſeus or Noah) are found: and on theſe higheſt Mountaines of that part of the world did Goropius Becanus conceiue that the Arke of Noah grounded after the Floud: of all his coniectures the moſt probable, and by beſt reaſon approued. In his Indoſcythia he hath many good Arguments, though mixt with other fantaſticall opinions of this ſubiect. And as the ſame Becanus alſo noteth; that as in this part of the world are found the beſt Vines: ſo it is as true, that in the ſame Line, & in 34. 35. & 36. degrees of Septentrionall Latitude, are the moſt delicate Wines of the World, namely, in Iudæa, Candia, and other parts of Greece: and likewiſe in this Region of Margiana: and vnder theſe Mountaines Strabo affirmeth, that the moſt excellent Vines of the World are found; the cluſters of Grapes containing two Cubits of length: & it is the more probable, becauſe this place agreeth in Climate with that part of Paleſtina, where the ſearchers of the land, by Moſes direction, found bunches of equal bignes at Eſcol. Numb. 13. 24.

The fruitfulneſſe of this place (to wit) on the South bottome of theſe Hils, Curtius witneſſeth. For in Margiana neere the Mountaines of Meros did Alexander feaſt himſelfe & his Armie ten daies together, finding the moſt delicate Wine of all other.

†. XV.

The concluſion, with a briefe repeating of diuers chiefe points.

AND therefore to conclude this opinion of Ararat, it is true, that thoſe Mountaines doe alſo trauerſe Armenia: yea, and Armenia it ſelfe ſometime is knowne by the

the Valley of Shinaar in 79. and 80. And therefore Armenia lyeth from Shinaar North-west, ninetie fiue degrees from the East; and if Armenia had beene but North, yet it had differed from the East one whole quarter of the Compasse. But Gregorie and Hierome warne vs, In scripturis ne minima differentia omitti debet: nam singuli sermones, syllabæ, apices, & puncta in diuina Scriptura plena sunt sensibus; In the Scriptures the least difference may not be omitted: for euery speech; syllable, note, or accent, and point in diuine Scriptures are replenished with their meanings. And therefore seeing Moses teacheth vs that the children of Noah came from the East, we may not beleeue Writers (of little authority) who also speake by heare-say and by report, vt fertur, & vt dicitur, as Berosus and Nicolaus Damascenus, determining herein without any examination of the Text, at all ad-uenture. But this is infallible true, that Shinaar lyeth West from the place where the Arke of Noah rested after the floud; and therefore it first found ground in the East, from whence came the first knowledge of all things. The East parts were first emuill, which had Noah him selfe for an Instructer: and directly East from Shinaar in the same degree of 35. are the greatest grapes and the best Wine. The great Armies also which ouer-topped in number those Millions of Semiramis, proue, that those parts were first planted. And whereas the other opinion hath neither Scripture nor Reason sufficient: for my selfe I build on his wordes who in plaine termes hath told vs, that the Sonnes of Noah came out of the East into Shinaar, and there they abode. And therefore did the Arke rest on those Easterne Mountaines, called by one generall name Taurus; and by Moses the Mountaines of Ararat, and not on those Mountaines of the North-west, as Berosus first fained; whom most part of the Writers haue followed therein. It was, I say, in the plentifull warme East where Noah rested, where hee planted the Vine, where hee tilled the ground & liued thereon. Placuit vero NOACHO agriculturæ studium, in qua tractanda ipse omnium peritissimus esse dicitur: ob eamq; rem sua ipsius lingua ISH-ADAMATH (hoc est) telluris vir appellatur celebratusq; est; The studie of Husbandrie pleased NOAH (saith the excellent learned man ARIAS MONTANVS) in the knowledge & order of which it is said, that NOAH excelled all men: and therefore was he called in his owne language a man exercised in the earth. Which also sheweth that he was no Wanderer, and that he troubled not himselfe with the contentions, beginning againe in the world, & among men, but stayed in his destined places, and in that part of the world, where hee was first deliuered out of the prison of the Arke, whereinto God had committed him, to preserue him and mankind.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first planting of Nations after the Floud: and of the Sonnes of NOAH, SHEM, HAM, and IAPHET, by whom the earth was repeopled.

Whether SHEM and HAM were elder than IAPHET.

IF these Sonnes of Noah, which was the eldest, there is a question made. Saint Augustine esteemed Shem for the eldest, Ham for the second, and Iaphet for the yongest: and herein the opinions of Writers are diuers. But this we finde euery where in the Scriptures, and especially in Moses, that there was neuer any respect giuen to the eldest in yeeres, but in vertue; as by the examples of Henoch, Abraham, Iacob, and Dauid, is made manifest. In a few wordes, this is the ground of the controuersie; The Latine translation, and so the Geneua, hath conuerted this Scripture of Genesis the 10. v. 21. in these wordes: Vnto SHEM also the Father of all the Sonnes of HEBER, and elder brother of IAPHET, were children borne. But Iunius, agreeing with the Septuagint, placeth the same wordes in this manner: To SHEM also the Father of all the Sons of HEBER, and brother of IAPHET the eldest sonne, were children borne: So the transposition of the word (elder) made this difference. For if the word (elder) had followed after Iaphet, as it is in the vulgar translation placed before it, then had it beene as plaine for Iaphet, as it is by these translations for Shem. Now (the matter being otherwise indifferent) seeing Gods blessings are not tyed to first and last in bloud, but to the eldest in pietie, yet the arguments are stronger for Iaphet than for Shem. And where the Scriptures are plainely vnderstood without any danger or incõuenince, it seemeth strange why any man of iudgement should make valuation of coniecturall arguments, or mens opinions. For it appeareth that Noah in the fiue hundreth yeere of his life, begate the first of his three Sonnes, Shem, Ham, and Iaphet: and in the sixe hundreth yeere (to wit) the hundreth yeere following, came the generall floud; two yeeres after which Shem begate Arphaxad, which was in the yeere 602. of Noahs life, and in the yeere of Shems life one hundred: so as Shem was but 100. yeeres old, two yeeres after the floud: and Noah begat his first borne being 500. yeeres old; & therefore, were Shem the elder, he had then beene a hundred yeeres old at the floud, and in the sixe hundreth yeere of Noahs life, and not two yeeres after. Which seeing the Scriptures before remembred hath denyed him, and that it is also written: Then NOAH awoke from his wine, and knew what his yonger sonne had done vnto him (to wit) HAM; of necessitie the first place doth belong to Iaphet. This yonger sonne, so conuerted by the vulgar and Geneua, Iunius turnes it filius minimus; His yongest sonne; but S. Chrysostome takes it otherwise, and findes Cham to bee the middle or second brother, and Iaphet the yongest sonne of all: which Cham for his disobedience and the contempt of his Father (whose nakednesse he derided) was dis-inherited, & lost the preeminencie of his birth, as Esau and Ruben did. Pererius conceiueth that Ham was called the yonger in respect of Shem the eldest, but auoweth withall, that the Hebrew hath not that precise difference of yonger and yongest, because it wanteth the comparatiue degree. It is true that Shem himselfe was alwaies named in the first place, yet whereas in the first Verse of the tenth Chapter of Genesis, Shem is accounted before Iaphet: in the second Verse Moses leaueth to begin with the issue by Shem, and reciteth the children of Iaphet first. So the first place was giuen to Shem for his election and benediction, and for this weightie respect; that the Hebrew Nation, Abraham, the Prophets, Dauid, and Christ our Sauiour were descended of him. And therefore, whether we shall follow the Vulgar Pagninus, and the Geneua, who agree in this conuersion, SHEM Frater IAPHET maior; or with the Septuagint, Iunius, and Tremelius, SHEM fratris IAPHET maioris; or with Pererius, SHEM frater IAPHET ille magnus: inferring that Shem was the great and famous brother of Iaphet, let the Reader iudge. But for ought that I haue seene to the contrarie, it appeareth to me that Iaphet was the eldest. For where Pererius qualifieth the strength of the former Argument, That Shems age at the time of the floud did not agree with the eldership (with a supposition that the Scriptures tooke no account of smaller numbers) I doe not finde in the Scriptures any such neglect at all: for it is written, that SHEM was an hundred yeeres old, & begat ARPHAXAD two yeeres after the floud; and againe in the 12. Verse: So SHELA lined after he begat EBAR, foure hundred and three yeeres, &c. so as the number of two yeeres, of three yeeres, of fiue yeeres, and afterward of two yeeres, were alwayes precisely accounted.

§. II.

Of diuers things that in all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the World; as that all Histories must yeeld to MOSES: that the world was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and that knowne great Lords of the first ages were of the issue of HAM.

BVt let vs go vnto the Worlds plantation after the floud, which being rightly vnderstood, we shall find that many Nations haue supposed or fayned themselues those Ancestors and Fathers, which neuer saw or approached the bounds of their Countries, and of whom they are by no way or branch descended. For it is plaine in the Scriptures how the sonnes and issues of Noah were distributed, and what Regions were first planted by them, from whence by degrees the rest of the world was also peopled. And if any prophane Author may receiue allowance herein, the same must bee with this caution, That they take their beginning where the Scriptures end. For so farre as the storie of Nations is therein handled, we must know, that both the truth and antiquitie of the bookes of God finde no companions equall, either in age or authoritie. All record, memorie, and testimonie of antiquitie whatsoeuer, which hath come to the knowledge of men, the same hath beene borrowed thence, and therefore later than it, as all carefull obseruers of time haue noted: among which thus writeth Eusebius in the Proeme of his Chronologie: MOSES is found more ancient than all those whom the Grecians make most ancient, as HOMER, HESIOD, and the Traian warre; and farre before HERCVLES, MVSÆVS, LINVS, CHIRON, ORPHEVS, CASTOR, POLLVX, ÆSCVLAPIVS, BACCHVS, MERCVRIVS, and APOLLO, and the rest of the gods of the nations, their Ceremonies, or holy Rites, or Prophets: and before all the deeds of IVPITER, whom the Greekes haue seated in the top and highest Turret of their Diuinitie.

For of the three Iupiters remembred by Cicero, the ancientest was the sonne of Æther whose three sonnes begotten on Proserpina, were borne at Athens, of which Cecrops was the first King: and in the end of Cecrops time did Moses bring the children of Israel out of Egypt: Eduxit MOSES populum Dei ex Egypto nouissimo tempore CECROPIS Athenienſis Regis; MOSES brought the children of Israel out of Egypt, in the last dayes of CECROPS, King of the Athenians, saith S. Augustine: and yet was not Cecrops the Founder of the Citie it self, but Theseus long after him. But because the truth hereof is diuersly prooued, and by many learned Authors, I will not cut a sunder the purpose in hand, by alleaging many authorities in a needlesse question, but leaue it to the proper place. Cicero de Nat. Deorum, l. 3. De ciuit. Dei l. 18. c. 11.

The Sonnes of IAPHET were, Gomer, Magog, Madai, Iauan, Tubal, Meshach, and Tiras.

The Sonnes of GOMER were, Askenaz, Riphath, Togorma.

The Sonnes of IAVAN were Elisha, Tarshis, Kittim, and Dodanim.

First, weare to consider, that the world after the Floud not planted by imagination, neither had the children of Noah wings to flie from Shinaar, to the vttermost border of Europe, Africa and Asia in haste, but that these children were directed by a wise Father, who knew those parts of the world before the Floud, to which he disposed his children after it, and sent them not as Discouerers, or at all-aduenture, but assigned & allotted to euery Sonne and their issues, their proper parts. And not to harken to fabulous Authours, who haue no other end than to flatter Princes (as Virgil did Augustus in the fiction of Æneas) or else to glorifie their owne Nations; Let vs build heerein vpon the Scriptures themselues, and after them vpon Reason and Nature. First therefore wee must call to minde and consider, what manner of face the earth euery-where had in the 130. yeere after the great inundation, and by comparing those fruitfullest Vallies, with our own barren and cold ground, informe our selues thereby, what wonderfull Desarts what impassable fastnesse of woods, reeds, bryars, and rotten grasse, what Lakes and standing Pooles, and what Marishes, Fens, and Bogs, all the face of the earth (excepting the Mountaines) was pestered withall. For if in this our Climate (where the dead and destroying Winter depresseth all vegetatiue and growing Nature, for one halfe of the yeere in effect) yet in twenty or thirty yeers, these our grounds would not all ouergrow and be couered (according to the nature therof) either with Woods, or with other offensiue Thickets and Bushments: much more did all sorts of Plants, Reedes, and Trees, prosper in the most fruitfull Vallies, and in the Climate of a long and warme Summer, and hauing withall the start of 130. yeeres, to raise themselues without controlment.

This being considered, it will appeare, that all these people which came into Shinaar, and ouer whom Nimrod either by order or strength tooke the Dominion, did after the confusion of Languages, and at such time as they grew to be a mighty People, disperse themselues into the Regions adioyning to the said Vallie of Shinaar, which contained the best part of Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and Chaldea; and from the borders thereof in time they were propagated: some of them towards the South, others towards the West and North. And although there were allotted to Shem many Regions, both East and West from Shinaar, with the Dominion of Palestina, which the Canaanits first possest; yet could he not enioy the lot of his inheritance on the suddaine, but by time and degrees. For wee finde, that Abraham, the true successour of Shem, dwelt in Chaldea at Vr; and from thence (called by God) hee rested at Charran in Mesopotamia: from whence after the death of Thare hee trauailed to Sichem in Palestina: and yet there had passed betweene Shem and Abraham (reckoning neither of themselues) seuen Descents, before Abraham moued out of Chaldaa; where, and in Babylonia, all those people by Nimrod commanded, inhabited for many yeeres, and whence Nimrod went out into Assyria, and founded Nineue. Indeed the great Masters of Nations (as farre as wee can know) were, in that Age of the Issues of Ham; the blessing of God giuen by Noah to Shem and Iaphet taking lesse effect, vntill diuers yeers were consumed; and vntill the time arriued, which by the wisedom of God was appointed. For of Chus, Mizraim, and Canaan, came the People and Princes, which held the great Kingdomes of Babylonia, Syria, and Egypt, for many Descents together.

§. III.

Of the Iles of the Gentiles in Iaphets portion: of Berosvs his too speedie seating Gomer the sonne of Iaphet in Italie; and another of Iaphets sonnes Tvbal in Spaine: and of the Antiquitie of Longinque Nauigation.

TO beginne therefore (where Moses beginneth) with the sonnes of Iapheth, among whom the Iles of the Gentiles were diuided: which diuision, as well to Iaphets sonnes as to the rest which came into Shinaar, was (if the diuision were made at Phalegs birth) in the yeere of the World 1757. or 1758. and (by that account) in the yeares after the Floud one hundred and one, of which question elsewhere.

The habitations proper to the sonnes of Iaphet were the Iles of the Gentiles, which include all Europe with all the Ilands adioyning; and compassing it about: Europe being also taken for an Iland, both in respect that the Sea Hellespont and Ægeum, Bosphorus and Euxinus cut is off from the great Continent of Asia, as also because Europe it selfe is (in effect) surrounded with water, sauing that it is fastned to Asia by the North, for it hath those Seas before named to the East, the Mediterran to the South and Southwest, the Ocean to the West, and Brittish, Germane, and Baltick Sea, with that of Glaciale to the North North-east, and North-west. Besides, it hath about it all the Cyclades or Iles lying betweene Greece and the lesser Asia, and the Iles of Rhodes, Cyprus, Creete, or Candia, Sicilia, Corsica, Sardinia, Malta, the Iles of Brittanie and Zealand, with their young ones adiacent.

This partition and portion of Iapheth, with the part which hee held in Asia, and the
Gen. 9. v. 27. North, which was also very great, answereth to that blessing of God by Noah, Dilatet Deus Iapheth; Let God spread abroad (or increase the Posteritie of) Iapheth, and let him dwell in the Tents of Shem. For though Iunius heere vseth the word (alliciat) and not dilatet: and the Geneua persuadeat; yet the Septuagint haue dilatet or amplificet; and such was the blessing giuen to our Fathers, which God promised to Abraham and his Seede for euer. And the dwelling in the Tents or Tabernacles of Shem was a blessing by God to the Posteritie of Iapheth: noting not onely an enlargement of Territories, but that thereby they should bee made participant of Gods Church. But to come to Iaphets sonnes, of whom Gomer is the eldest. This Gomer (if we may beleeue Berosus and Annius, whose authoritie the greatest number of all our late Writers haue followed) did in the tenth yeare of Nimrods Reigne depart from Babylonia, and planted Funcc. chronol. Italie: which also Funcius confirmeth in these words, Anno decimo Nimrodi, &c. In the tenth yeere of Nimrods Reigne, Gomervs Gallvs planted a Colonie in that Land afterward called Italie: and in the twelfth yeere of the same Nimrods Reigne Tvbal seated himselfe in Austuria in Spaine (now called Biscay) which was in the 140. and in the 142. yeeres after the Floud, according to Berosvs. But this opinion is very ridiculous. For before the confusion of Tongues the children of Noah did not separate themselues, at least so many of them as came with Nimrod into Shinaar. Let vs therfore consider with reason, what time the building such a Citie and Towre required, where there was no prepared matter, nor any readie meanes to performe such a worke as Nimrod had erected (and as Funcius himselfe out of his Author Berosus witnesseth) ad altitudinem & magnitudinem montium; To the heighth and magnitude of the Mountaines. Sure that both this Citie and Towre was almost builded, the Scriptures witnesse: But

The Lord came downe to ſee the Citie and Towre, which the Sonnes of men builded. Let vs then but allot a time ſufficient for the making of Bricke to ſuch a Worke, of the greateſt heighth (and therefore of circuit and foundation anſwerable) that euer was. For where the vniuerſall Floud couered the higheſt Mountaines fifteene Cubits; Let vs build vs a Citie and a Tower (ſaith NIMROD) whoſe top may reach vnto the Heauen: meaning, that they would raiſe their Work aboue fifteene Cubits higher than the higheſt Mountaine, otherwiſe they could not aſſure themſelues from the feare of a ſecond inundation: a great part whereof was finiſhed before it fell, and before they left the Worke. They alſo began this building vpon a ground, the moſt oppreſſed with waters of all the world: as by the great ruine which theſe waters, forcibly ouer-bearing and ouer-flowing, made in the time of the ſucceeding Emperours, is made manifeſt, approoued alſo by the Prophet Hieremie, ſpeaking of Babylon in theſe words: Thou that dwelleſt vpon many waters. It cannot be doubted but that there needed a ſubſtantiall foundation, for ſo high a raiſed building on a mariſh ground: and to which, Glycas vpon Geneſis giueth fortie yeeres. For it ſeemeth, that the Tower was neere finiſhed when God ouerthrew it: it being afterward written, So the Lord ſcattered them from thence vpon all the Earth, and they left to build the Citie. Out of which place it may be gathered (becauſe the Towre is not then named) that they very neere had perfomed the Work of their ſuppoſed defence, which was the Tower: and that afterward they went on with the Citie adioyning, wherein they inhabited. It is alſo to be noted, that till ſuch time as this confuſion ſeized them (wherupon the Towre was throwne down) theſe Nations did not diſperſe themſelues: for from thence the Lord ſcattered them vpon all the Earth, (that was) when they perceiued not one anothers ſpeech. Now to thinke that this Worke in the newneſſe of the Word (wanting all inſtruments and materials) could be performed in ten yeares; and that Tubal and Gomer in the ſame yeere could creepe through 3000. miles of Deſart, with Women, Children, and Cattell; let thoſe light Beleeuers, that neyther tye themſelues to the Scripture, nor to reaſon, approue it, for I doe not. And if the Arke of Noah was 100. yeares in building, or but neere ſuch a time, (and then) when the World had ſtood 1556. yeares, it were more than fooliſhneſſe and madneſſe it ſelfe, to thinke that ſuch a Worke as this could be performed in ten; when the World (from the Floud to the arriuall at Babel, and beginning of this building there) had but 131. yeares, and whereof they had ſpent ſome part in trauailing from the Eaſt. Againe, if all Aſia ſet to their helping hands in the building of the Temple of Diana, and yet they conſumed in that Work 400 yeares (or be it but halfe that time) and in ſuch an Age as when the World flouriſhed in all ſorts of Artificers, and with abundant plentie of materials & carriages: This Worke of the Tower of Babel could hardly (with all the former wants ſuppoſed) be erected in thoſe few yeers remembred. And for concluſion, let all men of iudgement weigh with themſelues how impoſſible it was for a nation or Family of men, with their Wiues, and Children, and Cattell, to trauaile 3000. miles through Woods, Bogs, and Deſarts, without any Guide or Conductor; and we ſhall find it rather a Worke of 100. yeers than of 100. dayes. For in the Weſt Indies, of which the Spaniards haue the experience, in thoſe places where they found neither Path nor Guide, they haue not entred the Countrey ten miles in ten yeeres. And if Nimrods people ſpent many yeeres by the account before remembred in paſſing from the Eaſt India or the higher part thereof, which ſtandeth in 115. Degrees of Longitude, vntill they came into Shinaar which lyeth in 79. Degrees (the diſtance betweene thoſe places containing 36. Degrees, which makes 720. Leagues, which is 2160. miles) & did all the way keep the Mountaines and hard ground; then the difference betweene Babylon and Biſcay is much more: for the bodie of Biſcay lyeth in ten Degrees, and Babylon or Shinaar, (as aforeſaid) in 79. ſo the length of way from Shinaar to Auſturia or Biſcay is 69. Degrees, which make 1380. Leagues, or of miles 4140. And therefore if Nimrod tooke diuers yeeres to find Shinaar, which was but 2160. miles: or (ſuppoſing that the Arke reſted in Armenia) little aboue 400. miles: there is no cauſe to the contrary, but to allow as many yeeres to Gomer & Tubal to trauaile 3000. miles, to Countries leſſe known vnto them by far, than the Land of Shinaar was to Nimrod. For Paradiſe was knowne to Noah before the Floud: and ſo was the Region of Eden by Moſes afterward remembred; but what hee vnderſtood of moſt part of the World elſe it is vnknowne. And therefore did Annius ill aduiſe himſelf to plant Gomer in Italie, and Tubal in Spaine, in the tenth & twelfth of Nim-

Plin.

Isa.66.v.8. reads Reigne: Shall the Earth be brought forth in one day, or shall a Nation be borne at once? But it may be obiected, That the Sonnes of Iapheth might come by Sea, and so saue this great trauaile through Desarts by Land. But we neuer reade of any Nauigation in those dayes, nor long after. Surely he that knoweth what it is to imbarke so great a people as we may iustly suppose those Conductors carryed with them, will not easily beleeue that there were any Vessels in those dayes to transport Armies, and (withall) their Cattell, by whose Milke they liued and fed their Children: For Milke and Fruit were the banquetting Dishes of our Fore-Fathers. And in the eldest times, euen the Kings and Fathers of Nations valued themselues by the Heards and numbers of their Cattell: who had Flockes of Sheepe, and great Droues and Heards of their own, and their own Sheep-heards and Heardsmen. Now if Tubal had past by Sea from any part of Palestina, Syria, or Cilicia, he might haue made good choice within the Streights, and not haue ouer gone Granado, Valentia, and other Prouinces in that Tract: past the Streights of Gibralter, disdayned all Andalusia and Portugal, with all those goodly Ports and Countries; and haue sought out the yron, woody, and barren Countrey of the World (called Biscay) by a long and dangerous Nauigation. But before the iourney of the Argonautæ, there were scarce any Vessels that durst crosse the Seas in that part of the world: and yet that which Iason had (if the Tale be true) was but a Galley, & a poore one (God knowes) and perchance such as they vse this day in Ireland: which although it carryed but foure and fiftie Passengers, yet it was farre greater than any of the former times:

Diod.Sicul.l.4. c.4.fol.115. Erat enim antea paruarum nauicularum vsus: For in formes times they vsed very smal Vessels.

I deny not but that the Tyrians gaue themselues of old to farre-off Nauigations, whence Tibullus ascribed the inuention of Ships vnto them:

Tyrus knew first how Ships might vse the Wind.

Diod.Sicul.l.1. Plin.l.7.c.56. And for those Boates called longæ naues or Gallies, Pliny saith that Ægesias ascribeth the deuice to Paralus: and Philostephanus to Iason: Ctesias to Samyras; and Saphanus to Semiramis: Archimachus to Ægeon: to which inuention the Erythræi are said to haue added

Thucyd. certaine numbers of Oares: and then Aminocles the Corinthian to haue increased them: the Carthaginians afterwards to haue brought them to foure Bankes: the Quinq; Remi first to haue beene vse by Nesichthon the Salaminian, with which Vessels in those parts of the World, the Romans serued themselues in the Punicke Warre. But these bee perhaps but the partialities of Writers, or their ignorance. For there are that as constantly cast the deuising of these Gallies on Sesostris, though Semiramis vsed them in the passage of her Armie ouer Indus in Abrahams time. So it is said, that Danaus was the first that Plin.l.7.c.56. Euseb.de prep. Euang.c.1. Tert.de Coron. mil. brought a Ship into Greece: and yet the Samothracians challenge the inuention; and yet Tertulian (on the contrarie) giues it to Minerua: others to Neptune; Thucydides to the Corinthians. And so ignorant were the people of those Ages, as the Egyptians vsed to coast the Shores of the Red Sea vpon raffes, deuised by King Erythrus: and in the time of the Romans, the Brittans had a kind of Boat (with which they crost the Seas) made of small twigs, and couered ouer with Leather: of which kind I haue seene at the Dingle in Ireland, and elsewhere. Naues excorio circumsuta in Oceano Britannico (saith Textor;) of which Lucan the Poet:

Primùm cana salix, madefacto vimine, paruam
Texitur in puppim, cæsog; induta iuuenco,
Vectoris patiens tumidum superenatat amnem.
Sic Venetus stagnante Pado, fusog; Britannus
Nauigat Oceano.

The moystned Osyer of the hoarie Willow
Is wouen first into a little Boat:
Then cloth'd in Bullockes Hide, vpon the billow
Of a proud Riuer, lightly doth it float
Vnder the Waterman:
So on the Lakes of ouer-swelling Poe
Sailes the Venetian: and the Britaine so
On th' out-spred Ocean.

And

And although it cannot be denyed, when Noah by Gods inspiration was instructed in so many particulars concerning the Arke, that then many things concerning Navigation were first reuealed; yet it appeares that there was much difference between the Arke of Noah, and such Ships as were for any long Nauigation. Yea, ancient Stories shew, that it was long after these times, ere any durst presume vpon any long Voyages to Sea, at least with multitudes of Women, and Children, and Cattell: as also common reason can tell vs, that euen now when this Art is come to her perfection, such Voyages are very troublesome and dangerous. So as it doth appeare, that there was not in that Age of Nimrod any Ship, or vse of Ships fit for any long Nauigation. For if Gomer & Tubal had passed themselues and their people by Sea, the exercise of Nauigation would not haue beene dead for so many hundred yeares after. Leauing therefore the fabulous to their Fables, and all men else to their fancies, who haue cast Nations into Countries far off, I know not how, I will follow herein the Relation of Moses and the Prophets: to which Truth there is ioyned both Nature, Reason, Policie, and Necessitie: and to the rest, neither probabilitie, nor possibilitie.

§. IIII.

Of GOG and MAGOG, TVBAL, and MESHECH, seated first about Asia the lesse; out of EZECHIEL, CAP. 38. 39.

NOw although many Learned and Reuerend men haue formed (I know not whereby led) a Plantation of the World, which also hath been and is receiued; yet I hope I may be excused, if I differ altogether from them in many particulars. Certainly, that great Learned man of this latter Age, Arias Mountanus was also in some things much mistaken: and for Iosephus, as hee hath many good things, and is a Guide to many errours withall, so was hee in this Plantation of the World very grosse and fabulous; whereby both Eusebius, Hieroſolymitanus, Epiphanius, and others, that haue taken his testimonies for currant, haue beene by him farre misse-led. But the better to conceiue what Regions of the World Gomer the first sonne of Iaphet possest, as also Tubal, it is needefull to begin with Magog: because the Scriptures take most knowledge of Gog and Magog: which two names haue troubled many Commentators, saith Matth. Beroaldus, who hath laboured herein with great diligence, and whom (of all that euer I read) I find most iudicious in the examination of this Plantation. Hee takes authoritie from the Prophet Ezechiel chiefly, who in the 38. and 39. Chapters directeth vs, what Nations the Gomerians, Tubalines, and Togormians were, together with the Magogians: of which Gog was Prince or Chiefe Conductor in their Attempts against Israel. For besides the portions of Europe, and the North-east parts of the greater Asia, which Iapheths Issues possest, all Asia the lesse was peopled by them. And that those of the Issue of Iapheth (whom Ezechiel speakes of) were seated hereabout, it may best appeare, if we consider the circumstances of the place, and the dependencie vpon the former Prophesie in the 37. Chapter. For in that 37. Chapter, Ezechiel propheſieth of the vniting of the two Kingdomes of Israel and Iuda, after their deliuerie from captiuitie. c. 37. v. 19.

By which Propheſie of Ezechiel, it appeareth, that God purposed to gather together his people, to giue life to dead bones, and to rule them by one Prince. For to that purpose it is written; And DAVID my Seruant shall bee King ouer them, and they shall haue one Sheepheard, (that is they shall be vnited as they were in Dauids time. Hereupon in the 38. Chapter Ezechiel propheſieth against those Nations, which should seeke to impeach this Vnion, and disturbe the people of Israel, whom God purposed to receiue to grace, and promised to restore. And so in the same Chapter are those Nations coupled together, which infested the Israelites after their returne, and sought to subiect them: all which were the Subiects or Allies of Gog, Prince of the Magogians, or Cœlesyrians, next bordering Palestina, or the holy Land, followed also by the rest of the Nations of Asia the lesse, which lay North from Iudea. The words of Ezechiel are these: Sonne of man, set thy face against GOG, and against the Land of MAGOG, the chiefe Princes of MESECH (or MOSOCH) and TVBAL: and afterward, Behold, I come against the chiefe Prince of MESECH and TVBAL: and in the sixth verse; GOMER and all his Bands, and the House of TOGORMA of the North quarters. Herein Ezechiel hauing first deliuered c. 38. v. 2.

the purpose of his Prophecie, teacheth what Nations they were, that should in vanitie assayle Israel. He ioyneth them together vnder their Prince Gog, and sheweth that their habitations were on the North quarters of Iuda, and how seated and ioyned together. Gog signifieth in the Hebrew (saith Saint Hierome) tectum or couering of a house: and Pintus vpon Ezechiel affirmeth that by Gog is meant Antichrist: for (saith hee) Antichristus erit Diaboli tegumentum sub specie humana: That Antichrist shall be the couering of the Deuill vnder humane forme. He addeth, that Magog is as much to say as Gog: the Letter (M) being an Hebrew Prepositon, and importeth as much as of or from: so hee taketh Magog for those people which follow Antichrist. So farre Pintus; at least in this not amisse, that he expoundeth Magog not for any one person, but for a Nation; with which agreeth this obseruation of Berosaldus. Magog (saith he) in Hebrew is written Ham-Magog, which sheweth Magog to be a Region or Nation: for the Letter (He) which is vsed but for an Emphasis (which the Hebrewes call Heliarcdia) is neuer added to proper names of men, but often to place. So as Gog was Prince of that Nation (called either Magog, or, according to others, the people of Gog) also Prince of Meshech, (or Mosoch) and of Tubal: as by the first Verse of the 29. Chapter is made manifest: Behold I come against thee GOG the chiefe Prince of MESHECH and TVBAL. This must needes bee meant by the Successours of Seleucus Nicanor, who did not (as other conquering Nations) seeke to make the Iewes their Tributaries only, but endeuoured by all meanes, and by all kind of violence to extinguish the Religion it selfe (which the Hebrewes profest) and the acknowledging of one true God: and to force them to worship and serue the mortall and rotten gods of the Heathen; of which nothing remayned but the very name, and dead Images. Saint Ambrose and Isidore take Gog for the Nation of the Goths: belike because they inuaded Europe, and sacked Rome, and many other places and Cities thereabout. Hermolaus Barbarus out of Pomp. Mela deriues the Turkes from the Scythians, esteemed Magogians of Gog. Many take Gog for the proper name of a Man: others of a Region: others for a Nation inhabiting a Region, as Iunius, who sayes that Gog is the name of a Nation, denominated from him whom the Greekes Stories call Gyges: who in former time hauing slaine Candaules the Lydian, gaue his owne name to that Nation, thence after called Gygades: and thereof also the Gygean Lake; which Lake Strabo also findeth in Lydia, (of which Gyges was King) fortie Furlongs from Sardis. Plinie calleth it Gygeum stagnum. Herodotus and Nicander set it about the Riuers of Hyllus, and Maeander; but the difference is not great. Marius Niger maketh mention of this Gyges King of Lydia: who after hee had subdued the Countrey about the Riuer Rhodius which runneth into the Hellespont, called the Promontorie Trapese after his owne name Gyges. These Opinions doe also seeme to strengthen that of Iunius. For Magog, saith hee, is that part of Asia the lesse, which Halyattes obtained, and after him his Sonne Crœsus; who (as Iunius further notes) hauing mastred all those Regions as farre South as Libanus, in that Border built the Citie Gigarta or Gogkarta (which in the Syrian signifieth the Citie of Gog) seated in Cœlesyria, whose people were the ancient Enemies of the Iewes.

Now that Magog is found in Cœlesyria, Plinie affirmeth, saying; Cœlesyria habet Bambycen quæ alio nomine Hierapolis vocatur, Syris verò Magog. Cœlesyria hath in it Bambyce, which by another name is called Hierapolis, but of the Syrians Magog. Hee further telleth vs that the monstrous Idoll Atergatis, called by the Greekes Dercето, was here worshipped. Lucian makes mention hereof, saying that the Citie had anciently another name, which yet hee expresseth not; forbearing perhaps the word Magog, as sounding nothing elegantly in the Greeke. But if we may beleeue Strabo, then was Edessa in Mesopotamia the same Bambyce or Hierapolis, where the same Idoll was worshipped. Ortelius is doubtfull whether one of these Authors did not mistake the place of this Bambyce or Hierapolis. It may well enough bee that the same name and Religion was common to them both. Certaine it is, that both of them lay due North from Palestina, and were both subiect vnto the Kings of the Race of Seleucus. Now I doe not condemne the Opinion of Hermolaus Barbarus following Iosephus, but grant, that perhaps Magog might also bee the Father of the Scythians; notwithstanding that in this place, where Gog is made the Prince of Magog, the Nations of Cœlesyria and the North parts adioyning bee meant by Magog: for by a latter Plantation from these parts they might bee propagated into Scythia. Yet it is not to be denyed, that the Scythians in in old times comming out of the North-east wasted the better part of Asia the lesse, and possest Cœlesyria, where they built both Scythopolis and Hierapolis, which the Syrians call Mogog. And that to this Magog Ezechiel had reference, it is very plaine: for this Citie Hierapolis or Magog standeth due North from Iudea, according to the words of Ezechiel, that from the North quarters those Nations should come. For as the Kings of the South which infested the Israelites were the Ptolomies, Kings of Egypt: so those of the North were the Kings of Asia and Syria, the Successours of Seleucus, the Successour of Alexander Macedon. Gulielmus Tyrius thinkes that this Hierapolis is that Rages, mentioned in the Storie of Tobias. Plinie takes it not onely to haue beene called Bambyce, as we haue said, but also Edessa: not that by Euphrates; but another of the same name; now the known name is Alleppo: for so *Belloniu*s expounds this Hierapolis; or Magog. This Citie had the Title of Sacred, as the Sacred Citie, (for so the word Hierapolis signifieth) yet was it a place of most detested Idolatry, and wherein was worshipped the Idoll of the Mermayde Atergatis, or Atirgitis, according to Plinie, which the Greekes call Derceto. Lib. 4. cap. de bello Sacro.

If then we conferre the words of Ezechiel in the third verse of the thirtie eight Chapter, wherein he ioyneth together Gog Mesech, and Tubal: and withall remember that Hierapolis was the Citie of Magog, which also is seated directly North from Iudea: with whom also Ezechiel coupleth Gomer, and all his bands of the North quarters; wee may (as I conceiue) safely conclude, that these Followers and Vassals of Gog (which were Northerne Nations in respect of Iudea) were not the Gomerians of France, nor the Tubalines of Spaine, but a people of the lesser Asia, and Cœlesyria: and therefore that the opinions of Berosus, Iosephus, and whosoeuer else hath followed them therin are to be reiected. But if Iosephus referre himselfe to later times, and thinke that some Colonie of the Tubalines might from Iberia and Asia passe into Spaine (to wit) from that piece of Land betweene Colchis (or Mengrelia) and Albania, (most part possest by the Georgians) then is his iudgement of better allowance. For without any repugnancie of opinions, it may be granted, that in processe of time these people might from their first habitation, passe into the Countries neere the Euxine Sea, and from thence in after-Ages into Spaine.

Iosephus makes mention of the Iberi, saying, that they were anciently called Thobelos, as of Tubal; from whence (saith Iustine) they passed into Spaine to search out the Mines of that Region: hauing belike vnderstood that it was a Southerly Countrie and Mountainous. For it seemeth that the Tubalines called Chalybes liued altogether by the exchange of Iron, and other Metals, as Apollonius witnesseth in these following Verses, telling how the Argonantes did visit them;

Hæc gens tellurem rigido non vertit aratro,
Sed ferri venas scindit sub montibus altis:
Mercibus hæc mutat, quæ vitæ alimenta ministrant:

The Calybes plough not their barren soyle
But vndermine high Hils for Iron Veines:
Changing the purchase of their endlesse toyle
For Marchandize, which their poore liues sustaines.

But it is more probable, that Spaine was first peopled by the Africans, who had euer since an affection to returne thither, & to repeople it a new. This appeared by the Carthaginians of old, who were easily drawne to passe ouer the Streights into that Countrey; and after by the Moores who held Granado, and the South parts eight hundred yeeres, till the time of Ferdinand and Isabel. And either of these opinions are more probable, than that in the twelfth yeere of Nimrods Reigne, Tubal past into Spaine, and therein built Saint Vual: a poore Towne, and a poore deuice, God knowes. Certaine it is that we must finde Mosoch or Mesech, and Tubal Neighbours, and Gomer and Togarma not farre off, or else we shall wrong Ezechiel: for he called Gog the Leader or Prince of Mesech and Tubal, and maketh Gomer and Togarma their Assistants. And that Mesech inhabited Asia, Funclius (though he followed Berosus) confesseth, for these bee his words: MESACVS, qui à MOSE MESECH, priscos Mesios ab Adula monte vsq; ad Ponticam regionem posuit: hæc regio postea Cappadocia dicta est, in qua vrbs Mazica, &c. hæc est terra MAGOG principalis; MESACVS, whom MOSES calleth MESECH, placed the ancient

Mesians

Meſians from the Mount Adulas, vnto the Coaſt of Pontus. This Region was afterward called Cappadocia, in which is the Towne Mazica, &c. this is the principall Country of MAGOG. And this doth Annius alſo auow, and yet forgets that Gog was Prince both of Meſech and Tubal: and therefore, that the one was a Nation of Spaniards, the other of Cappadocians, is very ridiculous; Spaine lying directly Weſt, and not North from Iudea. Alſo Ezechiel in the 27. Chapter, where he prophecieth of the deſtruction of Tyre, nameth Meſech and Tubal ioyntly. And for a finall proofe, that theſe Nations were of a Northren Neighbour Land (how farre ſoeuer ſtretched) Ezechiel in the 38. Chapter makes them all Horſemen. Thou, and much people with thee, all ſhall ride vpon Horſes, euen a great multitude and a mightie. Then if any man beleeue that theſe troupes came out of Spaine 10 ouer the Pyrenes, and firſt paſſed ouer a part of France, Italie, Hungarie, and Sarmatia, and imbarqued againe about the Helleſpont, or elſe compaſſed all Pontus, and Euxinus, to come into the leſſer Aſia, which is halfe the length or compaſſe of the then knowne World; he may be called a ſtrong beleeuer, but he ſhall neuer be iuſtified thereby. But on the contrarie it is knowne, that Seleucis was a Prouince neighbouring Paleſtina or Iudea, and that Hierapolis (or Magog) ioyned vnto it: whoſe Princes commanded all Syria, and Aſia the leſſe, (namely the Selencida) and held it, till Scipio, Aſiaticus ouerthrew Antiochus the Great: after which they yet poſſeſt Syria till the time of Tigranes: and whether Meſhech be in Cappadocia, or vnder Iberia, yet is it of the Tubalines, and one and the ſame Dominion. 20

Of Gomer the like may be ſaid. Firſt, he ſeated himſelfe with Togorma, not farre from Magog and Tubal, in the borders of Syria and Cilicia. Afterward hee proceeded further into Aſia the leſſe; and in long tract of time his valiant Iſſue filled all Germanie, reſted long in France and Brittanie, and poſſeſſed the vtmoſt borders of the earth, accompliſhing (as Melanchon well notes) the ſignification of their parents name, which is Vtmoſt bordering. But when theſe borderers wanted further place, wherein they might exonerate their ſwelling multitudes that were bounded in by the great Ocean, then did they returne vpon the Nations occupying the Countries, through which they had formerly paſſed, oppreſſing firſt their Neighbours, afterwards the people more remote. Hereupon it was (as the worthy reſtorer of our Antiquities, M. William Cambden hath 30 noted) that they were called Cimbri, which in their old Language doth ſignifie Robbers; neceſſitie inforcing them to ſpoyle their Neighbours, to whom in their originall they were as neere ioyned, as afterwards in the feates which they poſſeſſed. For that the Warlike nations of Germany were in elder Ages accuſtomed to be beaten by the Gaules, the authoritie of Ceſar affirming it is proofe ſufficient. But in times following they purſued richer Conqueſts, and more eaſie though further diſtant, by which (to omit their other enterprizes not here to be ſpoken of) they were drawne at length into Aſia the leſſe, and occupyed thoſe parts, which had formerly beene held by their Progenitours. I ſay not that they claymed thoſe Lands as theirs by Deſcent; for likely it is, that they knew little of their owne Pedigree. Neyther can any man therefore deny, that they 40 were of olde ſeated in Aſia, becauſe in late Ages they returned thither; vnleſſe hee will thinke, that all thoſe Nations which from farre parts haue inuaded and conquered the Land of Shinaar, may by that Argument bee proued not to haue iſſued from thence at the firſt.

Now concerning Samothes, for his excellent wiſedome ſirnamed Dis, whom Annius makes the Brother of Gomer and Tubal (which Brother Moſes neuer heard of, who ſpake his knowledge of Iaphets ſonnes) they muſt find him in ſome olde Poet: for Funclius, a great Beroſian, confeſſeth: Quis hic SAMOTHES fuerit incertum eſt; Who this SAMOTHES was, it is vncertaine; neither is there any proofe that he was that ſame Dis, whom Ceſar ſaith the Gaules ſuppoſe to bee their Anceſter; yea, and Vignier confeſſeth with 50 FVNCTIVS: Mais on ne ſcayt qui il eſtoit; No man knowes who he was.

§. V.

Againſt the fabulous BEROSVS his fiction, That the Italian IANVS was NOAH.

BVt before I goe on with Noah his Sonnes, I thinke it neceſſarie to diſproue the fiction which Annius hath of Noah himſelfe: an inuention (indeed) very ridiculous, though warranted (as hee hath wreſted) by thoſe Authours of whom himhimſelfe hath Commented: as the Fragment of Beroſus, Fabius, Pictor, Cato, Lauinius and others. For Annius ſeekes to perſwade vs, that Noah (ſurnamed Ianus) was the ſame which founded Genoa, with other Cities in Italie, wherein he liued 92. yeeres. This to diſproue, by Moſes ſilence, is a ſufficient argument to me, if there were nothing elſe to diſproue it. For if he vouchſafed to remember the building of Babel, Erec, Achad, Chalne and Nineue by Nimrod, Noah was a man of too great marke to be forgotten, with all the acts he did in 92. yeares. But it were a needleſſe labour for me to diſproue the authoritie of that Beroſus, on whom Annius groundeth, ſeeing ſo many learned men haue ſo demonſtratiuely proued that Fragment to be counterfeit. Beſides that, Tatianus the Aſſyrian in his Oration againſt the Greekes, auoweth, that the ancient and true Beroſus wrote onely three Bookes, dedicated to Antiochus the ſucceſſor of Seleucus Nicanor: but Annius hath deuiſed fiue Bookes, wherewith he honoureth Beroſus. And whereas Beroſus handled onely the eſtate of the Chaldeans and Aſſyrians, Annius hath filled this Fragment with the buſineſſe of all the World. And if wee may beleeue Euſebius better than Annius, then all the Kings of the Latines (before Æneas) conſumed but 150. yeers: whereas no man hath doubted, but that from Noah to Æneas arriual into Italy there paſt 1126. (after the leaſt rate of the Hebrew account) and (after Codoman) 1291. For Ianus (who was the firſt of their Kings) liued at once with Ruth, who marryed Booz, in the Worlds yeare (as ſome reckon) 2717. after the Floud 1064. and Noah dyed 350. yeares after the Floud: and ſo there paſt betweene Ianus of Italie and Noah ſurnamed Ianus 704. yeers. For Saturnus ſucceeded Ianus, Picus after Saturnus, Fannus after Picus, and Latinus followed Faunus: which Latinus liued at once with Tautanes the 27. King of Aſſyria; with Pelaſgus of Peloponneſus; with Demophoon of Athens; and Sampſon Iudge of Iſrael. Now all theſe fiue Kings of the Latines hauing conſumed but one hundred and fiftie yeares; and the laſt of them in the time of Sampſon: then reckoning vpwards for one hundred and fiftie yeares, and it reacheth Ruth, with whom Ianus liued.

True it is, that the Greekes had their Ianus; but this was not Noah: ſo had they Ion the ſonne of Xuthus, the ſonne of Deucalion, from whom they draw the Iones, who were indeed the children of Iauan, the fourth ſonne of Iapheth. For the vulgar Tranſlation (where the Hebrew word is Iauan) writes Greece, and the Septuagint, Hellas; which is the ſame. So had they Medus the ſon of Madea, whom they make the Parent of the Medes, though they were deſcended of a far more ancient Father (to wit) Madai the third ſonne of Iapheth.

Ezech. 27. 19 13 & to the place of Eſay 66. 19. (for Iauan) Hellada: and (for the plurall Iuuanin) Hellena.

Laſtly, we ſee by a true experience, that the Britiſh Language hath remayned among vs aboue 2000. yeares, and the Engliſh ſpeech euer ſince the inuaſion of the Angles, and the ſame continuance haue all Nations obſerued among themſelues, though with ſome corruption and alteration. Therefore, it is ſtrange if either Noah (by them called Ianus) had left in Italie his grand-child Gomer after him, or Tubal in Spaine, that no plaine reſemblance of the Hebrew, Syrian, or Scythian (which no time could haue quite extinguiſhed) ſhould haue beene found in the Languages of thoſe Countries. For which reaſons we doubt not but theſe perſonall Plantations of Ianus, Gomer, Tubal, &c. in Italie, Spaine, or France, are meerely fabulous. Let the Italians therefore content themſelues with the Gracian Ianus, which commanded them and planted them, and who preceded the fall of Troy but 150. yeeres (ſaith Euſebius) which was in the time of Latinus, the fift King: which alſo Saint Auguſtine and Iuſtine confirme: and this agreeth with reaſon, time, and poſſibilitie. And if this be not ſufficient to diſproue this vanitie, I may out of themſelues adde thus much: That whereas ſome of them make Veſta (others Camaſena) the wife of this Ianus, who inſtituted the holy Fire of the Veſtal Virgins in Rome (the Latines and Romans taking from Ianus all their Idolatrous and Heatheniſh Ceremonies) there is no man ſo impious, as to beleeue that Noah himſelfe (who is ſaid by Moſes to haue walked with God, to be a iuſt man, and whom God of all Mankind made choice of) could be either ignorant of the true and only God, or ſo wicked and vngratefull, to ſet vp or deuiſe any Heathen, Saluage, or Idolatrous adoration, or haue inſtituted any Ceremonie, contrarie to that which he knew beſt pleaſing to God himſelfe.

§. VI.

§. VI.

That Gomer also and his sonne Togorma of the Posteritie of Iapheth, were first seated about Asia the lesse: and that from thence they spread Westward into Europe, and Northward into Sarmatia.

TO turne now to the sons of Noah, and the Worlds Plantation after the Floud: therein I obserue, that as both reason and necessitie taught them; so, when they multiplyed in great numbers, and dispersed themselues into the next Countries bordering to their first habitations, and from thence sent forth Colonies elsewhere, it was in such a manner as that they might repayre to each other, and keepe intelligence by Riuer: because the Land was yet Desart, and ouer-prest with Woods, Reeds, Bogs, & rotten Marishes. As when Nimrod seated in Babylonia, Chus took the South part of Chaldaea, down the riuer of Gehon, by which he might passe to & fro from Babylon to his own Plantation: those also, which were of the Race of Shem, inhabiting at Vr or Orchoa neere the Lakes of Chaldaea, might by the same riuer get vp to Babylon, and receiue succour from thence. All which Tract of Land vpon Gehon Southward, Moses in the description of Paradise calleth the Land of Chush: because the Dominion and Empire was then in the hands of Nimrod a Chusite, by whom the children of Shem (which came into that Valley and stayed not in the East) were for a while oppreſt, till God afterward by the seed of Abraham made them his owne Nation and victorious. Hauilah, the brother of Nimrod, and sonne of Cush, tooke both bankes of Tygris, especially on the East side of the Riuer: by which Riuer his people might also passe to and fro to Babel.

The Imperiall seate of which Region of Hauilah or Susian, was anciently called Chusian or Chusan, afterward Susa. Cush himself tooke the Bankes of Gehon, and planted those Countries Westward, and Southwest-ward towards Arabia the Stony, and the Desart, where Ptolomie placeth the Citie of Chusidia, first Chusia. Ptol. Asiæ tab. 4.

Seba, and Sheba, with the rest that planted Arabia fœlix, had Tygris to conuey them into the Persian gulfe, which washeth the bankes of Arabia fœlix on the East side: so as those sons of Cush might take Land downe the Riuer as they pleased. Also the Citie of Nineue was by Nimrod founded on the said Riuer of Tygris; and from thence a Colonie past to Charran, standing also vpon a nauigable branch of Euphrates. In like manner did Iapheths sonnes settle themselues together, and tooke their seates in Asia the lesse: from whence they might indifferently stretch themselues Northward, and Westward, into the next parts of Europe, called the Isles of the Gentiles. And it seemeth very agreeable to reason, that both Gomer, Magog, and Tubal, sate downe first of all in that part of Syria, to the North of Palestina and Phœnicia: and from thence Gomer or his children past on into Asia the lesse, as those of Magog and Tubal did; from whence the Tubalines spred themselues into Iberia: and the Magogians more Northerly into Sarmatian. The first Gomerians, and first Planters in Asia the lesse, held the Country of the Cymmerians (witnesse Herodotus) the same Region which was afterward by the Gallo-Greeks called Galatia, to whom Saint Paul wrote his Epistle so intituled. This Nation of the Cymmerians (whom the inuincible Scythians afterwards dispersed, and forced from their first Plantations) gaue names to diuers places, as to the Mountaines about Albania (called Cymmerini) and to the Citie of Cymmeris in Phrygia: also Bosphorus Cymmerius tooke appellation from this Nation, in the out-let whereof was also a Citie of that name, called Cymmerian: which Plinie saith (mistaking the place) had somtime the name of Cerberion; but Cerberion was a Towne in Campania, so called of the vnhealthfull waters, sauouring of Brimstone, which Augustus caused to be cleansed by letting in the water of the Lake Lucrinus. Lib. 4.

The children of Tubal ranged as farre as Iberia, to whom the Moschici were Neighbours, which others write Meshech. The Prophet Ezechiel (coupling them together) calleth Gog the Prince of Meschech and Tubal. For these Meschi (which Ptolomie calleth Moschi) inhabit Syracena a Prouince of Armenia, directly South from the Mountaines Moschici, in the Valley betweene the Mountaines Moschici, and the Mountaines Paryaraies: out of whose North part springeth the Riuer Phasis; from the East part Araxis; and from the West Euphrates: and of this Meschech are descended also the Moscouians (saith Melanchton) and it may bee, that in processe of time some of them inhabited those Regions also: For Meshech (saith Melanchton) signifieth extendens, enlarging or stretching forth. Togorma alſo at firſt did inhabite amongſt his parents and kinred. The Togormians were alſo called Giblei, a people neighbouring the Sydonians in Gabala, a Tetrarchie of Phœnicia, the ſame which Pliny calleth Gaben: from whence Salomon had his moſt excellent Maſons, which hewed ſtones for the Temple of Hieruſalem. Thence the Togormians ſtretched into the leſſe Armenia, whoſe Kings were hence called Tigranes, and their Cities Tigranokarta: of which Cities Tigranes, ſubdued by Lucullus the Roman, built one. Hieroſolymitanus hath planted the Togormians in Barbary; forgetting the propheſie of Ezekiel againſt the Tyrians. They of the houſe of Togorma, brought to thy Faires horſes, and horſe-men, and mules; which could not well bee driuen ouer the whole length of the Mediterran Sea, but from the neighbour Countries by land. But Ioſephus takes them for the parents of the Phrygians; which I doe not deny, but they might be in the enſuing ages: and ſo might the Tubalines be of the Spaniards; but it was from Iberia, and many hundred yeares after the twelfth of Nimrods reigne. The Iewes conceiue that the Turkes came of thoſe Togormians, becauſe their Emperor is called Togor. The Chaldæans make them the Fathers of the Germanes. But Laonicus affirmes, that the Turkes deſcended of the Crim Tartar, which borders Muſcouia. But for theſe ſubderiuations it were infinit to examine them. Only of the firſt and ſecond plantation, and of the firſt Nations after the floud, is the matter which I labour to diſcouer; and therein to open the ignorance of ſome, and the corruption of other fabulous Writers. And this we muſt Note, that thoſe grand-children of Noah which were of a more quiet, or (perchance) of leſſe vnderſtanding, & had not therefore the leading of Colonies ſent out, their proper habitations could bee hardly knowne: onely reaſon hath taught vs, that they dwelt among the reſt, and were couered with the fame of others, who tooke on them the Conduction and Dominion ouer the reſt. Note.

Of Iauan the fourth ſon of Iapheth: and of Meſch, of Aram, and Meſhech of Iapheth.

OF Iauan the fourth ſonne of Iapheth came the Iones, which were afterwards called the Greekes: and ſo the Latine and Greek Interpreters for Iauan write Greece, as in Eſay: Et mittam ex iis qui ſaluati fuerint ad gentes, in mare, in Italiam, & Græciam: And I will ſend thoſe that eſcape of them to Nations in the Sea, in Italy and in Greece. The Geneua here vſeth the word (Tarſhiſh) for Tarſus, a City in Cilicia, though Tarſis in many places be taken for the Sea. The Tigurine and the Geneua vſe the names Tubal and Iauan, and not Italy and Greece: keeping the ſame Hebrew words. Of the Iones were the Athenians, though themſelues dreame that they were Aborigines, or men without Anceſters, and growing (as it were) out of the ſoile it ſelfe: who abounding in people, ſent Colonies into Aſia the leſſe, of whom came the Iones of thoſe parts. Others deriue the Athenians from Ion the ſonne of Xuthus, the ſon of Deucalion; but the antiquity of Iauan marres the faſhion of that ſuppoſition, who ſo many years preceded Xuthus, Ion, or Deucalion. Pauſanias tels vs that Xuthus ſtole out of Theſſaly with all his Fathers treaſure, and his Brothers portions, and arriuing at Athens, hee was graciouſly receiued by Erictheus, who gaue him his Daughter in marriage; of whom he receiued two ſonnes, Ion and Achæus, the ſuppoſed Anceſters of the Athenians: (For Attica was called Ionia, ſaith Plutarch in the life of Theſeus;) who, when he had ioined Megara to Attica, erected a pillar in that Iſthmos or Strait, which faſtneth Peloponneſus to the other part of Greece: writing on that part which looketh towards the Eaſt, theſe words: Hæc non ſunt Peloponneſus, aſt Ionia; Theſe Countries are not of Peloponneſus, but of Ionia: and on the other ſide which looked towards the South, and into Peloponneſus, this: Theſe parts are Peloponneſus, and not Ionia. Thucyd.

Strabo out of Hecatæus affirmeth, that the Iones came out of Aſia into Greece; which is contrary to the former opinion: That the Iones of Greece tranſporting certain companies into Aſia the leſſe, the name of Iones was thereby therein retained. And though Strabo knew no more thereof than hee learned of the Greeks themſelues, yet I finde this coniecture of Hecatæus reaſonable enough. For though it were to him vnknowne, yet ſure I am that Aſia the leſſe had people before Greece had any: and that Iauan did not flie from Babylonia into Greece, but tooke Asia the lesse in his passage; and from thence past ouer the neereſt way, leauing his owne name to some maritimate Prouince on that side, as hee did to that part of Greece so called. But yet Strabo himselfe beleeued, that Ionia took the name from Ion the son of Xanthus: for so much he had learned from themselues; which was also the opinion of Pausanias. True it is, that the Greekes in after-times cast themselues into that part of Asia the lesse, opposite vnto them, which they held for diuers yeares. And howsoeuer the Greeks vaunt themselues to be Fathers of Nations, & the most ancient; yet all approued Historians (not their owne) deride and disproue their pride, and vanity therein. For this dispute of Antiquity (among prophane Writers) rested betweene the Scythians and the Egyptians, as Iustine out of Trogus, in the warre betweene Vexoris of Egypt, and Tanais of Scythia, witnesseth: which preceded farre the reigne of Ninus, and was long before the name of Greece was euer heard of. And it is also manifest, that in Cecrops time the Greekes were all saluages, without law or religion, liuing like brute beasts in all respects; and Cecrops (saith Saint Augustine) liued together with Moses.

Lib.18.de Ciu. Dei.c.10.

The sixth sonne of Iapheth was Meshech, whom the Septuagint call Mosech: (a part of those Nations commanded by Gog the chiefe Prince of Meshech and Tubal.) But this we must remember, that betweene Mesech the sonne of Aram, and Meshech (or Mosech) the sonne of Iapheth, there is little difference in name, and both by diuers Interpreters diuersly vvritten. Montanus with the Vulgar vvriteth Mesch, the sonne of Aram, Mes; the Geneua, Masch; Iunius, Mesch. But it may be gathered out of the 120. Psalme, that eyther Meshech the sonne of Iapheth, was the parent of those people, or gaue name to that Prouince wherein Dauid hid himselfe: or else (vvhich may rather seem) that it tooke name from Mesch the sonne of Aram. For Dauid bewayling his exile (while he liued among a barbarous and irreligious People) vseth these words: Woe is me that I remaine in Meseth, and dwell in the Tents of Kedar: vvhich Iunius conuerteth thus: Hei mihi quia peregrinor tam diu: habito tanquam Scenitæ Kedareni: The Septuagint giues it this sense: Woe is me because my habitation (or abode) is prolonged, who dwell with the Inhabitants of Kedar: vvith vvhich this of the Latine agreeth; Heu mihi, quia incolatus meus prolongatus est, habitaui cum habitantibus Kedar: The Chaldæan otherwise, and in these vvords: O me miserum, quia peregrinatus sum Asianis, habitaui cum tabernaculis Arabum; O wretch, that I am, for I haue trauailed among those of Asia: I haue dwelt in the Tabernacles of the Arabians. But howsoeuer or which soeuer conuersion be taken for the best, yet all make mention of Kedar: which is a Prouince of Arabia Petræa; and the Chaldæan putteth Asia in stead of Mesech, but the Hebrew it self hath Mesech. And if it be to be taken for a Nation, (as it is most likely, because it answers to Kedar, the name of a Nation) seeing Mesh the sonne of Aram, 1. *Chron.*1.7. is called Meshec, it is indifferent whether this Nation tooke name from Meshech or Mesh, both bordering Iudæa, and like enough to be commanded by one Prince; for so Ezechiel makes Mesech and Tubal. But as for those that take Mesech out of the word Mosoch (giuen by the Septuagint) to be the Muscouian: sure they presume much vpon the affinity of names, as aforesaid. And sure I am that Dauid neuer trauelled so farre North; (for to him Muscouia was vtterly vnknown) but about the border of Kedar (it may be) he was often in all the time of his persecution: the same being a City on the Mountains of Sanir or Galaad. And yet Arias Montanus makes Mosoch the Father of the Muscouians: and herein also Melanchton runnes with the tide of common opinion, and sets Mesech in Muscouia, though with some better aduice of iudgement; as, first seated in Cappadocia, and from thence trauelling Northward: expounding the places of the 120. Psalme, (Hei mihi quòd exulo in Mesech) to signifie, Gentis eius feritatem insignem esse; That the ferity of that Nation exceeded: which fierceneſſe or brutality of the Muscouians, Dauid neuer proued, or (perchance) neuer heard of. But the same ferity or cruelty which those Northerne Muscouians had, may aswell bee ascribed to the Arabians and Kedarens. For this Country tooke name of Kedar the second sonne of Ismael, of whom a people of equall fierceneſs to any of the world were begotten, both in those times and long after, euen to this day (if the Arabians, Ismaelites, and Saracens, may bee accounted one people:) the same being foreshewed by the speech of the Angell to Hagar, *Gen.*16.*v.*12. And he shall be a wilde man: his hand shall be against euery man, and euery mans hand against him. Now Arabia the Desart (saith Pliny) confronteth the Arabians Cochlei on the East, and the Cedrei Southward, both which ioyne together vpon the Nabathæi. So it appeareth (as before before) that Meſech, Tubal, Gomer, Togorma, and Magog, neighboured Canaan and Iſrael, and that Kedar alſo did ioyne to Meſech: all which vvere Regions of Syria, or of Aſia the leſſe, commanded by the Succeſſors of Seleucus, enemies of the re-eſtabliſhment of Iſrael and Iuda. But (as I haue already ſaid) it might well bee, that long after the firſt plantation the iſſue of Meſech (or Moſoch) might paſſe into Cappadocia, and thence into Hyrcania, and giue names, both to Mazega in the one, and to the Mountaines Moſchici in the other, and from thence might ſend people more Northerly into Muſcouia, & ſo all opinions ſaued. But all ſaluage Nations ouer-growne and vncultiuated, doe (for the moſt part) ſhew a late plantation, euen as Ciuility, Letters, and magnificent Building, witneſſe antiquity.

Tiras, the ſeuenth ſonne of Iapheth, vvhich Montanus reckons among the ſonnes of Gomer, was the Father of the Thracians, as all Authors (worthy the examination) affirme. Ioſephus vvas the firſt that determined hereof: and becauſe the Scriptures are altogether ſilent, what part of the world Tiras peopled, the coniectures are indifferent, and giue no ground at all of diſpute. It followeth now to ſpeake of the ſonnes of Gomer, vvhich vvere three, Mont. in chr.

Aſcanez, Riphath, and Togorma.

§. VIII.

Of Aſcanez and Riphath, the two elder Sonnes of Gomer.

Ascanez vvas the Father of thoſe which the Greeks call Regini, (ſaith Ioſephus) but he giues no reaſon vvhy.

Euſebius makes Aſcanez the Father of the Goths. The Iewes in their Thargum make him the roote of the Germane Nation, but their expoſitions are commonly very idle. Pliny findeth Aſcania in Phrygia, neere the Riuers of Hilas and Cios: Melanchton being of the ſame opinion, that the Tuiſcones vvere deſcended of the Aſcanez: (for Tuiſcones, ſaith he, is as much to ſay, as of the Aſcanez, præpoſito articulo die Aſcanez) and that the word ſignifieth a Religious Keeper of fire: it being an ancient ſuperſtition to pray at the fire of Sacrifices, as afterwards at the Tombes of Martyrs. Not farre from Phrygia was the lake Aſcania, knowne by that name in the Romanes time. And among the Kings which came to the ſuccour of Troy, was Aſcanius (Deo ſimilis, ſaith Homer) like vnto God: because he was beautifull and ſtrong: for in the ſame manner doth Virgil grace Aeneas, Os humeroſq́; Deo ſimilis; in face and body like one of the Gods: Virgil alſo remembreth ſuch a Riuer, together with the Hils Gargara: as, Illas ducit amor trans Gargara, tranſq́; ſonantem Aſcanium; Appetite leads them both ouer the Mountains Gargara, and the roaring Aſcanius. But this Pliny maketh more plaine in the deſcription of Phrygia. For he placeth the City of Brillion vpon the Riuer Aſcanius, which is adioyning to Myſia, and is neere the border of the Troian Empire: and the Lake Aſcanez he directs vs to finde by the deſcription of Pruſia, founded by Hannibal at the foot of Olympus, which lieth far within the Countries of Bithynia: and then from Pruſia to Nicea are accounted 25. miles, in which vvay this Lake lyeth, euen betweene Pruſia and Nicea. And ſo Iunius (as I conceiue him) takes them of Aſcanez, to be the Inhabitants of Pontus, and Bithynia, and thoſe North parts of Aſia. Stephanus de Vrbibus makes it a City of Troas, built by Aſcanius the ſon of Æneas: ſaying, that there vvas another of that name in Myſia. Of Aſcania a Lake of Bithynia, Ptolomy vvitneſſeth: and Strabo giueth Aſcania both a Lake, a Riuer, and a Towne in Myſia, neere vnto Cio; which alſo agreeth vvith Pliny. For Pliny findeth Pruſia (before ſpoken of) neere Cio, and calleth the Iſlands before Troy Aſcanes. Melanch. in car. lib. 1. Hom. Iliad. 2. Virg. Georg. 3.

Now, vvhether theſe places tooke name of Aſcanez the ſon of Gomer, or of Aſcanius the ſonne of Æneas, it might be queſtioned: ſure it is, that Aſcanius which brought ſuccour to the Troians, could not take his name from Æneas ſon, who vvas then either exceeding young, or rather vnborne: and it ſeemeth that the Countries vvhence thoſe ſuccours came, vvere not out of any part of Phrygia or Myſia, but farther off, and from the North parts of all Aſia the leſſe, vvhich by Hieremy is called Aſcanez, by the figure Synecdoche, as Iunius thinketh. Out of thoſe teſtimonies therefore which deceiue not, we may confidently determine. For of the Prophet Hieremy vvee ſhall learne of vvhat Nation the Aſcanez vvere, vvhoſe words are theſe: Set vp a Standard in the Land, blow the Trumpet among the Nations againſt her, call vp the Kings of Ararat, Minni, and Aſcanez. c. 51. v. 27.

against her, &c. meaning against the Babylonians. Ararat was Armenia the greater, as most Interpreters consent, so called of the Mountaines of Ararat which runne through it: Minni the lesser Armenia: Armenia being compounded of Aram and Minni. For Minni was the ancient name: (saith Iunius and others before him,) and Aram anciently taken for Syria, which contained all that Tract from Euphrates to the Sea-coasts of Phanicia, and Palestina; and therefore Mesopotamia being in elder times but a Prouince of Syria, the Scriptures difference it in the story of Iacob and Esau, and call it Aram-padan. Then if these two Nations were of the Armenians and Ascanez ioined with them (who altogether vnited vnder Cyrus and Darius, came to the spoyle of the Babylonian Empire) we shal erre much to call Askenaz Germany or Almaine: for we heare of no swart Ruttiers at that siege. But the Askenaz were of those Nations which were either subiect or allied to the Medes: of which if any of them came afterward into Phrygia, I know not: for the dispersion of Nations was in aftertimes without account. But for the opinion of Eusebius, who makes them to be Goths; or that of Iosephus, who cals them Rhegini; or of the Iewes, who will haue them to be Almaines; when they confirme it either by Scriptures or Reason, I will thinke as they doe.

Of Riphath the second sonne of Gomer there is mention in the first of Chronicles. Beroaldus and Pererius thinke that he wandered farre off from the rest of his Brothers, and therefore no memory of his plantation. But I see nothing to the contrary, but that hee might seate himselfe with the rest of his Family: for there wanted no roome or soyle in those dayes for all the sonnes and Grand-children of Noah. Therfore I take it to be well vnderstood, that the Riphei were of Riphath, which the Greeks afterwards (according to Iosephus) called the Paphlagones: and Riphei (saith Melanchton) signifieth Gyants. These people were very famous in the North parts, and in Sarmatia: the most of number and power among them, Sarmatarum gens maxima Heneti, The greatest number of the Sarmatians were the Heneti; who spake the ancient Polac: which being first called Riphei (for the loue of some of their Leaders or Kings) changed their names and became Heneti, (a custome exceeding common in those times) and dwelt first in Paphlagonia, as Homer witnesseth, and so doth Apollonius in his Argonauticks: Now, when these Riphei (afterward Heneti) sought new Regions, they came along the shores of Euxinus, and filled the North-part of Europe, containing Russia, Lituania, and Polonia. From thence they croft thwart the Land, and peopled Illyria, desirous (saith Melanchton) of a warmer soile of Fruit and Wine. These Heneti or Veneti, whom Melanchton taketh to be one people, filled all that Land betweene the Baltick and Adriaticke Sea; and to this day the name of the Gulfe Venedicus is found in Russia. This Nation, after they were possest of Lituania and Polonia, disturbed the plantation of the Boij and Hermonduri. Therfore, it seemeth to me, that of Riphath, came the Riphei, afterward Heneti; and so thinketh Arias Montanus, first seated in Paphlagonia, but in course of time Lords of Sarmatia, and those other parts before remembred, chiefly betweene the Riuers of Vistula and Albis. The name (saith Melanchton) signifieth Wandering or Wanderers, or Nomades: a people which liued by White-meats and fruits, as (indeed) all Nations did in the first Ages.

Melanch. in Carion.

Of the third sonne of Gomer, Togorma, I haue spoken already; now therefore of Iauans children, which were foure:

Elisa, Tharsis, Cethim, Dodanim.

Of foure sonnes of Iauan: and of the double signification of Tharsis, either for a proper name, or for the Sea.

OF Elisa or Elipha, came the Æoles: and of this Elisa, all the Greekes were called Hellenes, saith Montanus. Melanchton makes Elisa the Father of the Æoles in Asia side: others of Elis in Peloponnesus; or of both. And seeing the Greekes were descended in generall of Iauan, it is probable that the Æoles & the Elei, tooke name of Elisa, his eldest Sonne. Ezechiel in the 27. speaking of Tyre, nameth the Isles of Elisa. Hyacynthus & purpura de insulis Elisæ facta sunt operimentum tuum: Blue Silke and Purple, brought from the Isles of Elisa, was thy couering: The Chaldæans for Elisa write Italia: but the Vulgar, the Tigurine, the Geneua, and Iunius, keepe the word Elisa: and so I thinke they might doe with reason. For there was not found any such Purple Dye in Italie in in those dayes, nor since, that I can read of: but those Isles of Elisa, were by a better coniecture the Isles of Greece, and the best Purple was found afterward at Tyre it selfe: & before that, among the Cyclades, and on the coast of Getulia.

Tharsis, the second Sonne of Iauan, inhabited Cilicia, of which Tharsis is the Metropolis. Montanus for Tharsis in Cilicia, vnderstands Carthage in Africa; but (reseruing the respect due to so learned a man) he vvas much mistaken in that coniecture. The Chaldean Paraphrast puts Carthage for Tharsis, but it hath no authority nor warrant of reason therin. So likewise, where it is vvritten, that the Ships of Salomon went euery three yeares to Tharsis, and brought thence Gold, Siluer, Elephants teeth, &c. the Chaldean Paraphrast translates Tharsis (Africa.) But Salomons Ships vvere prepared in the Red Sea at Esion-Gaber, in the Bay of Elana, neere vnto Madian, vvhere Iethro (Moses Father in Law) inhabited; a Prouince of Arabia Petraa, Idumaa, or of the Chusites; and they sayled to the higher part of the East India. For it had beene a strange Nauigation to haue spent three yeares in the passage betweene Iudea and Carthage, or any other part of Africa, vvhich might haue beene sayled in sixe or ten daies. And if so great riches might haue bin found within the bounds of the Mediterran Sea, all the other neighbouring Princes would soon haue entertained that Trade also. But this enterprize of Salomon is in this sort written of in the first of Kings: Also King Salomon made a Nauie of Ships in Esion-Gaber, which is beside Elath and the brinke of the Red Sea in the Land of Edom: and Hyram sent with the Nauie his seruants, that were Mariners, and had knowledge of the Sea, with the seruants of Salomon: and they came to Ophir, and fet from thence 420. Talents of Gold, &c. But as the Nations about Pontus thought no Sea in the vvorld like vnto their owne, and doubted whether there were any other Sea but that onely: (whereof it came, that Pontus was a word vsed for the Sea in generall) so, becaus the Israelites and the Phœnicians knew no other Sea than that of the Mediterran in the beginning; and that the people of Tharsis had the greatest Shippes, and were the first Nauigators in those parts vvith such Vessels, they vvere therfore called men of the Sea: and the word Tharsis vsed often for the Sea. And vvhereas it is said that the Shippes of Salomon vvent euery three yeares to Tharsis, that phrase is not strange at all; for vve vse it ordinarily wheresoeuer vve nauigate, (namely) that the Kings Ships are gone to the Sea, or that they are set out euery yeare, or euery three yeare to the Sea, and therefore Tharsis was not therein named, either for Carthage, Africa, or India, but vsed for the Sea it selfe. But in this place Tharsis is truely taken for Tharsis, the chiefe City in Cilicia, founded by Tharsis the second sonne of Iauan, or by his Successors in memory of their first parent. To this City arriued Alex. Macedon, before he gaue the first ouerthrow to Darius, and casting himselfe into the Riuer to bathe and vvash his body, hee fell into an extreame Feuer, and great danger of death: and in this City of Tharsis was S. Paul borne. Now this agreeth with the reason and nature of a Plantation. For (Gomer and his other sonnes inhabiting Asia the lesse, and that part of Syria adioyning) Iauan, who vvas to passe ouer the Sea into Greece, tooke the edge of the same Coast, and first planted the Iones on that shore: gaue the Islands betweene Asia the lesse and Greece, to Elisa, and left Tharsis vpon the Sea-side in Cilicia; of vvhom that City tooke name.

The third sonne of Iauan vvas Cethim, of whom were the Romanes and Italians, saith Beroaldus, but I allow better of Melanchtons opinion, vvho makes Cethim the Father of the Macedonians. Cethim is a voice plurall (saith he) and signifieth percussores, though in that respect it may be meant by either. But it seemeth more probable, that the place of Esay 23. (according to Melanchton) had relation to Alexander and the Macedonians: Hæc calamitas ab Esai prædicta est, qui capite vicesimo tertio inquit, venturos esse euersores Tyri ex terra Cittim; This calamity (saith Melanchton) was foreshewed by Esai the Prophet, who in the three and twentieth Chapter pronounced, that the Destroyers of Tyre were come out of Cittim. And although the children of Israel esteemed all men Islanders, vvhich came to them by Sea, and separate from that Continent; (and so also Cittim might be taken for Italy, saith Beroaldus) yet wee must take the first performance of the former Prophesie, which tooke effect by the destruction of the Tyrians by Alexander, who after 7. Moneths siege, entred that proud City, and cut in pieces seuen thousand principall Citizens; strangled two thousand, & changed the freedome of 13. thousand others into bondage and slauery. Now, that Macedon vvas taken for Cethim, it doth appeare plainely in the first of the Macchabees, in these vvords: After that Alexander the Macedonian, the sonne of Philip, went forth of the Land of Cethim, and slew Darius King of the Persians, and Medes. Iosephus sets Cethim in the Isle of Cyprus, in which (saith hee) there remaineth the Citie Citium, the Countrey of Zeno the Philosopher (witnesse Laertius;) which City Pintus vpon Ezechiel affirmeth, that it stood in Saint Hieromes time. So it may bee that all the Islands in ancient times by the Hebrewes vvere called the Islands of Cethim: and in that sense might Cyprus be so called also; & yet because Tharsis was the very next Port to Cyprus, and directly ouer against it, it is also very probable, that Cethim dwelt by his brother Tharsis: and finding that Island too streight for his people after they were increased, & that the rest of the Coasts, both on Asia side and Greece, were inhabited by his Father and Brothers, he sent Colonies ouer the Ægean Sea, and inhabited Macedonia.

Dodanim the fourth sonne of Iauan, and the yongvest Brother (by the most opinions) sate downe at Rhodes, as neere Cethim, Tharsis, and Elisa, as hee could. For Dodanim and Rhodanim are vsed indifferently by many Translators: the Hebrew (D) and the Hebrew (R) are so like, as the one may easily be taken for the other, as all Hebricians affirm. There is also found in Epirus the City of Dodona, in the Prouince of Molossia. And as Cethim, vvhen he wanted soyle in Cyprus: so Dodanim (seated in a far lesse Island) did of necessity send his people farther off; and keeping alongst the Coast, and finding Peloponnesus in the possession of Elisa, he passed a little further on the Westward, and planted in Epirus. And though the City of Dodona, was not then built, or (perchance) not so ancient as Dodanim himselfe, yet his Posterity might giue it that name in the memory of their first parent, as it hapned all the World ouer. For names were giuen to Cities, Mountaines, Riuers, and Prouinces, after the names of Noahs children and grand-children; not in all places by themselues, but by their successors many yeares after: euery of their Families being desirous to retain among them by those memories, out of what branch themselues vvere taken, and grafted elsewhere. And because great Kingdomes were often by new Conquerers newly named, and the greatest Cities often fired and demolished, therefore those that hoped better to perpetuate their memories, gaue their own names, or the names of their Ancestors, to Mountaines and Riuers, as to things (after their iudgements) freest from any alteration.

Thus then did Iauan settle himselfe and his children, in the edge and frontier of Asia the lesse, towards the Sea-shore: and afterward in Greece, and the Islands and neighbour Prouinces thereof, as Iapheth their Father had done in the body of the lesser Asia, together with Iauans brethren, Gomer, Magog, Madai, Tubal, Meschech, and the rest round about him. And in like sort did Chush (the sonne of Cham) people Babylonia, Chaldæa, and the borders thereof towards the West and South-west: and the sonnes of Chush (all but Nimrod, who held Babylonia it selfe) trauelled Southward in Arabia fœlix, and South-westward into Arabia petræa: the rest of his children holding the Regions adioyning to Nimrod. Mizraim the brother of Chush in like manner tooke the vvay of Egypt: and his brother Canaan the Region of Palæstina adioyning. The sonnes of Canaan had their portions in Canaan, of whom all those Nations came, which were afterward the Enemies both to the Hebrews, and to those of the sons of Shem, which spread themselues towards the West, and the borders of the Mediterran Sea: of which I shall speake hereafter. But first of the sons of Cham or Ham, which were foure:

Chush, Mizraim, Phut, and Canaan.

That the seat of Chush the eldest son of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Æthiopia: and of strange Fables, and ill Translations of Scripture, grounded on the mistaking of this point.

†. I.

Of Iosephus his Tale of an Æthiopesse wife of Moses, grounded on the mistaking of the seate of Chush.

THat Ham was the Father of the Egyptians, it is made manifest in many Scriptures, as in the 105. Psalme, verse 51. Then Israel came to Egypt, and Iacob was a stranger in the land of Ham: and in the 78. Psalme, Hee slew all the first-borne in Egypt, euen the beginning of their strength, in the Tabernacles of Ham. There is also also found a great City in Thebaida, called Cheramis: (as it were the City of Ham) of which name Herodotus also discouers an Iland in the same Region. But because Chush is the elder sonne of Ham, it agreeth with order to speake first of him. Now though I haue already in the description of Paradise handled this question, and (I hope) proued that Chush could not be Æthiopia: yet seeing it commeth now to his turne to speake for himselfe, I will adde some farther proofe to the former. For, the manifestation hereof sets many things straight, which had otherwise very crooked constructions, and senselesse interpretations. Surely, howsoeuer the Septuagint and Iosephus haue herein failed, that Chush could not be Æthiopia, but Arabia: (to wit) both that Arabia called Petræa, and a part of Arabia the Happy and the Desart: which Regions Chush and the Chusites presently planted, after they left Babylonia to Nimrod, wherein they first sate down altogether. And there is nothing which so well cleereth this Controuersie, as the true interpretation of the place, Num.12.v.1. where Moses his Wife is called a Chusite; together with some places which speake of Nabuchodonosors Conquests. For whereas Iosephus and the Septuagint in the place, Num.12.v.1. as also elsewhere, vnderstand Chush for Æthiopia, we must giue credit to Moses himselfe herein; and then it will appeare that Iosephus was grosly mistaken, or vainely led by his owne inuention. For Iosephus presuming that Chush was Æthiopia, and therefore that the Wife of Moses (which in Scripture, Num.12.ver.1. is called a woman of Chush) was a woman of the land of Æthiopia, faineth that Tharbis the Daughter of the King of Aethiopia, fell in loue with the person and fame of Moses, while he besieged Saba her Fathers City; and to the end, to obtaine Moses for her Husband, she practised to betray both her Parents, Country, and Friends, with the City it selfe, and to deliuer it into Moses hands. The Tale (if it bee worth the reciting) lyeth thus in Iosephus. After he hath described the strength of the Aethiopian City Meroe, which he saith at length Cambyses called so from the name of his Sister, (the old name being Saba) he goeth on in these words: Hic cum Moses desidere exercitum otiosum ægrè ferret, hoste non audente manus conserere, tale quiddam accidit. Erat Æthiopum Regi filia nomine Tharbis, &c. which tale hath this sense in English: when Moses was grieued that his Army lay idle, because the Enemy besieged, durst not sally and come to handy strokes, there happened this accident in the meane while. The Aethiopian King had a Daughter called Tharbis, who at some assaults giuen, beheld the person of Moses, and withall admired his valour. And knowing that Moses had not only vp-held and restored the falling estate of the Egyptians, but had also brought the conquering Aethiopians to the very brinke of subuersion: these things working in her thoughts, together with her owne affection, which daily increased, shee made meanes to send vnto him by one of her trustiest seruants, to offer her selfe vnto him, and become his wife; which Moses on this condition entertained, that shee should first deliuer the City into his possession, whereunto she condescending, and Moses hauing taken oath to performe this contract, both the one and the other were instantly performed.

A dispute against the tale of Iosephus.

THis Tale (whereof Moses hath not a word) hath Iosephus fashioned, and therein also vtterly mistaken himselfe, in naming a City of Arabia for a City of Aethiopia: as he names Aethiopia it selfe to haue beene the Country of Moses his Wife, vvhen (indeede) it was Arabia. For Saba is not in Aethiopia, but in Arabia, as both Strabo and all other Geographers, ancient and moderne, teach vs, saying, that the Sabeans are Arabians and not Aethiopians; except Iosephus can perswade vs, that the Queene of Saba which came from the South to heare the wisedome of Salomon, were a Negro, or Blacke-Moore. And though Damianus à Goes speake of certaine Letters to the King of Portugall from Prester Iohn, of the Abissines: wherein that Aethiopian King would perswade the Portugals that he was descended of the Queene of Saba and of Salomon; yet it doth no where appeare in the Scriptures, that Salomon had any Son by that great Princesse: which had it beene true, it is likely that when Sishac King of Egypt inuaded Roboam, and sackt Hierusalem, his Brother (the Sonne of Saba and Salomon) who ioyned vpon Egypt, would both haue impeached that enterprize, as also giuen aide and succour to Roboam against Ieroboam, who drew from him ten of the twelue Tribes to his owne obedience. Neither is it any thing against our opinion of Moses his Wife, to haue been an Arabian, that the Scriptures teach vs, that Moses married the daughter of Iethro Priest of Midian or Madian: which standing on the North Coast of the Red Sea, ouer against the body of Egypt, and neere Esion-Gaber, where Salomon prouided his Fleet for India, in the Region of Edom, may well be reckoned as a part of Arabia, as the Red Sea is called Sinus Arabicus. For Edumæa ioyneth to the Tribe of Iuda by the North, to Arabia Petræa by the East, to the Mediterran by the West, and to the Red Sea by the South-east. And if wee marke the way which Moses tooke when he left Egypt, and conducted Israel thence, it will appeare that he was no stranger in Arabia: in the border whereof, and in Arabia it selfe, hee had formerly liued fortie yeeres; where it seemeth, that besides his carefull bringing vp in Egypt, he was instructed by Iethro in the Egyptians learning. For Iosephus confesseth, and Saint Stephen confirmeth, that he was learned in all the wisedome of the Egyptians. But on the other side this Text makes much against Iosephus, where it is written in Exodus the second Therefore Moses fled from Pharao, and dwelt in the Land of Madian or Midian, and not in Æthiopia. And in the third Chapter it is as plaine as words can expresse, in what Region Madian was, where it is written, When Moses kept the sheepe of Iethro his Father in Law Priest of Madian, & drawe the Flocke to the Desart, and came to the Mountaine of God in Horeb. Now that Mount Horeb is not in Æthiopia, euery Infant knoweth. And if we may beleeue Moses himselfe, then was not the Wife of Moses purchased in that manner which Iosepus reporteth (which was for betraying her Countrey and Friends) neither had shee the name of Tharbis, but of Sippora, or Zippora: neither was shee a Negro, but a Madianitesse. And as God worketh the greatest things by the simplest meanes: so it pleased him from a Shepheard to call Moses, and after him Dauid, and by them to deliuer his people first and last. For Moses, sitting by a Well (as disconsolate and a stranger) defended the daughters of Reguel from the other shepherds, and drew them Water to water their sheepe: vpon which occasion (by God ordained) he was entertained by Iethro, whose Daughter he married: and not for any betraying of Townes or Countries.

Exod. 2.

From hence also came Iethro to Moses at Rephidim, not farre from Idumæa, and finding the insupportable gouernment of such a multitude, hee aduised him to distribute this weightie charge, and to make Gouernours and Iudges of euery Tribe and Familie. And if Iethro had beene an Aethiopian, it had beene a farre progresse for him to haue passed through all Egypt with the Wife and Children of Moses, and to haue found Moses in the border of Idumæa: the Egyptians hating Moses and all that fauoured him. But the passing of Moses through Arabia Petræa (which ioyneth to Madian) proueth that Moses was well acquainted in those parts, in which the second time he wandred forty yeares, and did by these late trauailes of his, seeke to instruct the children of Israel in the knowledge of one true God, before he brought them to the Land of plenty & rest. For he found them nourished vp with the milke of Idolatry, and obstinate in the Religion of the Heathen, & finding that those stiffe plants could not be bowed or declined, either by perswasion or by miracle, he ware them out in the Desarts, as God directed, and grafted their branches anew, that from those hee might receiue fruit, agreeable to his owne desire, and Gods Commandements.

Lastly, this opinion of Iosephus is condemned by Augustinus Chrisamensis, where also he reprehendeth Apollinaris, who auowed that Moses had married both Tharbis and Sephora: His owne words haue this beginning: Mentitur etiam Apollinaris duas vxores habuisse Moses, &c. Apollinaris also lyeth, in affirming that Moses had two wiues: and who doth not perceiue these things fained by them? for it is manifest that the wife of Moses was Zephora, Daughter to the Priest or President of Madian: and that Madian cannot be taken for Aethiopia beyond Egypt; being the same that ioyneth to Arabia: so farre Chrysamensis.

Chush ill expounded for Aethiopia. Ezech. 29. 10.

NOw as Chush is by the Septuagint conuerted Aethiopia, and the wife of Moses therefore called Æthiopissa: so in the conquest of Nabuchodonosor is Aethiopia written for Arabia. For by the words of Ezechiel, it is manifest that Nabuchodonosor was neuer in Aethiopia. Behold (saith Ezechiel, speaking of the person of this great Assyrian) I come Ezech. 29. 10.

vpon thee and vpon thy Riuers, and I will make the Land of Egypt vtterly waſte and deſolate, from the Towre of Seueneh, euen to the borders of the blacke-Moores: vvhich laſt words ſhould haue beene thus conuerted: From the Towre of Seueneh to the borders of the Chuſites or Arabians: betweene which two is ſituated all Egypt. For to ſay, from the borders of Seueneh to the Æthiopians, hath no ſenſe at all. Seueneh it ſelfe being the border of Egypt, confronting and ioyning to Æthiopia, or the Land of the blacke-Moores. So as if Nabuchodonoſors conqueſt had beene but betweene Seueneh and the border of Æthiopia, it were as much to ſay, and did expreſſe no other victory than the conqueſt of all that Land and Countrey, lying betweene Middleſex and Buckingham, where both the Countries ioyne together; or all the North parts of England, betweene Barwick and Scotland: for this hath the ſame ſenſe with the former, if any man ſought to expreſſe by theſe two bounds, the Conqueſt of England: Barwick being the North border of England, as Seueneh or Syene is the South bound of Egypt, ſeated in Thebaida which toucheth Æthiopia. But by the words of Ezechiel it appeareth, that Nabuchodonoſor neuer entred into any part of Æthiopia, although the Septuagint, the Vulgar, the Geneua, and all other (in effect) haue written Æthiopia for Chuſh,

†. IIII.

Another place of Ezechiel, cap. 30. verſ. 9. in the like manner miſtaken.

AND as the former, ſo is this place of Ezechiel miſtaken, by being in this ſort conuerted: In die illa egredientur nuncij à facie mea in trieribus ad conterendam Aethiopiæ confidentiam: Which place is thus turned in Engliſh by the Geneueans: In that day ſhall there Meſſengers goe forth from me in ſhips to make the careleſſe Moores affraid. Now the Latine for (ſhips) hath the Greeke word Trieres for Triremes which are Gallies of three bankes, and not ſhips. But that in this place the Tranſlation ſhould haue beene (as in the former) amended by vſing the word Chuſh or Arabia for Aethiopia or the blacke Moores, euery man may ſee which meanely vnderſtandeth the Geography of the World, knowing, that to paſſe out of Egypt into Aethiopia there neede no Gallies nor Ships, no more than to paſſe out of Northampton in Leiceſterſhire: Aethiopia being the conterminate Region with Egypt, and not diuided ſo much as by a Riuer. Therefore in this place of Ezechiel it was meant, that from Egypt, Nabuchodonoſor ſhould ſend Gallies alongſt the coaſt of the Red Sea, by vvhich an Army might bee tranſported into Arabia the Happy and the Stony (ſparing the long wearieſome march ouer all Egypt, and the Deſart of Pharan) which Army might thereby ſurpriſe them vnawares in their ſecurity and confidence. For vvhen Nabuchodonoſor was at Seueneh within a mile of Aethiopia, he needed neither Galley nor Ship to paſſe into it: being all one large and firme Land with Egypt, and no otherwiſe parted from it, than one In-land ſhire is parted from another; and if hee had a fancy to haue rowed vp the Riuer but for pleaſure, hee could not haue done it: for the fall of Nilus (tumbling ouer high and ſteepy Mountaines) called Cataduþa Nili, were at hand.

Laſtly, as I haue already obſerued, the ſonnes of euery father ſeated themſelues as neer together as poſſibly they could, Gomer and his ſonnes in Aſia the leſſe; Iauan and his ſons in Greece, and the Ilands adioyning; Shem in Perſia and Eaſtward. So the Sons & Grandchildren of Chuſh from the Riuer of Gehon (their Fathers firſt ſeate) inhabited vpon the ſame, or vpon ſome other contiguat vnto it, as Nimrod and Hauilah on the one ſide, and Saba, Sheba, and Sabtecha (with the reſt) did on the other ſide. And to conclude in a word, the Hebrews had neuer any acquaintance or fellowſhip, any war, treaty of peace, or other intelligence with the Aethiopian black Moores, as is already remembred in the Chapter of Paradiſe.

†. V.

A place, Eſay 18. v. 1. in like manner corrupted, by taking Chuſh for Aethiopia.

AND as in theſe places before remembred, ſo in diuers other is the vvord Aethiopia put for Arabia or Chuſh, which puts the ſtory (vvhere it is ſo vnderſtood) quite out of square; one Kingdome therby being taken for another. For what ſenſe hath this part of Scripture, Esay 18. Va terræ Cymbalorum alarum quæ est trans flumina Æthiopiæ, or according to the Septuagint in these words: Va terræ nauium alarum quæ est trans fluuios Aethiopiæ? Woe to the land shaddowing with wings, which is beyond the Riuers of Aethiopia, sending Embassadours by sea, euen the vessels of reeds vpon the waters. Va terræ umbrosæ oræ, woe to the Land of the shadie coast, saith Iunius. The former Translat ors vnderstand it in this sense; That the waters are shaddowed with the sails, which are significatiuely called the wings of the ships, the other, that the coast of the Sea was shaddowed by the height of the Land.

But to the purpose: That this Land here spoken of by the Prophet Esay, is Egypt, no Interpreter hath doubted. For they were the Egyptians that sent this message to the Israelites which Esay repeateth, & by the former translation euery man may see the transposition of Kingdomes: for hereby Egypt is transported vnto the other side of Aethiopia, and Aethiopia set next vnto Iudea, when it is the Land of Chush and Arabia indeed that lyeth betweene Iudea and Egypt, and not Aethiopia, which is seated vnder the Equinoctiall Line. And of this Beroaldus asketh a materiall question, (to wit) what Region that should be, of which the Prophet speaketh, and placeth it beyond the Riuers of Aethiopia. Nam de ignota agi regione dici nequit; For it cannot be said that he treateth of an vnknowne Region. Now if Aethiopia it selfe be vnder the Equinoctiall line, with whom the Iewes had neuer any acquaintance, why should any man dream that they had knowledge of Nations far beyond it againe, and beyond the Riuers of Aethiopia? except we shall impiously thinke that the Prophet spake hee knew not what, or vsed an impertinent discourse of those Nations, which vvere not discouered in 2000. yeares after, inhabiting as far South as the Cape of good Hope, commonly knowne by the name of Bona esperanza.

†. VI.

That vpon the like mistaking, both Terrhaca in the story of Senacherib, and Zera in the story of Asa are vnaduisedly made Aethiopians.

AND by this translation is the story of Senacherib vtterly mistaken in the cause of his retrait. For Senacherib vvas first repulsed at Pelusium, at the very entrance of Egypt from Iudea: when hauing certaine knowledge that Thirrhaca, (which all the Interpreters call King of Aethiopia) was on the way to set on him, hee began to with-draw himselfe: and fearing to leaue his Army in two parts, hee sent threatning Messengers to Ezechia King of Iuda, perswading him to submit himselfe: the Tenor whereof is set down in the second of Kings in these words: Haue any of the gods of the Nations deliuered his Land out of the hands of the King of Ashur? where is the god of Hamah, &c. By vvhich proud Embassage, if he had obtained entrance into Ierusalem, he then meant to haue vnited that great Army before Ierusalem, commanded by Rabsekeh, with the other which lay before Pelusium, a great City vpon the branch of Nilus next Arabia. For Senacherib had already mastered the most part of all those Cities in Iudea and Beniamin vvith a third Army, (which himselfe commanded) being then at the siege of Lebna. But vpon the rumor of that Arabian Army led by their King Thirrhakeh (whom Iosephus cals Tharsices) Rabsakeh hasted from the siege of Hierusalem, and found Senacherib departed from Lachis, and set downe before Lebna, which was afterwards called Eleutheropolis, as some haue supposed. But while he had ill successe at Pelusium and feared Thirrhakeh, God himselfe whom he least feared, strook his Army before Ierusalem by the Angel of his power, so as 158000. were found dead in the place, as in the life of Ezechias is hereafter more largely written. And that this Army of Tirrakeh was from Arabia, Iosephus himselfe makes it plaine. For he confesseth in the tenth Book, the first Chapter of the Iewes Antiquities, that it vvas come to Senacheribs knowledge, that the Army which was a foote (both to relieue the Egyptians and the Iewes) marched towards him by the vvay of the Desart: Now the Desart vvhich lay indifferent betweene Hierusalem and Pelusium, vvas that of Pharan or Sur, which also toucheth on the three Arabia's, to wit, the Stony, of which it is a part: the Desart, and the Happy; and by no other vvay indeed could the Arabians come on to succour either Pelusium or Hierusalem. But that there is any Desart betweene Pelusium and the South part of Egypt. hath neuer yet beene heard of, or described by any Cosmographer or Historian. So then this description of the second of Kings, vers. the ninth, hath the same mistaking as the rest. For here the word (Chush) is also translated Aethiopia; and in this sense haue all the Interpreters, (but Iunius) expressed the beginning of the ninth Verse:

Ioseph. 10. c. 1.

2. Kings 19.

Antiq. l. 10. 2. Kings 19.

Lib. 10. cap. 1.

He

He heard alſo men ſay of Thirrhakeh King of Æthiopia, &c. whereas it ſhould haue beene thus conuerted with Iunius: Audiens autem de Thirrhakeh Rege Chuſhi; Hee heard alſo of Thirrakeh King of the Chuſhites. For they were the Chuſites and Arabians, whoſe Houſes and Cities were next the fire, and vpon whom the very ſmoake of Iuda flaming was blowne, being their neereſt Neighbours: and ſo were not the Æthiopian black-Moores vnder the Equinoctiall, whom neither war nor peace (which diſcouereth all Regions) euer found out, ſaith Pliny. For this King was no more King of Æthiopia than Zerah was, who inuaded Aſa King of Iuda, with an Army of a Million, and three thouſand Charriots. Indeed, how ſuch an Army & thoſe Charriots ſhould paſſe through all Egypt, (the Kings of Egypt being mighty Kings) let all men that know how theſe Regions are ſeated, and how farre diſtant, iudge. For Princes doe not eaſily permit Armies of a Million to run through them; neither was there euer ſuch ſtrength of Black-Moores heard of in that part of the World, or elſewhere. Neither are theſe Æthiopians ſuch trauailers or Conquerors; and yet is this King Zerah alſo called King of Aethiopia. But the vvord Chuſh being firſt ſo conuerted for Aethiopia, the reſt of the Interpreters (not looking into the ſeates of Kingdomes, or the poſſibilities of attempts, or inuaſions) followed one another in the former miſtakings.

†. VII.

A farther expoſition of the place, Eſay 18. 1.

CONcerning theſe words in that eighteenth Chapter of Eſay, Nauium alarum; Winged ſhips, (ſo the Septuagint turne it) or Cymbalo alarum (according to the Latine) ſayles whiſtling in the windes, or terra vmbroſa ora (after Iunius) the Land of a ſhaddowed coaſt, or the Land ſhaddowing with wings, as our Engliſh Geneua hath it. The two firſt interpretations of the Septuagint and S. Hierome, haue one ſenſe in effect. For the ſailes are commonly called the wings of a ſhip; & we vſe to ſay ordinarily when our ſhips ſaile ſlowly, that ſhe wanteth wings: (that is) when her ſailes are either worne or too narrow: and we alſo vſe the ſame phraſe of the winde whiſtling in the ſailes. And it may be that the Egyptians emploied ſo many of thoſe ſmal ſhips, as their ſails were ſaid to giue a ſhaddow ouer the Red Sea. But to make both interpretations good, Pintus (vpon Eſay) affirmeth, that the vvord (Sabal) doth ſignifie both to ſhaddow and to gingle (vvhich is) to make a kinde of Cymbaline ſound: ſo as the meaning of this place (ſaith Pintus) is this: Woe to thee, O Egypt, which doeſt promiſe to others ſafeguard, vnder the ſhaddow of thy wings; vvhich (indeede) ſeemeth to agree with the argument of the eighteenth Chapter of Eſay: and this phraſe is often elſewhere vſed, as in the ſixteenth Pſalme: Sub vmbra alarum tuarum protege me; Defend me vnder the ſhaddow of thy wings. The Boates of reede ſpoken of are of two kindes; either of basket-willow couered with hides (as anciently in Brittain) or a Tree made hollow in the bottome, and built vpon both ſides with Canes. Of the one ſort I haue ſeene in Ireland, of the other in the Indies.

§. XI.

Of the plantation and antiquities of Egypt.

†. I.

That Mizraim the chiefe planter of Egypt: and the reſt of the ſonnes of Ham, were ſeated in order, one by another.

THe ſecond ſonne of Ham was Mizraim, (who according to the place of a ſecond brother) was ſent ſomewhat farther off to inhabite. For Chuſh firſt poſſeſt Chaldea on the Weſt ſide of Gehon chiefly: and from thence, as he increaſed in people, ſo he entred Arabia, and by time came to the border of the Red Sea, & to the South-eaſt-ſide of Iudæa. Mizraim his brother (with Phut) paſt ouer into Africa. Mizraim held Egypt: and Phut (as a third brother) was thruſt farther off into Mauritania. Canaan tooke the Sea-coaſt, and held the ſide of Paleſtina: and theſe foure brothers poſſeſt all that Tract of Land, from Gehon in Chaldea, as farre to the Weſt as the Mediterrane Sea: comprehending all Arabia Deſerta, and Petræa, all Canaan which embraceth Galilea, Samaria, and and Indes; with the two Egypts, wherof the neather is bounded by Memphis on the South, and by the Mediterrane Sea on the North: and Thebaida (called the vpper Egypt) stretcheth it self toward the South as far as Syene, the border of the Æthiopians or black-Moors. All the rest of the coast of Africa Westward, Phut peopled; which brothers had not any other Nation or Family that dwelt between them. And in the same manner did all their sons againe, and all the sons of the rest of Noahs children, sort themselues.

†. II.

Of the time about which the name of Egypt began to be knowne: and of the Egyptians Lunarie yeeres, which made their antiquities seeme more fabulous.

THis flouriſhing Kingdome posseſt by Mizraim, changed her ancient name, and became Egypt, as such time as Ægyptus (otherwise Rameſſes, as some thinke) the sonne of Belus, chased thence his elder brother Danaus, shifting him into that part of Greece now called Morea, by whom the Argines were made Danai, abandoning their proper names: which happened 877. yeeres after the Floud, in the time of Ioſua, as St. Auguſtine coniectureth out of Euſebius. But in Homers Odyſſes it appeareth that the Egyptians vvere so called at the time of the Troian Warre. And before this, Egypt was knowne by diuers other names, as Oceana, Aria, Oſiriana, &c. And Manethon (whom Ioſephus citeth in his first booke against Appion) numbreth all the Kings of Egypt after Moſes departure, who consumed 393. yeares. By vvhich other men coniecture, that the Egyptians tooke on them that name 330. yeares after Ioſua, and about 1000. yeares after the Floud. But where Ioſephus in the same booke taketh Iſrael to be those Hyeſos, which he also calleth Paſtores or Shepherds, which are said to haue reigned in Egypt 511. yeares: whom also he calleth his Anceſtors, (meaning the Anceſtors of the Iewes) in this I am sure he was grosly deceiued, or that he vainly boasted: for the Iſraelites had no such Dominion as Manethon faineth, nor abode in Egypt so long a time by many yeares.

Of the Egyptian Antiquities there are many fancies in Tregus, Herodotus, Plato, Diod. Siculus, Mela, and others. For they affirme (saith Pomp. Mela) that there had reigned in Egypt 330. Kings before Amaſis, who vvas contemporary with Cyrus; and that they had memory and story of 13000. yeares; and that the Stars had foure times changed their course, and the Sunne twice set in the East. These Riddles are also rife among the Athenians and Arcadians, vvho dare affirme, that they are more ancient than Iupiter and the Moone; vvhereof Ouid:

> Arcades: & Luna gens prior illa fuit.
> The Arcadians the earth inhabited
> Ere yet the Moone did shine, or Ione was bred.

But for those 13000. yeares it may well be true; seeing it is certaine that the Egyptians reckon their yeares by Moneths, which makes after that account not aboue 1000. or 1100. years, whether we take their Moneths or Lunary yeares to haue beene of the first kinde of 27. dayes and eight houres; or otherwise 29. dayes and twelue houres; or after any other of those fiue diuerſities of their Lunary yeares.

†. III.

Of certaine vaine aſſertions of the Antiquity of the Egyptians.

GErardus Mercator in his Chronology, reasoneth for the Egyptians Antiquity in this manner: That the sixteenth Dynaſty (where Euſebius begins to reckon the Egyptians times) had beginning with the generall Floud: and that therfore the first of the other fifteene reached the Creation, or soone after it. To which coniecture of Mercator, Perrius maketh this answer; That therein Mercator was first deceiued, because he taketh it for granted, that the beginning of the sixteenth Dynaſtie vvas at once with the generall Floud: which Euſebius maketh 292. years after, and in the time of Abraham. Secondly, Mercator maketh the beginning of the shepherds Dynaſtia (being in number 17.) in the time of their first King, Saltis, to haue beene in the yeere of the Word 1846. which

Euſe-

Eusebius findeth in the Worlds age 2140. For the 16. Dynastia was begun but in the 292. yeeres after the Floud, as they account, and continued 190. yeeres. Thirdly, whereas Mercator maketh euery Dynastia to endure 115. yeers, Eusebius reckoneth many of them at lesse than 100. yeeres: for the 28. had but sixe yeeres, the 29. but 20. and the 30. but 18. yeeres.

Now Annius in his Supplement of Manethon affirmeth, That all these 15. Dynasties lasted but 162. yeeres: and that the first of the 15. began but in the 131. yeere after the floud: so as where Mercator makes all the 15. to precede the floud, and the 16. to haue beene then in being at the time of the floud, Annius makes them all after it. But the contrariety of falshood cannot be hidden, though disguised. For Annius had forgotten his former Opinion and Assertion, that it was in the 131. yeere that Nimrod, with the sons of Noah, came into the Valley of Shinaar: so he forgets the time which was consumed in the building of Babel: & that before the confusion of Speech there was no dispersion, nor far-off plantation at all. And though he hastily conueyed Gomer into Italy, and Tubal into Spaine, in the tenth yeer of Nimrods reigne: (which was ten yeeres after his arriual into Babylonia) yet herein he is more vnaduised. For he makes Egypt possest, & a gouernment established in the very first yeere of the arriuall of Nimrod into Shinaar, before all partition, or any expedition farre off or neer, in question: for from thence (that is, from Babel) did the Lord scatter them vpon all the earth.

†. IIII.

Against Pererius: that it is not vnlikely, but that Egypt was peopled within 200. yeeres after the Creation; at lest, that both it, and the most parts of the World were peopled before the Floud.

BVt wheras Pererius seeketh to ouerthrow this Antiquity of the Egyptians touching their Dynasties, (which Eusebius doth not altogether destroy, but lessen) I do not find any great strength in this opinion of Pererius; (to wit) that it was either vnlikely or impossible that Egypt should bee peopled within 100. or 200. yeeres after Adam, in the first Age. And whereas he supposeth that it was not inhabited at all before the generall Floud, I doe verily beleeue the contrary: and that not onely of Egypt, but the better part of all the World was then peopled: Pererius his words are these: Quomodo enim primos mundi ducentos, vel etiam centum annos Adami proles adeò multiplicari potuit, vt ad Egyptum vsq; habitandum & complendum propagata sit, &c. For how could the children of Adam be so multiplied in the first two hundred, or in the first hundred yeeres of the world, and so propagated as to inhabite and fill Egypt? for allowing this (saith Pererius) wee must also confesse, that there were then both the Assyrians and other Nations.

Now seeing that the Scriptures are silent herein, and that it is no point of our sauing beleefe, it is lawfull for euery man to be guided in this and the like questions by the best reason, circumstance, and likelihood; and herein, as in the rest, I protest that I doe not gainsay any mans opinion out of any crossing or cauilling humour: for I thinke it the part of euery Christian, rather to reconcile differences, where there is possibility of vnion, than out of froward subtlety, and preiudicate resoluednesse, to maintaine factions needlesse, and dangerous contentions.

First therefore, to this opinion, that Egypt was not planted so soone after Adam, no, not at all before the Floud, I say, that there is no reason why wee should giue a lesse increase to the sonnes of Adam, than to the sonnes of Noah. For their length of life, which exceeded those which came after the Floud double; & (after a few yeeres) treble, is an infallible proofe of their strength and ability, to beget many Children: & at that time they obserued no degrees of kindred, nor consanguinity. And that there was a speedy increase of people, and in great numbers, it may in some sort appeare by this, that Cain, who (being fearefull that the death of Abel would haue beene reuenged on him) withdrew himselfe from the rest, which were afterward begotten, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, and there, by the helpe of his owne issues built a City, (called Enoch) after the name of his first-borne. Now if it be gathered that Nimrod came into the Valley of Shinaar with so many multitudes, as sufficed to build the City and Towre of Babel: and that to this increase there was giuen but 130. yeeres by Berosus, and after the account of the Scriptures (reckoning, as it is commonly vnderstood, by the birth of Arphaxad, Selah, Heber, and Phaleg) but one hundred and one yeere: I see no cause to doubt, but that in the infancy of the first age, when the bodies of men were most perfect, euen within 130. yeeres, the same (if not a greater) number might be increased; and so within 70. yeeres after (that is, by such time as the World had stood 200. yeares) aswell Assyria, Syria, and Egypt might bee possest before the Floud, as they were within the same or lesse time after it. Neither doth it agree with the circumstance or true Story of the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire, that all those people, which were increased in the first hundred or 130. yeeres after the Floud, came into Shinaar and Babylonia. For that euer Noah himselfe came out of the East, as there is no Scripture or Authority to proue it; so all probable coniecture and reason it selfe denies it. Againe, those multitudes and powerfull numbers, which Semiramis (but the third from Nimrod) found in India, considered with her owne Army of three Millions, (and she left not all her Kingdomes empty) doe well proue, that if the World had such plenty of people in so few yeeres after the Floud, it might also be as plentifully filled in like time before it. For after their owne account Ninus gouerned Babylonia and Assyria but 292. yeeres after the Floud of Noah. And these Troupes of Semiramis were gathered out of all those Easterne Kingdomes, from Media to the Mediterran Sea; when there had now past from the Floud to the time of this her inuasion, somewhat lesse or more than 360. yeeres: for much more time the true Chronology cannot allow; though I confesse, that in respect of the strange greatnesse of Semiramis Army, and the incredible multitudes gathered, this is as short a time as can well be giuen. And if but one halfe bee true of that which is said, That her Army consisted of 1300000. Footmen, and 500000. Horsemen, it must needes bee, that long before Semiramis Reigne, the greatest part of Asia (whence her huge Armie was gathered) was full of people: yea Arabia it selfe (much part whereof is barren) must long before this time of Semiramis haue beene plentifully peopled; when Ninus hauing a determination to make himselfe Master of all Nations, entred (notwithstanding) in League with the King thereof: whom therefore hee either feared, or sought his assistance. And if Arabia were then so well repleniſhed, I see no cause but Egypt might also bee peopled. Now if wee may beleeue Trogus Pompeius (Epitomized by Iustine) Egypt was a most flouriſhing and magnificent Nation before Ninus was borne. For these bee his owne words, speaking of Ninus. Fuêre quidem temporibus antiquioribus Vexoris Rex Ægypti, &c. But there were in times more ancient Vexoris King of Egypt, and Tanais King of the Scythians: of which the one inuaded Pontus, the other Egypt. And how full of people all that part of the World was, the Conquests of Ninus witnesse, who subdued with no small force the Armenians, the Medes, and afterwards the Bactrians; yea, all that whole body of Asia on this side India. For Diodorus out of Ctesias numbreth the Armies wherewith Ninus inuaded Zoroaster, at 1700000. Footmen, and 200000. Horsemen: and the Stories generally shew, that though Zoroasters Armie was farre short of this, yet it was greater than any that those parts of the World euer since beheld. But to what end should I seeke for forreigne authority? for no man doubteth but that Egypt was possest by Mizraim, the sonne of Ham; and that it was an establiſhed Kingdome, filled with many Cities in Abrahams time, the Scriptures tell vs. And sure, to prepare and cultiue a desolate and ouergrown ground, to beautifie it with many Cities, Lawes, and Policies, cannot be esteemed a labour of a few dayes: and therefore it must be inhabited in a lesse time than 200. yeeres after the Floud; and in the same time (if not in a shorter) before the Floud. For if so many Millions of men were found within 300. yeeres after the generall Floud; so as not onely Babylon, and Assyria, Bactria, Armenia, Media, Arabia, Egypt, Palestina, yea, the farre-off Lybia on the one side, and India on the other, and Scythia (inferiour to neither) were all filled: into what small corners could then all those Nations be compreſt, which 1656. yeeres brought forth before the Floud? euen necessity, which cannot bee resisted, cast the abundance of mens bodies into all parts of the knowne World; especially, where Death forbare the Father, and made no place for the Sonne, till hee had beheld liuing Nations of his owne body.

§. V.

Of some other reasons against the opinion of Pererius.

For what a strange increase did the long liues of the first Age make, when they continued 800. or 900. yeeres? Surely, we haue reason to doubt, that the World could not containe them, rather than that they were not spred ouer the World. For let vs now reckon the date of our liues in this Age of the World: wherein if one exceede 50. yeeres, ten for one are cut off in that passage, and yet wee finde no want of people, nay we know the multitude such, as if by warres or pestilence they were not sometimes taken off by many thousands, the earth with all the industry of man could not giue them food. What strange heapes then of soules had the first Ages, who enioyed 800. or 900. yeares, as aforesaid? These numbers, I say, cannot bee counted nor conceiued. For it would come to the same reckoning in effect, as if all those which haue beene borne in Brittaine since 3. or 4. hundred yeeres before the Norman Conquest (saiuing such as by accident or by violence were cut off) were now aliue; and if to these there were added as many as by Polygamy might haue beene increased. For (to omit, that the Gyants and mighty ones of the first Age obserued no law of Matrimony) it is to bee thought that those Louers of the world and of pleasure, when they knew the long and liberall time which Nature had giuen them, would not willingly or hastily present themselues to any danger which they could flye from or eschew. For what humane argument hath better perswasion to make men careless of life, and feareless of death, than the little time which keepes them asunder, and that short time also accompanied with so many paines and diseases, which this enuious old Age of the World mingleth together, and soweth with the seedes of Mankinde?

Now if that Berosus or Annius may be alleadged for sufficient Authours, whom Pererius himselfe in this question citeth, then is it by them affirmed, and by Iosephus confirmed, that the City of Enoch was seated neere Lybanus in Syria: and if other parts of Syria were peopled in Cains time; I see no cause why Palestina (which is also a Prouince of Syria) and Egypt (which neighboureth it) could be left desolate both all the life time of Cain, and all those times betweene his death and the Floud, which were by estimation 700. or 800. yeares. And sure though this Fragment of Berosus with Annius his Comment be very ridiculous in many places (the ancient Copies being corrupted or lost) yet all things in Berosus are not to bee reiected. Therefore Saint Hierome for such Authours giues a good rule: Bona eorum eligamus, vitemus contraria; Let vs choose what is good in them, and reiect the rest. And certainly in the very beginning of the first Booke, Berosus agreeth (in effect) with Moses, touching the generall Floud: and in that first part Berosus affirmeth, that those mighty men and Gyants which inhabited Enoch, commanded ouer all Nations, and subiected the vniuersall World: and though that phrase (of all the World) be often vsed in the Scriptures for a part thereof; as in the second of the Acts, That there were dwelling at Hierusalem Iewes; men that feared God of euery Nation vnder Heauen: yet by words which follow in Berosus, it is plaine, that his words and sense were the same: for he addeth, from the Sunnes rising to the Sunnes setting, which cannot be taken for any small part thereof. Againe, we may safely coniecture, that Noah did not part and proportion the World among his sonnes at aduenture, or left them as Discouerers, but directed them to those Regions which he formerly knew had been inhabited. And it cannot be denyed that the earth was more passable and easie to trauaile ouer before the Floud, than after it. For Pererius himselfe confesseth, that Attica (by reason of mud and slime which the water left vpon the Earth) was vninhabited 200. yeeres after Ogyges Floud; whereby we may gather, that there was no great pleasure in passing into farre Countries, after the generall Deluge, when the earth lay (as it were) incopsed for 100. or 130. yeeres together. And therefore was the face thereof in all coniecture more beautifull, and lesse cumbersome to walke ouer, in the first Age, than after the generall ouerflowing.

§. VI.

Of the words of Moses, Gen. 10. v. vltimo, whereupon Pererius grounded his opinion.

LAstly, whereas Pererius drawes this Argument out of the last Verse of the tenth of Genesis, And out of these were the Nations diuided after the floud: Quo significatur talem diuisionem non fuisse ante diluuium; By which it appeareth (saith Pererius) that there was no such diuision before the Flood; which hee also seeketh to confirme out of the eleuenth of Genesis, because the diuision of tongues was the cause of the dispersion of the people. This cõsequence, quo significatur, &c. seemeth to me very weake: The Text it selfe rather teacheth the contrary: For out of these (saith Moses) were the Nations diuided in the earth after the Floud; inferring, that before the Floud the Nations were diuided out of others, though after the Floud out of these onely. But whatsoeuer sense may bee gathered from this place, yet it can no way be drawne to the times before the Floud, or to any Plantation or diuision in that age: for if there were none else among whom the earth could be diuided after the Floud, but Noahs Sonnes, wherein doth that necessary diuision controule the planting of the World before it? And whereas it is alleaged that the confusion of speech was the cause of this dispersion; it is true, that it was so for that present; but if Babel had neuer beene built, nor any confusion of Languages at all, yet increase of people and time would haue enforced a farther-off and generall Plantation: as Berosus Lib. 3. sayes well, that when Mankinde were exceedingly multiplyed, Ad comparandas nouas sedes necessitas compellebat, They were driuen by necessitie to seeke new Habitations. For we finde (as it is before said) that within 300. yeeres after the Floud, there were gathered together into two Armies, such multitudes as the Valley about Babylon could not haue sustained those numbers, with their increase, for any long time; all Asia the greater and the lesser; all Scythia, Arabia, Palestina, and Ægypt, with Greece, and the Islands thereof; Mauritania and Lybia, being also at that time fully peopled. And if wee beleeue Berosus, then not onely those parts of the World, but (within 140. yeares after the Floud) Spaine, Italie and France were also planted: much more then may we thinke, that within 1656. yeeres before the Floud, in the time of the chiefe strength of Mankind, they were repleniished with people. And certainly seeing all the World was ouerflowne, there were people in all the World which offended.

§. VII.

A conclusion, resoluing of that which is most likely, touching the Ægyptian Antiquities: with somewhat of Phut (another Sonne of Ham*) which peopled Lybia.*

THerefore, for the Antiquitie of the Ægyptians, as I doe not agree with Mercator, nor iudge with the Vulgar, which giue too much credit to the Ægyptians Antiquities: so I doe not thinke the report of their Antiquities so fabulous, as either Pererius or other men conceiue it. But I rather incline to this, that Ægypt being peopled before the Floud, and 200. or 300. yeeres, more or lesse after Adam, there might remaine vnto the Sonnes of Mizraim some Monuments in Pillars or Altars (of stone or mettall) of their former Kings or Gouernours: which the Egyptians, hauing added to the List and Roll of their Kings after the Floud, in succeeding time (out of the vanitie of glory, or by some corruption in their Priests) something beyong the truth might be inserted. And that the memory of Antiquitie was in such sort preserued, Berosus affirmeth it of the Chaldeans, and so doth Epigenes. For they both write, that the vse of Letters and the Art of Astronomie was knowne to the Babylonians 3634. yeeres before Alexanders Conquest: and this report Annius findeth to agree and reach to the time of Enoch, who was borne 1034. yeeres before the Floud, and wrote of the Worlds destruction, both by Water and Fire; as also of Christ his comming in iudgement, as Saint Iude hath witnessed. But leauing these Antiquities to other mens iudgements, and euery man to his owne reason, I will conclude this Plantation of Egypt. It is agreed by all, that it was peopled by Mizraim, and that it tooke the name of Egypt from Egyptus the sonne of Belus, as aforesaid. Being diuided into two Regions, that part from Memphis or Nicopolis to the Mediterran Sea, was called the inferiour Egypt; surnamed also Delta: because the seuerall branches of Nilus breaking asunder from one body of the Riuer, gaue it the forme

of the Greeke letter Delta, which is the forme of a Triangle. That branch, which ran toward the North-east and imbraced the Sea next vnto the Desarts of Sur and Pharan, had on it the City of Pelusium, where Senacherib was repulsed: The other branch, which yeelded it selfe to the Salt-water towards the North-east, is beautified by that famous City of Alexandria: The vpper part of Egypt is bounded betweene Memphis and Syene neere Æthiopia, and had the name of Thebaida, of that ancient City of Thebes; which (according to Homer) was adorned with 100. Gates: and therefore called Ciuitas centum portarum; and by the Greeks Diospolis; in the Scriptures No-hamon, which signifieth multitudes of Inhabitants, exceeding beliefe. Iosephus cals Egypt Mersin of Mizraim: and Herodotus affirmes that it had once the name of Thebais. Ios. l. 1. Ant. c. 7. Hero. Euterpe.

Phut the third sonne of Ham tooke the next portion of Land to his brother Mizraim, and inhabited Lybia: whose people were anciently called Phutei, (saith Iosephus) and Pliny mentioneth the Riuer Phut in Mauritania: which Riuer from the Mountain Atlas (known to the Inhabitants by the name of Dyris) he maketh to be distant the space of two hundred miles. It also appeareth in the thirtieth Chapter of Ezechiel, that Phut, Chush & Lud were contermini and Associates with the Egyptians. L. 5. c. 1.

§. XII.

Of the eleuen sonnes of Canaan, the fourth sonne of Ham.

†. I.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan: with the names of his eleuen sonnes.

Canaan (the fourth sonne of Ham) possest all that Region called by the Romanes Palæstina; in the Scriptures Galilæa, Samaria, and Iudæa; in the latter times known by the name of the Holy Land and Iurie: the limits whereof are precisely set downe by Moses, Genesis the tenth, Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon as thou goest to Gerar vntill Azzah, and as thou goest vnto Sodome and Gomorrha, and Admah, and Zeboim, euen vnto Lasha. Now howsoeuer these words of the Hebrew Text (as thou goest) be conuerted, Moses meaning was that Gerar was the South bound of Canaan, and Zidon the North; Sodome & Gomorrha the East, and the other Cities named stood on the Frontiers thereof. For Gerar standeth in a right Line from Gaza in the way of Egypt, the vttermost Territory of Canaan Southward: and this was properly the Land of Canaan.

Now the sons of Canaan which possest this Country, and inhabited some part of the borders thereof, were in number eleuen:

1. Zidon.
2. Heth or Chethus.
3. Iebusi or Iebusæus.
4. Emori or Emoreus, or Amoreus.
5. Girgeshi or Girgesæus.
6. Heui or Chiueus.
7. Arki or Harkeus.
8. Seni or Sineus.
9. Araadi or Aruadæus.
10. Zemari or Samareus, or Tzemareus.
11. Hamathi or Hamathæus, or Chamathæus.

Of which the most renowned were the Hethites, Gergesites, Amorites, Heuites, Iebusites, and Perizzites: which Perizzites were descended of Zamari or Samareus, or from some of his.

†. II.

Of the portions of Zidon and Heth.

Zidon the first borne of Canaan, built the famous City of Zidon in Phœnicia, which afterward fell in partition to the Tribe of Asser: for Asser, Zabulon, and Nephtali had a great part of the ancient Phœnicia distributed among them; but the Asserites could neuer obtaine Zidon it selfe.

The second sonne of Canaan was Heth or Cethus: of whom came the Hethites, or Hittites, one of those seuen principall Nations (Commanders of Canaan) appointed by God to be rooted out; namely, the Gergesites, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Perizzites, the Heuites, and the Iebusites. The Hittites inhabited about Bersabe, and towards Hebron neere the Torrent Besor, and about Gerar, which Moses maketh the vttermost limit of Canaan, hauing the Desart of Pharan to the South: for about Bersabe (otherwise Puteus iuramenti) foure miles from Gaza dwelt Heth and his Posterity, as far to the Northeast as Hebron, & Mamre, and of Ephraim the Hittite did Abraham buy the field of Sarahs buriall. Of which Nation Rebecca bewailed her selfe to Isaac, saying, That she was weary of her life for the Daughters of Heth. The Giants Anakim were of these Hittites, a strong & fierce Nation, whose entertainment by the kings of Israel against them the Syrians greatly feared: as in the fourth of the Kings; Israel hath hired against vs the Kings of the Hittites.

†. III.

Of the Iebusites and Amorites.

Iebuseus, the third sonne of Canaan, of whom came the Iebusites, and whose principall seat was Iebus, (afterward Hierusalem) were also a valiant and stubborne Nation, and held their City and the Country neere it, till such time as Dauid by Gods assistance recouered both: yet were not the Iebusites extinguished, but were Tributaries to Salomon.

Amoreus was the fourth sonne of Canaan, of whom the Amorites tooke name, who inhabited that Land to the East of Iordan below the Sea of Galilee, hauing Arnon and the Mountaines of Galaad on the East, and Iordan on the West: of whom Og (King of Basan) and Sihon (ouerthrowne by Moses) were Princes.

The Amorites had also many other habitations dispersed within the bounds of Canaan: as behinde Libanus in the edge of Cœlesyria, or Syria Libanica. They had also their being in the Mountaines of Iuda, and in Idumea neere the Metropolis thereof, called Duma. And hereof it came that all the Canaanites were sometime called Amorites: as in Genesis the fifteenth: For the wickednesse of the Amorites is not yet full. And that this was also a powerfull Nation, wee finde in the Prophet Amos: Yet destroyed I the Amorite before them, whose heighth was like the heighth of a Cedar, and he was strong as the Oake.

†. IIII.

Of the Gergesites, Heuites, and Harkites.

The fift sonne of Canaan was Gergeseus or Gergesion, (otherwise Girgasi) who inhabited on the East side of the Lake of Tiberias, or the Sea of Galilee, where Ptolomy sets the City Gerasa, which Iosephus cals Gesera, in the Territory of Decapolis. Here it was that Christ dispossest the possessed with Diuels; and the Gergesites desired him to depart their Coasts: because their Swine, filled with the euill spirits, drowned themselues in the Sea of Galilee. Gergeseus also built Beritus (sometime Geris) afterward Fœlix Iulia, three miles from the Riuer Adonis in Phœnitia: in which the Romans held a Garrison: and to which Augustus gaue many large priuiledges.

Heueus the sixth sonne, and Father of the Heuites, inhabited vnder Libanus neer Emath. These Heuites, howsoeuer the Caphthorim expelled a good part of them (as in Deuteronomy the second is remembred) yet many of them remained all the warre of Iosua, and afterward to the time of Salomon. For God was not pleased vtterly to root out these Nations, but they were sometimes made Tributaries to the Israelites, and at other times serued (in their falling away from the true worship of God) to afflict them: for as it is written, Iudges the third: They remained to proue Israel by them, whether they would obey the Commandements of God.

The seuenth sonne was Araceus or Harki, who between the foote of Libanus and the Mediterran Sea, (ouer against Tripolis) built the City of Archas, Arce, or Arca, afterwards Arabis.

†. V.

†. V.
Of Sini and Aruadi.

Sineus the eight son, Hierosolymitanus sets at Caparersa, which Ptolomy findes in Iudea, not farre from Iebus; to the South thereof, saith Iunius. But it is more probable, that Sineus founded Sin, which S. Hierome calls Sim: Ptolomy, Simyra: Mela and Pliny, Simyrus: Brochard, Sycon, (called Synochis) neere Arca. Pererius thinkes that Sineus inhabited the Desarts of Sinai, or thereabout; but hereof there is no other certainty than the report of Brochard, who tooke view of all these places, affirming, that Sineus built Synochis, as Zidon built Zidon. There is also another Nation of Cini (written with the letter C. otherwise Kenei) who descended of Hobab the son of Raguel the Madianite, who assisted the Israelites in their conduction through the Wildernes of Pharan. But these Cinei were admitted among the Israelites, and had a portion of Land with the Nephtalims, beside their habitations with the Amalekites: against these Cinai, Balaam propheciedd, that they should be destroyed by the Assyrians. Iudg.4. Iosua 19.33.

The ninth sonne was Aradeus or Aruadeus, who in the Ile of Aradus built the City Arados: opposite against which Iland on the Maine of Phœnicia, they founded another City of that name, which for opposition was afterwards called Antaradus. To this City came S. Peter (saith Clement) & in this Ile preached the Gospell, and founded a Church in honour of our Lady: but wee finde no such worke of his in the Acts of the Apostles. Both these two were very famous, and places of skilfull Sea-men: whom Ezechiel remembreth in his propheeies against the Tyrians: The inhabitants of Zidon and Aruad were thy Mariners. Gul. Tyr. Vitr. Cap.27.v.8.

†. VI.
Of Zemari.

OF Samareus, or Zemari, the tenth sonne, there are diuers opinions. Some think that he inhabited in Cœlesyria at Edessa, and founded Samaraim, which in Iosua is placed in the Tribe of Beniamin. There is also Samaraim (of the same Orthography) vpon the Mountains of Ephraim (saith Beroaldus) mentioned in the second of Chronicles, c.13.v.4. which the Latine conuerteth amisse (saith he) by Semeron. The Hierosolymitan Paraphrast makes Samareus (of whom were the Perizzites) the parent of the Emissani, which Pliny calls the Hemisseni, in Cœlesyria; and it may be that it was their first habitation, and that they afterwards inhabited those other places before-remembred. But that they founded Samaria, both the Hebrew Orthographie, and this place in the first of Kings (speaking of Omri) disproueth: And he bought the Mountaine Samaria or Shemeron of one Shemer, for two talents of siluer, and built in the Mountaine; and called the name of the City which hee built, after the name of Shemer, Lord of the Mountaine, Samaria. But of all these places I shall speake more at large in the conquest of the holy Land, by the children of Israel. Of whomsoeuer the Samaritanes were descended, sure I am, that they were euer a perfidious Nation, and base: for as long as the state of the Iewes stood vp, they alwaies called themselues Iewes: when it suffered or sanke, they then vtterly denied to be of that Nation or Family; for at such time as they were returned from their first captiuitie, they became a mixt Nation; partly of the Colonies of the Assyrians, and partly of the Naturalls. Beroal. in Chro. lib.4. 1.Kin.16.28.

†. VII.
Of Hamathi.

THe last of Canaans sonnes was Hamatheus, or (according to the Hebrew) Hamathi, of Hamath, (saith Beroaldus:) of which (the aspiration taken away) the same is pronounced Emath, whereof Hamatheus was present. Iosephus & Saint Hierome confound Emath with Antioch: not that Antioch which standeth on the Riuer Orontes, on the frontier of Comagena, betweene the Mountaine Casius and the Prouince of Pieria, and Seleucia, of which Saint Peter was Bishop, and in which Saint Luke and Ignatius were borne; but Antioch, surnamed Epiphania, as Beroaldus supposeth, which standeth betweene

Apamea

Apamea and Emesa in Cassiotis. Yet, indeed, Emath cannot be taken for either: for both that Antioch vpon Orontes, and that which neighboureth Emesa, are farther off seated from Canaan, than euer any of those Nations straggled. And whereas S. Hierome setteth Emath, which he confoundeth with Epiphania, in the Tribe of Nephtali; it is manifest, that Epiphania, which standeth to the North of Emesa, hath all the Prouince of Laodicea betweene it and any part of the Land diuided. And if Libanon it selfe were not shared among the Tribes, then could not Epiphania belong vnto them: for both the Prouinces Laodicea and Libanica, are betweene Epiphania and any part of the holy Land: & therefore Emath so taken could not be a part of Nephtali, as in the thirteenth of Iosua is directly proued. For Iosua counting the lands that remained vnpossest, reckoneth all Mount Libanon towards the Sunne-rising, from Baalgad vnder Mount Hermon, vntil we come to Hamath. And this reason (among others) is vsed, that Emath was not in Nephtalim, or any way belonging to the children of Israel: because Dauid accepted the presents of Tohu King of Emath, and (therewithall) conditions of peace: which hee would not haue done, if that Territory had euer belonged to the children of Israel, but would haue recouered it without composition, and by strong hand, as he did the rest. But this Argument (as I take it) hath no great weight. For if the promise which God made, be considered, as it is written in Deuteronomy, then might Emath bee comprehended, though seated altogether without the bounds of the Land promised, according to the description of Moses and Iosua: for Emath is indeede situate on the other side of the Mountaine of Hermon, which ioyneth to Libanus: and is otherwise called Iturea. But whereas Hamath is named in Iosua the 19. v. 35. and written in the Latine conuersion Emath, therein (saith Beroaldus) was S. Hierome mistaken. Emath or Iturea is that ouer the Mountaines, and the City in Nephtalim should be written Hamath: and so the Septuagint (vnderstanding the difference) write it Ammath and not Emath, the same which indeede belonged to the Nephtalims, seated on the South side of Libanus, to the East of Assedim: which City S. Hierome writes Emath; Iosephus Hamah; others, Emathin, or Amatheos, and the people Amathein; of which (as I take it) Rabsakeh vaunteth in the second of Kings: Where is the god of Hamath?

§. XIII.

Of the sonnes of Chush (excepting Nimrod,) of whom hereafter.

The sonnes of Chush were, { Seba, Hauila, Sabta, Raama, Sabteca, Nimrod, } And the sonnes of Raama were, { Sheba, and Dedan. }

†. I.

That most of the sonnes of Chush were seated in Arabia the Happy: and of the Sabaans that robbed Iob: and of the Queene that came to Salomon.

SEba or Saba was the eldest sonne of Chush, the eldest sonne of Ham; to make a difference betweene Him and his Nephew Sheba, the sonne of his brother Raama, or Regma (or Ragma after Montanus:) his name is written with a single (S) Samech, and Sheba the sonne of Regma with an (S) asperate, which is the Hebrew Schin. Seba the eldest sonne of Chush, Regma his brother, and Sheba the sonne of Regma, possest both the shores of Arabia Fœlix. Saba tooke that part toward the Red Sea, as neerest his Father Chush, and the Land of the Chusites: Regma and Sheba the East coast of the same Arabia, which looketh into the Gulfe of Persia; of which Pliny: Sabæi Arabum populi, propter thura clarissimi ad vtrag; maria porrectis gentibus habitant; The Sabaans people of Arabia, famous for their Frankincense, extending their Nations, dwell along both the Seas, (to wit) the Persian, and the Arabian, or Red Sea. This Countrey was afterwards called Arabia, à populi mixtione, saith Postellus. To this agreeth Ptolomy, who setteth the City of Saba towards the Arabian or Red Sea, and the City Rhegama towards the Persian; with whom also we may leaue Sabta: for so much Montanus gathereth out of Ptolomy, because becauſe he remembreth a(Nation called Stabei) neere the Perſian Sea; and Maſſabathæ which deſcended of them. But Montanus hath ſent Regma, or(as he calls him) Rhama into Carmania, for which I ſee no reaſon. Ioſephus, who onely attended his owne fancies, hath baniſhed Saba or Seba to the border of Ethiopia. But Beroaldus thinkes it ſtrange, that the Sabai, which ſtole away Iobs Cattle, ſhould runne through all Egypt, and all Arabia Petrea, and finde out Iob in Traconitis, betweene Paleſtina and Cœleſyria 1200. miles off. Now, as this coniecture was more than ridiculous, ſo do I thinke, that neither the Sabæi on the Red Sea, nor thoſe toward the Perſian Sea, could by any meanes execute the ſtealth vpon Iob, which ſoeuer Beroaldus ſhall take for neereſt. But theſe were the Sabæi of Arabia the Deſart, where Guilandinus Melchior affirmeth out of his owne experience, that the Citie Saba is ſeated: the ſame which Ptolomie calls Saue, now Semiſcaſac: and from this Saba in Arabia the Deſart, came thoſe Magi, or Wiſe men which worſhipped Chriſt, ſaith Melchior, whoſe words are theſe: The Magi came neither out of Meſopotamia (as Chryſoſtome, Hierome, and Ambroſe ſuppoſed) nor out of Arabia the Happie, as many wiſe men doe beleeue, but out of Saba in Arabia the Deſart: which Citie when my ſelfe was there, was (as I iudged it) called Semiſcaſac. And to approue this opinion of Guilandinus, it appeareth that theſe Sabei were neighbours to Iob, and lay fit to inuade and rob him. For both the other Nations (as well thoſe on the Perſian Sea, as thoſe on the Red Sea) are ſo diſ-ioyned with large Deſarts, as there is no poſſibilitie for ſtrangers to paſſe them, eſpecially with any numbers of Cattell, both in reſpect of the Mountaines, of the ſands, and of the extreame want of water in thoſe parts: Vbi nec homines, nec beſtiæ videntur, nec aues, imò nec arbores, nec gramen aliquod, ſed non niſi montes ſaxoſi, altiſſimi, aſperrimi; where there are found neither men, nor beaſts, no not ſo much as birds, or trees, nor any paſture or graſſe, but onely ſharpe, and high ſtonie, and craggie mountaines. Beroaldus and Peterius conceiue, that the Queene of Saba which came to viſit Salomon, was of the Sabei on the Eaſt ſide of Arabia Fœlix; but the contrarie ſeemeth more probable, and that ſhe was Queene of Saba towards the Red Sea: for Salomon at that time commanding all that part of Arabia Petrea, twixt Idumæa and the Red Sea, as farre downe as Midian or Madian, and Ezion Gaber: and this Queene of Saba which inhabited the Weſt part of Arabia Fœlix, being his neighbour, might without any farre trauaile enter his Territories, free from all danger of ſurpriſe by any other Prince or Nation.

But to auoid tediouſneſſe, it is manifeſt that Seba or Saba, Sabta, Raama, or Regma, with his Sonnes Sheba and Dedan, and Sabteca, were all the poſſeſſors of Arabia the Happy, & the Deſart: onely Hauilah & Nimrod dwelt together on the Eaſt ſide of Chuſh, who held Arabia Petræa. Now for Sabta, there is found of his name the Citie of Sabbatha or Sabota in the ſame Arabia: of which both Plinie and Ptolomie; who withall nameth Sabotale, within the walls whereof there were ſometimes found ſixtie Temples. Ezekiel ioyneth the Father and the Sonne together, The Merchants of Sheba and Raama were thy Merchants. And that they were the Eaſterne Arabians, their merchandiſe witneſſeth, formerlie repeated in the Chapter of Paradiſe. For Ioſephus his fancies, that Saba was the parent of the Ethiopians about Meroe, and Sabta of the Ethiopians Aſtabari, they be not worthie any farther anſwer than hath already beene giuen: eſpecially ſeeing theſe Cities, preſeruing the memorie of the names of Saba, & of Sabta in Arabia, were yet remaining in Ptolomies time, though in ſome letters changed. As alſo in the coaſts adioyning, the names of other of the brethren of the familie of Cuſh, with little alterations are preſerued. In Arabia the Deſart is found the Citie Saba or Saue, (now Semiſcaſac) with the Citie of Rhegana for Rhegma; & the Nation by Ptolomie himſelfe called Raabeni of Raamah. In Arabia the Happie is found the Citie of Rhegama, and Rabana; which alſo keepeth the ſound of Rhegma, the Citie of Saptha or Saptah, not farre from the Eaſt-coaſt of Arabia: as alſo the Metropolis and chiefe Citie in the bodie of the South part of Arabia, called without difference or alteration Sabatha, and to the Weſt of Sabatha towards the Red Sea the great Citie of Saba; and the Nation adioyning, Sabæi: and to the South thereof againe toward the ſtreight entrance of the Red Sea, the Region of Sabe. To all theſe his Brothers and Nepheuves which were ſeated on the Eaſt ſide of Arabia, Hauilah by the paſſage of Noris was a neighbour, to whom hee might paſſe by Boate euen vnto Rhegma the Citie of Raama, or Rhegma, ſet neere the Riuer of Lar towards the mouth of the Perſian Sea, which ſtood in Ptolomies time.

† II.

Iosephus his opinion of Dedan, one of the issue of Chush, to haue been seated in the West Aethiopia, disproued out of Ezech: and Hieremie.

AND whereas Iosephus (whom in this S. Hierome followeth, as not curious heerein) sent Dedan the son of Raamah into West Aethiopia, it is strange that Ezechiel should couple Sheba, Raamah, and Dedan together; Dedan in the 15. Verse, and Sheba, and Raamah in the 22. Verse, to be the Merchants of Tyre, if Dedan had dwelt in West Aethiopia, which is distant from Raamah and Sheba (the habitation of his father and brother) aboue foure thousand miles. Besides which, the merchandise that the Dedanites brought to Tyre doth not make them naked Blacke-moores. For they of Dedan (saith Ezechiel) were thy Merchants in precious clothes for thy Chariots; and these Westerne Aethiopians neuer saw cloth, till the Portugals, seeking those Coasts, traded with them: the merchandise of the Countrie being Hides, Elephants teeth, some Gold and Amber, Ciuet Cats, and Rice, but nothing at all of any manufacture: and all these they exchanged for linnen, or yron chiefly.

But in those dayes the West part of Africa within the body of the land was knowne onely by imagination: and, being vnder the burnt Zone, was held vninhabitable. And therefore that the Negros of the West Aethiopia, which inhabite about Serra Liona, or Niger, could either passe by Sea or Land to Tyre, in the bottome of the Mediterran Sea, were a strange, or rather a foolish fancy. Now to put it out of dispute that Dedan also dwelt by the rest of the children of Chush, which seates they held by that name in the time of Hieremy the Prophet, let vs heare Hieremy his owne words: Fly, ye Inhabitants of Dedan, for I haue brought the destruction of Esau vpon him. Heereby it appeareth, that Dedan was a Neighbour to the Idumeans: and Idumea is a Prouince of Arabia Petrea: and Dedan which dwelt on the North part of Arabia felix, ioyned in that part to Petrea, the seat of his Grand-father Chush; which neighbourhood and fellowship of Dedan and the Idumeans, is also confirmed by Ezechiel: I will stretch out my hand vpon Edom, and destroy Man and Beast out of it, and I will make it desolate from Teman: and they of Dedan shall fall by the sword.

Ezech. 25. 15.

§. XIII.

Of the issue of Mizraim: and of the place of Hieremie, Chap. 9. Vers. 7.

AFter Chush it followeth to speake of Mizraim: sonnes, whose names (saith Saint Augustine) were plurall, to signifie the Nations, which came of them. Ludim, the elder sonne of Mizraim, was the Father of the Lybians in Africa: and the rest of his Brothers dispersed themselues into all the Regions adioyning. Among the sons of Shem there is also Lud; but hee is differenced from Lud the sonne of Mizraim by the singular number: the sonne of Shem being written Lud, the sonne of Mizraim, Ludim: and yet these Names and Nations are often confounded, notwithstanding the apparant difference both of Names and Nations. For, that Ludim the sonne of Mizraim was the parent of the Lybians in Africa, and that he was seated not farre from Mizraim his father, appeareth by the Prophet Hieremy, who ioyneth them in this sort together: Come vp yee Horses, and rage ye Chariots, and let the valiant men come forth, the Black-moores, and the Lybians which beare the shield: for those Nations assisted the Egyptians, being of one parent descended. And in Ezechiel, Phut & Lud are ioyned together. Aethiopia (or Chush) saith Ezechiel. c. 30. v. 3. and Phut and Lud, and all the common people, and the men of the Land that are in league, shall fall with them by the sword: which is as much to say, as the sons of Chush, (which were the Chusites) the sonnes of Mizraim, (which were the Egyptians) and the Lybians (descended of his sonne Lud) with other the inhabitants of Egypt and Africa, shall fall together. Hieroſolymitanus finds also in Africa a Nation of the Lydians. And I beleeue it: because Hieremy ioyneth the Lybians, and Lydians together in the place before remembred. But Lybia in Africa is by the Hebrwes called Ludim (saith Arias Montanus) though 2. Chron. 12. 3. they seeme to bee called Lubim or Lubai, a name somewhat neerer the word Lybies, and by which it may seeme that the truer

The termination im in the Hebrew, is commonly a signe of the plurall number, as aim of the dual.

Cap. 46. v. 9.

writing is, not Libyes, but Lybies. Neither is it here to be omitted, that Pintus (vpon the thirtieth of Ezechiel) vnderstandeth that which is spoken in the third Verse of Lud, not to be meant of the Lybians at all: for he will haue this threatning to be meant against the people of Lyda, a City (saith he) between Egypt and Palestina, which opinion I could not mislike if the City of Lyda were so seated. But Lyda (which should be written Lydda with a double D, and is the same City which was afterward Diospolis, in which S. Peter cured Æneas of the palsey) standeth neere the Torrent Gaas, not farre from Ioppe the Port of Hierusalem. Yet it is not impossible but that this City might haue Lud for the Founder. For there are many Cities of one name founded in all the Regions of the World, and farre asunder; as after the names of Alexander, Seleucus, and Antiochus, many Cities called Alexandria, Selencia, and Antiochia, so of diuers others. St. Hierome maketh Lehabim to be the Father of Libya, who was the third sonne of Mizraim: and so doth Postellus; and either opinion may be true.

The rest of Mizraims sonnes haue no proper Countries giuen them in the Scriptures, sauing Casluhim and Caphtorim, of whom came the Philistims, whom the Scriptures call Peleset.

These Casluhim inhabited Cassiotis, a Region lying in the entrance of Egypt from Palestina, in which the Lake Sirbonis, and the Mountaine Cassius are found: not farre from whence Pompey was buried.

Caphtorim seated neere Casluhim in that Tract of Egypt called Sethrotis, not farre from Pelusium. Strabo calls it Sethrotis, Stephanus and Pliny, Sethroitis, of the City Sethron: which Ortelius takes to be the same which Ptolomy calls Hercules parua. Of the Casluhim and Caphtorim came the Philistims, which are called by the Septuagint Allophyli (which is) Alienigenæ, Strangers, or of a strange kindred. These Philistims inhabited the South part of the holy Land towards Egypt, of whom Palestina tooke name. For the Hebrewes (saith Isidore) doe not vse the letter (P) but in stead of it (ph.) Their principall Cities were Gaza, Ascalon, Azotus, Geth, and Accaron: and the people of them called Gasæi, Ascalonitæ, Azotij, Gethæi, and Accaronitæ: Isidore affirmes, that Ascalon was first called Philistim: and of that City the Country adioyning. But where Isidore had it, I know not.

The first knowne King of the Philistims was that Abimelech, who had a liking to Abrahams wife; with whom Abraham made a couenant and league. This Abimelech dwelt indeed at this time in Gerar; but it is written that hee was also King of the Philistims, in these words: Wherefore Isaac went to Abimelech King of the Philistims vnto Gerar. Now in regard that this or some ancienter Abimelech gouerned the cõmonwealth greatly to his glory, the rest of his successors called themselues by the same name. The Philistims commanded that Tract of land vpon the Mediterran Sea to the Northward, from the Castle of Pilgrims (otherwise Cæsarea Palestina, or Stratons Towre) which was the South-border of Phœnicia, to Gaza, or to the Riuer of Egypt. The Anakims or strong Gyants were of these Philistims: & Goliah was of Geth, one of the fiue Cities aboue named. They had sometimes fiue Kings, saith Lyranus. They mastered the Israelites at seuerall times aboue 150. yeeres, and kept them Tributaries, till they were weakened by Sampson and Samuel; but in the end this yoke was taken off by David, and laid on themselues.

It is obiected, that because these Cities & the Countries adioyning, were held by the sonnes of Mizraim, therefore did the Israelites dispossesse the sonnes of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, by forcing those places.

To this saith Pererius, that although the Palestines or Philistims held it in the time of Iosua; yet at the time of the promise it was possest by the Canaanites; as in the second of Deuteronomy. The Heuites dwelt in the Villages vnto Gaza. And what maruaile, if (the Canaanites being the greater part) the denomination were from them? For that the Philistims were of Caphtor, and so of Mizraim and not of Canaan, besides Moses, the Prophet Hieremy witnesseth: The Lord will destroy the Philistims: the remnant of the issue of Caphtor: and in like manner in the ninth of Amos, the Philistims are said to be the reliques of Caphtorim: Haue not I brought vp Israel out of the land of Egypt, and the Philistims from Caphtor, and Aram from Kir? so I reade this place with diuers of the learned. For whereas the Vulgar hath, & Palestinos de Cappadocia, & Syros de Cyrene, this conuersion Beroaldus condemneth; where Caphtor is taken for Cappadocia, and Cyrene for Kir. For Cyrene is a City directly West from Egypt, betweene Ptolemais or Barce and Apollonia: but Kir in Asia vnder the Assyrians; Iunius hath it Kir, and not Cyrene: and so hath the Geneua.

But

Hieremy 47. 4.

Amos 9. v. 7.

But Pererius cals Caphtorim Cappadocia, according to the Vulgar translation, to which he is bound: & yet it is not altogether improbable if he mean Cappadocia in Palæstina, and not that Cappadocia by the Sea Pontus in the North of Asia the lesse. For whether they inhabited Sethreites, or Cappadocia of Palæstina, it is not certainly knowne. And sure in this maner he may expound Cappadocia to be ambiguous, aswell as he doth Cyrene: taking it here not for Cyrene in Africa, but for a place in Media. For it is written in the second of Kings, that Teglatphalasser king of the Assyrians carried away the Inhabitants of Damascus into Kir: and so Iosephus seemes to vnderstand this Kir for Cyrene in Media, calling this Cyrene, Media superior: for it was the manner and policy of the Assyrians to transplant the people conquered by them, as they did the Samaritans or Israelites, and other Nations. And hereof it came that Kir was called Syro-Media: because the Syrians by the Assyrians were therein captiued.

Of which see in the second Book, Chap 7. §. 3. †. 5.

§. XV.
Of the issue of SEM.

†. I.
Of Elim, Assur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

It remaineth lastly to speake of the Sons of Sem, who are these:

1. Alam, or Elam,
2. Asshur,
3. Arphaxad,
4. Lud, and
5. Aram.

THe posterity of Sem, Moses recounteth after the rest: because from them he proceedeth in order with the Genealogie and Story of the Hebrewes: (For of Sem was Abraham descended.)

Of these fiue sonnes, the Scriptures remember the length of the life of Arphaxad only, and only the children of him & Aram, the rest are barely spoken of by rehearsall of their names, sauing that it may bee gathered, that Assur (who was supposed to found Nineue) was also said to be the Father of the Assyrians, whose issues, and the issues of Cham, instantly contended for the Empire of the East: which sometimes the Assyrians, somtimes the Babylonians obtained, according to the vertue of their Princes. This is the common opinion, which also teacheth vs, that all the East parts of the World were peopled by Assur, Elam, and Lud (sauing India) which I beleeue Noah himselfe first inhabited: and to whom Ophir and Hauilah the sons of Ioctan afterward repaired. Hi filij Sem ab Euphrate, & fluuio partem Asiæ vsq; ad Oceanum Indicum tenuerunt; The sons of Sem (saith S. Hierome) held all those Regions from Euphrates to the Indian Ocean.

Ios. Ant. l. 1. c. 7.

Of Elam came the Elamites, remembred, Acts 2. verse. 9. and the Princes of Persia; which name then began to be out of vse and lost, when the Persians became Masters of Babylonia: the East Monarchy being established in them. Some prophane Writers distinguish Elam from Persia, and make the Elamites a people apart. But Susa (which the Scriptures call Susan) in Elam was the kings seat of Persia (witnesse Daniel:) And I saw (saith he) in a vision, and when I saw it, I was in the Palace of Susan, which is in the Province of Elam. This City is embraced by the Riuer Eulæus (according to Ptolomy) in Daniel, Vlai: and seated in the border of Susiana.

cap. 8. vers. 2.

Ptol. Asiæ tab. 5. Dan. 8.

Asshur (as most Historians beleeue) the second son of Sem, was Father of the Assyrians, who disdaining the pride of Nimrod, parted from Babel, and built Nineue, of equall beauty and magnitude with Babylon, or exceeding it. But we shall in due place disproue that opinion. Euery mans hand hath beene in this Story, and therefore I shall not need herein to speake much: for the Assyrians so often inuaded and spoiled the Israelites, destroyed their Cities, and led them Captiues, as both in Diuine & Humane letters there is large and often mention of this Nation.

But howsoeuer Herodotus and D. Siculus extend this Empire, and honour this Nation with with ample Dominion; yet was not the ſtate of the Aſſyrians of any ſuch power, after ſuch time as Sardanapalus loſt the Empire. For Senacherib who was one of the powerfulleſt Princes among them, had yet the Mountaine Taurus for the vtmoſt of his Dominion toward the North-eaſt, and Syria bounded him toward the Weſt, notwithſtanding theſe vaunts of Senacherib in Eſay the 37. Haue the gods of the Nations deliuered them whom my Fathers haue deſtroyed? as Gozan, and Haran, and Reſeph, and the children of Eden which were at Telaſſar? Where is the King of Hamath, and the King of Arphad, and the King of the City Sepharuaim, Hena and Iuah? All theſe were indeede but petty Kings of Cities, and ſmall Countries, as Haran in Meſopotamia: Reſeph in Palmyrena: Hamath or Emath in Iturea, vnder Libanus: the Iſle of Eden: Sepher, and others of this ſort. Yea, Nabuchodonoſor, who was moſt powerfull, before the conqueſt of Egypt, had but Chaldæa, Meſopotamia, and Syria, with Paleſtina and Phœnicia parts thereof. But in this queſtion of Aſſur, I will ſpeake my opinion freely when I come to Nimrod, whoſe plantation I haue omitted among the reſt of the Chuſites, becauſe hee eſtabliſhed the firſt Empire: from whom the moſt memorable ſtory of the World taketh beginning. Eſay 37. Verſ. 11.

Of Arphaxad came the Chaldæans, ſaith Saint Hierome, and Ioſephus; but it muſt be thoſe Chaldæans about Vr: for the ſonnes of Cham poſſeſt the reſt. It is true that he was the Father of the Hebrewes: for Arphaxad begat Shela, and Shela, Heber; of whom hereafter.

And that Lud, the fourth ſon of Shem, gaue name to the Lydians in Aſia the leſſe, is the common opinion, taken from Ioſephus and S. Hierome; but I ſee not by what reaſon he was moued to ſtraggle thither from his friends.

†. II.

Of Aram, and his Sonnes.

Aram the fift and laſt Son of Shem was the parent of the Syrians: of which Damaſcus was head. Their name was changed from Aram or Aramites by Syrus (ſaith Euſebius out of Ioſephus) which Syrus liued before Moſes was borne; the ſame which others call the ſonne of Apollo. Meſopotamia alſo being but a Prouince of Syria, had the name of Aram Naharaijm, which is as much to ſay; as Syria duorum fluuiorum; Syria compaſſed with two Riuers, (to wit) Tigris and Euphrates. The Scriptures call it Meſopotamia, Syria, and Padan Aram: and the Greekes Meſopotamia ſimply. Eſay 7. 8. Euſeb. p. 10. 6.

Ariſe and get thee to Padan Aram (ſaith Iſaac to Iacob) to the houſe of Bethuel thy mothers father, and thence take thee a wife. Strabo alſo remembreth it by the ancient name of Aram or Aramea, as theſe his owne words conuerted witneſſe: Quos nos Syros vocamus, ipſi Syri Aramenios & Arameos vocant; Thoſe which we call Syrians (ſaith hee) themſelues call Aramenians and Arameans. Gen. 28. 2. ſee Gen. 25. 20. alſo Deut. 23. 4. Iudg. 3. Paral. 1. 19. Pſal. 59. Strab. l. 1.

Againſt this opinion, that Aram the ſonne of Sem was the Father and Denominator of the Syrians in generall; (and not onely of thoſe in Syria Inter-amnia, which is Meſopotamia) ſome reade, Geneſ. 22. 21. Kemuel, the Father of the Syrians: where other out of the originall read Kemuel, the ſonne of Aram. Neither is it any inconuenience for vs to vnderſtand the word (Aram) here, not for the Nation, but for the name of ſome one of note; the rather, becauſe in the Hiſtory of Abraham and Iſaac (which was in time long before Kemuels Poſterity could be famous) we finde Meſopotamia called Aram; and that with an addition: ſometimes with Naharaijm, and ſometimes of Padan, to diſtinguiſh it from another Aram; which (as it ſeemes) then alſo was called Aram. For whereas Iunius thinks in his notes vpon Gen. 25. 20. that Padan Aram ought to be reſtrained to ſome part of Meſopotamia, (to wit) to that part which Ptolomy calls Anſobaritis (ſo called from the Riuer Chaboras, which diuiding it, runneth into Euphrates) the promiſcuous vſe of Padan Aram, and Aram Naharaijm (which latter appellation queſtionleſſe comprehends the whole Meſopotamia) may ſeem to refute this opinion: eſpecially ſeeing the ſignification of this appellation agreeth with the whole Region. For it ſignifieth as much as the yoke of Syria, which name agrees with this Region: becauſe the two Riuers, (as it were) yoked together goe along it. The Reliques of the name Padan appeare in the name of two Cities in Ptolomy, called Aphadana: (as Iunius hath well noted) the one vpon Chaboras, the other vpon Euphrates.

The Sonnes of Aram were, { Vz or Hus, Hul, Gether, and Mesch or Mes.

Hieron.in trad. Hebraic. Vz or Hus inhabited about Damascus, and built that City; saith Iosephus and St. Hierome. But Tostatus mistaking this opinion, both in them and in Lyra, who also followeth Iosephus, affirmeth that Abrahams Steward Eliezer was the Founder thereof; though it were likely that Hus the eldest son of Aram dwelt neare vnto his father, who inhabited the body of Syria. For Hus was a Region of the same, adioyning to Arabia the Desart, & to Batanea or Traconitis: whereof the Prophet Hieremy: Reioyce and be glad O Daughter of Edom that dwellest in the Land of Hus. Hus therefore is seated beyond Iordan, in the East Region of Traconitis, adioyning to Basan, hauing Batanea Gaulonitis, and the Mountaine Seir to the East, Edrai to the South, Damascus North, and Iordan West: hauing in it many Cities and people, as may also be gathered out of Hieremy: And all sorts of people: and all the kings of the Land of Hus. In this Region dwelt Iob, descended of Hus, the son of Nahor, the brother of Abraham (saith S. Hierome) and married Dina the Daughter of Iacob, saith Philo.

Hieremi.Lam. cap.4.ver.21. Cap.25.ver.20.

Hul the second son of Aram, S. Hierome makes the Father of the Armenians: and Gether the third son, parent to the Acarnanians or Carians: which opinion, (because I finde not where to set him) I do not disproue, though I see no reason why Gether should leaue the fellowship of his owne brethren, and dwell among Strangers in Asia the lesse. Iunius giues Hul (whom he writes Chul) the Desart of Palmyrena, as far as Euphrates, where Ptolomy setteth the City of Challe.

Gether (saith Iosephus) founded the Bactrians: but Iosephus gaue all Noahs children feathers, to carry them far away in all haste. For mine own opinion, I alwaies keep the rule of Neighbourhood, and thinke with Iunius (to wit) That Gether seated himselfe neare his brothers, in the body of Syria, and in the Prouince of Cassiotis, and Seleucis, where Ptolomy placeth Gindarus, and the Nation by Pliny called Gindareni.

Iunius also giueth to Mes or Mesch the North part of Syria, betweene Cilicia and Mesopotamia, neare the Mountaine Masius. The certainty of those Plantations can no otherwise be knowne than by this probability, that Aram the father (of whom that great Region took name) planted his sons in the same Land about him: for he wanted no scope of Territory for himselfe and them; neither then when the World was newly planted, nor in many hundred yeares after: and therefore there is no reason to cast them in the Desart parts of the World, so far asunder. And as necessity and policy held them together for a while: so Ambition (which began together with Angels and Men) inhabiting the hearts of their children, set them asunder. For although these sons of Aram, and the sons of the rest of Noahs children, kept themselues within the bounds of some one large Kingdome; yet therein euery one also sought a Prouince apart, & to themselues; giuing to the Cities therein built their own names, thereby to leaue their memory to their Posterity: the vse of Letters being then rare, and knowne to few.

In this sort did the pride of the Spaniards in America cast them into so many Prouinces: euery one emulating and disdaining the greatnesse of other, as they are thereby to this day subiect to inuasion, expulsion, and destruction: so as (Noua Hispania and Peru excepted, because those Countries are vnaccessible to Strangers) an easie force will cast them out of all the rest.

Chap.8.§.7. Mes the fourth son is made the parent of the Mœonians: of whom something hath bin spoken already. Arphaxad the third son of Shem, begat Shelah, and Heber. Heber had two sons, Phaleg and Ioctan: and in Phalegs time was the Earth diuided.

†. III.

Of the diuision of the Earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the sonnes of Heber, of the issue of Sem.

THe many people which at the diuision (at Phalegs birth) were then liuing, and the through Plantation of all the East part of the World (at his death) hath made a doubt, whether the Earth were diuided at eyther. The Hebrewes (saith Pererius out of of Sedar Holam, one of their Chronicles) affirm that this partition happened at the death of Phaleg: and Phaleg was borne in the yeare after the Floud 101. and liued in all 239. yeares, which numbers added makes 340. And therefore was it so many yeares after the Floud, ere the children of Noah seuered themselues. But to this opinion of the Hebrewes, and the doubt they make how in so few yeares as 101. (the time of Phalegs birth) so many people could be increased, Pererius giues this answer, That if 70. persons of the Family of Iacob increased to 600000. fighting men in 215. years, (besides women, children, and impotent persons) how much more is it likely, that so soone after the Floud the children of Noah might in a shorter time bring forth many multitudes, hauing receiued the blessing of God, Increase and multiply, and fill the earth? What strength this answer hath, let others iudge: for the children of Israel were 70. and had 215. years time: and the sons of Noah were but three, and had but 101. years of time, to the birth of Phaleg.

Others conceiue that Phaleg tooke that name after the diuision, in memory thereof: as Iosephus and Saint Augustine, who reason in this manner. If the diuision were at Phalegs death (which hapned in the yeare, which is commonly held to be the 48. of Abraham, but was by more likely computation 12 yeares before his birth) then was the diuision 38. years after Ninus, who gouerned 52. years: in the 43. yeare of whose reigne Abraham was borne. But when Ninus began to rule the Assyrians, 80. years before this diuision (as this diuision is placed by the Hebrewes, Hierome and Chrysostome) then was the earth so peopled in all the East and Northerne parts, as greater numbers haue not beene found at any time since. For Ninus associating to himselfe Arieus King of Arabia, a people who at that time (saith Diod. Siculus) plurimum opibus atq; armis præstabant, Exceeded both in riches and bodies of men, subdued many Cities in Armenia; receiued Barzanis into grace; then inuaded Media, and crucified Pharnus the King thereof, with his Wife and seuen Children; vanquished all those Regions between Nilus and Tanais, the Egyptians, Phœnicians, the Kingdoms of Syria, and all the Nations of Persia, to the Hyrcanian Sea. For the numbers which followed Ninus (already remembred out of Ctesias) against Zoroaster and others: and Zoroaster on the other side, who made resistance with 400000. proue it sufficiently, that if the diuision had not happened before the death of Phaleg, there had needed no diuision at that time at all. For some of them were so ill satisfied with their partitions, as they sought to be masters of all, and greater Armies were there neuer gathered than by Ninus and Semiramis: wherefore in this opinion there is little appearance of the truth.

Per. in Gen. lib. 15. c. 10.

But for that conceit that if the diuision had beene made at the birth of Phaleg, there were not then sufficient numbers borne to fill the earth: It was neuer meant that the earth could be filled euery where at the very instant, but by times and degrees. And surely whatsoeuer mens opinions haue beene heerein, yet it is certaine, that the diuision of tongues and of men must goe neere together with the ceasing of the worke at Babel: and that the enterprize of Babel was left off instantly vpon the confusion of Languages, where followed the execution of the diuision; and so neyther at the birth nor death of Phaleg: for Phaleg was borne in the yeare 101. after the Floud, which was the yeare that Nimrod came into Shinaar, or ten years after he arriued, saith Berosus.

Now if it be obiected that Phaleg (the Etymologie of whose name signifieth diuision) must haue liued without a name, except the name had beene giuen him at the time of this confusion and partition: to this obiection it may be answered, That the change of names vpon diuers accidents is not rare in the Scriptures: for Iacob was called Israel after he had wrestled with the Angel; Abraham was first Abram; and Edom Esau; and that Phaleg being a principall man in this diuision had his first name vpon this accident changed, it is most probable.

And lastly, whereas the Hebrewes, Saint Hierome and Chrysostome account Heber for a great Prophet, if that by giuing his sonne the name of Phaleg, hee fore-told the diuision which followed: to this I say, I doe not finde that Heber deserued any such honour, if hee had thereupon so called his sonne: for diuision and dispersion followeth increase of people of necessity; and this Prophesie (if any such had beene) might also haue reference to the diuision, which afterwards fell amongst the Hebrewes themselues.

But if we giue a reasonable time to the building of the Towre and City of Babel, in which time many people (by reason and by demonstratiue proofe) might be increased: and that vpon the fall thereof the confusion and diuision followed (whereupon Phelag tooke name) then in this opinion there is nothing either curious or monstrous.

†. IV.

Of the sonnes of Ioctan, the other sonne of Heber.

The sons of Ioctan were:

1. Elmodad.
2. Saleph, or Salep, or Sheleph.
3. Asamath, or Chatzar.
4. Iare, or Iaraah, or Ierath.
5. Hadoram.
6. Vzal, or Vxal.
7. Dicklach, or Dicla.
8. Obal, or Ebal, or Hobal.
9. Abimael.
10. Sheba, or Seba.
11. Ophir, or Opir.
12. Hauilah, or Chauila, and
13. Iobab.

ALl those sons of Ioctan (according to Saint Hierome) dwelled in the East parts of the world, or India, euen from the Riuer Cophe or Choas, which is one of the branches or heads of Indus.

But the certaine places of those thirteene Sons cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, the words of Moses being generall: And their dwelling was from Mesha as thou goest vnto Separ a Mount in the East. Of all these thirteene Sons, there were onely three memorable, (to wit) Sheba, Ophir, and Hauilah, Concerning whose names, to auoid confusion, it is to be obserued, that among the sons of Chush, two of them had also the names of Sheba and Hauilah. Abraham had also a third Saba or Sheba, his grand-childe by his wife Ketura. But Seba the sonne of Chush, and Sheba the sonne of Rhegma his Nephew, we haue left in Arabia Fœlix: and Hauilah the son of Chush vpon Tigris. Saba the grand-childe of Abraham was (as some haue thought) the Father of the Sabeans in Persia: of which Nations Dionysius de Orbis situ, maketh mention. Primùm Sabæi; post hos sunt Passagardæ; prope verò hos sunt Tasci: The first are Sabeans: after these be Passagardæ; and neere these the Tasci. And whereas it is written: But vnto the Sonnes of the Concubines which Abraham had, Abraham gaue gifts, and sent them away from Isaac his sonne (while he yet liued) Eastward to the East-Countrey: hereupon it is supposed, that this Saba the sonne of Abraham, wandered into Persia: for Persia was accounted the furthermost East-Countrey in respect of Iudæa; which also Ouid setteth vnder the Sun-rising. Yet seeing the rest of Abrahams sons seated themselues on the borders of Iudæa, I rather choose to leaue Saba the son of Abraham in Arabia the Desart, where Ptolomy setteth a City of that name.

Gen. 10. 30.

Gen. 25. 6.

Metam. lib. 1.

But Saba the sonne of Ioctan, the son of Heber, (as I conceiue) inhabited India it selfe. For Dionysius Afer in his Periegesis, (or description of the World) which hee wrote in Greeke Verse, among the Regions of India findeth a Nation called the Sabæi. Taxilis hos inter medios habitat q. Sabæus; In the middest of these dwell the Sabæi, and the Taxili, saith this Dionysius.

†. V.

Of Ophir one of Ioctans sonnes, and of Peru, and of that voyage of Salomon.

OPhir also was an Inhabitant of the East India, and (as S. Hierome vnderstands it) in one of the Ilands plentifull with gold, which are now known by the name of Molucca. Iosephus vnderstands Ophir to be one of those great head-lands in India, which by a generall name are called Chersonesi, or Peninsulæ: of which there are two very notorious; Callecut and Malacon. Pererius takes it rightly for an Iland, as Saint Hierome doth, but but he sets it at the head-land of Malacca. But Ophir is found among the Moluccas farther East.

Arias Montanus out of the second of Chronicles, the third Chapter and sixth Verse, gathers that Ophir was Peru in America, looking into the West Ocean, commonly called Mare del Sur, or the South Sea; by others Mare pacificum. The words in the second of the Chronicles are these: And he ouer-layed the house with precious stones for beautie; and the gold was gold of Paruaim. Iunius takes this gold to bee the gold of Hauilah, remembred by Moses in the description of Paradise: And the gold of that Land is good: finding a Towne in Characene a Prouince of Susiana called Barbatia; so called (as he thinks) by corruption for Paruaim: from whence those Kings subiected by Dauid, brought this gold, with which they presented him; and which Dauid preserued for the enriching of the Temple. Gen. 2. 11. & 12. Plin. l. 6. c. 28.

But this fancy of Peru hath deceiued many men, before Montanus, and Plessis, who also tooke Ophir for Peru. And that this question may be a subiect of no further dispute; it is very true that there is no Region in the World of that name: sure I am, that at least America hath none, no not any City, Village, or Mountaine so called. But when Francu Pisarro first discouered those Lands to the South of Panama, arriuing in that Region which Atabaliba commanded (a Prince of magnificence, Riches and Dominion inferior to none) some of the Spaniards vtterly ignorant of that language, demanding by signes (as they could) the name of the Country, and pointing with their hand athwart a Riuer, or Torrent, or Brooke that ranne by, the Indians answered Peru, which was either the name of that Brooke, or of water in generall. The Spaniards thereupon conceiuing that the people had rightly vnderstood them, set it downe in the Diurnall of their enterprise, and so in the first description made, and sent ouer to Charles the Emperor, all that West part of America to the South of Panama had the name of Peru, which hath continued euer since, as diuers Spaniards in the Indies assured me; which also Acosta the Iesuite in his naturall and morall Historie of the Indies confirmeth. And whereas Montanus also findeth, that a part of the Indies (called Iucatan) tooke that name of Iochan, who as hee supposeth nauigated from the vtmost East of India to America: it is most true, that Iucatan is nothing else in the language of that Countrey, but [What is that] or [What say you?] For when the Spaniards ask'd the name of that place (no man conceiuing their meaning) one of the Saluages answered Iucatan (which is) What aske you, or What say you? The like hapned touching Paria, a mountainous Country on the South side of Trinidado & Margarita: for when the Spaniards inquiring (as all men doe) the names of those new Regions which they discouered, pointed to the Hils a farre off, one of the people answered, Paria, which is as much to say, as, high Hils or Mountaines. For at Paria begins that maruailous ledge of Mountaines, which from thence are continued to the Strait of Magellan, from eight degrees of North latitude to the 52. of South: and so hath that Country euer since retained the name of Paria.

The same hapned among the English, which I sent vnder Sir Richard Greeneuile to inhabite Virginia. For when some of my people asked the name of that Country, one of the Saluages answered, Wingandacon, which is as much to say, as, You weare good clothes, or gay clothes. The same hapned to the Spaniard in asking the name of the Iland Trinidado. for a Spaniard demanding the name of that selfe place which the Sea incompassed, they answered, Caeri, which signifieth an Iland. And in this manner haue many places newly discouered beene intituled, of which Peru is one. And therefore wee must leaue Ophir among the Moluccas, whereabout such an Iland is credibly affirmed to be.

Now although there may be found gold in Arabia it selfe (towards Persia) in Hauilah, now Susiana, and all alongst that East Indian shore; yet the greatest plenty is taken vp at the Philippines, certaine Ilands planted by the Spaniards, from the East India. And by the length of the passage which Salomons ships made from the red Sea, (which was three yeares in going and comming) it seemeth they went to the vttermost East, as the Moluccas or Philippines. Indeede these that now goe from Portugal, or from hence, finish that nauigation in two yeares, and sometimes lesse: and Salomons ships went not aboue a tenth part of this our course from hence. But wee must consider, that they euermore kept the coast, and crept by the shores, which made the way exceeding long. For before the vse of the Compasse was knowne, it was impossible to nauigate athwart the Ocean; and therefore Salomons ships could not finde Peru in America. Neither was it needfull for the Spaniards themſelues (had it not beene for the plenty of gold in the Eaſt India Ilands, farre aboue the mines of any one place of America) to ſaile euery yeare from the Weſt-part of America thither, and there to haue ſtrongly planted, & inhabited the richeſt of thoſe Ilands: wherein they haue built a City called Manilia. Salomon therefore needed not to haue gone farther off than Ophir in the Eaſt, to haue ſped worſe: neither could he nauigate from the Eaſt to the Weſt in thoſe dayes, whereas he had no coaſt to haue guided him.

Toſtatus alſo gathereth a fantaſticall opinion out of Rabanus, who makes Ophir to be a Country, whoſe Mountaines of gold are kept by Griffins: which Mountaines Solinus affirmeth to bee in Scythia Aſiatica, in theſe words: Nam cum auro & gemmis affluant, Griphes tenent vniuerſa, alites ferociſſima, Arimaſpi cum his dimicant, &c. For whereas theſe Countries abound in gold, and rich ſtones, the Griffins defend the one and the other: a kinde of Fowle the fiereeſt of all other; with which Griffins a Nation of people called Arimaſpi make warre. Theſe Arimaſpi are ſaid to haue beene men with one eye onely, like vnto the Cyclopes of Sicilia: of which Cyclopes, Herodotus and Ariſteus make mention: and ſo doth Lucan in his third Booke: and Valerius Flaccus: & D. Siculus in the ſtory of Alexander Macedon. But (for mine owne opinion) I beleeue none of them. And for theſe Arimaſpi, I take it that this name ſignifying One-eyed, was firſt giuen them by reaſon that they vſed to wear a vizzard of defence, with one ſight in the middle to ſerue both eies; & not that they had by nature any ſuch defect. But Solinus borroweth theſe things out of Pliny, who ſpeakes of ſuch a Nation in the extreame North, at a place called Giſolitron, or the Caue of the Northeaſt winde. For the reſt, as all fables were commonly grounded vpon ſome true ſtories or other things done: ſo might theſe tales of the Griffins receiue this Morall: That if thoſe men which fight againſt ſo many dangerous paſſages for gold, or other riches of this World, had their perfect ſenſes, and were not depriued of halfe their eye-ſight (at leaſt of the eye of right reaſon & vnderſtanding) they would content themſelues with a quiet and moderate eſtate; and not ſubiect themſelues to famine, corrupt aire, violent heate, and cold, and to all ſorts of miſerable diſeaſes. And though this fable be fained in this place, yet if ſuch a tale were told of ſome other places of the World, where wilde Beaſts or Serpents defend Mountaines of gold, it might bee auowed. For there are in many places of the world, eſpecially in America, many high and impaſſable Mountains which are very rich & full of gold, inhabited onely with Tygres, Lyons, and other rauenous and cruell beaſts: vnto which if any man aſcend (except his ſtrength be very great) he ſhall be ſure to finde the ſame warre, which the Arimaſpi make againſt the Griffins: not that the one or other had any ſenſe of the gold, or ſeek to defend that mettall, but being diſquieted, or made affraid of themſelues or their young-ones, they grow inraged and aduenturous. In like ſort it may be ſaid that the Alegartos, (which the Egyptians call the Crocodyles) defend thoſe Pearles which lye in the Lakes of the Inland: for many times the poore Indians are eaten vp by them, when they diue for the pearle. And though the Alegartos know not the pearle, yet they finde ſauour in the fleſh and bloud of the Indians, whom they deuoure.

§. VI.

Of Hauilah the ſonne of Ioctan, who alſo paſſed into the Eaſt Indies: and of Meſha and Sephar named in the bordering of the Families of Ioctan: with a Concluſion of this diſcourſe touching the plantation of the World.

OF Hauilah the ſonne of Ioctan, there is nothing elſe to be ſaid, but that the generall opinion is, that he alſo inhabited in the Eaſt India in the Continent, from which Ophir paſt into the Ilands adioyning. And whereas Ganges is ſaid to water Hauilah, it is meant by Hauilah in the Eaſt India, which tooke name of Hauilah the ſon of Ioctan: but Hauilah, which Piſon compaſſeth, was ſo called of Hauilah, the ſonne of Chuſh, as is formerly proued by this place of Scripture: Saul ſmote the Amalekites from Hauilah, as thou commeſt to Shur, which is before Egypt. But that Saul euer made Warre in the Eaſt India, no man hath ſuſpected. For an end wee may conclude, that of the thirteene ſonnes of Ioctan, theſe three, Saba, Hauilah, & Ophir; though at the firſt ſeated by their brethren about the hill Maſius or Meſh, Gen. 10. 30. (to wit) betweene Cilicia and Meſopotamia; yet at length either themſelues or their iſſues remoued into the Eaſt India, leauing the other

other Families of Ioctan, to fill the Countries of their first plantation, which the Scripture defines to haue beene from Mesh vnto Sephar. And although S. Hierome take Mesh to be a Region of the East India, and Sephar a Mountaine of the same (which Mountain, Montanus would haue to be the Andes in America) those fancies are farre beyond my vnderstanding. For the word (East) in the Scriptures, where it hath reference to Iudea, is neuer farther extended than into Persia. But Mesch is that part of the Mountaine of Masius in the North of Mesopotamia, out of which the Riuer Chaboras springeth which runneth by Charran: and in the same Region we also finde for Sephar (remembred by Moses, Sipphara by Ptolomy, standing to the East of the Mountaine Masius; from whence Ioctan hauing many sonnes, some of them might passe into India, hearing of the beauty and riches thereof. But this was in processe of time.

The other fashion of planting I vnderstand not, being grounded but vpon mens imaginations, contrary to reason and possibility. And that this Mountaine in the East was no farther off than in those Regions before remembred, it appeareth by many places of the Scripture where the same phrase is vsed: as in Numbers 23. Balac the King of Moab hath brought me from Aram, out of the Mountaine of the East; which was from the East part of Mesopotamia. For Balac brought Balaam out of Mesopotamia, (witnesse this place of Deuteronomie:) Because they hyred Balaam the sonne of Beor, of Pethor in Aram Naharaijm, to curse thee: for Aram Naharaijm was Syria fluuiorum, which is Mesopotamia, as aforesaid. Vers. 7. cap. 23. ver. 4.

This plantation of the World after the flood doth best agree (as to me it seems) with all the places of Scripture compared together. And these be the reports of Reason and probable coniecture, the Guides which I haue followed herein, and which I haue chosen to goe after, making no valuation of the opinions of men, conducted by their owne fancies, be they ancient or moderne. Neither haue I any end herein, priuate, or publike, other than the discouery of truth. For as the partiality of man to himselfe hath disguised all things: so the factious and hireling Historians of all Ages (especially of these latter times) haue by their many Volumes of vntrue reports left Honor without a Monument, and Vertue without Memory: and (in stead thereof) haue erected Statues and Trophees to those, whom the darkest forgetfulnesse ought to haue buryed, and couered ouer for euermore. And although the length and dissoluing Nature of Time, hath worne out or changed the Names and Memory of the Worlds first planters after the flood (I mean the greatest number and most part of them) yet all the foot-steps of Antiquity (as appeares by that which hath beene spoken) are not quite worne out nor ouer-growne: for Babylon hath to this day the sound of Babel; Phœnicia hath Zidon, to which City the eldest Son of Canaan gaue name; so hath Cilicia, Thursis; and the Armenians, Medes, Hiberians, Cappadocians, Phrygians, the Syrians, Idumæans, Libyans, Moores, and other Nations, haue preserued from the death of forgetfulnesse some signes of their first Founders and true Parents.

CHAP. IX.

Of the beginning and establishing of Gouernment.

§. I.

Of the proceeding from the first Gouernment vnder the eldest of Families to Regall, and from Regall absolute, to Regall tempered with Lawes.

IT followeth now to entreate how the World began to receiue Rule and Gouernment, which (whilst it had scarcity of People) vnder-went no other Dominion than Paternity and Eldership. For the Fathers of Nations were then as Kings, and the eldest of Families as Princes. Hereof it came, that the word (Elder) was alwayes vsed both for the Magistrate, and for those of Age and Grauity: the same bearing one signification almost in all languages. For in the eleuenth of Numbers God commanded Moses to gather together 70. of the Elders of the people, and Gouernour ouer them: the Hebrew bearing the same sense, which the Latine word Senes or Seniores doth. So it is written in Susanna, Then the Assembly beleeued them as those that were the Elders and Iudges of the People. And so in the words of those false Iudges and witnesses to Daniel, Shew it vnto vs, seeing God hath giuen thee the office of an Elder. Demosthenes vseth the same word for the Magistrate among the Grecians. Cicero in Cato giueth two other reasons for this appellation: Apud Lacedæmonios qui amplissimum Magistratum gerunt, vt sunt, sic etiam appellantur Senes; Among the Lacedæmonians the chiefe Magistrates, as they were so are they called Elderimen: and againe: Ratio & prudentia nisi essent in senibus, non summum Concilium Maiores nostri appellassent Senatum; If reason and aduisement were not in old men, our Ancestors had neuer called the highest Councell by the name of a Senate.

Gouer-

But though these reasons may well be giuen, yet wee doubt not but in this name of (Elders) for Gouernours or Counsailers of State, there is a signe that the first Gouernors were the Fathers of Families; and vnder them the eldest Sons. And from thence did the French, Italian, and Spaniard take the word (Signor) and out of it (Seignourie) for Lordship and Dominion: signifying (according to Loyseau) puissance in propriety, or proper power. The kindes of this Seignourie, Seneca makes two: the one, Potestas aut imperium; Power or command; the other, Proprietas aut dominium; Propriety or Mastership: the correlatiue of the one is the subiect, of the other the slaue. Ad Cæsarem (saith he) potestas omnium pertinet, ad singulos proprietas; Cæsar hath power ouer all, and euery man propriety in his owne: and againe, Cæsar omnia imperio possidet, singuli dominio; Cæsar holdeth all in his power, and euery man possesseth his owne. But as men and vice began abundantly to increase: so obedience, (the fruit of naturall reuerence, which but from excellent seed seldome ripeneth) being exceedingly ouer-shadowed with pride, and ill examples, vtterly withered and fell away. And the soft weapons of paternall perswasions (after mankind began to neglect and forget the originall and first giuer of life) became in all ouer-weak, either to resist the first inclination of euill, or after (when it became habituall) to constraine it. So that now, when the hearts of men were onely guided & steered by their owne fancies, & tost to and fro on the tempestuous Seas of the world, while wisedome was seuered from power, and strength from charity: Necessity (which bindeth euery nature but the immortall) made both the Wise & Foolish vnderstand at once, that the estate of reasonable men would become far more miserable than that of beasts, and that a generall flood of confusion would a second time ouer-flow them, did they not by a generall obedience to order and dominion preuent it. For the mighty, who trusted in their owne strengths, found others again (by interchange of times) more mighty than themselues: the feeble fell vnder the forcible, and the equall from equall receiued equall harmes. Insomuch that licentious disorder (which seemed to promise a liberty vpon the first acquaintance) proued vpon a better triall, no lesse perillous than an vnindurable bondage.

Necessitas est firmum iudicium, & immutabilis prouidentiæ potestas.

These Arguments by Necessity propounded, and by Reason maintained and confirmed, perswaded all Nations which the Heauens couer, to subiect themselues to a Master, and to Magistracy in some degree. Vnder which Gouernment, as the change (which brought with it lesse euill, than the former mischiefes) was generally pleasing: so time (making all men wise that obserue it) found some imperfection & corrosiue in this cure. And therefore the same Necessity which inuented, and the same Reason which approued souereign power, bethought it selfe of certaine equall rules, in which Dominion (in the beginning boundlesse) might also discerne her own limits. For before the inuention of Lawes, priuate affections in supreme Rulers made their own fancies both their Treasurers and Hangmen: measuring by this yard, and waighing in this ballance, both good and euill.

For as wisedome in Eldership preceded the rule of Kings; so the will of Kings forewent the inuentions of Lawes. Populus nullis legibus tenebatur: arbitria principum pro legibus erant; The people were not gouerned by any other Lawes than the wils of Princes. Hereof it followed, that when Kings left to be good, neither did those mens vertues value them which were not fancied by their Kings, nor those mens vices deforme them that were. Amor interdum nimis videt, interdum nihil videt; Loue sees one while too much, another while starke nothing. Hence it came to passe, that after a few years (for direction and restraint of Royall power) Lawes were established: and that gouernment which had had this mixture of equality (holding in an euen ballance supreme power and common right) acquired the title of Regall: the other (which had it not) was knowne for Tyrannicall: the one God established in fauour of his people: the other he permitted for their affliction.

In the infancy of this Regall authority, Princes as they were chosen for their vertues onely, so did they measure their powers by a great deale of moderation. And therefore (saith Fabius Pictor) Principes, quia iusti erant, & religionibusediti, iure habiti Dij & dicti; Princes, because they were iust and religious, were rightly accounted and called gods. De aureo seculo part. 1.

And though (speaking humanely) the beginning of Empire may be ascribed to Reason and Necessity; yet it was God himselfe that first kindled this light in the mindes of men, whereby they saw that they could not liue and bee preserued without a Ruler and Conducter: God himselfe by his eternall prouidence hauing ordained Kings; and the law of Nature Leaders, and Rulers ouer others. For the very Bees haue their Prince; the Deere their Leaders; and Cranes (by order imposed) watch for their owne safety. The most High beareth rule ouer the Kingdomes of Men; and appointeth ouer it whomsoeuer hee pleaseth. By me (saith Wisedome, spoken by the Son of God) Kings reigne; By me Princes rule; and it is God (saith Daniel) that setteth vp Kings, and taketh away Kings. And that this power is giuen from God, Christ himselfe witnesseth, speaking to Pilate; Thou couldest haue no power at all against me, except it were giuen thee from aboue. Dan. 5. 21. Prou 8. 15. Dan. 2. 21. Iohn 19. 11.

It was therefore by a threefold Iustice that the World hath beene gouerned from the beginning, (to wit) by a Iustice naturall: by which the Parents and Elders of Families gouerned their Children, and Nephewes, and Families; in which gouernment the Obedience was called naturall Piety: Againe, by a Iustice diuine; drawne from the Lawes and Ordinances of God; and the Obedience hereunto was called Conscience: And lastly, by a Iustice ciuill, begotten by both the former; & the Obedience to this we call Duty. That by these three those of the eldest times were commanded, and that the rule in generall was Paternall, it is most euident: for Adam being Lord ouer his owne Children, instructed them in the seruice of God his Creatour; as wee reade, Cain and Abel brought Oblations before God, as they had beene taught by their Parent, the Father of Mankinde.

§. II.

Of the three commendable sorts of Gouernment with their opposites: and of the degrees of humane society.

WHat other Policy was exercised, or State founded after such time as mankinde was greatly multiplied before the Floud, it cannot bee certainely knowne, though it seeme by probable coniecture, that the same was not without Kings in that first Age: it being possible that many Princes of the Egyptians (remembred among their antiquities) were before the generall Floud: and very likely, that the cruell Oppressions in that Age proceeded from some tyranny in Gouernment, or from some rougher forme of Rule, than the Paternall.

Berosus ascribeth the rule of the World in those dayes to the Gyants of Libanus, who mastred (saith he) all Nations from the Sun-rising to the Sun-set. But in the second Age of the World, and after such time as the rule of Eldership failed, three seuerall sorts of Gouernment were in seuerall times established among men, according to the diuers natures of Places and People. Beros. lib. 1.

The first, the most ancient, most generall, and most approued, was the Gouernment of one, ruling by iust Lawes, called Monarchy: to which Tyranny is opposed, being also a sole and absolute Rule, exercised according to the will of the Commander, without respect or obseruation of the Lawes of God, or Men. For a lawfull Prince or Magistrate (saith Aristotle) is the Keeper of Right & Equity: and of this condition ought euery Magistrate to be, according to the rule of Gods word: Iudges and Officers shalt thou make thee in thy Cities: And these shall iudge the people with righteous iudgement. Deut. 16. 18.

The second Gouernment is of diuers principall Persons established by order, and ruling by Lawes, called Aristocracy, or Optimatum potestas; to which Oligarchia (or the particular faction and vsurpation of a few great-ones) is opposed: as the Decem viri, or Trium viri, and the like.

The

The third is a State popular, (or Gouernment of the people) called Democratia, to which is opposed Ochlocratia, or the turbulent vniust ruling of the confused multitude, seditiously swaying the State, contrary to their own Lawes & Ordinances. These three kinds of Gouernment are briefly expresst by Tholosanus; vnius, paucorum, & multorum, Of one, of few, of many.

Now as touching the beginning and order of policy since the second increase of Mankinde, the same grew in this sort: First of all, euery Father, or eldest of the Family, gaue Lawes to his owne issues, and to the people from him and them increased. These as they were multiplied into many Housholds (man by nature louing society) ioyned their Cottages together in one common Field or Village, which the Latins call Vicus; of the Greek οἶκος, which signifieth a House, or of the word (Via) because it hath diuers waies & paths leading to it. And as the first House grew into a Village, so the Village into that which is called Pagus, (being a society of diuers Villages) so called of the Greeke πήγη, which signifieth a Fountain: because many people (hauing their habitations not far asunder) drank of one Spring or Streame of water. To this word the English Hundreds, or (as some think) Shires answereth not vnfitly.

But as men and impiety began to gather strength, and as emulation & pride between the Races of the one and the other daily increased: so both to defend themselues from out-rage, and to preserue such goods as they had gathered, they began to ioyne and set together diuers of their Villages, inuironing them first with bankes and ditches, and afterwards with wals: which being so compassed were then called Oppida; either ab opponendo se hostibus, Because wals were opposed against Enemies, or ab opibus, because thither they gathered their riches for safety and defence: as also they were called Vrbes, ab orbe; because when they were to build a City, they made a Circle with a Plough (saith Varro) therewith measuring and compassing the ground which they went to inclose or fortifie. And although Vrbs and Ciuitas be often confounded, yet the difference was anciently in this, that Vrbs signified no other than the very wals and buildings, and Ciuitas was taken for the Citizens, inhabiting therein: so called of Ciuis, and that, ab eo quòd multitudo coiuit, of comming together. But all inhabitants within these wals are not properly Citizens, but onely such as are called Free-men: who bearing proportionably the charge of the City, may by turnes become Officers and Magistrates thereof: the rest goe vnder the name of Subiects, though Citizens by the same generall name of Subiects are also knowne. For euery Citizen is also a Subiect, but not euery Subiect a Citizen: perhaps also some Citizen (as the chiefe Magistrate, if he be to be termed one of the Citizens) is no Subiect; but of this we neede not stand to inquire. The word (Magistrate) is taken à Magistro, from a Master, and the word (Master) from the Aduerbe Magis (as also Magisteria, Precepts of Art) or else from the Greeke word (Megistos:) and so the Greekes call them Megistanes, whom the Latines call Magnates, or Magistratus.

Ethic. 5. The office and duty of euery Magistrate Aristotle hath written in few words. A Magistrate or Prince (saith hee) is the keeper of right and equity; but the same is best taught by Saint Paul, who expresseth both the cause efficient, and finall, (that is) by whom Magistrates and Princes are ordained, together with their duties and offices. A Magistrate is
Rom. 13. 4. the Minister of God for thy wealth; but if thou doe euill, feare: for he beareth not the sword for nought. For he is the Minister of God, to take vengeance on him that doth euill. Hee also
Ver. 1. teacheth in the same place; That euery soule ought to be subiect to the higher powers, because
2. they are by God ordained; and that whosoeuer resisteth that power, resisteth God, the giuer and fountaine thereof: and shall not onely be therefore subiect to the iudgement and con-
Ibid. v. 5. demnation of Man, but of God: For ye must be subiect (saith he) not because of wrath onely, but also for conscience sake.

The examples are not to be numbred of Gods punishments vpon those that haue resisted Authority, by God ordained and established. Neither ought any Subiect therefore to resist the power of Kings, because they may be taxed with iniustice or cruelty: for it pleaseth God sometimes to punish his people by a tyrannous hand: and the Commandement of obedience is without distinction. The Prophets and Christ himselfe subiected themselues to the power of Magistracy. Christ commanded that all due to Cæsar should be giuen vnto him: and he payed Tribute for himselfe and Peter. Hieremy commanded of Egypt: And it is acceptable in the sight of our Saviour (saith Paul) that yee make Supplications and Prayers for Kings, and for all that are in authority: and if for such Kings as were Idolatrous, much more for Christian Kings and Magistrates. And so much did Saint Chrysostome in his Homily to the people preferre Monarchicall Gouernment, as he rather commended the rule of Kings (though Tyrants) than that they should be wanting: Præstat Regem tyrannum habere, quàm nullum; Better a tyrannous King, than no King: to which also Tacitus subscribeth: Præstat (saith Tacitus in the first of his History) sub malo principe esse quàm nullo; It is better to haue a bad Prince than none at all. And be they good Kings (which is generally presupposed) then is there no liberty more safe, than to serue them: Neq; enim libertas tutior vlla est (saith Claudian) quàm Domino seruire bono: No liberty (saith he) more safe for vs than to be seruants to the vertuous. And certainely howsoeuer it may be disputed, yet is it safer to liue vnder one Tyrant, than vnder 100000. Tyrants: vnder a wise man that is cruell, than vnder the foolish and barbarous cruelty of the multitude. For as Agesilaus answered a Citizen of Sparta that desired an alteration of the Gouernment, That kinde of rule which a man would disdaine in his owne house, were very vnfit to gouerne great Regions by.

Lastly, as many Fathers erected many Cottages for their many children: and as (for the reason before remembred) many Households ioyned themselues together, and made Villages; many Villages made Cities: so when these Cities and Citizens ioyned together, and established Lawes by consent, associating themselues vnder one Gouernour, and Gouernment; they so ioyned, were called a Commonwealth: the same being sometimes gouerned by Kings; sometimes by Magistrates; sometimes by the people themselues.

§. III.

Of the good Gouernment of the first Kings.

NOw this first Age after the Floud, and after such time as the people were increased, and the Families became strong and dispersed into seuerall parts of the World, was by ancient Historians called Golden: Ambition and Couetousnesse being as then but greene, and newly growne vp, the seeds and effects wherof were as yet but potentiall, and in the blowth and bud. For while the Law of Nature was the rule of mans life, they then sought for no larger Territory than themselues could compasse and manure: they erected no other magnificent buildings, than sufficient to defend them from cold and tempest: they cared for no other delicacy of fare, or curiosity of dyet, than to maintaine life: nor for any other apparrell, than to couer them from the cold, the Raine and the Sun.

And sure if wee vnderstand by that Age (which was called Golden) the ancient simplicity of our Fore-fathers, this name may then truely be cast vpon those elder times: but if it be taken otherwise, then, whether the same may be attributed more to any one time than to another, (I meane to one limited time and none else) it may bee doubted. For good and Golden Kings make good and Golden Ages: and all times haue brought forth of both sorts. And as the infancy of Empirie, (when Princes plaied their Prizes, & did then only woo men to obedience) might be called the Golden Age: so may the beginning of all Princes times be truely called Golden. For be it that men affect honour, it is then best purchased; or if honour affect men, it is then that good deseruings haue commonly the least impediments: and if euer Liberality ouerflow her banks & bounds, the same is then best warranted both by policy and example. But Age and Time doe not onely harden and shrinke the openest and most Iouiall hearts, but the experience which it bringeth with it, layeth Princes torne estates before their eyes, and (withall) perswadeth them to compassionate themselues. And although there be no Kings vnder the Sun whose meanes are answerable vnto other mens desires; yet such as value all things by their owne respects, doe no sooner finde their appetites vnanswered, but they complaine of alteration, and account the times iniurious and yron. And as this falleth out in the Reigne of euery King, so doth it in the life of euery man, if his dayes be many: for our younger yeares are our Golden Age; which being eaten vp by time, we praise those seasons which our youth accompanied: and (indeed) the grieuous alterations in our selues, and the paines and diseases which neuer part from vs but at the graue, make the times seem so differing and displeasing: especially the quality of mans nature being also such, as it adoreth and extolleth the passages of the former, and condemneth the present state how iust soeuer: Fit humana malignitatis vitio, vt semper vetera in laude, præsentia in fastidio sint; It comes to passe (saith Tacitus) by the vice of our malignity, that we alwaies extoll the time past, and hold the present fastidious: For it is one of the errours of wayward Age: Quod sint laudatores temporis acti; That they are praisers of fore-passed times, forgetting this aduice of Salomon: Say not then, Why is it that the former dayes were better than these? for thou doest not inquire wisely of this thing: to which purpose Seneca; Maiores nostri questi sunt, & nos querimur, posteri querentur, euersos esse mores, regnare nequitiam, in deterius res hominum & in omne nefas labi: Our Ancestors haue complained, we doe complaine, our children will complaine, that good manners are gone, that wickednesse doth reigne, and all things grow worse and worse, and fall into all euill. These are the vsuall discourses of Age and misfortune. But hereof what can we adde to this of Arnobius? Noua res quandoq; vetus fiet, & vetus temporibus: quibus cæpit noua fuit & repentina: Whatsoeuer is new, in time shall be made old: and the ancientest things when they tooke beginning were also new and sodaine. Wherefore not to stand in much admiration of these first times, which the discontentments of present times haue made Golden, this we may set down for certaine, That as it was the vertue of the first Kings, which (after God) gaue them Crowns: so the loue of their people thereby purchased, held the same Crownes on their heads. And as God gaue the obedience of Subiects to Princes: so (relatiuely) he gaue the care and iustice of Kings to the Subiects; hauing respect, not onely to the Kings themselues, but euen to the meanest of his Creatures: Nunquam particulari bono seruit omne bonum; The infinite goodnesse of God doth not attend any one onely: for he that made the small and great, careth for all alike: and it is the care which Kings haue of all theirs, which makes them beloued of all theirs; and by a generall loue it is, that Princes hold a generall obedience: For, Potestas humana radicatur in voluntatibus hominum: All humane power is rooted in the will or dispositions of men.

§. IV.

Of the beginning of Nobility: and of the vaine vaunt thereof without vertue.

And with this Supreme Rule and Kingly authority began also other degrees and differences among Subiects. For Princes made election of others by the same Rule, by which themselues were chosen; vnto whom they gaue place, trust, and power. From which imployments and Offices sprung those Titles, and those degrees of Honour, which haue continued from Age to Age to these dayes. But this Nobility, or difference from the Vulgar, was not in the beginning giuen to the Succession of Bloud, but to Succession of Vertue, as hereafter may be proued. Though at length it was sufficient for those whose Parents were aduanced, to be knowne for the Sonnes of such Fathers: and so there needed then no endeuour of well-doing at all, or any contention for them to excell, vpon whom glory or worldly Nobility necessarily descended. Yet hereof had Nobility denomination in the beginning, That such as excelled others in vertue, were so called: Hinc dictus Nobilis, quasi virtute præ alijs notabilis. But after such time as the deserued Honour of the Father was giuen in reward to his Posterity, Saint Hierome iudged of the Succession in this manner: Nihil aliud video in Nobilitate appetendum, nisi quod Nobiles quadam necessitate constringantur, ne ab antiquorum probitate degenerent; I see no other thing to bee affected in Nobility, than that Noblemen are by a kinde of necessity bound, not to degenerate from the vertue of their Ancesters. For if Nobility be Virtus & antiqua diuitia; Vertue and ancient riches, then to exceede in all those things which are extra hominem, as riches, power, glory, and the like, doe no otherwise define Nobility, than the word (animal) alone doth define a reasonable man. Or if honour (according to L. Viues) bee a witnesse of vertue and well-doing: and Nobility (after Plutarch) the continuance of vertue in a Race or Linage: then are those in whom Vertue is extinguished, but like vnto painted and printed Papers, which ignorant men worship in stead of Christ, our Lady, and other Saints: men, in whom there remaine but the dregs and vices of ancient Vertue: Flowers, and Herbes, which by change of soile and want of manuring are turned to Weedes. For what is found praise-worthy in those waters, which had their beginning out of pure Fountains, if citur aliquando Cicuta venenosa, & ex terra sterili pretiosum aurum, Out of fruitfull ground ariseth sometimes poysoning Henbane, and out of barren soile precious Gold. For as all things consist of matter and forme, so doth Charron (in his Chapter of Nobilitie) call the Race and Linage but the matter of Nobilitie: the forme (which giues life and perfect being) he maketh to be Vertue, and Qualitie, profitable to the Common-weale. For he is truely and entirely Noble, who maketh a singular profession of publike Vertue, seruing his Prince and Countrie, and being descended of Parents and Ancesters that haue done the like. And although that Nobilitie, which the same Authour calleth personall, (the same which our selues acquire by our Vertue and well deseruings) cannot be ballanced with that which is both naturall, by Descent, and also personall; yet if Vertue bee wanting to the naturall, then is the personall and acquired Nobilitie by many degrees to be preferred: For (saith Charron) this Honour (to wit) by Descent, may light vpon such a one, as in his owne nature is a true Villaine. There is also a third Nobilitie which hee calleth Nobilitie in Parchment, bought with Siluer or Fauour: and these be indeede but Honours of affection, which Kings with the change of their fancies wish they knew wel how to wipe off againe. But surely, if we had as much sense of our degenerating in worthinesse, as we haue of vanitie in deriuing our selues of such and such Parents, we should rather know such Nobilitie (without Vertue) to be shame and dishonour than Noblenesse, and glory to vaunt thereof. What calamitie is wanting (saith Bernard) to him that is Bernar. l. 2. de Camest thou thence with thy Mytre, or glistering with Iewels, or garnished with Silkes, or adorned with Feathers, or stuffed with Gold? If thou scatter and blow away all these by thy consideration as certaine morning cloudes, which doe or will soone passe ouer, thou shalt meet with a naked, and poore, and wretched and miserable man, and blushing, because he is naked, and weeping because he is borne, and repining, because he is borne to labour, and not to honour.

§. I.

That Nimrod was the first after the Flood that reigned like a Soueraigne Lord: and that his beginning seemeth to haue beene of iust authoritie.

THE first of all that reigned as Soueraigne Lord after the Floud was Nimrod, the Sonne of Chush, distinguished by Moses from the rest (according to Saint Augustine) in one of these two respects: either for his eminencie, and because hee was the first of fame, and that tooke on him to command others: or else in that hee was begotten by Chush, after his other children were also become Fathers, and of a later time than some of his Grand-children & Nephewes. Howsoeuer, seeing Moses in expresse words calleth Nimrod the Sonne of Chush, other mens coniectures to the contrary ought to haue no respect.

This Empirie of Nimrod, both the Fathers and many later Writers call tyrannicall: the same beginning in Babel, (which is) confusion. But it seemeth to mee that Melanchton conceiued not amisse hereof: the same exposition being also made by the Author of that worke called Onomasticum Theologicum, who affirmes that Nimrod was therefore called Amarus Dominator, Abitter or seuere Gouernour, because his forme of rule seemed at first farre more terrible than Paternall authority. And therefore is hee in this respect also called a mightie Hunter: because he tooke and destroyed both Beasts & Theeues. But Saint Augustine vnderstands it otherwise, and conuerts the word (ante) by (contra) affirming therein, that Nimrod was a mightie Hunter against God: Sic ergo intelligendus est Gigas ille, Venator contra Dominum; So is that Giant to be vnderstood, a Hunter against the Lord.

But howsoeuer this word (a mightie Hunter) be vnderstood; yet it rather appeareth, that as Nimrod had the command of all those, which went with him from the East into Shinaar: so, this charge was rather giuen him, than by him vsurped. For it no where is found, that Noah himselfe, or any of the Sonnes of his owne body came with this troupe into Babylon: no mention at all being made of Noah (the yeeres of his life excepted) in the succeeding Story of the Hebrews; nor that Sem was in this disobedient troupe or among the builders of Babel.

The same is also confirmed by diuers ancient Historians, that Nimrod, Suphne, and Iolan were the Captaines and Leaders of all those which came from the East. And though Sem came not himselfe so farre West as Shinaar (his lot being cast on the East parts) yet from his Sonnes Nephew Heber, the name and Nation of the Hebrewes (according to the general opinion) tooke beginning, who inhabited the Southermost parts of Chaldea about the Citie of Vr, from whence Abraham was by God called into Charran, and thence into Canaan.

And because those of the Race of Sem which came into Chaldea, were no partners in the vnbeleeuing worke of the Towre: therefore (as many of the Fathers coniecture) did they retaine the first and most ancient language, which the Fathers of the first Age had left to Noah; and Noah to Sem and his Issues: In familia Heber remansit hac lingua; In the Family of Heber this Language remained (saith Saint Augustine out of Epiphanius;) and this Language Abraham vsed; yea, it was anciently and before the Floud the generall speech: and therefore first called (saith Cœlestinus) lingua humana: the humane tongue.

We know that Georgius Becanus following Theodoret, Rabbi Moses, Ægyptius, Vergara, and others, is of another opinion; but howsoeuer we determine of this point, we may with good probability resolue, that none of the godly seed of Sem were the chiefe Leaders of this presumptuous multitude. And seeing it is not likely but that some one was by order appointed for this charge, we may imagine that Nimrod rather had it by iust authoritie, than violence of vsurpation.

§. II.

That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were three distinct persons.

BEROSVS, and out of him Nauclerus with others, make many Nimrods, Eusebius confounds him with Belus, and so doth Saint Hierome vpon Ose; and these words of S. Augustine seeme to make him of the same opinion: Ibi autem Ninus regnabat post mortem patris sui Beli, qui primus illic regnauerat 65 annos; There did Ninus reigne after the death of his Father Belus, who first gouerned in Babylon sixtie fiue yeeres. But it could not be vnknowne to Saint Augustine, that Nimrod was the establisher of that Empire: Moses being plaine and direct therein, For the beginning of Nimrods Kingdome (saith he) wit Babel, Erec, Accad, and Chalne, in the Land of Shinaar; wherefore Nimrod was the first King of Babel. And certainly it best agreeth with reason, that Ninus was the third, and not one with Nimrod, as Mercator (led by Clement) supposed: for in Ninus time the World was maruailously replenished. And if S. Augustine had vndoubtedly taken Belus for Nimrod, he would haue giuen him the name which the Scriptures giue him, rather than haue borrowed any thing out of prophane Authors. And for those words of S. Augustine (qui primus illic regnauerat, who was the first that reigned there) supposed to be meant by Belus: those words do not disproue that Nimrod was the Founder of the Babylonian Empire. For although Iulius Cæsar ouerthrew the liberty of the Romane Commonwealth, making himselfe perpetuall Dictator, yet Augustus was the first established Emperor: and the first that reigned absolutely by soueraigne authority ouer the Romans, as an Emperour.

The like may be said of Nimrod, that he first brake the rule of Eldership and Paternitie, laying the foundation of soueraigne Rule, as Cæsar did; and yet Belus was the first, who peaceably, and with a generall allowance exercised such a power. Pererius is of opinion, that Belus and Nimrod were the same, because many things are said of them both agreeing in time: for it was about 200. yeeres after the floud (as they account) that Belus reigned: but such agreement of times proues it not. For so Edward the third, and his grand-child Richard the second, were kings both in one yeere: the one dyed, the other in the same yeere was crowned King.

And yet the opinion (that Nimrod and Belus were one) is far more probable than that of Mercator; who makes Ninus and Nimrod to be the same. For it is plaine that the beginning of Nimrods Kingdome was Babel, and the Townes adioyning: but the first and most famous worke of Ninus was the Citie of Nineue.

Now whereas D. Siculus affirmeth, that Ninus ouercame and suppresse the Babylonians, the same rather proueth the contrarie, than that Ninus and Nimrod were one person. For Ninus established the seat of his Empire at Nineue in Assyria, whence the Babylonians might (perchance) in disdaine thereof fall from his obedience, whom he recouered againe by strong hand, which was easie: Babylon being not walled till Semiramis time.

——Dicitur altam
Coctilibus muris cinxisse Semiramis Vrbem.

Semiramis with wals of bricke the Citie did inclose.

Further, where it is alleaged, that as the Scriptures call Nimrod mightie: so Iustine hath the same of Ninus, which is one of Mercators arguments, It may be answered, that such an addition might haue beene giuen to many other Kings as well. For if wee may beleeue Iustine, then were Vexoris King of Egypt, and Tomi of Scythia mighty Kings before Ninus was borne. And if we may compare the words of Moses (touching Nimrod) with the vndertakings of Ninus, there will be found great difference betweene them.

For whereas Mercator conceiueth, that it was too early for any that liued about the time of the confusion of languages, to haue inuaded and mastered those Cities so farre remoued from Babel, namely, Erec, Accad, and Chalne, which worke he therefore ascribeth to Ninus, as a man of the greatest vndertaking, & consequently would haue Nimrod to haue beene long after the time, in which we suppose he flourished; and both those names of Nimrod and Ninus to belong to one person, to wit, to Ninus: to these things to make some answer. First, I doe not finde that supposition true, That euer Nimrod inuaded any of these Cities, but that he founded them and built them from the ground, being the first after the floud, that conducted the children of Noah into those parts: and therefore had nothing built or erected to his hands.

Besides, whereas these Cities in many mens opinions are found to stand far away from Babylon, I finde no reason to bring me to that beleefe. The Citie of Accad which the Septuagint cals Archad, and Epiphanius, Arphal, Iunius takes to be Nisibis in Mesopotamia: for this Region thereabout the Cosmographers (saith he) call Assabene for Accadene. Others vndervnderstand Nisibis and Ninive to bee one City: so do Strabo and Stephanus confound it with Charran, but all mistaken. For Nisibis, Accad, & Charran are distinct places. Though I cannot deny Accadene to bee a Region of Mesopotamia, the same which Arias Montanus out of S. Hierome cals Achad: and so doe the Hebrewes also call Nisibis, which seemeth to be the cause of this mistaking. As for the City of Erec, which the Septuagint call Orech, S. Augustine, Orig, and Pagninus, Erec, this place Iunius vnderstands for Aracca in Susiana: but there is also a City in Comagena called Arace: and indeede likelihood of name is no certaine proofe, without the assistance of other circumstances.

Concerning the third City (called Chalneh) some take it for Calinisis: of which Am. Marcellinus. Saint Hierome takes it for Seleucia; Hierosolymitanus for Ctesiphon: others doe thinke it to be the Agrani vpon Euphrates, destroyed and razed by the Persians. But let Moses be the Moderator and Iudge of this dispute, who teacheth vs directly, that these Cities are not seated in so diuers and distant Regions; for these be his words: And the beginning of his Kingdome (speaking of Nimrod) was Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalneh, in the Land of Shinaar: so as in this Valley of Shinaar, or Babylonia, or Chaldea (being all one) we must finde them. And therefore I could (rather of the two) thinke with Viterbiensis, that these foure made but one Babylon, than that they were Cities farre remoued, and in seuerall Prouinces, did not the Prophet Amos precisely distinguish Chalne from Babylon. Goe you (saith Amos) to Chalne, and from thence goe you to Hamath, and then to Gath of the Philistims. The Geneua translation fauouring the former opinion, to set these Cities out of Shinaar, hath a marginall note expressing that Shinaar was here named: not that all these Cities were therin seated, but to distinguish Babylon of Chaldea, from Babylon in Egypt: but I finde little substance in that conceit. For sure I am, that in the beginning of Nimrods Empire there was no such Babylon, nor any City at all to be found in Egypt: Babylon of Egypt being all one with the great City of Cairo, which was built long after, not farre from the place where stood Memphis the ancient City, but not so ancient as Babylon vpon Euphrates. Now that Chalne is situate in the Valley of Shinaar, it hath beene formerly proued in the Chapter of Paradise. So as for any argument that may be brought to the contrary, from the remote situation of these three Cities from Babylon, vvee may continue in our opinion, That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, vvere distinct and successiue Kings.

§. III.

That Nimrod, not Assur, built Ninive: and that it is probable out of Esay 23. 13. that Assur built Vr for the Chaldees.

NOw as of Nimrod: so are the opinions of Writers different touching Assur, and touching the beginning of that great state of Babylon and Assyria: a controuersie vvearisomely disputed without any direct proofe, conclusion, or certainty. But to me (of whom, where the Scriptures are silent, the voyce of Reason hath the best hearing) the interpretation of Iunius is most agreeable; vvho besides all necessary consequence doth not dis-ioyne the sense of the Scriptures therein, nor confuse the vnderstanding thereof. For in this sort hee conuerteth the Hebrew Text: Erat enim principium regni eius Babel, & Erech, & Accad, & Chalneh, in terra Shinaaris: è terra hac processit in Assyriam, vbi ædificauit Niniven; (which is) For the beginning of his Kingdome was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Chalneh, in the land of Shinaar: and hee went forth of that land into Assyria, and built Ninive. So as Iunius takes Assur in this place, not for any person, but for the Region of Assyria: the land being so called in Moses time, & before it. For certainly, the other construction, (where the vvord Assur is taken for Assur the sonne of Sem) doth not answer the order which Moses obserues through all the Bookes of Genesis, but is quite contrary vnto it. For in the beginning of the tenth Chapter hee setteth downe the sonnes of Noah, in these vvords: Now these are the Generations of the Sonnes of Noah: Sem, Ham, and Iapheth, vnto whom sonnes were borne after the floud: then it followeth immediately: The sonnes of Iapheth were Gomer, &c. so as Iapheth is last named among Noahs sonnes, be hee eldest or youngest: because hee was first to be spoken of: with whom (hauing last named him) hee proceedes and sets downe his issue, and then the issue of his sonnes: first, the issue of Gomer, Iapheths eldest sonne; and then speakes of Iauan and his sonnes: for of the reſt of that Familie he is ſilent. Anon after he numbreth the ſonnes of Ham, of which Chuſh was the eldeſt: and then the ſons of Chuſh and Mizraim, and afterward of Canaan; leauing Shem for the laſt, becauſe he would not diſioyne the Storie of Hebrewes. But after he beginneth with Sem, he continueth from thence by Arphaxad, Shela, and Heber, vnto Abraham, and ſo to Iacob, and the Fathers of that Nation. But to haue brought in one of the ſonnes of Shem in the middle of the generations of Ham, had beene againſt order; neither would Moſes haue paſt ouer ſo ſlightly the erection of the Aſſyrian Empire, in one of the ſonnes of Shem, if he had had any ſuch meaning: it being the ſtorie of Shems ſonnes which he moſt attended. For he nameth Nimrod apart, after the reſt of the ſonnes of Chuſh, becauſe he founded the Babylonian and Aſſyrian Empire: and in the eleuenth Chapter he returneth to ſpeak of the building of Babel in particular, hauing formerly named it in the tenth Chapter, with the other Cities which Nimrod founded in Shinaar. And as he did in the tenth Chapter, ſo alſoin the eleuenth hee maketh no report of Shem, till ſuch time as he had finiſhed ſomuch of Nimrod as he meant to touch: and then he beginneth with the iſſue of Shem, which he continueth to Abraham and Iſrael. And of Iunius opinion touching Aſſur was Caluin to which I conceiue that P. Commeſtor, in hiſtoria Scholaſtica, gaue an entrance, who after hee had deliuered this place in ſome other ſenſe, he vſeth theſe words: Vel intelligendum non eſt de Aſſur filio Sem, &c. ſed Aſſur (id eſt, Regnum Aſſyrianum) inde egreſſum eſt, quod tempore Sarug proaui Abrahami factum eſt; (which is,) Or elſe it is not to bee vnderſtood of Aſſur the ſonne of Sem, &c. but Aſſur (that is, the Kingdome of the Aſſyrians) came from thence (videlicet from Babylon) or was made out of it, which happened in the time of Sarug the great grand-father of Abraham. After which he reconcileth the difference in this ſort: If you take the ancient Belus (meaning Nimrod) to be the firſt Erecter of the Aſſyrian Empire, or the firſt Founder thereof, it is true, Quantum ad initium, Reſpecting the beginning; but others conceiue that it had beginning from Ninus, which is alſo true, Quantum ad regni ampliationem; Regarding the enlargement of the Empire. To this I may adde the opinion of Epiphanius, confirmed by Cedrenus, who takes Aſſur to bee the ſonne of Nimrod: and ſo doth Methodius, and Viterbienſis, Saint Hierome, and Cyrillus, and now laſtly Torniellus; who ſaith he tooke vpon him that name of Aſſur after he had beaten the Aſſyrians, as Scipio did of Africanus, after his conqueſt in Africa: and that Aſſur was a common name to the Kings of Aſſyria, as it appeareth by many Scriptures, as Pſalme 81. Eſay 10. Oſe 5. &c. but to helpe the matter, hee makes Nimrod of the race of Shem, and the ſonne of Iran. But Rabanus Maurus, who was Arch-biſhop of Mentz in the yeere of Chriſt 854, an ancient and learned Writer, vnderſtands this place with Commeſtor, or Commeſtor with him, agreeing in ſubſtance with that tranſlation of Iunius: to which words of Moſes he giueth this ſenſe: De hac terra Aſſyriorum pullulauit imperium, qui ex nomine Nini, Bel filij, Ninum condiderunt, vrbem magnam, &c. Out of this land grew the Empire of the Aſſyrians, who built Ninus the great Citie, ſo named of Ninus the ſonne of Belus. On the contrarie Caluin obiecteth this place of Eſay: Behold the land of the Chaldeans, this was no people, Aſſur founded it by the inhabitants of the Wilderneſſe; than which there is no one place in the Scriptures, that hath a greater diuerſitie in the tranſlation and vnderſtanding, inſomuch as Michael de Palatio vpon Eſay (though in all elſe very diligent) paſſeth it ouer. But Caluin ſeemeth hereby to inferre, that becauſe Aſſur founded the ſtate of the Chaldeans, therfore alſo Aſſur rather than Nimrod eſtabliſhed the Aſſyrian Empire, and built Niueue: contrary to the former tranſlation of Iunius, and to his owne opinion. Now out of the Vulgar (called Hieromes tranſlation) it may be gathered that Aſſur both founded & ruined this Eſtate or Citie of the Chaldeans, by Eſay remembred: vnto which Citie, People, or State, he plainly telleth the Tyrians that they cannot truſt, or hope for reliefe thence. Or rather it may be taken, that the Prophet maketh this Citie of Chaldea, and that Eſtate, an example vnto thoſe Phœnicians, whom in this place he fore-telleth of their ruine: which Citie of Chaldea being of ſtrength, and carefully defended, was (notwithſtanding) by the Aſſyrians vtterly waſted and deſtroyed: whereby he giueth them knowledge, and foretelleth them, that their owne Citie of Tyre (inuincible, as themſelues thought) ſhould alſo ſoone after be ouer-turned by the ſame Aſſyrians: as (indeed) it was by Nabuchodonoſor. And theſe be the words after Hierome: Ecce terra Chaldæorum, talis populus non fuit, Aſſur fundauit eam, in captiuitatem transduxerunt robuſtos eius, ſuffoderunt domos eius, poſuerunt eam in ruinam, (which is)

Behold the Land of the Chaldeans, such a people there were not (or, this was no people, after the Geneua) Assur (or the Assyrians) founded it, they carried away their strong men captiue, they vndermined their houses, and ruined their Citie. The Septuagint expresse it but in a part of another Verse, in these words: Et in terrâ Chaldæorum, & hæc desolata est ab Assyrijs, quoniam muros eius euerunt, making the sense perfect by the preceding Verse, which all together may be thus vnderstood: If thou goe ouer to Chittim (which is Macedon or Greece) yet thou shalt not rest (speaking to the Tyrians) neither in the Land of the Chaldeans, for this is made desolate by the Assyrians, because their walls fell together to the ground. Pagninus and Vatablus conuert it thus: Ecce terra Chasdijm, hic populus non erat illic olim; nam Assur fundauit eam nauibus, erexerunt arces illius; contriuerunt ædes eius, posuit eam in ruinam: which may be thus Englished: Behold the Land of the Chaldeans, this people was not 10 once therein inhabiting: for Assur built it a harbour for ships, they erected the Towers thereof, and againe brake downe the houses thereof, and ruinated it. Iunius in the place of ships sets the word (pro Barbaris) that is, for the Barbarians: and the Geneua, by the Barbarians. But this is vndoubted that the Prophet Esay (as may be gathered by all the sense of the Chapter) did therein assure the Tyrians of their future destruction, which (accordingly) fell on them: wherein (for the more terrour) he maketh choice to note the calamities of those Places, Cities, and Regions, by whose Trade the state and greatnesse of the Tyrians was maintained, as by the Cilicians from Thar sis; from the Macedonians, and other Grecians vnder the name of Cittim; also by the Egyptians, the Chaldeans, and the rest. For Tyre was then the Mart Town of the World most renowned. And (as it appeares in our dis- 20 course of Paradise) not the least part of her chiefe merchandize came in by the Citie Vr or Vrchoa in Chaldea, where the body or chiefe streame of Euphrates (euen that streame which runneth through Babylon & Otris, which now falleth into Tygris) had his passage into the Persian Gulfe: though now it be stopped vp. For (as we haue heretofore noted) the Arabians (that descended from Sheba and Raamah) dwelling on the east bankes of the Persian Gulfe, trading with the Tyrians (as those of Eden, Charran, and Chalne did) transported their merchandize by the mouth of Tygris, that is, from Teredon, & of Euphrates, that is, from Vr or Vrchoa: and then by Babylon, and thence by Riuer and ouer Land they conueyed it into Syria, and so to Tyre: as they doe this day to Aleppo. So then Vr of the Chaldees was a Port Towne, and one of those Cities which had Intelligence, Trade, and 30 Exchange with the Tyrians: for it stood by the great Lakes of Chaldæa, through which that part of Euphrates ran, which passage is now stopt vp. Eius tursum vetustas abolenit (saith Niger.) And Plinie: Locus vbi Euphratis ostium fuit, flumen salsum; Time hath worne away the channell of Euphrates: the place where the mouth thereof was, is a Bay of salt water. These things being thus, certainly (not without good probabilitie) we may expound the Citie of the Chaldees, whose calamities Esay here noteth for terror of the Tyrians, to be the Citie anciently called Vr; and (by Hecataus) Camerina; by Ptolomie, Vrchoa: and by the Greekes, Chaldeopolis, The Citie of Chaldea: which the sonnes of Shem, vntill Abrahams time inhabited. And whereas in all the Translations it is said, that Assur both founded it and ruined it: it may be vnderstood, that Assur the Founder was the sonne of 40 Shem; and Assur the destroyers were the Assyrians, by whom those that inhabited Vr of Chaldæa, were at length oppressed and brought to ruine: which thing God foreseeing, commanded Abraham thence to Carran, and so into Canaan. And if the Hebrew word by Vatablus and Pagninus conuerted (by ships) doe beare that sense, the same may be the better approued; because it was a Port Towne: and the Riuer so farre vp as this Citie of Vr was in ancient time nauigable, as both by Plinie and Niger appeareth. And if the word (for the Barbarians) or (by the Barbarians) be also in the Hebrew Text, it is no lesse manifest, that the most barbarous Arabians of the Desart were and are the confronting, and next people of all other vnto it. For Chaldæa is now called Arachaldar, which signifieth desart Lands, because it ioyneth to that part of Arabia so called: and Cicero (calling those Arabians by the name of Itureans) addeth, that they are of all other people the most saluage; calling them, Homines omnium maxime barbaros.

So as this place of Esay, which breedeth some doubt in Caluin, proueth in nothing the contrarie opinion, nor in any part weakeneth the former translation of Iunius, nor the interpretation of Comester and Rabanus. For though other men haue not conceiued (for any thing that I haue read) that Assur is in this place diuersly taken (as for the sonne of Sem, when he is spoken of as a Builder of Vr; and when as a Destroyer thereof, then for the Assyrian Nation) yet certainely the euidence of the truth, and agreement of circumstances seeme to enforce it. And so this Founding of the Citie of the Chaldees by Assur (into which the most of the posteritie of Sem that came into Shinaar, and were separate for the Idolatrie of the Chusites and Nimrodians, retired themselues) hath nothing in it to proue that the same Assur built Nineue, or that the same Assur was all one with Ninus; except we will make Assur, who was the sonne of Shem, both an Idolater, and the sonne of Belus. For (out of doubt) Ninus was the first notorious Sacrificer to Idols; and the first that set vp a Statue or Image to be honoured as god. Now if Assur must be of that Race, and not of the Familie of Sem, as he must be if he founded Nineue, then all those which seeke to giue him the honor thereof, doe him by a thousand parts more iniurie, by taking from him his true Parent and Religion.

Besides, if th is supposed Assur whom they make the Founder of Nineue (and so the sonne of Belus) were any other, and not the same with Ninus, then what became of him? Certainely he was very vnworthy and obscure, & not like to be the Founder of such an Empire and such a Citie, if no man haue vouchsafed to leaue to posteritie his expulsion thence, and how he lost that Empire againe or quitted it to Ninus: whose acts and conquests are so largely written, and (according to my apprehension) farre differing from truth. It will therefore be found best agreeing to Scripture and to Reason, and best agreeing with the storie of that age written by prophane Authors, that Nimrod founded Babel, Erech, and Accad, and Chalne, the first workes and beginnings of his Empire, according to Moses; and that these workes being finished within the Valley of Shinaar, he looked farther abroad, and set in hand the worke of Ninus, lying neere vnto the same streame that Babel & Chalne did: which work his grand-childe Ninus afterward amplified and finished, as Semiramis (this Ninus his wife) did Babylon. Hence it came to passe, that as Semiramis was counted the Foundresse of the Citie which she onely finished: so also Ninus of Nineue: Quam quidem Babylonem potuit instaurare; She might repaire or renew Babylon, saith S. Augustine. For so did Nabuchodonosor vaunt himselfe to bee the Founder of Babylon also, because he built vp again some part of the wall, ouer-borne by the furie of the Riuer: which worke of his stood till Alexanders time, whereupon hee vaunted thus: Is not this great Babel which I haue built? Dan. 4. 27.

§. IIII.

Of the Acts of Nimrod and Belus, as farre as now they are knowne.

BVt to returne to the Storie, it is plaine in Moses, that Nimrod (whom Philo interpreteth transfugium; and Iulius Africanus surnamed Saturne) was the establisher of the Babylonian Monarchie, of whom there is no other thing written, than that his Empire in the beginning consisted of those 4. Cities before remembred; Babel, Erech Accad, and Chalne: and that from hence he propagated his Empire into Assyria, & in Assyria built foure more Cities (to wit) Nineue, Rehoboth, Celah, and Resen. And seeing that hee spent much time in building Babel it selfe and those adioyning, and that his trauailes were many ere he came into Shinaar: that worke of Babel (such as it was) with the other three Cities, and the large foundation of Nineue, and the other Cities of Assyria which he builded (considered with the want of materials, and with other impediments) were of greater difficultie than any thing performed by his Successors in many yeers after: to whose vndertakings time had giuen so great an increase of people, and the examples and patternes of his beginning so great an aduancement and encouragement: in whose time (saith Glycas) all these Nations were called Meropes, à sermonis linguarum terræ diuisione; By reason that the earth and the speech were then diuided.

Belus, or Bel, or Iupiter Belus, succeeded Nimrod, after he had reigned 114. yeeres; of whose acts and vndertakings there is little written. For it is thought that he spent much of his time in dis-burdening the low Lands of Babylon, and drying and making firme ground of all those great Fennes & ouer-flowne Marishes which adioyned vnto it. For any of his Warres or conquests there is no report, other than of his begun enterprise against Sabatius King of Armenia, and those parts of Scythia which Berosus calls Scythia Saga, whose sonne and successor Barzanes became subiect and Tributarie to Ninus, that followed the warre to effect, which was by his Father Belus begunne.

§. V.

§. V.

That we are not to maruaile how so many Kingdomes could be erected about these times: and of Vexoris of Egypt, and Tanais of Scythia.

THat so many Kingdomes were erected in all those Easterne parts of the World so soone after Nimrod, (as by the storie of Ninus is made manifest) the causes were threefold (namely) Opportunitie, Example, and Necessitie. For Opportunitie being a Princesse liberall and powerfull, bestoweth on her first Entertainers many times more benefits than either Fortune can, or Wisedom ought, by whose presence alone the vnderstanding mindes of men receiue all those helps and supplyes, which they either want or wish for: so as euery Leader of a troupe after the diuision of tongues and dispersion of People; finding these faire offers made vnto them, held the power which they possest, and gouerned by discretion all those people, whom they conducted to their distined places. For it cannot be conceiued, that when the Earth was first diuided, mankinde straggled abroad like beasts in a Desart; but that by agreement they disposed themselues, & vnder-tooke to inhabite all the known parts of the world, and by distinct Families and Nations: otherwise, those remote Regions from Babylon and Shinaar, which had Kings and were peopled in Ninus time, would not haue beene possest in many hundreds of yeeres after, as then they were; neither did those that were sent, and trauelled far off (order being the true parent of prosperous successe) vndertake so difficult enterprizes without a Conducter or Commander. Secondly, the Example of Nimrod with whom it succeeded well, strengthened euery humor that aspired. Thirdly, Necessitie resolued all men by the arguments of common miseries, that without a Commander and Magistrate, neither could those that were laborious, & of honest dispositions, enioy the haruest of their owne trauailes; nor those which were of little strength, secure themselues against forcible violence; nor those which sought after any proportion of greatnesse, either possesse the same in quier, or rule and order their owne Ministers and Attendants.

That these causes had wrought these effects, the vndertakings & Conquests of Ninus (the son of Belus) made it apparant: for hee found euery where Kings and Monarchies, what way soeuer his Ambition led him in the Warres.

But Nimrod (his Grand-father) had no companion King, to vs known, when he first tooke on him Soueraigntie and sole commandement of all those the children of Noah, which came from the East into Babylonia: though in his life time others also raised themselues to the same estate; of which hereafter. Belus (his sonne and Successor) found Sabatius King of Armenia and Scythia, sufficiently powerfull to resist his attempts: which Sabatius I take to be the same, which Iustine cals Tanais; and should coniecture, that Mizraim had beene his Vexoris, were it not that I vehemently suspect some error, (as Iustine placeth him) in the time of that Vexoris, who by many circumstances seemes to me, rightly accounted by the Iudicious and Learned Reinecccius, all one with the great Sesostris, that liued certaine Ages after Ninus. This Belus, the second King of Babylon, reigned 65. yeeres, according to the common account.

See more of this, l. 2. of this first Part. cap. 2. §. 6.

§. VI.

Of the name of Belus, and other names affine vnto it.

WHence this second King and Successour of Nimrod had the name of Bel, or Belus question hath beene made: for it seemeth rather a name imposed, or (of additi-on) giuen by Ninus, than assumed by Belus himselfe.

Cyrillus against Iulian cals the Father of Ninus Arbelus, affirming that he was the first of all men that caused himselfe to be called a god: which were it so, then might the name of Belus be thence deriued. But Bel, as many Learned Writers haue obserued, signifieth the Sunne in the Chaldean Tongue, and therefore did Ninus, and Semiramis giue that name to their Father, that he might be honoured as the Sun, which the Babylonians worshipped as a god. And as this Title was assumed in after-times by diuers others of the Chaldean Princes, and Babylonian Satrapæ: so was it vsed (in imitation) by the chiefe of the Carthaginians and other Nations, as some Historians haue conceiued.

To

To this Bel, or Belus, pertaine (as in affinitie) those names of Baal, Baalim, Belphegor, Beelphegor, Belzebub, and Beelzephon. Those that are learned in the Hebrew and Chaldean conuert the word Baal by the Latine, Primaps militiæ, Chiefe in the warre, though Daniel was so called (saith Suidas) Ob honorem explicationis arcanorum rerum; In honour of his expounding secrets. Saint Hierome makes Bel, Beel, and Baal, to haue the same signification: and saith, that the Idoll of Babylon was so called, which Ninus in memorie of his father set vp to be worshipped: to which that he might adde the more honour and reuerence, he made it a Sanctuarie and refuge for all offenders. Hence (saith Lyranus) came Idolatrie, and the first vse of Images into the World. Isidore doth interprete Bel by Vetus, old or ancient, adding, that as among the Assyrians it is taken for Saturne and the Sunne: so in the Punicke or Carthaginian Language it signifieth God. Glycas makes it an Assyrian name properly, and Iosephus a Tyrian. He also affirmeth that the Idoll which the Moabites worshipped (by them erected on the Mountaine Phegor, or Peor, and called Baal) is the same which the Latines call Priapus, the god of Gardens; which also was the opinion of S. Hierom. But that the word Bel, or Beel, was as much to say as God, appeareth by the word Beelzebub, the Idoll of Ascaron. For Bel, or Beel soundeth (God) and Sebub (Flies or Hornets:) by which name (notwithstanding) the Iewes expresse the Prince of Deuils. But the Prophet Ose teacheth vs the proper signification of this word from the voice of God himselfe, And at that day (saith the Lord) thou shalt call me Isii, and shalt call me no more Baalim: for I will take away the name of Baalim out of their mouthes. For although the name of Baal, or Babal, be iustly to be vsed towards God; yet in respect that the same was giuen to dols, God both hated it & forbad it. And the vsing of the word Bel among the Chaldeans for the Sunne, was not because it properly signifieth the Sun, but because the Sunne there was worshipped as a God: as also the Fire was, tanquam Salis particula. As for the words compounded (before remembred) as Belphegor, and Belzephon, Balzephon is expounded out of Facius, Dominus speculæ, vel custodiæ: The Lord of the Watch-Towre, or of the Guard: the other word noteth the Idoll, and the place wherein it was worshipped. It is also written Belpeor, or Baalpeor: and Peor (they say) is as much as Denudauit; and therefore the word ioyned expresseth a naked Image. Some there are that call this Belus the sonne of Saturne: for it was vsed among the Ancients to name the Father Saturne, the sonne Iupiter, and the Grand-childe Hercules. Saturni dicuntur familiarum Nobilium, Regumq; qui vrbes condiderunt sanctissimi, primogeniti eorum Ioues & Iunones; Hercules verò nepotes eorum fortissimi; The ancientest of Noble Families and Kings which founded Cities, are called Saturnes; their first borne Iupiters and Iunoes; their valiant Nephewes Hercules. But this Belus (saith Lilius Giraldus) was famous by reason of his warlike sonne Ninus, who caused his father to be worshipped as a God by the name of Iupiter Babylonius, whom the Egyptians (transported by the Dreames of their Antiquitie) make one of theirs. For Neptune (say they) vpon Libya the Daughter of Epaphus begat this Iupiter Belus, who was father to Ægyptus. They adde, that this Belus carrying a Colonie to the Riuer of Euphrates, there built a Citie, in which he ordained Priests after the Egyptian manner. But were there any Belus the sonne of Epaphus and Isis, or of Neptune and Libya, or (with Eusebius) of Telegonus, who after the death of Apis married Isis, (Cecrops then reigning in Athens) the same was not this Babylonian Belus of whom wee speake, but rather some other Belus, of whom the Egyptians so much vaunted.

§. VII.

Of the worshipping of Images begun from Belus in Babel.

AS for the Babylonian Belus, hee was the most ancient Belus, and the Inuentor of Astronomie, if Plinie say true: from whence the Egyptian might borrow both the name and the Doctrine. Some part of the Temple, in which his Statue or Image was honoured as a God, the same Author affirmeth that it did remaine in his time.

Of the Sepulchre of Belus, Strabo writeth thus. Ouer the Riuer (saith he) there are Gardens, where they say the ruines of Belus his Tombe, which Xerxes brake vp, are yet remaining. It was a square Pyramis made of Bricke, a furlong high, and on euery side it had a furlong in breadth. It appeares by Cyril against Iulian, that hee obtained diuine worship yet liuing;

liuing: for so he writes of him (calling him Arbelus.) Arbelus, vir superbus & arrogans, primus hominum dicitur à subditis Deitatis nomen accepisse: Perseuerarunt igitur Assyrij, & finitimæ illi gentes sacrificantes ei. (Arbelus, a man very proud and arrogant, is accounted to be the first of all men that was euer honoured by their subiects with title of Deitie, (or with the name of God.) The Assyrians therefore, and the bordering nations haue perseuered, sacrificing to him. Euen Arius also, whom Suidas cals Thuras, who succeeded next after Ninias, was made an Idoll-god among them, if we credit Suidas.

After Ninas (that is, after Ninyas) Thuras reigned (saith Suidas) whom they called after the name of the Planet Mars, a man of sharpe and fierce disposition, who bidding battaile to Cuachsus of the stocke of Iapheth, slue him. The Assyrians worshipped him for their God, and called him Baal (that is) Mars; thus farre Suidas. Neither is it vnlikely but that many among Idolatrous nations were Deified in their life-times, or soon after: though I denie not but that the most of their Images and Statua were first erected without diuine worship, onely in memorie of the glorious acts of Benefactors, as Glycas rightly conceiueth, and so afterward the Deuill crept into those woodden and brazen carcasses, when Posteritie had lost the memorie of their first inuention. Hereof Isidore speaketh in this manner: Quos autem Pagani Deos asserunt homines fuerunt, & pro vniuscuiusq; vitæ meritis vel magnificentia, coli apud suos post mortem cœperunt: sed (Dæmonibus persuadentibus) quos illis prosua memoria honor inuenerunt, minores Deos existimarunt: ad ista verò magis excolenda accesserunt Poetarum figmenta; They were men (saith he) whom the Pagans affirmed to be gods: and euery one for his merits or magnificence began after his death to be honoured of his owne. But at length (the Deuils persuading) they accounted them lesser gods, whose memories they honoured: and the Fictions of the Poets made the opinions (concerning the honour of the dead) much more superstitious.

And that the worshipping of Images was brought in by the Pagans, and Heathen Nations, it is not Isidore alone that witnesseth; but Gregorie Gentilium (saith he) inuentrix & caput est imaginum; Gentilissimus is the inuentresse and ground of Images: and Ambrose; Gentes lignum adorant, tanquam imaginem Dei; The Gentiles adore wood, as it were the Image of God. Eusebius also affirmeth as much, and calleth the worshipping of Images a custome borrowed of the Heathen. The like hath Saint Augustine against Adimantus. Et verentur (saith Lactantius) ne religio vana sit, si nihil videant quod adorent; They feare their Religion would be vaine, should they not see that which they worship.

And (out of doubt) the Schoolemen shift this fearefull custome very strangely. For seeing the very workemanship is forbidden, how can the heart of a wise Christian satisfie it selfe with the distinction of Dulia and Hyperdulia, which (vnimply) nothing but some difference of worshipping of those Images after they are made? And it is of all things the most strange, why religious and learned men should straine their wits to defend the vse of those things, which the Scriptures haue not onely no where warranted, but expresly in many places forbidden, and cursed the Practisers thereof. Yet this doctrine of the Deuill was so strongly & subtilly rooted, as neither the expresse Commandement of God himselfe, Thou shalt not make any grauen image, nor all the threatnings of Moses and the Prophets after him could remoue, weed not by feare, or by any perswasions leade the hearts of men from it. For where shall we find words of greater weight, or of plainer instruction than these? Take therefore good heede to your selues (for yee saw no Image in the day that the Lord spake vnto you in Horeb out of the midst of the fire) that yee corrupt not your selues, & make you a grauen Image or representation of any Figure, whether it be the likenesse of Male or Female.

And besides the expresse Commandement, Thou shalt make thee no grauen Image, and the prohibition in many Scriptures, so it is written in the Booke of Wisedome, That the inuention of Idols was the beginning of whoredome: and the finding of them the corruption of life: for they were not from the beginning, neyther shall they continue for euer.

And whereas the Schoolemen affirme, that the Prophets spake against the Worshipping of the Heathen Idols, it is manifest that Moses spake of Images of the liuing God, and not of Baal and the rest of that nature, For you saw no Image (saith Moses) the day that the Lord spake vnto you in Horeb. Surely it was excellently said of Basil. Noli aliquam in illo formam imaginari, ne circumscribas cogitatione tua: Doe not imagine any forme to be in God, lest thou limit or circumscribe him in thy minde too. Now, if the great Basil thought it a presumption vnlawful to represent a pattern of the infinite God to our own thoughts and mindes, how farre doe those men presume that put him vnder the greazie Pensill of a Painter, or the rustie Axe or other Instrument of a Carpenter or Caruer?

For as this dishonor to the infinite and incomprehensible God beganne in Babel: so did the Deuill transport and spred this inuention into all the Regions adioyning, and into Egypt and Greece.

The Romanes for a while resisted the erection of these Idols and Images, refusing to set them in their Temples for 170 yeeres, obseruing the Law of Numa, who thought it impietie to resemble things most beautifull, by things most base. But Tarquinius Priscus afterwards preuailing, and following the vanitie of the Grecians (a Nation of all others vnder the Sunne most deluded by Satan) set vp the Images of their gods; which (as S. Augustine witnesseth) that Learned Varro both bewailed, and vtterly condemned: and which Seneca thus derideth, Simulachra deorum venerantur, illis supplicant, genu posito illa adorant, & cum haec suspiciant, fabros qui illa fecere contemnunt; The Images of the gods are worshipped, those they pray vnto, with bended knees those they adore; and while they so greatly admire them, they contemne the Handi-craftsmen that made them: which also Sedulius the Poet in this sort scoffed at: Aug. de ciuit. l. 4 c. 31.

Heu miseri qui vana colunt, qui tunde sinistra
Religiosa sibi sculpunt simulachra, suumq;
Factorem fugiunt, & quae fecere verentur.
Quis furor est? quae tanta animos dementia ludit?
Vt volucrem, turpemq; bouem, torumq; Draconem,
Semi-hominemq; canem supplex homo promus adoret.

Ah wretched they that worship vanities,
And consecrate dumbe Idols in their heart,
Who their owne Maker (God on high) dispise,
And feare the worke of their owne hands and art:
What furie, what great madnesse doth beguile
Mens mindes, that man should vgly shapes adore,
Of Birds, or Buls, or Dragons, or the vile
Halfe-dogge-halfe-man on knees for aide implore.

And though this deuice was barbarous, and first, and many yeeres practised by Heathen Nations only, till the Iewes were corrupted in Egypt, yet it is not Seneca alone that laugheth to scorne the ignorant stupiditie of his Nation: but Iustin Martyr remembreth how the Sybils inueighed against Images: and Hospinian, how Sophocles taught, that it was pernicious to the soules of men to erect and adore those Babels. Strabo and Herodotus witnesse, that the Persians did not erect or set vp any Statue of their Gods. Aegesilaus neuer taught it the Lacedaemonian, but thought it impietie to represent immortall natures by mortall Figures. Eusebius also witnesseth in his sixt Booke de praeparatione Euangelica, that it was forbidden by a Law in Seres, or among the Brachmans in India, that Images should be worshipped. The same doe Tacitus and Crinitus report of the ancient Germans. Many other Authors might bee remembred that witnesse the disdaine which the Heathen themselues had of this childish Idolatrie: of which Hospinian hath written at large in his Tract de origine imaginum. And it was truely sayd, Omnia mala exempla bonis initijs orta sunt, All ill examples haue sprung from good beginnings. The Heathen at first made these Statues and Images, but in memorie of such remarkeable men, as had deserued best of their Countries & Common-wealths: Effigies hominum (saith Plinie) non solebant exprimi, nisi aliqua illustre causa perpetuitatem meruerunt; Men were not wont to make Pictures, but of men which merited for some notable cause to bee perpetually remembred. And though of the more ancient Papists some haue borrowed of the Gentiles (as appeares in Lactantius) that defence for Images: That Simulachra sunt pro elementis literarum, vt per ea discerent homines Deum inuisibilem cognoscere: Images (say they, and so before them the Heathen said) are in stead of Letters, whereby men might learne to know the inuisible God: in which vnderstanding perhaps they no otherwise esteemed them than pictures indeed; yet as that of Baal or Bel set vp in memory of Belus the Babylonian, became afterward the most reuerenced Idoll of the World, by which so many Nations (and they which were appropriate to God himselfe) were misled and cast away: so those very stocks & stones, and painted Canuases (called the pictures of Christ, our Ladie, and others) were by thousands of ignorant people, not onely adored, but esteemed to haue life, motion, and vnderstanding. On these sticks (saith the Booke of Wisedome) when we passe through the raging waues, on these sticks more rotten than the ship that carrieth vs.

This Heathen inuention of Images became so fruitfull in after-times, breeding an infinite multitude of gods, that they were forced to distinguish them into degrees and orders; as Dij consuntes, seu maiorum gentium, selecti, patrij, insigniores, dij medij: Counselling gods, or gods of the neighbrest Nobilitie, select gods, Patrian gods of marke, and common gods. (which the Romanes called Medioxumi) dij imi, and terrestriall Heroes, and multitudes of other gods: of which Saint Augustine hath made large mention in his Booke de Ciuitate Dei. But (saith Lactantius) among all those miserable soules and rotten bodies, worshipped by men more like to their Idols, did Epimenides Cretensis (by what good Angell moued I know not) erect in the Athenian Fields, Altars to the vnknowne God, which stood with the same title and dedication euen to the times of S. Paul: who made them first know to whom these Altars belonged, and opened their eyes which were capable of grace, that they might discerne the difference betwixt that light which lighteneth euery man, and the obscure and stinking mist wherein the Deuill had so manie yeeres led and mis-led them. And it sufficed not that the multitude of these gods was so great in generall, or that euery Nation had some one which tooke particular and singular care of them, as Iupiter in Creete, Isis in Egypt, in Athens Minerua, in Samos Iuno, in Paphos Venus, and so of all other parts; but euery Citie, and almost euery Family had a god a-part. For, as it is written in the second of Kings, the men of Babel, made Succoth Benoth, and the men of Cuth made Nergal, and the men of Hamath made Asbima, and the Anites made Nibhaz and Tartak; and the Sepharuaims burnt their children in the fire to Adramelech. All which how plainly hath the Prophet Esay derided? Men cut downe Trees, rinde them, burne a part of them, make readie their meate, and warme themselues by the fire thereof, and of the residue he maketh a god; an Idoll, and prayeth vnto it: but God hath shut their eyes from sight, and their heart from vnderstanding. It is therefore safest for a Christian to beleeue the Commandements of God so direct against Idolatrie, to beleeue the Prophets, and to beleeue S. Paul: who speaketh thus plainly and feelingly, My beloued, flye from Idolatrie, I speake as vnto them which haue vnderstanding, iudge ye what I say.

§. VIII.

Of the Warres of Ninus: and lastly of his Warre against Zoroaster.

VNto this Belus succeeded Ninus, the first that commanded the exercise of Idolatrie, the first that iniuriously inuaded his Neighbour Princes, and the first that without shame or feare committed adulterie in publique. But as of Belus there is no certaine memorie (as touching particulars:) so of this Ninus (whose Storie is gathered out of Prophane Authors) I find nothing so warrantable, but that the same may be disputed, and in the greatest part doubted. For although that piece of Berosus set out and commented vpon by Annius, hath many good things in it, and giueth great light (as Chytraus noteth) to the vnderstanding of Diodorus Siculus, Dion, Halicarnasseus, and others: yet Lodouicus Viues, Rhenanus, and others after them, haue layed open the imperfection and defects of the Fragment; prouing directly that it cannot be the same Berosus which liued in Alexanders time, cited by Athenæus and Iosephus: and whose Statue the Athenians erected, saith Pliny. Yet it is from him chiefely, that many haue gathered the succession of the Babylonian & Assyrian Princes, euen from Nimrod to the eighteenth King Asseradon, and to the times of Iosua. For of Megasthenes an Historian, of the Race of the Persian Priests, there are found but certaine Papers, or some few lines of the Caldean and Assyrian Monarchies, but he afterwards in the collection of the Persian Kings is not without his errours.

Ctesias of Cnidus (a Citie adioyning to Halicarnasseus) who liued together with Cyrus the younger, and with Artaxerxes Mnemon, gathered his Historie out of the Persian Records, & reacheth as farre vpwards as Ninus and Semiramis: and though in the Storie of Cyrus the younger, Xenophon approoueth him in some things, and Athenæus, Pausanias and Tertullian cite him, yet so base and apparant are his flatteries of the times and Princes ces with whom he liued;& ſo incredible are the numbers which he finds in the Armies of Ninus, and eſpecially of Semiramis; as whatſoeuer his reports were, times haue conſumed his workes, ſauing ſome very few excerptions lately publiſhed.

And therfore in things vncertaine, ſeeing a long diſcourſe cannot be pleaſing to men of iudgement, I wil paſſe ouer the acts of this third Aſſyrian, in as few words as I can expreſſe them. S. Auguſtine affirmes that Ninus maſtered all Aſia, India excepted. Others ſay that he wanne it all, ſaue India, Bactria, and Arabia. For he made Aricus of Arabia the companion of his Conqueſts, with whom he entred into a ſtraight leagne of amitie, becauſe he commanded many people, and was his kinſman, and a Chuſite, and the neereſt Prince confronting Babylonia. His firſt enterprize was vpon Syria, which he might eaſily ſubdue, both becauſe he inuaded it on the ſodaine, and becauſe it lay next him: and alſo becauſe the Arabians and their king Aricus (which bordered Syria) aſſiſted him in the Conqueſt thereof.

The king of Armenia, Barzanes, he forced to acknowledge him, and to aide him in his Warre againſt Zoroaſter: for from Armenia he bent himſelfe that way toward the Eaſt; but that euer he commanded the leſſer Aſia, I doe not beleeue, for none of his Succeſſors had any poſſeſſion therein.

His third Warre was againſt Pharnus, king of the Medes, whom it is ſayd that he ouerthrew, and cruelly murthered with his ſeuen Children, though others affirme, that they all died in one battaile againſt him. Whether he inuaded Zoroaſter before the building or amplifying of Nineue, or after, it is vncertaine. It is ſaid that he made two expeditions into Bactria: and that finding little or ill ſucceſſe in the firſt, he returned, and ſet the worke of Nineue forward: and then a ſecond time entred Bactria with 1700000. Foot, and 200000. Horſe, and 10000. ſixe hundred Chariots: being encountred by Zoroaſter with foure hundred thouſand. But Ninus preuayling, and Zoroaſter being ſlaine, he entred farther into the Countrie, and beſieged the chiefe Citie thereof, called Bactra or Bactrion (ſaith Stephanus:) which by a paſſage found, and an aſſault giuen by Semiramis (the wife of Menon) he entred and poſſeſt. Vpon this occaſion Ninus both admiring her iudgement and valour, together with her perſon and externall beautie, fancied her ſo ſtrongly, as (neglecting all Princely reſpects) he tooke her from her husband, whoſe eyes he threatned to thruſt out if he refuſed to conſent. He therefore yeelding to the paſſion of loue in Ninus, and to the paſſion of ſorrow in himſelfe, by the ſtrong perſwaſions of ſhame and diſhonour, caſt himſelfe head-long into the water, and died.

Of ZOROASTER, ſuppoſed to haue beene the chiefe Author of Magick Arts: and of the diuers kinds of Magicke.

§. I.

That Zoroaſter was not Cham, nor the firſt Inuenter of Aſtrologie, or of Magicke: and that there were diuers great Magicians of this name.

ZOroaſter King of the Bactrians, Vincentius ſuppoſeth to be Cham the ſonne of Noah: A fancie of little probabilitie. For Cham was the Paternall Anceſter of Ninus, the Father of Chus, the Grand-father of Nimrod, whoſe ſonne was Belus, the Father of Ninus. It may be that Vincentius had heard of that booke vvhich vvas called Scriptura Cham, deuiſed by ſome wicked Knaue, and ſo intituled: of which Sixtus Senenſis hath made the due mention.

It is reported by Caſſianus, that Serenus Abbas gaue the inuention of Magicke to Cham the ſonne of Noah: ſo did Comeſtor in his Scholaſticall Hiſtorie: which Art (ſaith he) vvith the 7. liberall Sciences he writ in 14. Pillers: ſeuen of which were made of braſſe, to reſiſt the defacing by the waters of the Floud; and 7. of bricke againſt the iniurie of fire. There was alſo another deuiſed diſcourſe, which went vnder the title of Prophetia Cham. Cassianus out of Serenus hath somwhat like to this of Comestor. These be Cassianus words: Cham (filius Noah )qui superstitionibus istis & sacrilegis fuit artibus infectus, sciens, nullum se posse super his memoriales librum in Arcam prorsus inferre, in qua erat cum patre iusto, &c. Cham (the sonne of Noah*)who was infected with these superstitions, and sacrilegious Arts, knowing, that he could not bring any booke or memoriall of that natures into the Arke, wherein he was to remaine with his godly Father, caused the Precepts and Rules thereof to be grauen in metall and hard stone.*

S. Augustine noteth that Zoroaster was said to haue laught at his birth, when all other children weepe; which presaged the great knowledge which afterward he attayned vnto: being taken for the Inuenter of naturall Magicke and other Arts; for the Corrupter, saith Plinie and Iustine. But I doe not thinke that Zoroaster inuented the doctrine of the Horoscopes or Natiuities: or first found out the nature of herbs, stones, and mineralls, or their Sympatheticall or Antipatheticall workings; of which, I know not what King of Chaldea is also made the Inuenter. I rather thinke that these knowledges were far more ancient, and left by Noah to his sons. For Abraham who had not any acquaintance with Zoroaster, (as Iosephus reporteth) was no lesse learned heerein than any other in that age, if he exceeded not all men then liuing: differing from the wisedome of after-times in this, that he knew and acknowledged the true cause, and giuer of life and vertue to Nature and all Naturall things; whereas others (forgetting Gods infinite, dispersed, and vniuersall power) admired the instruments, and did attribute proper strength to the things themselues, (from which the effects were sensible) which belonged to that wisedome, which being one, and remaining in it selfe, can doe all things, and reneweth all. Wisd. c. 7.

Now whether this Zoroaster (ouer-throwne by Ninus) were the same which was so excellent a Naturalist, it is doubted. For Zoroaster the Magician, Ctesias calls Oxyartes, whom Plinie finds of a later time. And if Zoroaster were taken away by a Spirit (being in the middest of his Disciples) as some Authors report, then Zoroaster, slaine by Ninus, was not the Magician: which is also the opinion of Scaliger. Scalig. in Euseb. Iosephi lib. 1. Antiq. c. 4.

Againe, Iosephus and Cedrenus affirme, that Seth first found out the Planets, or wandring Starres, and other Motions of the Heauens: for if this Art had beene inuented by Zoroaster, he could not haue attained to any such excellencie therein, in his owne lifetime; but being a man (as it seemeth) of singlar iudgement, he might adde somewhat to this kind of knowledge, and leaue it by writing to posteritie.

But of this Zoroaster there is much dispute: and no lesse iangling about the word & art of Magick. Arnobius remembreth foure, to whom the name of Zoroaster, or Zoroastres was giuen: which by Hermodorus & Dinon seemeth to be but a cognomen, or name of art, and was as much to say, as astrorum cultor. The first, Arnobius calleth the Bactrian, which may be the same that Ninus ouerthrew: the second, a Chaldaan, and the Astronomer of Ninus: the third was Zoroaster Pamphylius, who liued in the time of Cyrus and his familiar: the fourth, Zoroaster Armenius, the Nephew of Hostianes, which followed Xerxes into Greece: between whom and Cyrus there past threescore & eighteene yeares. Suidas remembreth a fift, called Persomedus sapiens: and Plato speaketh of Zoroaster the son of Oromasides; vvhich Picus Mirandula confirmeth.

Now of what Nation the first and chiefe Zoroaster was, it is doubted. Plinie and Laertius make him a Persian. Gemisthius or Pletho, Ficinus and Steuchius, make him a Chaldaan. But by those bookes of one Zoroaster, found by Picus Mirandula, it appeareth plainely, that the Author of them was a Chaldaan by Nation, though the word (Chaldaan) was as often giuen to the learned Priests peculiarly, as for any distinguishment of Nations. Porphyrius makes the Chaldæi and Magi diuers; Picus the same. But that this Zoroaster was a Chaldaan both by Nation and Profession, it appeareth by his Bookes, which (saith Picus) were written in the Chaldaan tongue, and the Comment in the same language. Now that the Magi & they were not differing, it may be iudged by the name of those bookes of Zoroaster, which in an Epistle of Mirandula to Ficinus, he saith, to be intituled, Patris Ezre Zoroastris, & Melchior magorum oracula.

§. II.

§. II.

Of the name of Magia: and that it was anciently farre diuers from Coniuring and Witchcraft.

NOw for Magick it ſelfe; which Art (ſaith Mirandula) pauci intelligunt, multi reprehendunt; Few vnderſtand, and many reprehend; Et ſicut Canes ignotos ſemper allatrant; As Dogs barke at thoſe they know not: ſo they condemne and hate the things they vnderſtand not: I thinke it not amiſſe (leauing Ninus for a while) to ſpeake ſomewhat thereof. Pic. Mir. ſo. 81.

It is true that many men abhorre the very name and word (Magos) becauſe of Simon Magus, who being indeed, not Magus, but Goes, (that is) familiar with euill ſpirits, vſurped that title. For Magicke, Coniuring, and Witchery, are far differing Arts, whereof Plinie being ignorant ſcoffeth therat. For Nero (ſaith Plinie) who had the moſt excellent Magicians of the Eaſt ſent him by Tyridates King of Armenia, who held that Kingdom by his grace, found the art after long ſtudy and labour altogether ridiculous. Plin. l. 30. hiſt. Nat.

Magus is a Perſian word primitiuely, whereby is expreſt ſuch a one as is altogether conuerſant in things diuine. And (as Plato affirmeth) the Art of Magicke is the Art of worſhipping God. To which effect Apollonius in his Epiſtles expounding the Word (μαγος) ſaith, that the Perſians called their gods μάγους: whence he addeth that Magus is either ὁ κατα φύσιν θεὸς or θεραπεύτης θεῶν (that is) that Magus is a name ſomtime of him that is a God by nature, ſometimes of him that is in the ſeruice of God: in which latter ſenſe it is taken, Math. 2. v. 1. And this is the firſt and higheſt kind: which Piccolominie calleth diuine Magicke: and theſe did the Latines newly intitle Sapientes or Wiſemen: For, the feare & worſhip of God is the beginning of knowledge. Theſe Wiſemen the Greeks cal Philoſophers: the Indians, Brachmans: which name they ſomewhat neerely retaine to this day, calling their Prieſts Bramines; among the Egyptians they were termed Prieſts; with the Hebrewes they were called Cabaliſts, Prophets, Scribes, and Phariſees: amongſt the Babylonians they were differenced by the name of Chaldæans: & among the Perſians Magicians: of whom Arnobius (ſpeaking of Hoſtanes, one of the ancient Magicians) vſeth theſe words: Et verum Deum merita maieſtate proſequitur, & Angelos miniſtros Dei, ſed veri, eius venerationi nouit aſsiſtere. Idem dæmonas prodit terrenos, vagos, humanitatis inimicos; Soſthenes (for ſo M. Fælix calleth him, not Hoſtanes) aſcribeth the due maieſtie to the true God, and acknowledgeth that his Angels are miniſters and meſſengers which attend the worſhip of the true God. He alſo hath deliuered that there are Deuils earthly and wandering, and enemies to mankinde. Piccol. de Deſin. Prouerb. 1. 7. Iohn Hug. Linſchot. In octauio Minuty Fœlcis cum Arnobio. p. 360.

His Maieſtie alſo in his firſt Booke of Dæmonologie c. 3. acknowledgeth, that in the Perſian tongue the word (Magus) imports as much as a contemplator of diuine and heauenlie ſciences; but vniuſtly ſo called, becauſe the Chaldæans were ignorant of the true diuinitie. And it is alſo right which His Maieſtie auoweth, that vnder the name of Magicke all other vnlawfull Arts are comprehended, & yet doth His Maieſtie diſtinguiſh it from Necromancie, Witchcraft, and the reſt: of all which he hath written largely and moſt learnedly. For the Magicke which His Magieſtie condemneth, is of that kinde whereof the Diuell is a partie. Daniel in his ſecond chapter nameth foure kindes of thoſe Wiſe men: Arioli, Magi, Malefici, and Chaldæi. Arioli the old Latine tranſlation calleth Sophiſtas: Vatablus and Pagninus, Genethliacos, or Phyſicos, or Philoſophers, or (according to the note of Vatablus) Naturaliſts: Nempè ſunt Magi apud Barbaros, quod Philoſophi apud Græcos (ſcilicet) diuinarum humanarumq; rerum ſcientiam profitentes; For the Magi are the ſame with the Barbarians, as the Philoſophers are with the Græcians (that is) men that profeſſe the knowledge of things both diuine and humane. The Greeke & the Engliſh call them Inchanters; Iunius, Magicians; Caſtalion, Coniecturers: in the Syrian they are all foure by one name called Sapientes Babylonis; The Wiſe men of Babel. Demonolog. l. 2. cap. 1.

The ſecond ſort Vatablus, Pagnin, Iunius, and our Engliſh, call Aſtrologers; Hierome and the Septuagint, Magicians.

The third kind are Malefici, or Venefici: in Hierom, Pagnin, and the Septuagint, Witches or Poyſoners: in Iunius, Præſtigiatores or Sorcerers, as in Engliſh.

That Witches are alſo rightly ſo called Venefici, or Poyſoners; and that indeed there is a kinde of Malefici, which without any Art of Magicke or Necromancie vſe the helpe of the Deuill to doe mischief, His Maiestie confirmeth in the first Chapter of his second Booke: speaking also in the fifth Chapter of their practice, to mixe the powder of dead bodies with other things by the Deuill prepared; and at other times to make pictures of Waxe, or Clay, or otherwise (as it were Sacramentaliter) to effect those things, which the Deuill by other meanes bringeth to passe.

The fourth, all Translators call Chaldeans: who tooke vpon them to foretell all things to come, as well naturall as humane, & their euents: and this they vaunted to performe by the influences of the Starres by them obserued, and vnderstood.

Such were, and to this day partly (if not altogether) are the corruptions, which haue made odious the very name of Magicke, hauing chiefly sought (as is the manner of all impostures) to counterfeit the highest and most noblest part of it, yet so as they haue also crept into the inferior degrees.

A second kind of Magicke was that part of Astrologie, which had respect to sowing and planting, & all kinds of agriculture and husbandrie: which was a knowledge of the motions and influences of the Starres into those lower Elements.

Philo Iudaeus goeth farther, affirming, that by this part of Magicke or Astrologie, together with the motions of the Starres and other heauenly bodies, Abraham found out the knowledge of the true God, while he liued in Chaldaea: Qui contemplatione creaturarum cognouit Creatorem, (saith Io. Damascen) Who knew the Creator by the contemplation of the creature. Ioseph reporteth of Abraham, that hee instructed the Egyptians in Arithmeticke and Astronomie, who before Abrahams comming vnto them knew none of these sciences.

De vit sanct. Glyc. Annal. fol. 180.

And so doth Archangelus de Burgo, in defence of Mirandula against Garsias: Alexander & Eupolemon dicunt, quod Abraham sanctitate & sapientia omnium praestantissimus Chaldaeos primùm, deinde Phœnices, demum Ægyptios sacerdotes Astrologiam & diuina docuerit; Alexander (saith he, meaning Alexander Polyhistor) and Eupolemon affirme, that Abraham the holyest and wisest of men, did first teach the Chaldeans, then the Phœnicians; lastly, the Egyptian Priests, Astrologie and diuine knowledge.

See vpon his Comment. in Aug de Ciuit. Dei. lib. 6. c. 2.

The third kind of Magicke contayneth the whole Philosophie of nature; not the brabblings of the Aristotelians, but that which bringeth to light the inmost vertues, and draweth them out of Natures hidden bosome to humane vse, Virtutes in centro centri latentes; Vertues hidden in the center of the center, according to the Chymists. Of this sort were Albertus, Arnoldus de villa noua, Raymond, Bacon, and many others: and before these in elder times, and who better vnderstood the power of Nature, & how to apply things that worke to things that suffer, were Zoroaster before spoken of: Apollonius Tyaneus remembred by S. Hierome to Paulinus; in some mens opinion Numa Pompilius among the Romans: among the Indians, Thespian: among the Egyptians, Hermes: among the Babylonians, Budda: the Thracians had Zamolxis: the Hyperboreans (as is supposed) Abbaris: and the Italians, Petrus Aponensis. The Magick which these men profest, is thus defined: Magia est connexio à viro sapiente agentium per naturam cum patientibus, sibi congruenter respondentibus, vt inde opera prodeant non sine eorum admiratione qui causam ignorant: Magicke is the connexion of naturall agents and patients, answerable each to other, wrought by a wise man to the bringing forth of such effects, as are wonderfull to those that know not their causes.

In all these three kindes, which other men diuide into foure, it seemeth that Zoroaster was exceedingly learned: especially in the first and highest. For in his Oracles he confesseth God to be the creator of the Vniuersall: he beleeueth of the * Trinity, which he could not inuestigate by any naturall knowledge: he speaketh of Angels, and of Paradise: approueth the immortalitie of the soule: teacheth Truth, Faith, Hope, and Loue, discoursing of the Abstinence and Charitie of the Magi: Which Oracles of his, Psellus, Ficinus, Patritius, and others haue gathered and translated.

Of this Zoroaster, Eusebius in the Theologie of the Phanicians, vsing Zoroasters owne words: Hæc ad verbum scribit (saith Eusebius) Deus primus incorruptibilium, sempiternus, ingenitus, expers partium, sibiipsi simillimus, bonorum omnium auriga, munera non expectans, optimus, prudentissimus, pater iuris, sine doctrina iustitiam perdoctus, natura perfectus, sapiens, sacræ naturæ vnicus inuentor &c. Thus writeth Zoroaster word for word. God the first incorruptible, euerlasting, vnbegotten, without parts, most like himselfe, the guide of all good, expecting no reward, the best, the wisest, the father of right, hauing learned iustice without teaching, perfect wise by nature, the only inuenter thereof.

Lib. 2. fol. 26. Sixtus Senensis speaking of the wisedome of the Chaldeans, doth distinguish those wise men men into fiue orders, (to wit) Chaſcedim, or Chaldeans: Aſaphim, or Magicians: Chartumim; (which he tranſlates Ariolie, or Sophiſts) Mechaſphim, or Maleſici, or Venefici, Witches, or Poyſoners; and Gazarim Augures, or Aruſpices, or Diuiners.

Chaſcedim were thoſe which had the name of Chaldeans, which were Aſtronomers: Hij cœlorum motus diligentiſsimè ſpectarunt; Theſe did moſt diligently contemplate the motions of the heauens: whom Philo in the life of Abraham deſcribeth.

Aſaphim were in the old Latine tranſlation called Philoſophers: of the Septuagint and of Hierome, Magicians: Qui de omnium tam diuinarum quàm humanarum rerum cauſis Philoſophati ſunt; who diſcourſed of the cauſes of all things, as well diuine as humane: of whom Origen makes Balaam (the ſon of Beor) to be the firſt: but Laertius aſcribeth the inuention of this art to Zoroaſtres the Perſian. Laert. l. 1.

Chartumim, or Inchanters, the Diſciples (ſaith Saint Auguſtine, Plinie, and Iuſtine) of another Zoroaſtres: who corrupted the admirable wiſedome of the Magi, which he receiued from his Anceſters.

Mecaſphim, or Venefici, or Witches, are thoſe which we haue ſpoken already out of His Maieſties booke of Demonologia.

Gazarim, or Aruſpices (after Saint Hierome) which diuine from the entrailes of beaſts ſlaine for ſacrifices: or by Gazarim others vnderſtand Augures, who diuine by the flying, finging, or feeding of birds.

By this diſtinction we may perceiue the difference betweene thoſe wiſe men which the kings of Babylon entertained; and that the name and profeſſion of the Magi among the ancient Perſians was moſt honeſt. For as Peucer truely obſerueth, Praerant religioni Perſica, vt in populo Dei Leuitæ, ſtudijſq; vera Philoſophiæ dediti erant: nec quiſquam Rex Perſarum poterat eſſe, qui non antea Magorum diſciplinam ſcientiamq; percepiſſet; The Magi (ſaith he) were the chiefe Miniſters of the Perſian Religion, as the Leuites among Gods people, and they were giuen to the ſtudies of true Philoſophie: neither could any be King of the Perſians, who had not firſt beene exerciſed in the myſteries and knowledge of the Magi. Peucer. de Diuinat. in c. de mag. fol. 135. 136. Sixtus Senenſis in the defence of Origen againſt Polychronius and Theophilus, hath two kinds of Magicke, his owne words are theſe: Et ne quem moueant præmiſſa Polychronij & Theophili teſtimonia, ſciendum eſt duplicem eſſe Magiam; alteram vbiq; ab Origine damnatam, quæ per fœdera cum dæmonibus inita aut verè aut apparenter operatur; alteram ab Origine laudatam, quæ ad practicen naturalis philoſophiæ pertinet, docens admirabiles res operari ex applicatione mutua naturalium virtutum ad inuicem agentium ac patientium; That the teſtimonies of Theophilus and Polychronius (ſaith he) may not moue any man, it is to be vnderſtood that Magicke is of two ſorts, the one euery where condemned by Origen; which worketh (whether truely or ſeemingly) by couenants made with Deuills; the other commended by Origen; which appertaineth to the practicke part of naturall Philoſophie, teaching to worke admirable things by the mutuall application of naturall vertues, agent and ſuffering reciprocally. Bibl. l. 6. fol. 424.

This partition Hierome doth embrace in the firſt of his Commentaries vpon Daniel: where conſidering of the difference which Daniel makes betweene theſe foure kinds of wiſe Men formerly remembred, he vſeth this diſtinction: Quos nos hariolos, cæteri γοητας (id eſt) incantatores interpretati ſunt, videntur mihi eſſe qui verbis rem peragunt; Magi, qui de ſingulis philoſophantur; maleſici, qui ſanguine vtuntur & victimis, & ſæpe contingunt cadauera mortuorum: porro in Chaldæis Genethliacos ſignificari puto, quos vulgo Mathematicos vocant. Conſuetudo autem communis Magos pro maleficis accipit, qui aliter habentur apud gentem ſuam, eo quòd ſint Philoſophi Chaldæorum: & ad artis huius ſcientiam Reges quoq; & Principes eiuſdem gentis omnia faciunt; vnde & in natiuitate Domini Saluatoris ipſi primùm ortum eius intellexerunt, & venientes ſanctam Bethlehem adorauerunt puerum, ſtella deſuper oſtendente; They whom we call Sorcerers, and others interpret Inchanters, ſeeme to mee ſuch as performe things by words; Magicians, ſuch as handle euery thing philoſophically; Witches, that vſe bloud and ſacrifices, and often lay hands on the body of the dead: further, among the Chaldeans I take them to be ſignified by the name of Coniecturers vpon natiuities, whom the vulgar call Mathematicians. But common cuſtome takes Magicians for Witches, who are otherwiſe reputed in their own Nation: for they are the Philoſophers of the Chaldeans: yea Kings and Princes of that Nation doe all that they doe according to the knowledge of this Art: whence at the natiuitie of the Lord our Saviour they firſt of all vnderſtood his birth, and comming vnto holy Bethlehem did worſhip the Childe: the Starre from aboue ſhewing him vnto them. By this therefore it appeareth that there is great great difference betweene the doctrine of a Magician, and the abuse of the word. For though some Writers affirme, that Magus hodie dicitur, qui ex fœdere facto vtitur diaboli opera ad rem quamcunq; That he is called a Magician now-adaies, who hauing entred league with the Diuell, vseth his helpe to any matter: yet (as our Sauiour said of Diuorce) it was not so from the beginning. For the Art of Magicke is of the wisedome of Nature; other Arts which vndergoe that title, were inuented by the falshood, subtlety, & enuy of the Deuill. In the latter there is no other doctrine, than the vse of certaine ceremonies, Per malâ fidem; By an euill faith: in the former no other ill, than the inuestigation of those vertues and hidden properties which God hath giuen to his creatures, and how fitly to apply things that worke, to things that suffer. And though by the Iewes those excellent Magicians, Philosphers, & Diuines, which came to worship our Sauiour Christ, were termed Mechaschephim, or Mecasphim; yet had they no other reason than common custome therein. Consuetudo autem communis Magos pro maleficis accipit; Common custome (saith S. Hierome) vnderstandeth Witches vnder the name of Magicians: And antiquitie (saith Peter Martyr) by the word (Magi) vnderstood good and wise men. Quid igitur expauescis Magi nomen formidolose, nomen Euangelio gratiosum, quod non maleficum & venificum, sed sapientem sonat & Sacerdotem? O thou fearefull one (saith Ficinus) why doubtest thou to vse the name of Magus, a name gracious in the Gospell, which doth not signifie a Witch or Coniurer, but a wise man and a Priest? For what brought this slander to that study and profession, but onely idle ignorance: the parent of causelesse admiration? Causa fuit mirificentia quorundam operum, quæ (re vera) opera naturalia sunt: veruntamen quia procuratione dæmonum, naturas ipsas vel coniungentium, vel commiscentium, vel aliter ad operandum expedientium facta sunt, opera dæmonum credebantur ab ignorantibus hæc. De operibus huiusmodi est Magia naturalis, quam Necromantiam multi improprie vocant: The maruellousnesse of some workes, which (indeed) are naturall, hath beene the cause of this slander: but because these workes haue beene done by procurement of Diuels, ioyning the natures together or mingling them, or howsoeuer fitting the natures to their working, they were thought the workes of the Diuels by the ignorant. Among these workes is naturall Magicke, which men call very improperly Necromancie.

Hieron. in Daniel. Pet. Mar. Loc. Mar. Ficin. parprim. fol. 573. Gul. Parisien. de Lege, cap. 14.

Mirandula in his Apologie goeth further: For by vnderstanding (saith he) the vttermost actiuitie of naturall agents we are assisted to know the Diuinitie of Christ: for otherwise (to vse his owne words) ignorat is terminis potentiæ & virtutis rerum naturalium stat nos dubitare illa eadem opera, quæ fecit Christus, posse fieri per media naturalia; The termes or limits of naturall power and vertue not vnderstood, wee must needs doubt whether those very workes which Christ did, may not be done by naturall meanes: after which he goeth on in this sort: Ideo non hæretice, non superstitiosè dixi, sed verissimè & Catholicè per talem Magiam adiuuari nos in cognoscenda diuinitate Christi: Therefore I sayd not heretically, not superstitiously, but most truely and Catholikely, that by such Magicke wee are furthered in knowing the Diuinitie of Christ. And seeing the Iewes and others the enemies of Christian Religion, doe impudently and impiously obiect, that those Miracles which Christ wrought were not aboue Nature, but by the exquisit knowledge thereof performed: Mirandula a man for his yeares fuller of knowledge than any that this latter Age hath brought forth, might with good reason auow, that the vttermost of Natures workes being knowne, the workes which Christ did, and which (as himselfe witnesseth) no man could doe, doe manifestly testifie of themselues, that they were performed by that hand which held Nature herein but as a Pencill, and by a power infinitely supreme & diuine; and therby those that were faithlesse, were either conuerted or put to silence.

§. III.

That the good knowledge in the ancient Magicke is not to be condemned: though the Deuill here, as in other kindes hath sought to abtrude euill things, vnder the name and colour of good things.

SEeing therfore it is confessed by all of vnderstanding, that a Magician (according to the Persian word) is no other than, Diuinorum cultor & interpres: A studious obseruer & expounder of diuine things: and the Art of it selfe (I meane the Art of naturall Magicke) no other, Quam naturalis Philosophiæ absoluta consummatio; Then the absolute perfection of naturall Philosophie: Certainly then it proceeds from ignorance, and no way ſorteth with wiſe & learned men, promiſcue & without difference and diſtinction, to confound lawfull & praiſe-worthy knowledge with that impious, and (to vſe S. Pauls words) with thoſe beggerly rudiments, which the Diuell hath ſhuffled in, & by them bewitcheth and befooleth graceleſſe men. For if we condemne naturall Magicke, or the wiſedome of Nature, becauſe the Diuell (who knoweth more than any man) doth alſo teach Witches and Poyſoners the harmefull parts of Herbes, Drugges, Mineralls, & Excrements: then may we by the ſame rule condemne the Phyſician, and the Art of healing. For the Diuell alſo in the Oracles of Amphiaraus, Amphilochus, Trophonius, and the like, taught men in Dreames what Herbes and Drugges were proper for ſuch and ſuch diſeaſes. Now no man of iudgement is ignorant, that the Diuel from the beginning hath ſought to thruſt himſelfe into the ſame Imployment among the Miniſters and Seruants of God, changing himſelfe for that purpoſe into an Angell of Light. He hath led men to Idolatry as a Doctrine of Religion; he hath thruſt in his Prophets among thoſe of the true God; he hath corrupted the Art of Aſtrologie, by giuing a diuine power to the Starres, teaching men to eſteeme them as gods, and not as inſtruments. And (as Bunting obſerueth) it is true, that iudiciall Aſtrologie is corrupted with many ſuperſtitions: but the abuſe of the thing takes not away the Art; conſidering that heauenly bodies (as euen generall experience ſheweth) haue and exerciſe their operation vpon the inferiour. For the Sunne, and the Starre of Mars doe drie; the Moone doth moiſten, and gouerne the Tides of the Sea. Againe, the Planets, as they haue ſeuerall and proper names, ſo haue they ſeuerall and proper vertues: the Starres doe alſo differ in beautie & in magnitude; and to all the Starres hath God giuen alſo their proper names, which (had they not influences and vertues different) needed not: He counteth the number of the Starrs, and calleth them by their names. But into the good and profitable knowledge of the celeſtiall influences, the Diuell ceaſeth not to ſhuffle in his Superſtitions: and ſo to the knowledge of the ſecret vertues af Nature hath he faſtened his doctrine of Characters, Numbers, & Incantations; and taught men to beleeue in the ſtrength of Words and Letters: (which without Faith in God are but Inke or common breath) thereby either to equall his own with the Al-powerfull Word of God, or to diminiſh the glory of Gods creating Word, by whom are all things.

Moreouer, he was neuer ignorant, that both the wiſe & the ſimple obſerue when the Sea-birds forſake the ſhores and flye into the Land, that commonly ſome great ſtorme followeth; that the high flying of the Kite and the Swallow betoken faire weather; that the crying of Crowes and bating of Ducks foreſhew raine: for they feele the Ayre moiſtened in their Quils. And it is written in Hieremie the Prophet, Euen the Storke in the ayre knoweth her appointed times, and the Turtle, and the Crane, & the Swallow. Hereupon, this enemie of Mankinde, working vpon theſe as vpon the reſt of Gods creatures, long time abuſed the Heathen by teaching them to obſerue the flying of Fowles, and therby to iudge of good or ill ſucceſſe in the War: & (withall) to look into their entrailes for the ſame, as if God had written the ſecrets of vnſearchable prouidence in the liuers and bowels of birds and beaſts. Againe, becauſe it pleaſed God ſomtimes by Dreames, not onely to warne and teach his Prophets and Apoſtles, but Heathen Princes alſo; as: Abimelech to reſtore Sara to Abraham; becauſe he admoniſhed Ioſeph, and by Dreame informed Iacob, Laban, Pharao, Salomon, Paul, Ananias, the Magi of the Eaſt, and others. For as it is remembred in Iob: In Dreames and Viſions of the night when ſleepe falleth vpon men, &c. then God openeth the eares, that he might cauſe man to returne from his enterprize: therefore, I ſay, doth the Diuell alſo practiſe his Diuinations by Dreames, or (after Pariſienſis) diuinitatis imitationes, his mocke-diuinitie. This in the end grew ſo common, as Ariſtides compiled an Ephemerides of his owne Dreames: Mithridates of thoſe of his Concubines. Yea the Romanes finding the inconuenience hereof, becauſe all dreams (without diſtinction of caſes) were drawn to Diuination, forbad the ſame by a Law, as by the words of prohibition (aut narrandis ſomnijs occultam aliquam artem diuinandi) it may appeare. Likewiſe by the Law of God in Deuteronomie, cap. 13. ſeducing Dreamers were ordered to be ſlaine. Yet it is to be contemned, not that Marcus Antonius was told a remedy in his Dreame for two grieuous diſeaſes that oppreſt him; nor that of Alexander Macedon for the cure of Ptolomies poiſoned wound; nor that which Saint Auguſtine reporteth of a Millanoiſe, whoſe ſon (the Father dead) being demanded a debt already paid, was told by his Father in a dreame where the Acquittance lay to diſcharge it: nor that of Astyages of his Daughter, and many others of like nature. Of the reason of all vvhich, forasmuch as the cause is not in our selues, this place denieth dispute.

§. IIII.

That Daniels misliking Nabuchodonosors condemning of the Magicians, doth not iustifie all their practices.

BVt it may be obiected, that if such Diuinations as the Heathens commonly vsed were to be condemned in them, who tooke on them very many & strange Reuelations; how came it to passe that Daniel both condemned the hastie sentence of Nabuchodonosor against the Magicians of Chaldea, and in a sort forbad it? especially considering that such kind of people God himself commanded to be slaine. To this, diuers answers many be giuen. First, it seemeth that Daniel had respect to those Chaldeans, because they acknowledged that the Dreame of the king, which himself had forgotten, could not be knowne to any man by any Art either Naturall or Diabolicall: For there is none other (said the Chaldeans) that can declare it before the king, except the Gods, whose dwelling is not with flesh: and herein they confessed the power of the Euer-liuing God. Deut.13. & 18. Leuit.20.

Secondly, it may be coniectured (and that vvith good reason) that among so many learned men, some of them did not exercise themselues in any euill or vnlawfull Arts, but were meerely Magicians and Naturalists: & therefore when the king commanded to kill all, Daniel perswaded the contrary, & called it a hasty iudgement, which proceeded with furie without examination. And that some of those mens studies and professions vvere lawfull, it may be gathered by Daniels instruction: for himself had bin taught by them, and was called chiefe of the Inchanters: of which some were termed Soothsayers, others Astrologians, others Chaldeans, others Magi or Wise-men: and therefore of distinct professions.

Thirdly, Daniel misliked and forbad the execution of that iudgement, because it was vniust. For howsoeuer those men might deserue punishment for the practice of vnlawfull Arts (though not vnlawfull according to the Law of that State) yet herein they were altogether guiltlesse. For it exceeded humane power to pierce the Kings thought, which the Diuell himselfe could not know. So then in Daniels dislike, and hindering of the execution of sentence of death pronounced against the Magicians, there is no absolute iustifying of their practice and profession.

§. V.

The abuse of things which may be found in all kinds, is not to condemne the right vse of them.

NOtwithstanding this mixture euery where, of good with euil, of falshood with truth, of corruption with cleannesse and purity: The good, The truth, The puritie in euery kind may well be embraced: As in the ancient worshipping of God by Sacrifice, there was no man knowing God among the Elders, that therefore forbare to offer Sacrifice to the God of all power, because the Diuell in the Image of Baal Astaroth, Chemoth, Iupiter, Apollo, and the like was so odored.

Neither did the abuse of Astrologie terrifie Abraham (if we may beleeue the most ancient and religious Historians) from obseruing the motions and natures of heauenly bodies; neither can it dehort wise and learned men in these dayes from attributing those vertues, influences, and inclinations to the Starres and other lights of Heauen, which God hath giuen to those his glorious creatures. Euseb. ex Artapan. & Polybi.

The Sympatheticall and Antipatheticall working of Herbes, Plants, Stones, Minerals with their other vtmost vertues, sometimes taught by the Diuel, and applyed by his Ministers to harmefull and vncharitable ends, can neuer terrifie the honest & learned Physician or Magician from the vsing of them to the helpe & comfort of Mankind; neither can the illusions, whereby the Diuell betrayeth such men as are fallen from God, make other men reiect the obseruations of Dreames; so farre as vvith a good Faith and a Religious caution they may make vse of them.

Lastly, the prohibition to marke flying of Fowles (as signes of good or euill successe) hath no reference at all to the crying of Crowes against Raine, or to any obseruation not superstitious, and whereof a reason or cause may be giuen. For if we confound Arts Deut.18.10.

with the abuſe of them, we ſhall not only condemne all honeſt Trades and enterchange among men (for there are that deceiue in all profeſſions) but we ſhall in a ſhort time bury in forgetfulneſſe all excellent knowledge and all learning, or obſcure & couer it ouer with a moſt ſcornefull and beggarly ignorance: and (as Plinie teacheth) we ſhould ſhew our ſelues ingratos erga eos, qui labore curâq; lucem nobis aperuerunt in hac luce: Vnthankefull we ſhould ſhew our ſelues towards thoſe, who with paines and care haue diſcouered vnto vs light in this light.

Indeed not only theſe naturall knowledges are condemned by thoſe that are ignorant; but the Mathematicks alſo and Profeſſers thereof: though thoſe that are excellently learned iudge of it in this ſort: In ſpeculo Mathematico verum illud, quod in omni ſcibili quæritur, elucet; non modò remota ſimilitudine, ſed fulgida quadam propinquitate; In the Glaſſe of the Mathematickes that Truth doth ſhine, which is ſought in euery kinde of Knowledge; not in an obſcuring image, but in a neere and manifeſt repreſentation. Cuſan. comp. Theolog. c. 1.

§. VI.

Of the diuers kindes of vnlawfull Magicke.

IT is true that there are many Arts, if we may ſo call them, which are couered with the name of Magicke: and eſteemed abuſiuely to bee as branches of that Tree, on whoſe root they neuer grew. The firſt of theſe hath the name of Necromancy or Goetia: and of this again there are diuers kindes. The one is an Inuocation at the graues of the dead, to whom the Diuell himſelfe giues anſwer in ſtead of thoſe that ſeeme to appeare. For certaine it is, that the immortall ſoules of men doe not inhabit the duſt and dead bodies, but they giue motion and vnderſtanding to the liuing: death being nothing elſe but a ſeparation of the body and ſoule: and therfore the ſoule is not to bee found in the Graues.

A ſecond practice of thoſe men, who pay Tribute or are in league with Satan, is that of coniuring or of rayſing vp Diuels, of whom they hope to learne what they liſt. Theſe men are ſo diſtract, as they beleeue that by terrible words they make the Diuell to tremble; that being once impaled in a Circle (a Circle which cannot keep out a Mouſe) they therein (as they ſuppoſe) inſconce themſelues againſt that great Monſter. Doubtleſſe, they forget that the Diuell is not terrified from doing ill and all that is contrary to God and goodneſſe, no, not by the fearefull word of the Almighty: and that hee feared not to offer to ſit in Gods ſeate, that he made no ſcruple to tempt our Sauiour Chriſt, whom himſelfe called the Sonne of God. So, forgetting theſe proud parts of his, an vnworthy wretch will yet reſolue himſelf, that he can draw the Diuell out of Hell, and terrifie him with a Phraſe: wheras in very truth, the obedience which the Diuels ſeeme to vſe, is but thereby to poſſeſſe themſelues of the bodies and ſoules of thoſe which raiſe them vp; as His Maieſtie in his Booke aforenamed hath excellently taught: That the Diuels obedience is only, ſecundum quid, ſcilicet ex pacto; reſpectiue, that is, vpon bargaine.

I cannot tell what they can doe vpon thoſe ſimple and ignorant Diuels, which inhabite Iamblicus imagination; but ſure I am the reſt are apt enough to come vncalled: and alwaies attending the cogitations of their ſeruants and vaſſals, do no way need any ſuch inforcement.

Sunt in mundo genus quoddam poteſtatum vulde diuiſum, indiſcretum & inconſideratũ; & quod neque verum à falſo neque poſsibile diſcernit ab impoſsibili. L. Viues in cap. 11. lib. 10. Aug. de Ciuit. Dei: lib. 10. Cuſa. exerc. l. 2.

Or it may be that theſe Coniurers deale altogether with Cardans mortall Diuels, following the opinion of Rabbi Auornathan and of Porphirius, who taught that theſe kinde of Diuels liued not aboue a thouſand yeares: which Plutarch in his Treatiſe de Oraculorum defectu confirmeth, making example of the great god Pan. For were it true that the Diuels were in awe of wicked men, or could be compelled by them, then would they alwaies feare thoſe words and threats, by which at other times they are willingly maſtered. But the Familiar of Simon Magus when hee had lifted him vp in the Ayre, caſt him headlong out of his clawes, when he was ſure he ſhould periſh with the fall. If this perhaps were done by S. Peters Prayers (of which S. Peter no where vaunteth) yet the ſame prancke at other times vpon his owne accord the Diuell played with Theodotus: who tranſported (as Simon Magus was ſuppoſed to haue been) had the ſame mortall fall that he had. The like ſucceſſe had Budas, a principall pillar of the Manichæan Hereſie, as Socrates in his Eccleſiaſticall Hiſtory witneſſeth: & for a manifeſt proofe hereof we ſee it

euery day, that the Diuell leaues all Witches and Sorcerers at the Gallowes, for whom at other times he maketh himselfe a Pegasus, to conueigh them in haste to places far distant, or at least makes them so thinke: For to those that receiued not the truth (saith Saint 2 Thess. 2. Paul) God shall send them strong illusions. Of these their supposed transportations (yet agreeing with their confessions) His Maiestie in the second Booke & the fourth Chapter of the Demonologie, hath confirmed by vnanswerable reasons, that they are meerely illusiue. Another sort there are who take on them to include Spirits in Glasses & Crystals; of whom Cusanus: Fatui sunt incantatores, qui in vngue & vitro volunt spiritum includere: quia Spiritus non claudi tur corpore: They are foolish Inchanters, which will shut vp their spirits within their nailes or in Glasse: for a Spirit cannot be inclosed by a body. Exercitat. 1. 2.

There is also another Art besides the afore-mentioned, which they call Theurgia, or White Magick; a pretended conference with good Spirits or Angels, whom by Sacrifice and Inuocation they draw out of Heauen, and communicate withall. But the administring Spirits of God, as they require not any kind of adoration due vnto their Creator; so seeing they are most free Spirits, there is no man so absurd to think (except the diuell haue corrupted his vnderstanding) that they can be constrained or commanded out of Heauen by threats. Wherefore let the professours thereof couer themselues how they please by a professed puritie of life, by the ministerie of Infants, by fasting & abstinence in generall; yet all those that tamper with immateriall substances and abstract natures, either by Sacrifice, Vow, or Inforcement, are men of euill faith, and in the power of Satan. For good Spirits or Angels cannot be constrained; and the rest are Diuels, which willingly obey.

Other sorts there are of wicked Diuinations: as by fire, called Pyromantia: by water, called Hydromantia: by the ayre, called Mataeotechnia, and the like.

The last, and (indeed) the worst of all other is Fascination or Witchcraft: the Practisers whereof are no lesse enuious and cruell, reuengefull & bloudy, than the Diuell himself. And these accursed creatures hauing sold their soules to the Diuell, worke two wayes; either by the Diuell immediately, or by the art of poysoning. The difference betweene Necromancers and witches, His Maiestie hath excellently taught in a word: that the one (in a sort) command; the other obey the Diuell.

There is another kind of pettie Witchery (if it be not altogether deceit) which they call charming of Beasts and Birds, of which Pythagoras was accused, because an Eagle lighted on his shoulder in the Olympian fields. But if the same exceeded the Art of Falconrie, yet was it no more to be admired then Mahomets Doue, vvhich he had vsed to feed with Wheate out of his eare: which Doue, when it was hungrie, lighted on Mahomets shoudler, and thrust his Bill therein to finde his breake-fast: Mahomet perswading the rude and simple Arabians, that it was the Holy Ghost that gaue him aduice. And certainly if Banks had liued in elder times, he would haue shamed all the Inchanters of the World: for whosoeuer was most famous among them, could neuer master or instruct any beast as he did his Horse. AElian. l. 6. nat. histor:

For the drawing of Serpents out of their Dens, or killing of them in the holes by Inchantments (which the Marsians a people of Italie practised: Colubros disrumpit Marsia cantu: inchanting Marsia makes the snakes to burst.) That it hath beene vsed it appeares, Psalme 58. 6. though I doubt not, but that may Impostures may be in this kinde; and euen by naturall causes it may be done. For there are many Fumes that will either draw them out or destroy them; as womens haire burnt, and the like. So many things may be layed in the entrance of their holes that will allure them: and therein I find no other Magicke or Inchantments than to draw out a Mouse with a piece of tosted Cheese. Lucil. in Satyr.

§. VII.

Of diuers wayes by which the Diuell seemeth to worke his wonders.

BVt to the end that we may not dote with the Manichees, who make two powers of gods: that we doe not giue to the Diuell any other dominion than he hath (not to speake of his abilitie, when he is the Minister of Gods vengeance; as when Egypt, according to Dauid, was destroyed by euill Angels) he otherwise worketh but three wayes. The first is by mouing the cogitations and affections of men: The second second by the exquisite knowledge of Nature: and the third by deceit, illusion, and false semblance. And that they cannot vvorke what they would, G. Parisiensis giueth three causes: the first, a naturall impotency: the second, their owne reason dissvading them from daring ouermuch, or indeed (and that which is the only certaine cause) the great mercy of the Creator, Tenens eos ligatas (saith the same Author) velut immanissimas belluas. S. Augustine vvas of opinion that the Frogges which Pharaohs Sorcerers produced were not naturall, but that the Diuell (by betraying of their senses that looked on) made them appeare to be such. For as Vairus obserueth, those Frogges of the Inchanters vvere not found corrupted as those of Moses vvere, vvhich might argue that they were not creatures indeed. Hereof saith Saint Augustine: Nec sanè Demones naturas creant, sed quæ à Deo creatæ sunt commutant, vt videantur esse quod non sunt: The Diuels create not any natures, but so change those that are created by God, as they seeme to be that which they be not: of which in the 83. question he giueth the reason. Damon quibusdam nebulis implet omnes meatus intelligentiæ, per quos aperire lumen rationis radius mentis solet, (that is) The Diuell fils with certaine clouds all passages of the vnderstanding, by which the beame of the minde is wont to open the light of reason. Sinal. parif. de. vniuers. p. 2. c. 70.

And as Tertullian in his Booke de anima rightly conceiueth, if the Diuell can possesse himselfe of the eyes of our mindes, and blinde them, it is not hard for him to dazell those of the body. For (out of doubt) by the same way that God passeth out, the Diuell entreth in, beginning with the fantasie, by which he doth more easily betray the other faculties of the soule: for the fantasie is most apt to be abused by vaine apprehensions. Maxima vis est phantasiæ ad errorem.

Aquinas on the contrary held that those Frogges were not imaginarie, but such indeed as they seemed: not made Magicæ artis ludibrio, which indeed agreeth not with the Art, but (according to Thomas) Per aptam & idoneam agentium & patientium applicationem: By an apt and fit applying of agents and patients. And this I take to be more probable. For Moses could not be deceiued by that sleight of false semblance; and Saint Augustine in another case like vnto this (to wit) of the turning of Diomedes his companions into Birds, per actiua cum passiuis, inclineth rather to this opinion: though I am not perswaded that Saint Augustine beleeued that of Diomedes. And this opinion of Thomas, G. Parisiensis a man very learned also confirmeth. For speaking of natural Magick he vseth these words De leg. c. 24. fol. 7. De huiusmodi autem operibus est subita generatio ranarum, & pediculorum, & vermium, aliorumq; animalium quorundam: in quibus omnibus sola natura operatur, verum adhibitis adiutoribus, quæ ipsa semina naturæ confortant & accumulant, ita vt opus generationis tantum accelerent, vt eis qui hoc nesciunt non opus naturæ videatur (quæ tardius talia efficere consueuit) sed potentia Dæmonum, &c. to which he addeth: Qui autem in hijs docti sunt, talia non mirantur, sed solum Creatorem in hijs glorificant: In such workes (saith he) the sodaine generation of Frogges and Lice, and Wormes, and some other creatures is: in all which Nature alone worketh, but by meanes strengthening the Seeds of Nature, and quickning them, in such wise that they so hasten the worke of generation, that it seemeth to the ignorant not to be the worke of Nature, which vsually worketh more leisurely, but they think it is done by the powers of Diuels. But they who are learned in these Arts, maruaile not at such working, but glorifie the Creator. Now by these two wayes the Diuels doe most frequently worke, (to wit) by knowing the vttermost of nature, and by illusion: for their is no incomprehensible or vnsearchable power, but of God onely.

For shall we say, he causeth sometimes thunders, lightnings, and tempests, and can infect the ayre, as well as moue it or compresse it, who knowes not that these things are also naturall? Or may it be obiected that he fore-telleth things before they happen, which exceedeth nature, and is no illusion. It is true, that he sometimes doth it; but howe In elder ages he stole his knowledge out of the predictions of the Prophets: & he foretold the death of Saul, at such time as he vvas in his own possession & power to dispose of. And he that hath liued from the infancie of the vvorld to this day, and obserued the successe of euery counsaile: he that by reason of his swift motions can informe himselfe of all places, and preparations; he that is of counsaile with all those that studie & practise subuersion and destruction: he that is Prince of the ayre, and can thence better iudge, than those that inhabite the earth: if he should not sometimes, yea if he should not very oftentimes guesse rightly of things to come (where God pleaseth not to giue impediment) it were very strange. For we see that wise and learned men doe Esbe. 2. 2. & 6. 12. Diabolus magnum habet rerum vsum: quæ res multum habet momenti in quouis negotio, Aug. de Anima c. 26. 27. &c.

oftentimes by comparing like cauſes conceiue rightly of like effects, before they happen: and yet where the Diuell doubteth and would willingly keepe his credit, he euermore anſwereth by Riddles: as

Crœſus Halym penetrans magnam ſubuertit opum vim;

If Crœſus ouer Halys goe,
Great Kingdomes he ſhall ouerthrow.

Which anſwer may be taken either vvay: either for the ouerthrow of his own Kingdome, or of his Enemies. And thus far we grant the Diuell may proceed in predictions, vvhich (otherwiſe) belong to God onely; as it is in Eſay: Shew the things that are to come hereafter, that we may know that ye are Gods; ſhew vs at all times and certainly what is to come. Solius enim diuinæ intelligentiæ ac ſapientiæ eſt, occulta noſſe & reuelare; It is only proper to Gods vnderſtanding and wiſedome, to know and reueale hidden things.

Gui. Pariſienſis de legib. c. 24.

§. VIII.

That none was euer raiſed from the dead by the power of the Diuell: and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul.

TO conclude, it may be obiected that the Diuell hath raiſed from the dead: and that others by his power haue done the like, as in the example giuen of Samuel raiſed by the Witch of Endor: which were it true, then might it indeed be affirmed, that ſome of the Diuels acts exceeded all the powers of nature, falſe ſemblance, & other illuſions. Iuſtine Martyr was ſometime of the opinion, that it was Samuel indeede; and ſo vvas Ambroſe, Lyra, and Burgenſis; from vvhich authorities thoſe men borrow ſtrength vvhich ſo beleeue. But Martyr changed his opinion; & ſo did S. Auguſtine, who at firſt ſeemed to be indifferent: For in his queſtions vpon the Old and New Teſtament, he accounteth it deteſtable to thinke that it was Samuel which appeared: & theſe be his vvords elſewhere to the ſame effect: In requie ſunt animæ piorum à corpore ſeparatæ, impiorũ autem pœnas luunt, donec iſtarum ad vitam æternam, illarum verò ad æternam mortem quæ ſecunda dicitur corpora reuiuiſcant; The ſoules of the godly ſeparated from their bodies are at reſt, but thoſe of the wicked ſuffer puniſhment, till the bodies of the iuſt riſe to eternall life, and of the wicked to an eternall and ſecond death.

And (beſides S. Auguſtine) Iuſtine Martyr, Helarius, Tertullian, Athanaſius, Chryſoſtome, and others, beleeued firmely, and taught it: that the ſoules of men being once ſeparate from their bodies, did not wander on the earth at all: Credere debemus (ſaith Cyril) quum à corporibus ſanctorum animæ abierint, tanquam in manus chariſsimi patris Bonitati diuinæ commendari; We muſt beleeue when the ſoules of holy men are departed from their bodies, that they be commended to the diuine Goodneſſe, as into the hands of a moſt deare Father. If then they be in Heauen, the power of the Diuell cannot ſtretch ſo high: if in Hell, Ab inferno nulla eſt redemptio; From hell there is no redemption. For there are but two habitations after death: Vnum (ſaith Auguſtine) in igne æterno; alterum in regno æterno; The one in eternall fire; the other in Gods eternall Kingdome. And though it be written in Iure Pontificio, that many there are who beleeue that the dead haue againe appeared to the liuing; yet the Gloſſe vpon the ſame Text findes it ridiculous: Credunt & malè quia ſunt Phantaſmata (ſaith the Gloſſe) They beleeue, and they beleeue amiſſe, becauſe they be but Phantaſmes, or Apparitions. For whereas any ſuch voice hath beene heard, ſaying, I am the Soule of ſuch a one: Hæc oratio à fraude atq; deceptione diabolica eſt; That ſpeech is framed by the fraud and deception of the Diuell, ſaith Chryſoſtome. Likewiſe of the ſame, ſaith Tertullian: Abſit vt animam cuiuſlibet ſancti, nedum Prophetæ, à demonio credamus extractam; God forbid that we ſhould think that the ſoule of any holy man, much leſſe of a Prophet, ſhould be drawn vp againe by a Diuell.

It is true that the Scriptures call that apparition Samuel; ſo doe they the wooden images Cherubins: and falſe brazen gods are gods, and the like. And whereas theſe of the contrary opinion build vpon that place of the 26. of Eccleſiaſticus (a booke not numbred among the Canonicall Scriptures, as S. Auguſtine himſelfe in his Treatiſe, if it be his, De cura pro mortuis agenda, confeſſeth) yet Siracides following the literall ſenſe and phraſe of the Scriptures, proueth nothing at all: For though the Diuell would willingly perſwade ſwade, that the ſoules (yea euen of iuſt men) were in his power; yet ſo farre is it from the promiſes of the Scriptures, and from Gods iuſt and mercifull nature, and ſo contrary to all diuine reaſon, as Saint Auguſtine (or whoſoeuer wrote that booke before cited) might rightly terme it a deteſtable opinion ſo to thinke. For if God had ſo abſolutely forſaken Saul, that hee refuſed to anſwer him either by Dreames, by Vrim, or by his Prophets: it were ſottiſh to conceiue, that he would permit the Diuell, or a wicked Witch, to raiſe a Prophet from the dead in Sauls reſpect: it being alſo contrary to his own diuine Law to aske counſaile of the dead; as in Deuteronomie 18. and elſewhere. Therefore it vvas the Diuell, and not the ſoule of a dead body, that gaue anſwer and aduice. 1. Kin. 17. 22. 2. Kings 4. 34. Nullus enim magus aut dæmon mortuum verè vnquam excitauit. Wier. de faſcin.

But becauſe Helias and Helizeus had raiſed ſome from the dead by the power of God, thoſe Diuels which S. Auguſtine calleth ludificatores animantium ſibi ſubiectorum; Mockers of their owne vaſſals, caſting before their eies a ſemblance of humane bodies, and framing ſounds to their eares like the voyces of men, do alſo perſwade their graceleſſe and accurſed attendants, that themſelues both poſſeſſe, and haue power ouer the ſoules of men. Eludit Diabolus aciem tum ſpectantium, tum etiam cogitantium, ſaith L. Viues; The Deuill beguileth the ſenſe both of the beholders, and of thoſe that ſo imagine. Theſe then are the bounds of the Diuels power, whom if we will not feare, we muſt feare to ſinne. For when hee is not the inſtrument of Gods vengeance, he can touch no man that makes not himſelf his voluntary vaſſall: Poteſt ad malum inuitare, non poteſt trahere, ſaith S. Auguſtine, he can allure, but he cannot inforce to euill. Such as thinke otherwiſe, may goe into the number remembred by Lucretius:

Nam veluti pueri trepidant, atq; omnia cæcis
In tenebris metuunt: ſic nos in luce timemus.

We feare by light, as children in the darke.

CHAP. XII.

Of the memorable buildings of Ninus, and of his Wife Semiramis, and of other of her Acts.

§. I.

Of the magnificent building of Nineue by Ninus: and of Babylon by Semiramis.

BVt to come backe to Ninus the amplifier and finiſher of Nineue: whether hee performed it before or after the ouerthrow of Zoroaſtes, it is vncertaine. As for the City it ſelfe, it is agreed by all prophane Writers, and confirmed by the Scriptures, that it exceeded all other in circuit, and anſwerable magnificence. For it had in compaſſe 440. ſtadia, or furlongs; the vvals whereof vvere an hundred foot vpright, and had ſuch a breadth as three Charriots might paſſe on the Rampire in front: theſe vvals were garniſhed with 1500. Towres vvhich gaue exceeding beauty to the reſt, and ſtrength, no leſſe admirable for the nature of thoſe times. Iuſtin. l. 1. Diod. l. 2. Sabel. Ean. 1.

But this City (built in the Plaines of Aſſyria, and on the banks of Tygris, and in the Region of Eden) was founded long before Ninus time, and (as ancient Hiſtorians report, & more lately Nauclerus) had the name of Campſor, at ſuch time as Ninus amplified the ſame, and gaue it a wall, and called it after his owne name.

For theſe workes of Babylon and Nineue begun by Nimrod in Chaldea, and in Aſſyria, Ninus and Semiramis made perfect. Ninus finiſhed Nineue, Semiramis Babylon: vvherein ſhe ſought to exceede her husband by farre. Indeed in the firſt Age when Princes were moderate, they neither thought how to inuade others, nor feared to be inuaded: labouring to build Towns and Villages for the vſe of themſelues and their people, without either Wals or Towres; and how they might diſcharge the earth of Woods, Bryars, Buſhments, and Waters, to make it more habitable and fertile. But Semiramis liuing Herod. l. 1. Iuſtin. l. 1. Diod. l. 2. & 3.

in that Age, when Ambition was in strong youth: and purposing to follow the conqueſt vvhich her husband had vnder-taken, gaue that beauty and ſtrength to Babylon which it had.

§. II.

Of the end of Ninus: and beginning of Semiramis reigne.

THis ſhee did after the death of her husband Ninus: vvho after hee had maſtered Bactria, and ſubiected vnto his Empire all thoſe Regions betweene it and the Mediterran Sea and Helleſpont (Aſia the leſſe excepted) and finiſhed the vvorke of Nineue, he left the World in the yeare thereof 2019. after he had reigned 52. yeares. Plutarch reporteth that Semiramis deſired her husband Ninus, that he vvould grant vnto her the abſolute ſoueraigne power for one day. Diod. Siculus out of Athenæus, and others, ſpeakes of fiue dayes. In which time (moued either with deſire of rule, or licentious liberty, or with the memory of her husband Menon, who periſhed for her) ſhee cauſed Ninus her husband to be ſlaine. But this ſeemeth rather a ſcandall caſt on her by the Greeks, than that it had any truth.

Howſoeuer Ninus came to his end, Semiramis took on her after his death the ſole rule of the Aſſyrian Empire: of which, Ninus was ſaid to bee the firſt Monarch, becauſe hee changed his ſeat from Babylonia in Chaldæa, to Nineue in Aſſyria. Iuſtin reports, that Semiramis (the better to inueſt her ſelfe, and in her beginning without murmure or offence to take on her ſo great a charge) preſented her ſelfe to the people in the perſon of her ſon Ninias or Zameis, who bare her externall forme and proportion without any ſenſible difference.

This report I take alſo to be fained, for which many arguments might be made. But as ſhe ruled long, ſo ſhe performed all thoſe memorable acts which are written of her by the name of Semiramis, and ſubſcribed that letter which ſhe ſent to the King of India (her laſt challenge and vndertaken conqueſt) by her owne name. And were it true that her ſonne Ninias had ſuch a ſtature at his Fathers death, as that Semiramis (vvho vvas very perſonable) could be taken for him; yet it is very vnlikely that ſhe could haue held the Empire from him 42. yeares after by any ſuch ſubtilty: (for ſo long ſhee reigned after the death of her husband:) but it may be true that Ninias or Zameis (being wholly giuen to his pleaſures, as it is written of him) was well pleaſed with his Mothers proſperous gouernment and vnder-takings.

§. III.

Of Semiramis parentage and education, and Metamorphoſis of her Mother.

SOme Writers (of which Plutarch is one) make this famous woman to haue beene of baſe parentage, calling her after the name of her Country, a Syrian. Beroſus cals her after the name of her City wherein ſhee was borne, Semiramis Aſcalonitis; of Aſcalon, the ancient City and Metropolis of the Philiſtims. Others report her to be the daughter of Derceta, a Curtizan of Aſcalon, exceeding beautifull. Others ſay that this Derceta or Dercetis, the Mother of Semiramis, was ſometimes a Recluſe, and had profeſt a holy and a religious life; to whom there was a Temple dedicated, ſeated on the banke of a Lake adioyning to Aſcalon; and afterward falling in loue with a goodly yong man, ſhe was by him made with childe, which (for feare of extreame puniſhment) ſhee conueyed away, and cauſed the ſame to be hidden among the high reedes which grew on the bankes of the Lake: in vvhich (while the childe was left to the mercy of vvilde beaſts) the ſame was fed by certaine birds, which vſed to feed vpon or neere thoſe waters. But I take this tale to be like that of Lupa the Harlot that foſtered Romulus. For ſome one or other adioyning to this Lake, had the charge and foſteridge of this childe, who being perchance but ſome baſe and obſcure creature, the mother might thereby hope the better to couer her diſhonor and breach of vow; notwithſtanding vvhich ſhe was caſt from the top of her Temple into the Lake adioyning, & (as the Poets haue fained) changed by Venus into a Fiſh, all but her face, which ſtil held the ſame beauty & humane ſhape. It is thought that from this Derceta the inuention of that Idoll of the Philiſtims (called Dagon) was taken: for it is true, that Dagon had a mans face, and a fiſhes body:

into whose Temple when the Arke of God was brought, the Idoll fell twice to the ground: and at the second fall there remained onely the Trunke of Dagon, the head being broken off: For so S. Hierome hath conuerted that place Iudic. 16. 30. Samson, writeth by Dagon only, which signifieth a fish, and so onely appeared the head thereof by the second fall being sundred from the body.

For my selfe I rather think, that this Dagon of the Philistines was an Idoll representing Triton, one of those imaginary Sea-gods vnder Neptune. For the City being maritimate (as all those of the Philistines were, and so were the best of Phœnicia) yeelded all their deuotions to Neptune and the rest of the petty gods which attended him.

§. IV.

Of her Expedition into India, and death after discomfiture: with a note of the improbability of her vtter.

BVt for her Pedigree, I leaue it to the Assyrian Historie: and for her vicious life I ascribe the report thereof to the enuious and lying Greeke. For delicacy and ease doe more often accompany licentiousnesse in women, than labour and hazzard doe. And if the one half be true which is reported of this Lady, then there neuer liued any Prince or Princesse more worthy of fame than she: both for the workes she did at Babylon and elsewhere, and for the warres she made with glorious successe: all but her last enterprise vpon India, from whence both Strabo and Arianus report that she neuer returned: and that of all her most powerfull Army there suruiued but onely twenty persons: the rest being either drowned in the Riuer of Indus, dead of the famine, or slaine by the sword of Staurobates. But as the multitude which vvent out are more than reason hath numbred: so were those that returned lesse than could haue escaped of such an Army, as consisted of foure millions and vpwards. For these numbers which she leuied by her Lieutenant Dercetæus (saith Suidas) did consist of Foot-men three millions; of Horse-men one million; of Chariots armed with hookes on each side, one hundred thousand; of those which fought vpon Camels as many; of Camels for burden two hundred thousand; of raw Hides for all vses three hundred thousand; of Gallies vvith brazen heads three thousand, by which she might transport ouer Indus at once three hundred thousand Souldiers: which Gallies were furnished with Syrians, Phœnicians, Cilicians, and men of Cyprus. These incredible and impossible numbers, vvhich no one place of the earth was able to nourish (had euery man and beast but fed vpon grasse) are taken from the authority of Ctesias whom Diodorus followeth. But as the one may be taxed with many friuolous reports: so Diodorus himselfe hath nothing of certainty, but from Xerxes expedition into Greece and afterwards: whose Army (though the same was farre inferiour to that of Semiramis) yet had it weight enough to ouerlode the beliefe of any reasonable man. For all Authors consent, that Xerxes transported into Greece an Armie of 1700000. and gathered together (therein to passe the Hellespont) three thousand Gallies, as Herodotus out of the seuerall Prouinces whence those Gallies were taken hath collected the number.

Suid. f. 249. lit. S.

But of what multitude soeuer the Army of Semiramis consisted: the same being broken and ouerthrowne by Staurobates vpon the bankes of Indus, cantatum cantauit extremum; she sang her last song, and (as Antiquity hath fained) was changed by the gods into a Doue (the bird of Venus, whence it came that the Babylonians gaue a Doue in their ensignes.

§. V.

Of the Temple of Belus, and the Pyramides of Egypt.

AMong all her other memorable [illegible] magnificent vvorkes (besides the vvall of the City of [illegible] Temple of Bel, erected in the middle of this City, in [illegible] carryed foure square of great heigth and beauty, hauing on [illegible] Brazen Gates curiously engrauen. In the Core of the square shee raised a Towre of a furlong high, which is halfe a quarter of a mile; and vpon it againe (taking a Basis of a lesse circuit) she set a second Towre; and so eight in all, one aboue another: vpon the top whereof the Chaldean

Priests made the obseruation of the starres, because this Towre iust-topped the cloudes: and at the second hill there remained onely the Trunke of Dragon, which

By beholding the ruines of this Towre haue many Trauailers beene deceiued, who suppose that they haue seene a part of Nimrods Towre, when it was but the foundation of this Temple of Bel: (except this of Bel were founded on that of Nimrod.) There were burnt in this Temple one hundred thousand talents of frankincense euery yeare (saith Herodotus.) This Temple did Nebuchadnezzar adorne with the spoiles of Hierusalem, and of the Temple of Salomon, all which vessels and ornaments Cyrus redelyuered. This Temple Xerxes spoyled with the soile which Alexander is said to haue repaired by the perswasions of the Chaldeans. I deny not that it might haue beene in his desire so to do; but he enioyed but a few yeares after Babylon taken, and therefore could not performe any such vvorke. The Egyptians (saith Proclus) inhabiting a low and leuell ground, and giuen to the same superstition of the Starres that the Chaldeans were, erected in imitation, and for the same seruice and vse, the Pyramides by Memphis, which vvere coniecturæ vanitas, ingentibus, saith Plinie. Of these Pyramides, Bellonius a carefull obserue of rarities (vvho being in Egypt, mounted by steps to the top of the highest) maketh this report: Le meilleur archer qui seroit a la pointe, & tirant vne fleche en l'air, a peine pourroit il enuoyer hors de sa hoese qu'elle ne se rembast sur les degrez; The best Archer standing on the top of one of these Pyramides, and shooting an Arrow from thence into the ayre as farre as hee can, with great difficulty shall be able so to force the same, but that it will fall vpon some of the degrees or steps.

CHAP. I.

Of the time of the birth of Abraham: and of the vse of this question, for the ordering of the Story of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.

Of some of the successors of Semiramis: with a briefe transition to the question, about the time of the birth of Abraham.

AFter the death of Semiramis, Ninias or Zameis, succeeded her in the Empire, on whom Berosus Annianus bestowes the conquest of Bactria, and the ouerthrow of Zoroaster; contrary to Diodorus, Iustine, Orosius, and all other approued Writers. For where the Scriptures doe not helpe vs, Miramur non ausi in rebus antiquis Historiam non conijcere; Nec Plut. in Thesi.
inurnaile if then in things vnct ancient, History must affect ayre.

The better therefore to finde out, in what age of the World, and how long these Assyrian kings reigned, as also for other good causes, we must first assure the time of Abrahams birth, and in vvhat yeare the same hapned after the flood. Now since all agree, that the fortieth fortieth three yeare of Ninus was the birth-year of Abraham; by proving directly out of the Scriptures, in what yeare after the floud the birth of Abraham happed, we shall thereby set all the rest in square and order. But of this time there is much iangling betweene those Chronologers, which follow the Hebrew account, and others: the most part making 292. or 293. yeares; others 352. yeares betweene Abrahams birth and the floud: a matter often disputed, but neuer concluded.

Archilochus de temporibus (as we finde him in Annius) makes but 250. yeares from the floud to Ninus: then seeing that Abraham was borne in the fortieth three yeare of Ninus, according to Eusebius and S. Augustine, it followeth by the addition of those two numbers, that the yeare of Abrahams birth was in the year after the floud 293. or as the most part of all Chronologers gather, the yeare 292.

Now, since I doe here enter into that neuer-resolued question, & Labyrinth of times, it behoueth me to giue reason for my own opinion: and vvith so much the greater care and circumspection, because I walk aside, and in a way apart from the multitude; yet not alone, & without companions, though the fewer in number: with whom I rather choose to endure the wounds of those darts, which Enuie casteth at nouelty, than to go on safely and sleepily in the easie waies of ancient mistakings: seeing to be learned in many errors, or to be ignorant in all things, hath little diuersity.

§. II.

A proposall of reasons or arguments, that are brought to proue Abraham was borne in the yeare 292. after the Flood, and not in the yeare 352.

THose which seeke to proue this account of 292. yeares, betweene the generall floud and Abrahams birth, ground themselues, first on these words of the Scripture: So Terah liued 70. yeares, and begot Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: secondly, vpon the opinion of Iosephus, S. Augustine, Beda, Isidore, & many of the ancient Hebrewes before them: authorities (while they are slightly lookt ouer) seeming of great weight.

From the place of Scripture last remembred, the later Chronologers gather these arguments. First out of the words as they lie; That Terah at 70. yeares begot Abraham, Nahor and Haran: and that Abraham being the first named, Abraham being the worthiest, Abraham being the son of the promise, ought in this respect to be accounted the eldest sonne of Terah, and so necessarily borne in the seuentieth yeare of his life. Secondly, it was of Abraham that Moses had respect, in whom the Church of God was continued, who was heire of the blessing; and not of Nahor and Haran: for the scope of this Chapter was to set downe the Genealogy of Christ, from Adam to Abraham, without all regard of Nahor, and Haran.

It is thirdly obiected, that if Abraham were not the eldest sonne, then there can be no certainty of his age, and so are all future times made doubtfull. For it cannot then bee proued, that Abraham was borne more assuredly in the 130. year of Terah his age, than in the 131. 132. &c. Moses hauing no where set downe precisely that Abraham went into Canaan that very yeare, in which his Father died.

Fourthly, it is thought improbable, that Terah begat Abraham at 130. years: seeing Abraham himselfe thought it a wonder to be made a Father at 100. yeares.

§. III.

The answer to one of the obiections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one iourney out of Mesopotamia into Canaan: and it, after his Fathers death.

TO answer all vvhich obiections, it is very easie, the vvay being prepared thereto by diuers learned Diuines long since; and to vvhich I will adde somewhat of mine owne, according to the small talent which God hath giuen me. Now forasmuch as the state of the question cannot well be scanned, vnlesse the time of Abrahams iourney into Canaan be first considered of; before I descend vnto the particular examination of these arguments, I will make bold with order and method so farre, as to search into a strange tradition concerning his trauailes, that serueth as a ground for this opinion and a bulwarke against all that can be said to the contrary.

But it is conceiued that Abraham made two iournies into Canaan; the later after his Fathers Fathers death, the former presently vpon his calling; which hee performed without delay, not staying for his fathers death at Haran: a coniecture, drawn from a place in the Epistle to the Hebrewes, where it is written, By faith Abraham (when he was called) obeyed God, to goe out into a place which he should afterward receiue for inheritance: and hee went out, not knowing whither he went. This supposition (if it be granted) serues very well to vphold the opinion, that can ill stand without it. Let vs therefore see whether we may giue credit to the supposition it selfe. Heb. 11. 8.

Surely, that Abraham first departed Charran or Haran after the death of Terah his Father, the same is proued, without the admission of any distinction, by these words of St. Stephen: And after his Father was dead, God brought him into this Land, where ye now dwell, that was, out of Haran into Canaan. Against which place so direct, & plaine, what force hath any mans fancy or supposition, perswading, that Abraham made two iournies into Canaan; one before Terah's death, & another after: no such thing being found in Scriptures, nor any circumstance, probability, or reason to induce it? For if any man out of this place before alleadged can picke any argument, prouing, or affoording any strong presumption, that Abraham past into Canaan, and then returned vnto Haran, from whence he departed a second time: then I thinke it reason, that hee be beleeued in the rest. But that hee performed the commandement of God after his Fathers death, leauing Vr and Haran for Canaan, it is as true as the Scriptures themselues are true. For after his Father was dead, (saith Martyr Stephen) God brought him into this Land. And, as Beza noteth, if Abraham made a double iourney into Canaan, then must it be inferred, that Moses omitted the one, and Stephen afterwards remembred the other: and whence had Stephen, saith Beza, the knowledge of Abrahams comming into Canaan, but out of Moses? For if Stephen had spoken any thing of those times, differing from Moses, he had offered the Iewes, his aduersaries, too great an occasion both of scandalizing himselfe, & the Gospell of Christ. Indeed we shall finde small reason to make vs think that Abraham passed and repassed those wayes, more often than he was enforced so to doe, if we consider, that he had no other guide or comforter in this long and wearisome iourney, than the strength of his faith in Gods promise: in which if any thing would haue brought him to despaire, he had more cause than euer man had to fall into it. For he came into a Region of strong and stubborne nations: a nation of valiant and resolued Idolaters. Hee was besieged with famine at his first arriuall, and driuen to flie into Egypt for reliefe. His wife was old, and hee had no sonne to inherit the promise. And when God had giuen him Isaac, he commanded him to offer him vp to himself for sacrifice: all which discomforts he patiently and constantly vnderwent. Acts 7. 4.

Secondly, let vs consider the wayes themselues, which Abraham had to passe ouer, the length whereof was 300. English miles; and through Countries of which hee had no manner of experience. He was to transport himselfe ouer the great riuer of Euphrates, to trauell through the dangerous and barren Desarts of Palmyrena, and to climbe ouer the great and high mountaines of Libanus, Hermon or Gilead: and whether these were easie walkes for Abraham to march twice ouer, containing, as aforesaid, 300. miles in length, let euery reasonable man iudge. For if he trauelled it twice; then was his iourney in all 1800. miles from Vr to Haran: and from Haran twice into Canaan. But were there no other argument to disproue this fancy; the manner of Abrahams departing from Haran hath more proofe (that hee had not animum reuertendi, not any thought of looking backeward) than any mans bare coniecture, be hee of what antiquity or authority soeuer. For thus it is written of him, Then Abraham tooke Sara his wife, and Lot his brothers son, and all their substance that they possest, and the soules that they had gotten in Haran, and they departed to go to the land of Canaan, & to the land of Canaan they came. Now if Abraham brought all with him that was deare vnto him, his wife, and kinsmen, and his, & their goods: it is not probable that he meant to walke it backe againe for his pleasure, in so warm, dangerous, and barren a Country as that was: or if hee could haue beene thereto moued, it is more likely that he would haue then returned, when he was yet vnsettled, and prest with extreame famine at his first arriuall. For had his Father beene then aliue, he might haue hoped from him to receiue more assured comfort and reliefe, than among the Egyptians, to whom he was a meere stranger both in religion and Nation. Gen. 12. 5.

What the cause might bee of Abrahams returne to Haran, as I will not enquire of them, that without warrant from the Scriptures haue sent him backe thither, about the time of his fathers death: ſo they perhaps, if they vvere vrged, could ſay little elſe, than that without ſuch a ſecond voyage their opinion were not maintainable. One thing in good reaſon they ſhould do well to make plaine, if it be not ouer-troubleſome. They ſay that Abraham was in Haran at his Fathers death, or ſome time after, being then by their account 135. yeares old, or a little more. How then did it happen, that hee left quite vndone the buſineſſe, which, as we reade, was within foure or fiue yeares after that time his greateſt, or (as may ſeeme) his onely care? Did not he binde with a very ſolemne oath his principall ſeruant, in whom he repoſed moſt confidence, to trauaile into thoſe parts, and ſeeke out a Wife for Iſaac his ſonne? and doth it not appeare by all circumſtances, that neither hee nor his ſeruant were ſo well acquainted in Meſopotamia, that they could particularly deſigne any one woman, as a fit match for Iſaac? Surely if Abraham had beene there in perſon ſo lately, as vvithin foure or fiue yeares before, hee would not haue forgotten a matter of ſuch importance; but would haue truſted his own iudgement, in chooſing a woman, fit for her piety, vertue, and other deſireable qualities, to be linked in marriage with his onely ſonne, who was then fiue and thirty yeares old; before which age moſt of the Patriarches after the Flood had begotten children: rather than haue left all at random to the conſideration of a ſeruant, that neither knew any, nor vvas knowne of any in that Country. But let it be ſuppoſed (if it may be beleeued) that either Abraham forgot his buſineſſe when he was there, or that ſomewhat hapned which no man can deuiſe; What might bee the reaſon, that Abrahams man, in doing his Maſters errand, vvas faine to lay open the whole ſtory of his maſters proſperity, telling it as newes, that Sarah had borne to him a ſonne in her old age? If Abraham himſelfe, a more certaine Author, had ſo lately beene among them, vvould not all this haue beene an idle tale? It were needleſſe to ſtand long vpon a thing ſo euident. Whether it were lawfull for Abraham to haue returned backe to Haran, would perhaps bee a queſtion hardly anſwerable: conſidering how auerſe hee was from permitting his ſonne to be carried thither, euen though a wife of his owne kinred could not haue beene obtained without his perſonall preſence. Iacob indeed was ſent thither by his parents, to take a Wife of his owne linage; not without Gods eſpeciall approbation, by whoſe bleſſing he proſpered in that iourney; yet he liued there as a ſeruant; ſuffered many iniuries; and finally was driuen to conuey himſelfe away from thence by flight. For although it bee not a ſentence vvritten, yet out of all written examples it may bee obſerued, that God alloweth not in his ſeruants any deſire of returning to the place, from whence he hath taken, and tranſplanted them. That briefe ſaying, Remember Lots wife, containes much matter. Let vs conſider Meſopotamia from vvhence Abraham was taken, and Egypt, out of which the whole Nation of the Iſraelites were deliuered: we ſhall find, that no bleſſing iſſued from either of them; to the poſterity of the Hebrewes. When Ezechias was viſited with an honourable Embaſſie from Babel, it ſeemes that he conceiued great pleaſure in his minde, and thought it a piece of his proſperity; but the propheſie which thereupon hee heard by Eſay, made him to know, that the counſaile of God was not agreeable to ſuch thoughts: which more plainely appeared in a following generation, when by the waters of Babylon they ſate downe and vvept. Concerning Egypt vve reade, that Seſac and Neco Kings of Egypt brought calamity vpon Iſrael: alſo that their confidence in the Egyptian ſuccours vvas the cauſe of their deſtruction. Where they were forbidden to returne into Egypt I doe not remember, nor can readily finde; but it is found in Deuteronomy, that God had ſaid, They ſhould no more returne that way; which is giuen, as the reaſon, why their King might not cauſe the people to returne to Egypt, for the multiplying of his Horſes. Whether the Lord had laied any ſuch iniunction vpon Abraham of not returning to Meſopotamia, I cannot ſay; many things do argue it probably: That he neuer returned, all circumſtances do (to my vnderſtanding) both ſtrongly and neceſſarily conclude.

But becauſe this double paſſage of Abraham is but an imagination; and that imaginations of men are rather valuable among children, than that they can perſwade thoſe of iudgement or vnderſtanding: I take it ſufficient, that S. Stephan hath directly taught vs, that Abraham left Haran, his Father being dead. And for the reſt, when they ſhew any one Scripture to proue it, I will beleeue as they doe. For all the trauailes of Abraham are preciſely ſet downe in the Scriptures: as firſt from Vr or Camirina in Chaldea to Haran or Charran: and then from Haran (after his Fathers death) to Sichem; from Sichem he thence remoued to a mountaine betweene Bethel and Hai: thence into Egypt; from Egypt he returned thither againe, where Lot and he parted, because their flocks and heards of Cattle were more than could bee fed in that part: from thence the second time hee remoued to Mamre, neere to Hebron: and thence hauing pursued Amraphel, and rescued Lot, he after inhabited at Gerar, in the border of Idumea, vnder Abimelech: and after neere vnto it at Berſabe, at which time hee was ready to offer vp his ſonne Iſaac on the mountaine Moriah. But this fiction of his retrait to Haran or Charran, appeareth not in any one ſtory, either diuine or humane. Now, if it may be ſuppoſed, that Abraham had made any former iourney into Canaan, as Leuita his Cabala hath fained, it ſhould in reaſon be therewithall beleeued, that hee would in thoſe his firſt trauailes haue prouided himſelfe of ſome certaine ſeate, or place of abiding: and not haue come a ſecond time, vvith his wife, kinſmen, family, goods and cattle, not knowing vvhereon to reſt himſelfe. But Abraham when hee came from Charran, paſt through the North part of Canaan, thence to Sichem, and the Plaine of Moriah: where finding no place to inhabite, hee departed thence to Bethel and Hai: and ſo from Nation to Nation, to diſcouer and find out ſome fit habitation: from vvhence againe, as it is vvritten in Geneſis the eleuenth, Hee went forth, going and iourneying towards the South: and alwaies vnſettled. By occaſion of vvhich wandring to and fro, ſome ſay, the Egyptians gaue him and his the name of Hebrai. Gen. 12.6. Mont. in Caleb.

Further, to proue that hee had not formerly beene in the Countrey, wee may note, that ere he came vnto Bethel and Hai, and at his firſt entrance into Canaan, God appeared vnto him, ſaying, Vnto thy ſeede will I giue this Land, ſhewing it him as vnto a ſtranger therein, and as a Land to him vnknowne. For Abraham vvithout any other prouident care for himſelfe, beleeued in the Word of the liuing God: neither ſending before, nor comming firſt to diſcouer it; but being arriued, hee receiued a ſecond promiſe from God, that he would giue thoſe Countries vnto him and his ſeede to inhabite and inherite.

Laſtly, what ſhould moue any man to thinke, that Moſes would haue omitted any ſuch double iourney of Abrahams, ſeeing hee ſetteth downe all his paſſages elſe-where long and ſhort? as when hee moued from Sichem, and ſeated betweene Hai and Bethel, the diſtance being but 20. miles: and when hee moued thence to the valley of Mamre, being but 24. miles: and when he left Mamre, and ſate downe at Gerar, being leſſe than fiue miles; No, Moſes paſt ouer all the times of the firſt age with the greater breuity, to haſten him to the ſtory of Abraham: ſhutting vp all betweene the Creation & the Floud in ſixe chapters; which age laſted 1656. yeares: but he beſtoweth on the ſtory of Abraham fourteene chapters, beginning with his birth in the eleuenth, and ending with his death in the fiue and twentieth; and this time endured but 175. years. It hath therefore no face of truth, that Moſes forgot or neglected any thing concerning Abrahams trauels, or other actions: or that he would ſet downe thoſe ſmall remoues of fiue miles, and omit thoſe of three hundred. For ſuch a iourney in going and comming would haue miniſtred ſome variety of matter, or accident, vvorthy the inſerting and adding to Abrahams ſtorie.

§. IV.

The anſwer to another of the obiections propoſed, ſhewing that it was not vnlikely, that Terah ſhould beget Abraham in his hundred and thirty yeere.

NOw touching the obiection, where it is ſaid, that it was very vnlikely that Terah ſhould beget Abraham in his 130. yeare, ſeeing Abraham himſelfe thought it a vvonder to haue a ſon at an hundred: this is hardly worth the anſwering. This wonder is indeede miſ-caſt, and miſtaken: Abraham hauing reſpect onely to Sarah his wife, when he ſpake of their many yeares. For when the Angel ſaid vnto Abraham in his Tent doore at Mamre; Loe Sarah thy wife ſhall haue a Son, it followeth in the next verſe, Now Abraham and Sarah were old and ſtricken in age, and it ceaſed to be with Sarah after the manner of women: therefore Sarah laughed, &c.

So then in that it is ſaid, it ceaſed to be with Sarah after the manner of women, it appeareth that the wonder was vvrought on her, and not on Abraham. For Abraham by his ſecond wife Keturah had many ſonnes after Sarahs death, as Zimron, Iokſhan, Medan, Midian, Iſhbak, and Shuah: and the eldeſt of theſe was borne 37. yeares after Iſaac: and the youngeſt yonger 40. yeares after? What strange hellish thing was that, Terah being 130. yeares old should begin to Abraham, will they say, may be gathered from his supposed despaire of Abraham at one hundred yeares? For Sarah died in the yeare of the world 2145. and Isaac was borne in the yeare 2109. and Abraham did not marry Keturah till Sarah was buried. So if we deduct the number of 2109. out of 2145. there remaineth 36. And therefore if Abraham began to sonne 96. yeares after this supposed wonder, & when Abraham was 137. yeares old: it is not strange that his Father Terah should beget Abraham at 130. And if Booz, Obed, and Iesse, who lined so many yeares and ages after Abraham, begat sonnes at 100. yeares, or neere it, it cannot be marualled at, that Terah begat Abraham at 130. and Abraham others at the same age and seuen yeares after.

§. V.

The answer to two more of the obiections: shewing that wee may haue certainty of Abrahams age from the Scripture, though we make not Abraham the eldest Sonne: and that there was great cause, why in the story of Abraham his two brethren should be respected.

IT followeth now to speake something to the obiection, which brings Abrahams age altogether in doubt, except wee allow him to be the eldest son of Terah, and borne when Terah was 70. years old. For Abrahams age being made vncertaine, all succeeding times are thereby without any perfect rule or knowledge.

But this proposition, That we cannot be certaine of Abrahams age, vnlesse vve make him the eldest sonne, is false. For it is plaine in the Scriptures, that when Terah was 205. vvhich was the yeare of his death, then vvas Abraham 75. And if you aske, how I can iudge of times, either preceding or succeeding, by knowing that Abraham departed Haran at that age: I answer, That Saint Stephen hath told vs, that Abrahams departure followed the death of his Father Terah: and Terah died at 205. so as the 75. yeare of Abraham was the 205. yeare of Terah: which knowne, there can bee no errour in the account of times succeeding. Now to come to the obiection, where it is said, That Moses had no respect vnto Nachor and Haran, because they were out of the Church, but to Abraham onely, with whom God established the Couenant, and of whom Christ descended according to the flesh, &c. I answer, that Moses for many great and necessary causes had respect of Nachor and Haran. For the succession of Gods Church is not witnessed by Abraham alone, but by the issues of Nahor and Haran, vvere they Idolaters or otherwise. For Nahor was the Father of Bethuel, & Bethuel of Rebecca, the mother of Israel: and Haran was the parent of Lot, Sarah, and Milcah: and Sarah was mother to Isaac, and grandmother to Iacob: Milcah also the wife of Nahor, and mother of Bethuel, was Iacobs great grandmother: and the age of Sarah the daughter of Haran is especially noted, in that it pleased God to giue her a son at 90. years, and when by nature she could not haue conceiued. And therefore, though it were not in regard of themselues, yet because both Nahor and Abraham married the daughters of their brother Haran; and because Isaac married Rebecca the grand-childe of Nahor; and Iacob, Lea, and Rachel, the daughters of Laban, the grand-childe also of Nahor: it vvas not superfluous in Moses to giue light of these mens times and ages. And though sometime they worshipped strange gods, as it is Ios. 24. 2. yet I see no cause to thinke, that they still continued Idolaters. For they beleeued and obeyed the calling of Abraham, leauing their naturall Countrey, and City of Vr in Chaldea, as Abraham did, and remoued thence all, except Haran, who died before his Father Terah, ere they left Chaldea; but Lot, his sonne, followed Abraham into Canaan; and Sarah, the sister of Lot, Abraham married. Nahor also, who remained at Charran, gaue his sonnes daughters to Isaac, and Iacob, his owne kinse-men: hee himselfe hauing also married in his owne Family, not thinking it pleasing vnto God to mixe themselues with strangers and Idolaters. And that these men at length beleeued in the God of Abraham, it can no way be doubted. For when Laban had seene the seruant of Abraham standing at the Wel beside Charran, he inuited him to his Fathers house in this manner: Come in, thou blessed of Iehouah, &c. And vvhen this seruant of Abrahams demanded an answer as touching Rebecca, then answered Laban and Bethuel, and said; This thing is proceeded of Iehouah: meaning, that it was the will of the true God it should be so; wherin he acknowledged Gods prouidence. Likewise in the following verse it is written; Take, & let her be thy Masters sons wife, euen as Iehouah hath said. This their often vsing

Gen. 24. 50.

of the name of Iehouah, which is the proper Name of the true God, is a signe that they had the knowledge of him.

Now although it be the opinion of S. Chrysostome, and some later Writers, as Caietan, Oleaster, Musculus, Caluin, Mercer, and others, that Laban was an Idolater, because hee retained certaine Idols, or houshold gods, vvhich Rachel stole from him; yet that he beleeued in the true God it cannot be denied. For he acknowledgeth the God of Abraham and of Nahor, and he called Abrahams seruant, blessed of IEHOVAH, as aforesaid. So as for my selfe I dare not auow, that these men were out of the Church, who, sure I am, were not out of the faith.

§. VI.

That the naming of Abraham first of the three brethren, Gen. 11. v. 26. doth not proue that he was the eldest: together with diuers reasons prouing that Abraham was not the eldest son of Terah.

TO the maine obiection which I answer last, because it seemeth of most strength, by which, those that striue to shorten the times, endeauour to proue that Abraham was the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne in the 70. yeare of Terahs life: grounding themselues first and chiefly on this place of the Scripture; And Terah liued Gen. 11. 26. 70. yeeres, and begat Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: To this I say, that although Abraham in this verse be first named, yet the same is no proofe at all that he was the eldest & first-borne sonne of Terah. For it is no necessary consequence, that the first named in Scriptures was therefore eldest in bloud and birth, neither doth it appeare, that it pleased God to make especiall choice of the first sonnes in nature and time: for Seth was not the first-borne of Adam; nor Isaac of Abraham; nor Iacob of Isaac; nor Iuda and Ioseph of Iacob; nor Dauid the eldest of Iesse; nor Salomon of Dauid: as is formerly remembred.

But it is written of Noah: Noah was 500. yeeres old, and Noah begat Shem, Ham, and Iaphet: shewing that at the 500. yeare of his age hee began to beget the first of those three sonnes. For according to S. Augustine, speaking generally, Nec attendendus est in his ordo Aug. quæst. sul natiuitatis, sed significatio futuræ dignitatis: in qua excelluit Abraham: The order of nati- per Gen. 23. uitie is not here to bee respected, but the signification of the future dignity: in which Abraham was preferred. And therefore, as in the order of the sonnes of Noah: so is it here; where it is said, that Terah liued 70. yeeres, and begat Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: For it vvas late ere Terah began to beget Sonnes, himselfe being begotten by his Father Nachor at 29. as other his Ancestors vvere at 30. The like also happened to Noah: for whereas Adam begat Seth at 130. Enosh Kenan at 90. Kenan Mahalaleel at 70. Mahalaleel Iered at 60. Noah was yet 500. yeares old when he began to beget the first of his three sonnes, as aforesaid. And S. Augustine in the place before cited, rather inclineth to the opinion that Abraham was the youngest of Terah's sonnes, than otherwise: though for his excellency hee was worthily named first. His owne words are these: Fieri enim potuit vt posterior sit generatus Abraham: sed merito excellentiæ, qua in Scripturis valde commendatur, prior fuerit nominatus. It might be, saith he, that Abraham was begotten later: but was first named in regard of his excellency, for which in Scripture hee is much commended. So as the naming first or last proueth nothing who was first or last borne: either in those issues of Noah, or in these of Terah: Neither hath God any respect of the eldest in nature, as touching his election or spirituall blessing; for Moses nameth first the children of the promise, and the eldest & first in Gods fauour. Pietas ergo vel ipsa potius electio diuina, quæ comitem secum trahit pietatem, & Dei timorem, primas partes dat Semo in liberis Noæ, & Abrahamo in liberis Thare: Piety, saith he, or rather diuine election, which doth euermore draw with it or after it, piety and the feare of God, gaue place and precedency to Sem among the children of Noah, and to Abraham among those of Thare.

For the rest it is manifest, that Abraham entred Canaan in the 75. yeare of his age. And it was in Canaan that Hagar bare him Ismael, when Abraham had liued 86. yeares. It was Gen. 12. 4. at Gerar (the South border of Canaan) that Sarah bare Isaac, when Abraham had consu- Gen. 16. 16. med 100. yeares. It was from the valley of Mamre in Canaan that Abraham rose out, when he rescued Lot and ouerthrew Amraphel: and he had then but the age of 83. years: and it is as manifest that hee parted from Haran after his Father Terah was dead. But if Act. 7. 4.

Terah

Gen. 11. Terah begat Abraham at 70. year old, then muſt Abraham haue been 135. yeares vvhen he firſt ſet his foote in Canaan, ſeeing Terah muſt be dead ere he parted; and ſo 70. added to 135. make 205. the true age of Terah: which is contrary to all thoſe places of Scripture before remembred. For he entred at 75. he reſcued Lot at 83. hee had Iſmael at 86. he had Iſaac at 100. proued by the former places.

Moreouer, if Abraham were the eldeſt ſonne of Terah, and borne in the 70. yeare of his age: then had Terah liued till Iſaac had beene 35. yeares old, and Iſmael, 49. both vvhich muſt then haue beene borne in Meſopotamia, and therein foſtered to that age: vnleſſe we ſhould either deny credit to S. Stephen, who ſaith that Abraham departed from Meſopotamia after his Fathers death: or elſe beleeue the interpretation of Daniel Angelocrator, who in his Chronologia antoptica, ſaith it was about his Fathers death: becauſe the Greek word, μετα may be tranſported by the Latine ſub, aſwell as by poſt: which though elſewhere it may be, yet cannot it be ſo in this place. For it were moſt improperly ſpoken, to ſay that thoſe things were done about Terahs death, which were 60. yeares before. Wherefore ſuppoſing Abraham to haue been borne in the ſeuenty yeare of Terah; we muſt giue thoſe times and places of birth to Abrahams children, which no authority will warrant; For Abraham had no children in Vr of Chaldea, nor in Haran, nor in ten yeares after his arriuall into Canaan. For the yeare of Terahs death, in vvhich Abraham left Haran, was the yeare of the World 2083. and the yeare of Iſmaels birth vvas the Worlds yeare 2094. which maketh 10. yeares difference. And that Iſaac vvas borne in Canaan, and was to be offered vpon the mountaine Moriah therein, 39. miles from Berſabe, where Abraham then inhabited: and that three Angels firſt of all appeared to Abraham in the valley of Mamre, no man doubteth.

And therefore it cannot bee that any of Abrahams ſonnes were borne in Meſopotamia; nor while Terah liued; nor in leſſe than ten yeares after Terahs death: and then conſequently was not Abraham the eldeſt ſonne of Terah, nor borne in the 70. yeare of Terahs age.

Gen. 12. Thirdly, whereas Abraham came into Canaan at 75. if Terah had begotten him at 70. then had Terah liued but 145. for 70. and 75. make 145. which muſt alſo haue beene the full age of Terah: but Terah liued 205. yeares; and therefore was not Abraham borne in the 70. yeare of Terah.

Fourthly, the ages of Lot and Sarah make it manifeſt, that Haran was the elder, if not the eldeſt brother of Abraham; for Sarah or Iſcah wanted but ten yeeres of Abrahams age: Iſaac being borne when Abraham was 100. and Sarah 90. yeeres old.

It followeth then, that if Abraham had been the elder brother of Haran, Haran muſt haue begotten Sarah at nine years old: for granting that Haran was borne but one yeare after Abraham, and Sarah within ten yeares as old as Abraham, then of neceſſity muſt Haran beget her, when he had liued but nine yeares; which vvere too ridiculous to imagine.

And that Iſcah was Sarah; Rab. Solemon affirmeth; both names, ſaith he, bearing the ſame ſignification, and names of principality. Againe, to what end was the vvord Iſcah or Iſhcah inſerted in this place, if Sarah were not meant thereby? For, to ſpeake of any thing ſuperfluous, it is not vſed in Gods Booke: and if Iſcah had not belonged to the ſtory, it had beene but an idle name to no purpoſe remembred.

Now if it had beene true (as thoſe of the contrary opinion affirme) that Moſes had no reſpect of Nahor and Haran, who were notwithſtanding the parents of Bethuel and Rebecca, the mother of Iſrael, and of Chriſt: what regard then had Moſes of Iſcah in this place, were ſhee not Sarah, but otherwiſe an idle name of vvhom there is nothing elſe firſt or laſt?

The age alſo of Lot diſproueth the elderſhip of Abraham: for Lot vvas called an old man when Abraham was but 83. years old: And if Lot were of a greater age than Abraham, and Haran were Father to Lot, Sarah, and Milcah; Abraham marrying one of Harans daughters, and Nahor the other, Sarah alſo being within ten yeares as old as Abraham: it may appeare to euery reaſonable man (not obſtinate and preiudicate) that Haran was the eldeſt ſonne of Terah, and not Abraham: who alſo died firſt and before his Father left Vr in Chaldea. Alſo Lyra reaſoneth againſt the opinion of Abrahams elderſhip, vpon the ſame place of Geneſis: drawing argument from the age of Sarah, who was but 10. yeares yonger than Abraham himſelfe. Lyra his words are theſe: Si igitur Haran fuit iunior ipſo

Abraham,

Abraham, ſequitur quòd non habebat decem annos quando genuit Saram: imò nec octo, &c. and afterward, & ideò melius videtur dicendum, quòd Abraham fuit vltimò natus de tribus filijs Thare, tamen nominatur primò, propter eius dignitatem: & quia ponendus erat caput ſtirpis & generationis ſequentis: & quia primò facta eſt ei repromiſsio expreſſa de Chriſto, ſicut ſupra dictum eſt de Sem, &c. If therefore (ſaith Lyra) Haran was younger than Abraham himſelfe, it followeth that he was not ten yeeres old when he begat Sarah: And therefore it ſeemeth better to be ſaid, that Abraham was the laſt borne of the three ſonnes of Thare, neuertheleſſe he is named firſt for his dignitie, both becauſe hee was to be ordained head of the flocke and generation following, and becauſe the promiſe of Chriſt was firſt made vnto him, as before it is ſaid of Sem.

§. VII.

A concluſion of this diſpute, noting the Authors on both ſides: with an admonition, that they which ſhorten the times make all ancient ſtories the more vnprobable.

IT therefore agreeth with the Scriptures, with Nature, Time, and Reaſon, that Haran was the eldeſt ſonne of Terah, and not Abraham: and that Abraham was borne in the 130. yeere of Terahs life, and not in the 70. yeere. For Abraham departing Charran after Terah died, according to S. Stephen, and that iourney by Abraham performed when he was 75. yeeres old; theſe two numbers added make 205. yeers the full age of Terah: ſeeing that when Terah died, then Abraham entred Canaan. For my ſelfe, I haue no other end herein than to manifeſt the truth of the Worlds Story. I reuerence the iudgements of the Fathers: but I know they were miſtaken in particulars. Saint Auguſtine was doubtfull, and could not determine this controuerſie, For whatſoeuer is borrowed from him out of his ſixteenth Booke de Ciuitate Dei, cap. 15. the ſame may be anſwered out of himſelfe in his fiue and twentieth queſtion vpon Gen. But Saint Auguſtine herein followed Ioſephus and Iſidor: and Beda followed S. Auguſtine. And it was out of a fooliſh pride and vanitie, that the Hebrewes and Ioſepus ſought to make Abraham the firſt borne: as if God had had reſpect to the eldeſt in nature. So did Ioſephus together with Nicholas Damaſcenus (thinking thereby to glorifie the Iewiſh Nation) make Abrahams a king, entitling Sarah by the name of Queene Sarah: and ſaid that Abraham was followed with 318. Captaines, of which euery one had an infinite multitude vnder him; trecentos & octodecem præfectos habuit: quorum ſingulis infinita multitudo parebat. And that Pharao inuading him with a great Armie, tooke from him his Wife Sarah: Such fables argue that Ioſephus is not to bee beleeued, but with diſcreete reſeruations. Acts 7.4. Gen. 12.4.

This account of times, allowing no more than 292. yeeres from the Floud to Abraham, is vpheld by many of the Hebrews. But how ſhould we value the opinion of ſuch Chronologers, as take Amraphel for Nimrod? Surely, if their iudgement in ſuch matters were worthy to be regarded, it would haue appeared in ſetting downe the ſucceſſion of the Perſian Kings, vnder whom they liued, whoſe Hiſtorie was not ſo farre remote in time, as theſe antiquities, nor wanting the light of many good writers. Yet groſſely haue they erred therein, & ſo familiar are their miſtakings in all things of like nature, that we ſeldom find their opinion rehearſed without the confutation treading on the heeles of it. They of the Romane religion are alſo generally on the ſame ſide: it being a thing vſuall among them, to maintaine whatſoeuer they haue beene formerly knowne to hold and beleeue. Contrariwiſe, of the more ancient, Theodoret, and ſome following him: of later times Beroaldus, Codoman, Peucer, Caluin, Iunius, Beza, Broughton, Doct. Gibbons, and Moore, with diuers of the Proteſtants hold Abraham to haue beene borne in the 130. yeere of his Father Terah. From theſe (as in a caſe not concerning any point in Religion) diuers of the ſame Religion, and thoſe neuertheleſſe good Authors, as Bucholcerus, Chitraus, Funclius and others, are very auerſe herein, eſpecially Ioſephus Scaliger with his Sethus Caluiſius, proclaiming Beroaldus an Arch-heretike in Chronologie, and condemning this opinion of his as poyſonous. Contrariwiſe, Auguſtinus Torniellus a Prieſt of the Congregation of Saint Paul, a iudicious, diligent and free writer, whoſe Annales are newly ſet forth, very earneſtly defends the opinion, which I haue already deliuered; not alleadging Beroaldus, nor any Proteſtant writer, as beeing perhaps vnwilling to owe thankes to heretikes. For my ſelfe I doe neither miſlike the contrary opinion, becauſe commonly those of the Romish Religion labour to vphold it; nor fauour this larger account of times; because many notable men of the Protestant writers haue approoued it; but for the truth it selfe. To strengthen which, after all these former reasons, and testimonies of Scripture, I will adde thus much more to the rest. First, it is apparant to all men of iudgement, that the best approued Historians, Diuine and Prophane, labour to inuestigate the truth of times, thereby to approue the stories, & forepast actions of the world: and not the truth of histories to approue the times by. Let vs then make iudgement to our selues, which of those two accounts giue the best reputation to the story of the Scriptures; teaching the Worlds new plantation, and the continuance of Gods Church: either that of Iosephus, & those which follow him; who makes but 292. yeares, or thereabouts, betweene the floud and birth of Abraham: or this other account, which makes 352. yeares betweene the one and the other: the one taking Abraham to be the first borne of Thare, in the 70. yeare of his life: the other a younger sonne of Thare, and borne when he had liued 130. yeares. And if we looke ouer all, and do not hastily satisfie our vnderstanding with the first things offered, and thereby being satiated doe slothfully and drowsily sit downe; we shall find it more agreeable rather to allow the reckoning of the Septuagint, who, according to some editions, make it aboue 1072. yeares betweene the Floud and Abrahams birth: than to take away any part of those 352. years giuen. For if we aduisedly consider the state and countenance of the world, such as it was in Abrahams time, yea before Abraham was borne, wee shall finde that it were very ill done of vs by following opinion without the guide of reason, to pare the times ouer-deepely betweene Abraham and the Floud: because in cutting them too neere the quick, the reputation of the whole storie might perchance bleede thereby, were not the testimonie of the Scriptures supreme, so as no obiection can approach it: and that wee did not follow withall this precept of S. Augustine, That whereseuer any one place in the Scriptures may bee conceiued disagreeing to the whole, the same is by ignorance of interpretation mis-vnderstood. For in Abrahams time all the then knowne parts of the World were peopled: all Regions and Countries had their Kings. Egypt had many magnificent Cities: and so had Palestina, and all the bordering Countries, yea, all that part of the World besides, as farre as India: and those not built with stickes, but of hewne stones, and defended with walls and rampiers: which magnificence needed a parent of more antiquitie, than those other men haue supposed. And therefore, where the Scriptures are plainest and best agreeing with reason and nature, to what end should we labour to beget doubts and scruples, or draw all things into wonders and maruailes: giuing also strength thereby to common cauillers, and to those mens apish braines, who only bend their wits to find impossibilities, and monsters in the story of the World and Mankinde.

§. VIII.

A computation of the times of the Assyrians, and others, grounded vpon the times noted in the storie of Abraham.

An. mūdi 2008 dil. 352. natus Abraham, Eus. Aug. de Ciuit. Dei. l. 16. c. 17.

IN this sort therefore for the reasons before alleadged, I conclude, that from the generall Floud, to the birth of Abraham, 352. yeares were consumed: and taking the Assyrian History with vs, the same number of yeares were spent from the Floud to the 43. yeere of Ninus: in which 43. yeere of Ninus Abraham was borne: which happened in the yeare of the world, 2009.

Now of this time of 352. yeares, we must giue one part as well to the increase of those people which came into Shinaar, as to those that stayed in the East, to wit, 30. yeares to Chus, ere he begat Seba: of which, though the Scriptures are silent, yet because those of the same time had that age when they begat their first sonnes, wee may the more safely giue the like allowance to these. For Eber begat Peleg at 34. Peleg Regu at 30. Regu Serug at 32. Now after Seba, Chus begat Hauila, Sabta, Raama and Sabtecha: and Raama begat Sheba and Dedan, before Nimrod was borne, as it appeareth Gen. 10. which S. Augustine approueth. Giuing then 30. yeares more to Raama ere he begat Sheba, and fiue yeeres to the fiue elder brothers of Nimrod, it may be gathered that 65. yeares were consumed ere Nimrod himselfe was borne: and that Raamah had that age before any of his sonnes were were begotten, it may be gathered, by example and compariſon: for Peleg the fourth from Noah, as Ragau was, begat Reu in the ſame yeere of his life. Gen. 11. 18.

Let vs then allow 60. yeeres more after the birth of Nimrod, for two other generations to be brought forth, or elſe we ſhall hardly finde people to build Babel: for ſure we are, that it was done by hands, and not by miracle: becauſe it diſpleaſed God. Theſe two numbers of 65. and 60. make 125. The reſt of the time of 131. (in which yeere they arriued in Shinaar, whereof there are 6. yeeres remaining) we may giue them for their trauels from the Eaſt: becauſe they were peſtered with women, children and Cattell: and, as ſome ancient writers haue conceiued, & Becanus of later times, they kept alwaies the mountaine ſides, for feare of a ſecond Floud. Now, if we take this number of 131. out of 352. there remaines 221. of which number Beroſus beſtoweth 65. on Belus, and 42. on Ninus before Abraham borne: both which S. Auguſtine approueth; which two numbers taken againe out of 221. there remaineth 114. yeeres of the 352. from the Floud to Abrahams birth: which number of 114. neceſſitie beſtoweth on Nimrod.

An. à ſalute humani generis ab aquis centeſimo primo cepit regnum Babylonicum ſub noſtro Saturno patre Iouis Belo, qui imperauit annis 65. Beroſus.

And if it be obiected that this time giuen to Nimrod, is ouer-long: ſure if we compare the age of Nimrod with the reſt of the ſame deſcent from Noah, it will rather appeare ouer-ſhort. For Nimrod, by this accompt, liued in all but one hundred ſeuenty nine yeeres: whereof he reigned one hundred and twelue: whereas Sale who was the ſonne of Arphaxad the ſonne of Sem, liued foure hundred three yeeres: and of the ſame age of the World was Nimrod the ſonne of Chus, the ſonne of Cham.

Now after Abraham was borne,

Ninus reigned 9. yeeres: which added to 43. make ——— 52.

Ninus dieth and leaueth Semiramis his Succeſſor.

Semiramis gouerned the Empire of Babylonia and Aſſyria 42. yeeres, and died in the 52 yeere compleat of Abrahams life. Of the World 2017. Of the Floud 361. 2059. mundi. 403. à dil. 2083. 427. 2093. 437.

Ninias or Zameis ſucceeded Semiramis, and ruled 38. yeeres, in the ſecond yeere of whoſe reigne Abraham left Meſopotamia.

When Abraham was 85. yeeres old, he reſcued his nephew Lot, and ouerthrew by ſurpriſe Amraphel King of Shinaar, or Babylonia. Ninias reigned 38. yeeres, and Abraham came into Canaan but 23. yeeres after Semiramis died: which was the 75. yeere of his age: ſo that Amraphel may ſeeme to haue beene this Ninias the ſonne of Ninus, and Semiramis, whoſe 23. yeeres, as aforeſaid, being the 75. yeere of Abraham, he and his fellow-kings might haue receiued this ouerthrow in the 85. yeere of Abraham, and the 33. yeere of his owne reigne: after which hee reigned fiue yeeres: which make in all 38. But the truth is, that the reaſons to the contrary, vrging that this Amraphel could not be Ninias, are not eaſily anſwered. Howbeit for the times of the Aſſyrian Kings, that they are to be ordered as we haue ſet downe, according to the times noted by Moſes, in the ſtorie of Abraham, it is moſt certaine; vnleſſe we will either derogate from the truth of Moſes his computation, which were impietie, or account the whole Hiſtorie of Ninus and Semiramis to bee but a fiction; which were to condmne all ancient Hiſtorians for fablers.

That Amraphel, one of the foure Kings whom Abraham ouerthrew, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to haue beene Ninias the ſonne of Ninus.

AND now touching this Amraphel, whom Moſes makes King of Shinaar or Babylonia, in the 85. yeere of Abrahams life, that is, in the 33. yeere of the raigne of Ninias Zameis the king of the Aſſyrians, the ſonne of Ninus and Semiramis, it is hard to affirme what he was, and how he could be at this time King of Babylonia: Ninias Zameis then reigning there. To this doubt the anſwer which firſt offereth it ſelfe as moſt probable, is that which hath beene alreadie noted, that this Ninias or Zameis, was no other than our Amraphel: who inuaded Traconitis or Baſan, and ouerthrew thoſe fiue kings of Pentapolis, or the valley of Siddim. For the Scriptures tell vs, that Amraphel was King of Shinaar, which is Babylonia: and the times before accounted make him to be the ſucceſſour of Ninus and Semiramis: and it falleth out with the 85. yeere of Abrahams life: wherein he reſcued Lot, ſlew Chedorlaomer, and ouerthrew the reſt. True it is, that this Amraphel was not at this time the greatest Monarke: for Chedorlaomer commanded in chiefe, though Amraphel be first named by Moses in the first verse of the 14. Chapter of Genesis. For the Kings of the valley of Siddim, or of Pentapolis, or the fiue Cities, were

Gen. 14. 4. the vassalls of Chedarlaomer, and not of Amraphel: as it is written, Twelue yeeres were they subiect to Chedorlaomer, but in the 13. yeere they rebelled, and in the 14. yeere came Chedorlaomer and the Kings that were with him: and therefore was Chedorlaomer the principall in this enterprise, who was then King of Elam, which is Persia: Now Persia being seated ouer Tygris, and to the East of Amraphels Countrie; and the other two kings, which were companions with Amraphel, being seated to the West of Shinaar or Babylonia: Amraphel, who held Babylonia it selfe, seemeth at this time to haue had no great scope or large dominion. For had Amrapel beene so great a Prince as prophane Historians make Ninus or Semiramis whom he succeeded, hee should not haue needed the assistance of three other Kings for this expedition. But though Chedorlaomer were the first and greatest of those foure Kings, (as it is manifest that he was: For these little kings of Sodome, Gomorra, &c. were his vassals, and not Amraphels,) yet this makes not the coniecture lesse probable, but that this Amraphel might be Ninias. For it may be, that the great and potent Empire of Assyria, had now (as we shall shew more plainely in that which followeth) receiued a downe-right fall, at the time of this warre: though not long before it commanded all the Kingdomes betweene India and the Phœnician Sea: to wit, in the times of Ninus and Semiramis.

Of Arioch another of the foure Kings, and that Ellas, whereof he is said to haue beene King, lies betweene Cœlesyria and Arabia Petræa.

NOw the two other kings ioyned with Amraphel and Chedorlaomer, were Arioch and Tydal; the one king of Ellassar, the other of the Nations. For Ellassar, Aquila and Hierome write Pontus: so Tostatus thinketh that it should bee Hellespont: which opinion Pererius fauoureth. But this is only to defend the Latine translation. For as Pontus; so is Hellespont farre distant, and out of the way to send any Armies into Arabia Petræa, or into Idumæa; which Countries these foure kings chiefly inuaded: Besides that, it is certaine, that the Assyrians (when they were greatest) had neuer any dominion in Asia the lesse. For at such time as the Assyrians feared the inuasion of the Medes and Persians, they sent not into Asia the lesse as commanders: but vsed all the Art Xenophon: they had to inuite Cræsus to their assistance: perswading him that nothing could bee more dangerous for himself, and the other Kings of those parts, than the successe of the Medes against the Assyrians. But examiue the enterprise what it was. These Kings (saith Gen. 14. the Text) made warre with Bera, King of Sodome, Birsha King of Gomorrha, Shinab King of Admath, and Shemebar King of Zeboim, and the King of Bela which is Zoar. All which fiue Kings had not so much ground as Middlesex: being such a kinde of Reguli, as Iosua found in the land long after: namely, Lords of Cities and small territories adioyning; of which Canaan had three and thirtie, all slaine or hanged by Iosua. Neither can the other Countries, which in the Text they are said also to haue inuaded, bee imagined to haue beene at that time of any great power: and therefore to call in Kings from Pontus or Hellespont, had manifested a great impotence and weakenesse in the Kings of Babylon and Persia.

And though it be alleadged for an example, that diuers Kings farre off, came to assist Pompey against Cæsar: yet these same examples without like occasions and circumstances, do neither leade nor teach. For there was no cause to feare the greatnesse of these pettie Kings, or of the other Countries: But the eyes of the world were fixed on Cæsar; and his vndertakings and intents were to all other Princes, no lesse doubtful than feare-full: But the whole Countrie by these foure Kings mastered in their passage, was afterward giuen to the halfe tribe of Manasse, Gad, and Reuben: a narrow valley of ground lying betweene Iordan and the mountaines of Seir: inclosed by the riuer of Arnon on the Southside, & by Lybanus on the North, consisting of the two smal Prouinces of Trachonitis or Basan, & the Region of the Moabites: a conquest farre vnualuable, and little answering to the power of the Assyrian Empire, if the same had remained in any comparable estate with the times of Ninus & Semiramis, who subiected all the great kings of that part of the World, without the assistance of any of the Kings of Hellespont, or any other part of Asia the lesse. But as the vulgar and Aquila conuert Ellassar by Pontus: so Symmachus makes Arioch a King of the Scythians, a King indeed, as farre fetched to ioyne with the Assyrians in this Warre, as the World had any at that time.

The Septuagint doe not change the word of Ellassar at all, but as they keepe the word Ararat, on the mountaines whereof the Arke did rest, so doe they in this place retaine the Hebrew word Ellassar, being doubtfull to giue it a wrong interpretation. And Pererius himselfe remembreth other opinions farre more probable than this of Pontus or Hellespont: yet he dares not auow his liking of them, because the Latin Translation hath it otherwise. For Stephanus de Vrbibus a Grecian Cosmographer, findeth the Citie of Ellas in the border of Cœlesyria: and S. Hierome calleth Ellas the Citie of Arioch, as in truth it was. Now although the same be seated by Stephanus in Cœlesyria, yet it standeth on the border of Arabia, of which Arioch was king: who formerly ioyned with Ninus in all his conquests, being of the same familie, and descended from Cham and Chus: after whom the name of Arius was by the Hebrew written Arioch: and afterward againe Aretas: as in the Machabees the kings of Arabia holding that name euen to the time of S. Paul, who was fought to be betrayed by the Lieutenant of Aretas commanding in Damascus. They were Princes for the most part confederate and depending vpon the Assyrian Empire. It is true that we find in Daniel, that in the time of Nabuchodonosor, one Arioch was Generall of his armie, & the principall Commander vnder him, who was a King of Kings: which makes it plaine, that Arioch here spoken of, the sonne of that Arioch Confederate of Ninus, was no king of Pontus, nor of Scythia: regions farre remoued from the Assyrians and Babylonians. The name also of Arioch who commanded vnder Nabuchodonosor is mentioned in Iudith, by the name of King of the Elymeans: who are a Nation of Persians bordering Assyria, according to Stephanus: though Plinie sets it betweene the Sea-coast, and Media: and if any brother of the Arabian Kings or other of that house (known by the name of Arius, Arioch, Areta, or Aretas) had the gouernment of that Persian Prouince called Elymais (as it seemeth they had by the places of Daniel and Iudith) yet the same was in Nabuchodonosors time. But this Arioch heere spoken of may with more reason bee taken for the King of Arabia, the sonne of Arius, the Confederate of Ninus: whose sonnes held league, as their Fathers did, being the next bordering Prince of all on that side towards the West vnto Babylonia, and Chaldæa: and in amitie with them from the beginning, and of their owne house, and bloud: which Diod: Siculus also confirmeth.

§. XI.

Of Tidal another of the foure Kings.

THe fourth King by Abraham ouerthrown was Tidal, King of the Nations. The Hebrew writes it Goiim, which Vatablus takes to be a proper name: Lyra of mixt people: Caluin of runnagates without habitation. Pererius out of Strabo, findes that Galilea was inhabited by diuers Nations, which were a mixt people: namely of Egyptians, Arabians, and Phœnicians. Nam tales sunt qui Galilæam habitant; Such are the inhabitants of Galilee, saith Strabo: and therefore was Tidal called King of these Nations, as they suppose. And it may be so: but the authoritie of Strabo is nothing in this question. For Galilea was not peopled at this time, as it was in the time of Strabo. For when Abraham came into Canaan, the Canaanite was then in the Land, howsoeuer they might be afterwards mixt, which I know not. But there are many petty kingdoms adioyning to Phœnicia, and Palæstina; as Palmyrena, Batanea, Laodicene, Apamena, Chalcidice, Cassiotis, Chalibonitis, and all these doe also ioyne themselues to Mesopotamia, on the North, and to Arabia on the East. And that these Nations gathered themselues together vnder Tidal, I take to be the probablest coniecture.

§. XII.

That Chedorlaomer the chiefe of the foure Kings was not of Assyria, but of Persia: and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impayred.

LAstly, whereas it is conceiued that Chedorlaomer was the Assyrian Emperor, and that Amraphel was but a Satrape, Viceroy, or Prouinciall gouernour of Babylonia, and that the other Kings named were such also, I cannot agree with Pererius in this. For Moses was too well acquainted with the names of Assur and Shinaar, to call the Assyrian a king of Elam: those kings being in the Scriptures euermore called by the name of Chaldea, Shinaar, Babylonia, or Assyria: but neuer by Elam; and Chedorlaomer or Kedarlaomer was so called of Kidor, from Cidarim which in the Hebrew signifieth Regale: for so Q. Curtius calleth the garment which the Persian Kings ware on their heads.

Neither doe I beleeue that the Assyrian or Babylonian Empire stood in any greatnesse at the time of this inuasion; and my reasons are these: First, example and experience teach vs, that those things which are set vp hastily, or forced violently, do not long last. Alexander became Lord of all Asia, on this side of Indus, in a time of so short a life, as it lasted not to ouer-looke what it selfe had brought forth. His fortunes were violent, but not perpetuall. For his Empire died at once with himselfe: all whose chiefe Commanders became kings after him. Tamberlaine conquered Asia and India with a storme-like and terrible successe: but to preualent furie God hath adioyned a short life: and whatsoeuer things Nature her selfe worketh in haste, she taketh the least care of their continuance. The fruit of his victories perished with him, if not before.

Ninus being the first whom the madnesse of boundlesse dominion transported, inuaded his neighbour Princes, and became victorious ouer them: a man violent, insolent, and cruell. Semiramis taking the opportunitie, and being more proud, aduenturous, and ambitious, than her Paramour: enlarged the Babylonian Empire, & beautified many places therein with buildings vnexampled. But her sonne hauing changed Nature and Condition with his Mother, proued no lesse feminine than she was masculine. And as wounds and wrongs, by their continuall smart, put the Patient in minde how to cure the one, & reuenge the other: so those Kings adioyning (whose subiection, & calamities incident, were but new, and therefore the more grieuous) could not sleepe, when the aduantage was offered by such a successour. For, in regno Babylonico hic parum resplenduit, this King shined little (saith Nauclerus of Ninias) in the Babylonian Kingdome. And likely it is that the neckes of mortall men hauing beene neuer before galled with the yoake of forraine dominion, nor hauing euer had experience of that most miserable and detested condition of liuing in slauerie: no long descent hauing as yet inuested the Assyrian with a right: nor any other title being for him pretended than a strong hand: the foolish and effeminate sonne of a tyrannous and hated Father, could very ill hold so many great Princes and Nations his vassals, with a powerlesse mastering, and a minde lesse industrious than his Father and Mother had vsed before him. And hee that was so much giuen ouer to licentious idlenesse, as to suffer his Mother to reigne 42. yeares, and thereof the greatest part after he came to mans estate: witnessed thereby to the World, that hee so much preferred ease before honour, & bodily pleasures before greatnesse, as he neither indeuoured to gaine what he could not gouerne, nor to keepe what hee could not without contentious perill enioy.

These Considerations being ioyned to the storie of Amraphel, deliuered by Moses, by which we find that Amraphel King of Shinaar was rather an inferiour to the King of Persia, than either his superiour, or equall; make it seeme probable, that the Empire of Ninus and Semiramis was at that time broken asunder, & restrained againe to Babylonia.

For conclusion I will adde these two arguments confirming the former: First, that at such time as it pleased God to impose that great trauaile vpon Abraham, from Vr in Chaldea to Charran, and then to Canaan, a passage of 700. miles, or little lesse, with women, children, and carriages: the Countries through which he wandred were then setled, and in peace. For it was in the 23. yeere of Ninias, when Abraham obeying the voyce of God, tooke this great iourney in hand: in which time of 23. yeares after the death of Semiramis, the neighbour Princes had recouered their libertie and former estates. For Semiramis Armie of foure millions, with her selfe vtterly consumed in India, & all her armies and engins of warre, at the same time lost, gaue an occasion and opportunitie euen to the poorest soules and weakest hearted creatures of the World, to repurchase their former libertie.

Secondly, it is affirmed by the best and ancientest Historians, that Arius the sonne of Ninias, or Amraphel, inuaded the Bactrians and Caspians, and againe subiected them: which needed not if they had not bin reuolted from Ninias, after Ninus death. And as Arius recouered one part, so did Baleus or Balaeus, otherwise Xerxes, reduce the rest reuolted to their former obedience. Of whom it is said that he conquered from Egypt to India: and therefore was called Xerxes, id est, Victor & triumphator, a conquerour and triumpher, which vndertakings had beene no other than the effects of madnesse, had not those Countries freed themselues from the Babylonian subiection. Now if we shall make any doubt hereof, that is, of the reconquest of Arius and Xerxes, both which liued after Ninus and Ninias, we may as well thinke the rest of Ninus and Semiramis to be but fained: but if we grant this reconquest, then is it true that while Ninias or Amraphel ruled, the Assyrian Empire was torne asunder, according to that which hath bin gathered out of Moses as before remembred.

§. XIII.

That it is not vnprobable that the foure Kings had no dominion in the Countries named, but that they had else-where with their colonies planted themselues: and so retained the names of the Countries whence they came: which if it be so, we neede not say that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our selues with many other difficulties.

THe consent of all writers, whose workes haue come to my perusall, agreeing as they doe, that these foure Kings, Amraphel of Shinaar, Chedorlaomer of Elam, and those fellowes, were Lords of those Regions, whereunto they are or seeme intituled: doth almost inforce vs to thinke that the history must so be vnderstood, as I haue deliuered. But if in this place, as often else-where in the Scriptures, the names of Countries may be set for people of those lands, or if (as Hierome hath it) Chedorlaomer was king of the Elamites, as Tidal was said to be of the Nations, that is, of people either wanting a fixed habitation, or gathered out of sundry regions: then may we otherwise conceiue of this Historie: remouing thereby some difficulties which men perhaps haue bin vnwilling to find, because they could not find how to resolue them. For as it had bin a strange coniecture to thinke that Arioch was drawne to assist the Persian, against the Sodomits, as far as from Pontus, where it is very vnlikely that Chedorlaomer was knowne, and almost impossible that the vale of Siddim should haue bin once named: so in true estimation it is a thing of great improbabilitie, that Chedorlaomer, if he were King of Persia alone, should passe through so great a part of the World, as the Countries of Assyria, Chaldea, Mesopotamia, Syria, and part of Arabia, and Canaan, to subdue those fiue Townes whose very names how they should come to his eare, being dis-ioynd by so many great nations of different languages, a wise man could hardly coniecture. And if all the Countries bordering Persia together with the Babylonian himself, yea the kingdome of Ellasar & that of Tidal, so far off remoued, were become his dependants, what reason can we find that might haue induced him to hearken after Sodome and Gomorrah: and when hee should haue sought the establishment of his new gotten Empire, by rooting out the posterity of Ninus (as Ninus had dealt by Pharnus of Media, and Zoroaster of Bactria) then to imploy the forces of Amraphel, & those other Kings, against fiue pettie Townes, leauing Tyrus and Sidon, & the great Citie of Damasco, with many other places of much importance, and far neerer vnto him, vnsubdued? Now as these doubts which may be alleadged against the first conquest of the vale of Siddim, are exceeding vehement: so are the obiections to be made against his reconquest of these fiue Cities, when they had reuolted, as forcible, yea and more, as being grounded partly vpon the Text it selfe. For first, what madnesse had it beene in that small Prouince to rebell against so powerfull a Monarche? Or if it were so that they dwelling farre from him, hoped rather to be forgotten, than that he should come or send to reclaime them: was it not more than madnesse in them, when his terrible armie approached, still to entertaine hope of euasion: yea to make resistance (being themselues a dissolute & therefore vnwarlike people) against the power of all the Nations betweene Euphrates, yea betweene themselues and the riuer of Indus?

Indus? Likewise on the part of Chedorlaomer we should find no great wisedome, if he knowing the weakenesse of this people, had raised such a world of men against them: whom by any Lieutenant, with small forces he might haue subdued. For the perpetuall inheritance of that little Countrie, was not sufficient to counteruaile one moneths charges of so huge an armie. How small then must his valour haue beene, who with so mightie preparations effected no more than the wasting of that Valley, wherein he left the Cities standing, taking no one of them; but returned well contented with a few prisoners, and the pillage of the Countrie, although he had broken their armie in the field? Now the Scriptures doe not of this inuasion (supposed so great) make any feareful matter: but
Gen. 14. 17. compose the two armies, as equally matcht, saying they were foure kings against fiue: yea, if the place be literally expounded, we shall find that Abraham slew all these kings, of which great slaughter no Historie makes mention: Neither will the reigne of Ninias who liued foure or fiue yeares longer, permit that he should haue died so soone: neither would Histories haue forgotten the manner of his death, if he had so strangely perished in Syria. Whereby it appeares, that these foure kings were not the same that they are commonly thought: nor their forces so great as opinion hath made them. It may therefore well be true, that these kings were such as many others, who in that age carried the same title: Lords and Commanders euery one of his owne company, which he carried forth as a Colonie, seeking place where to settle himself and them, as was the vsuall manner of those times.

Neither is it improbable, that Chedorlaomer leading a troupe of Persians, Amraphel some people out of Shinaar, and Tidal others gathered out of sundry places, might consort together, and make the weakest of the Countrie which lay about them, to pay them tribute. Whosoeuer will consider the beginning of the first booke of Thucydides, with the manner of discoueries, conquests and plantations, in the infancie of Greece; or the manner of the Saracens inuading Africa and Spaine, with almost as many kings as seuerall Armies: or the proceedings of the Spaniards in their new discoueries, passages, and conquests in the West-Indies: may easily perceiue, that it was neither vnusual, for the leaders of Colonies to receiue title from the people whom they conducted: nor to make alliances together, and breake them againe, disturbing sometimes one the other, sometimes helping in pursuit of a conquest. That Amraphel and his associates were such manner of Commanders, it may seeme the more likely, by the sloathfull qualitie of Ninias then reigning in Assyria: whose vnmanlike temper was such, as might well giue occasion to such vndertaking spirits, as wanted the imploiments whereunto they were accustomed in the reigne of Semiramis, rather to seeke aduentures abroad, than to remaine at home vnregarded: whilst others more vnworthy than themselues, were aduanced. If the consent of the whole streeme of writers vpon this place make this coniecture disagreeable to the Text, to the authoritie whereof all humane reason must subscribe, then we may hold our selues to the former coniecture, that Amraphel was Ninias: & that the power of his Ancestors being by his sloath decayed, he might well be inferiour to the Persian Chedorlaomer: or if this doe not satisfie, we may say that Amraphel was an Vnder king or Satrapa of Shinaar, vnder Ninias; who may be supposed to haue had his Imperiall seat in his Fathers Citie Nineue: and to haue preferred it before Shinaar and Babylon the Citie of his Mother, whom he hated as an vsurper of his right. But if it were possible that in a case not concerning any mans Saluation, & wherein therefore none hath cared to take great paines, all might erre: then can I thinke that the opinion, That those foure Kings were leaders of Colonies, sent out of the Countries named in the Text, and not Kings of the Countries themselues, is most consonant both to the condition of those times, and to the Scripture. And hereto adde that Chedorlaomer seemes rather called a Persian king, than King of Persia: and that Arioch (whose kingdome vndoubtedly was betweene Syria and Arabia) hauing beene a man of action, or being a worthy mans sonne, was very well pleased, to giue passage and assistance, to these Captaines or pettie Kings. These & such like things here to vrge, were but with circumstances to adorn a supposition, which either may stand without them, or if it must fall, is vnworthy to haue cost bestowed vpon it: especially considering, that it is not my intent to imploy any more time in making it good, but to leaue it wholly to the Readers pleasure, to follow any of these opinions, or any other, if he find any that shall seeme better than these. But of what Countries or people soeuer these foure were Kings, this expedition is the onely publique action that we we know of performed by Abraham. And as for other things belonging to his Storie, and of his ſonnes, and of his Nephews Eſau and Iacob, as they are regiſtred by Moſes, becauſe it is not our purpoſe, either to ſtand vpon things generally known to all Chriſtians, nor to repeate what hath beene elſewhere already ſpoken, nor to preuent our ſelues in things that may hereafter in due place be remembred, wee paſſe them here in ſilence. And becauſe in this Storie of Abraham and his poſteritie, there is much mention of Egypt: by which it appeares that euen in the time of Abraham, it was a ſetled and flouriſhing kingdome; it will not be amiſſe in the next place to ſpeake ſomewhat of the antiquities and firſt kings thereof.

CHAP. II.

Of the Kings of Ægypt from the firſt peopling of it after the Floud, to the time of the deliuerie of the Iſraelites from thence.

§. I.

A briefe of the names and times of the firſt Kings of Ægypt: with a note of the cauſes of difficulty in reſoluing of the truth in theſe points

SOone after the confuſion at Babel (as it ſeemes) Cham with many of his iſſue and followers (hauing doubtleſſe knowne the fertilitie of Egypt before the Eloud) came thither and tooke poſſeſſion of the Countrie; in which they built many Cities: and began the kingdome one hundred nintie one yeeres after the deluge. The ancient Gouernours of this Kingdome till ſuch time as Iſrael departed Egypt, are ſhewne in the Table following.

An. Mundi.	An. dil.
2269.	613.	Typhon } Hercules. } Orus.
2276.	620.	Seſoſtris the great.
2391.	735.	Seſoſtris the blinde.
2424.	768.	Buſiris or Oris the ſecond.
2438.	782.	Acenchere or Thermutis,
2476.	820.	or Meris.
2488.	832.	Ratheris or Atheris.
2497.	841.	Chencres drowned in the red Sea.

The Table, and eſpecially the Chronologie, is to be confirmed by probabilities & coniectures, becauſe in ſuch obſcurity, manifeſt & reſtleſſe truth cannot be found. For Saint Auguſtine, a man of exceeding great iudgement, and incomparable diligence, who had ſought into all antiquities, and had read the bookes of Varro, which now are loſt, yet omitted the ſucceſſion of the Egyptian Kings: which he would not haue don, if they had not beene more vncertaine than the Sicyonians, whom hee remembreth, than whom doubtleſſe they were more glorious. One great occaſion of this obſcurity in the Egyptian Story, was the ambition of the Prieſts: who, to magnifie their Antiquities, filled the Records (which were in their hands) with many leaſings, and recounted vnto ſtrangers the names of many Kings, that neuer reigned. What ground they had for theſe reports of ſuppoſed Kings, it ſhall appeare anon. Sure it is, that the magnificent workes and royall buildings in Egypt, such as are neuer found but in States that haue greatly flourished, witnesse that their Princes were of marueilous greatnesse, and that the reports of the Priests were not altogether false. A second cause of our ignorance in the Egyptian History, was the too much credulity of some good Authors, who beleeuing the manifold and contrary reports of sundry Egyptians, and publishing in their owne name such as pleased them best; haue confirmed them, and as it were inforced them vpon vs by their authority. A third and generall cause of more than Egyptian darkenesse in all ancient Histories, is the edition of many Authors by Iohn Annius, of whom (if to the censures of sundry very learned, I may adde mine) I thinke thus; That Annius hauing seene some fragments of those writers, and added vnto them what hee would, may be credited, as an auoucher of true Histories, where approued writers confirme him: but otherwise is to be deemed fabulous. Hereupon it commeth to passe that the account of Authors, either in the Chronologie or Genealogie of the Egyptian Kings, runs three altogether different wayes. The Christian writers, such as are ancient, for the most part follow Eusebius: Many late writers follow the edition of Annius his Authors: The prophane Histories follow Herodotus, Diodorus, and such others.

and

§. II.

That by the account of the Egyptian Dynasties, and otherwise, it appeares that Chams reigne in Egypt began in the yeere after the Floud, 191.

TO reconcile these, or gather out of them the times of the ancient Kings, about whom is most controuersie, the best meane is by helpe of the Dynasties: of whose continuance there is little or no disagreement. The account of the Dynasties (besides the authority of approued Authors) hath this good ground, that it agreeth for the most part, if not altogether, with the Histories of the Assyrians, Troians, Italians, &c. and others. The beginning of the 16. Dyn. is ioyned by generall consent, with the 43. yeere of Ninus: in which Abraham was borne. The twelue first Dynasties lasted each of them seuen yeeres, vnder the twelue, which were called the greater gods: so that all the yeers of their continuance were 84. The thirteenth Dynastie endured foureteen yeers: the fourteenth 26, the fifteenth 37. These three last, are said to haue beene vnder the three younger gods. So the fifteene first Dynasties lasted one hundred sixty one yeers. As I doe not therefore beleeue that the continuance of these Dyn. was such as hath been mentioned, beause Annius in such wise limits out their time: so I cannot reiect the account vpon this onely reason, that Annius hath it so: considering that both hitherto it hath passed as currant, and is greatly strengthened by many good reasons. For, whereas Eusebius placeth the beginning of the sixteenth Dynastie, in the yeere of Abrahams birth, as aforesaid: the reckoning is easily cast; by which the summe of 161. yeers, which according to our account were spent in the fifteene former, being subducted out of the sum of 352. yeers, which were between the Floud & Abrahams birth, shew that the beginning of the first Dynastie, which was the beginning of Chams reigne in Egypt, was in the yeere 191. As also by other probabilities the same may appeare. For it is generally agreed, that the multitude of mankinde which came into Shinaar, arriued at Babel, Anno à diluuio 131. In building the Tower were consumed fourtie yeers, as Glycas recordeth: whose report I haue elsewhere confirmed with diuers probabilities. That Cham was long in passing with his company, their Wiues, Children, Cattell, & substance, through all Syria then desolate, and full of Bogges, Forrests, and Bryers (which the Deluge and want of culture in one hundred seuentie one yeers had brought vpon it) no reasonable man will doubt. To this his passage therefore, and the seating of himselfe in Egypt, we allow twenty yeeres: & these summes being added together, to wit, one hundred thirty one yeers after the Floud, before they arriued at Babel, 40. yeeres for their stay there, and 20. for Chams passage into Egypt, and setling there, make vp the summe of 191. yeeres; at which time we said that Cham began his reigne in Egypt, in the beginning of the first Dynastie. And to this summe of 191. yeeres if wee adde the 161. yeeres of the 15. first Dynasties, as they are numbred in common account, we shall fall right with the yeere of Abrahams birth which was An. Dil. 352. And hereto omitting many other reasons, which might be brought to proue that these first Dynasties must needes haue beene very short, and not containing in the whole summe of their seuerall times aboue 161. yeares: Let it suffice that had they lasted longer, then either must Egypt haue beene peopled as soone as Babel after the Floud, or the Dynasties (as Mercator thinkes) must haue beene before the floud. That the arriuall at Babel was many yeares before the plantation of Egypt, after the floud, enough hath beene said to proue: and that the Dynasties were not before the floud, the number of the long-liu'd generations between Adam and the floud, which was lesse than the number of the Dynasties, may sufficiently witnesse. Or if we will thinke, that one life might (perhaps) be diuided into many Dynasties, then may this haue beene as well after the floud, as before: considering that the sonnes of Noah did not in euery Countrie erect such forme of Policie, as had beene vsed in the same ere the Deluge: but such, as the disposition of the people, the authoritie and power of the Conducter, together with many other circumstances, did induce or inforce them to.

§. III.

That these Dynasties were not diuers families of Kings, but rather successions of Regents, oft times many vnder one King.

THe short continuance of the Dynasties, doth shew that they were not seuerall races of Kings, as the vaunting Egyptians were wont to stile them. What they were it cannot certainly be warranted. For in restitutions of decayed antiquities, it is more easie to denie than to affirme. But this may be said partly vpon good circumstance, partly vpon the surest proofe, That it was the manner of the Egyptian Kings, to put the gouernment of the Countrie into the hands of some trustie Counsellor, only reseruing the Soueraignty to themselues, as the old Kings of France were wont to the Masters of the Palace, and as the Turke doth to the chiefe Visier. This is confirmed, first, by the number of the Dynasties, whereof many are vnder Cham, & more than one vnder Osiris or Mizraim; and must therefore haue beene successions, not of Kings, but rather of Counsailors and Regents. Secondly, by custome of such Princes borderers to Egypt, as are mentioned in the Scriptures of whom Abimelech the Philistim in his dealing with Abraham and Isaac about confederation, did nothing without Phicol Captaine of his Hoste; though in taking Abrahams wife, and in his priuate carriage, he followed his owne pleasure. Likewise of Abimelech the sonne of Gideon it was said: Is not he the sonne of Ierubbaal? and Zebul is his Officer? Also Ishbosheth the sonne of Saul, feared Abner the Captaine of the Hoste. Yea, Dauid himselfe hating Ioab for his crueltie, did not punish him in regard of his greatnesse, which was such, as was feared euen of Hadad the Edomite liuing then in Egypt. Thirdly, this is confirmed by the temper and disposition of Cham, who was lewd, as appeares by the Scriptures: therfore likely both for his owne idlenesse and pleasure, to haue laid the burden of gouernment vpon others; and vpon iealousie, the companion of vnworthinesse, to haue changed his Lieutenants often. Aboue all other proofes is the aduancement of Ioseph by Pharaoh. For Pharaoh said to Ioseph; Onely in the Kings throne will I be aboue thee: behold, I haue set thee ouer all the Land of Egypt. William Archbishop of Tyre, who flourished about the yeare of our Lord, one thousand one hundred eightie, affirmes that the like or very same forme of gouernment by Viceroys, was in his time practised in Egypt, hauing there beene in vse (as he beleeued) euer since the time of Ioseph. He plainely shewes, that the Soldans of Egypt were not Lords of the Countrie, how euer they haue beene so deemed: but that they acknowledged and humbly performed the dutie of subiects vnto the Caliphe: who residing in a most magnificent Palace in Cairo, did commit the charge, not onely of ciuill gouernment, but the power of making warre and peace, with the whole office & authority royall into the Soldans hands. He that shall reade in William of Tyre, the state of the Caliphes, or Malene Elhadech, with the forme of his Court, shall plainly behold the image of the ancient Pharaoh, ruling by a Lieutenant, as great in authority as Ioseph was, though farre inferiour in wisedome.

Will. Tyr. de bell. Sacro. l. 19. c. 17. 18. 19. & 20.

Lib. 19. c. 20.

To thinke that many names of such Regents or Lieutenants as Ioseph was, haue crept into the List of the Egyptian Kings, were no strange imagination. For Iosephs brethren called him, The man that is Lord of the Land, and the Lord of the Countrie: Besides, it is not vnlikely that the vain-glorious Egyptian Priests would as easily report him a King to posterity, as ignorant men & strangers deeme him such, vnder whose hand all dispatches

Gen. 42. 30. & 33.

of importance, and royall managing of the State had passed, whilest that the King himselfe intending his quiet, had giuen his office to another. How strangers haue mistaken in this kinde, the example already cited of Iosephs brethren, doth sufficiently witnesse. The reports of Priests doe appeare in Diodorus, and Herodotus: each of whom, citing their relations, as good authority, say; Diodorus, that Sesostris was the nineteenth King after Menas; Herodotus, that he was the 332. after Menas: which could not haue beene, if Menas had beene Adam. Therfore we may well conclude, That the Dynasties were not so many races of Kings, but successions of Regents, appointed by the kings of so many sundry linages or sorts of men. Now by whatsoeuer meanes a Dynastie or Regencie continued: whether in one familie, as being made an hereditary office: or in one order of men, as held by faction: sure it is that it was the Kings gift and free choyce, that gaue the office. But the Crowne royall alwayes passed by descent, & not by election: which (besides consent of Authors) the Scriptures also proue. For whereas Ioseph bought all the land of Egypt for Pharaoh, if the Crowne had passed by election, then should Pharaoh's children hereby either haue beene inthralled amongst the rest of the people, to the next successor: or inioying their Fathers land, though not his estate, haue been more mighty than the king: as Land-lords of all Egypt, and the king himselfe their Tenant. Likewise we finde in Exod. 12. that God smote the first borne of Pharaoh, that was to sit on his Throne. And in Esay it is said of Pharaoh: I am the sonne of the ancient King.

Esay 19.

Of Cham, and his sonne Mizraim, or Osiris.

THat the succession of Kings began, and continued in such wise as the Table hath shewed from Cham to Chencres, now it followeth to shew. Egypt is called in the Scripture the land of Ham. That this name is not giuen to it, because the posterity of Cham did reigne there, but for that himself did first plant it, we may gather by many circumstances. For I thinke it is no where found, that the Countries of Cush, Put, or Canaan, as well as Egypt, were called the Land of Ham. Further, it is found in Diodorus Siculus, that Osiris calleth himselfe the eldest sonne of Cham, saying; Mihi pater Saturnus deorum omnium iunior: also, Sum Saturni filius antiquior, germen ex pulchro & generoso ortum: which must needes be vnderstood of Cham: for this Saturnus Egyptius was Cham: as it is said, that on the monument of Ninus was an inscription, wherein Cham was called Saturnus Ægyptius. Likewise the Temple of Hammon, not farre from Ægypt, doth testifie, that Ham resided in those parts: And S. Hierome in quæstionibus Hebraicis, saith, that the Egyptians themselues did in his dayes call their Countrie Ham: as in foure seuerall places in the Psalmes this Countrie is called the land of Cham. And Ortelius, noting out of Plutarch in Osiride, that in the sacrifices of the Egyptians this Countrie of Egypt was called Chemia, expounds it for Chamia, vt puto (saith he) à Chamo Noes filio, to which also he addeth out of Isidore, Ægyptum vsq; hodie Ægyptiorum lingua Kam vocari: that Egypt vnto this day in the tongue of the Egyptians is called Kam. For the beginning and continuance of Chams reigne, the same reasons may suffice to be alleadged, which I haue already giuen in proofe of the time spent in the 15. first Dynasties: Neither is it strange that the reigne of Cham should last so long as 161. yeeres: considering that Sem liued 600: Arphachshad and Shelah each aboue 400. But strange it had beene, if one Saltis created by Manetho, had in those long-liued generations reigned there 19. yeeres, and with Beon, Apachnas, Apochis, and others of the same brood, obscured the fame and glory of Osiris, Orus, and Sesostris. Reineccius in histor. Iulia, placeth Mizraim next, otherwise called Osiris according to Diodorus: who, saith he, was the sonne of Hammon: Krentzhemius saith that Mizraim and Osiris are words of neere affinitie and sound in the Hebrew tongue. Howsoeuer it be, we know that Mizraim the sonne of Cham, was Lord of Egypt, and Reineccius citing good authoritie in this case, affirmeth that Egypt is now called by the naturals in their owne language, Mezre. Neither doe I see cause of doubt whether Osiris were the same with Mizraim. It is more necessary, & hard to shew manifestly, how long Mizraim or Osiris reigned. For whereas the yeere of his death is no where precisely set downe, we must be faine to follow probabilities. That he is not vainly said by Annius his Berosus, to haue begun his reigne at the birth of Abraham, when the Dynastie of the Thebai began, it appeareth, first, by the authoritie of Eusebius: who

auoucheth as much; next by Diodorus, who saith that he inhabited Thebes: which habitation of Osiris there, that it might be cause of that Dynasty, I can well beleeue; affeeming so farre to Reinecius, who thinkes the Dynasties were named onely, according to the seuerall seates of the kings.

§. V.

Of the time when Osiris reigne ended: and that Iacob came into Egypt in the time of Orus the sonne of Osiris.

THe death of Osiris, when it was, none can certainely affirme. The onely coniecture that I know is made thus: Lebabim the sonne of Mizraim called Hercules Lybius, made warre in Italy, to reuenge his Fathers death, on the associates of Typhon, in the 41. yeare of Baleus King of Assyria: before which yeare hee had made many great warres in Egypt, Phœnicia, Phrygia, Crete, Lybia, and Spaine: and hauing ended his Egyptian warres, left the Kingdome to Orus. Thus farre Berosus, or Authors following Berosus. That Orus last of all the gods (as they were stiled) held the Kingdome of Isis, Diodorus Siculus plainely saith: and Plutarch as much; to which all Histories agree. Krentzhemius hereupon inferres, that sixe yeares may be allowed to the warres, which Hercules made in so many Countries, after the Egyptian warres were ended: so should the death of Osiris haue beene the 34. of Baleus, when himselfe had reigned 29. yeares. I thinke that Krentzhemius was a greater Scholler than Souldier. For surely in those dayes when commerce was not such as now, but all Nauigation made by coasting, a farre longer time would haue beene required, to the subduing of so many Countries. An allowance of more time though it would alter his computation, yet would it well agree with his intent: which was (doubtlesse) to finde the truth. If according to his account the death of Osiris had beene the 34. of Baleus, then must Israel haue come into Egypt but seuen yeares before the death of Osiris: and haue liued there in the reigne of Typhon. A thing not easily beleeued. For it was the same king who aduanced Ioseph, bade him send for his Father, and gaue him leaue to goe into Canaan, to the performance of his Fathers Funerall: as may easily be gathered out of the booke of Genesis. Whereas therefore the reigne of Osiris cannot be extended by any possible allowance in account of times, beyond the seuenth yeare of Israels comming into Egypt: we must needes cut off 23. yeares from that number, which Krentzhemius coniectures his reigne to haue continued: namely seuen which hee should haue liued after Iacobs comming into Egypt; nine in which Ioseph had there flourished, ere his fathers comming: and other seuen in which Typhon and Hercules had reigned after the death of Osiris, yet before Iosephs aduancement.

Diod. Sic. l. 1. c. 1. Plut. de Isid. & Osid.

Neither will this disagree with the time of Hercules Lybius his wars. For the war which Hercules made in Italy, is said to haue indured 10. years: After which proportion we may well giue not onely sixe years, as Krentzhemius doth, but 23. more to so many wars in so many and so far distant Countries, as are named before: yea, by this proportion we may attribute vnto Orus the 13. yeares, which passed betweene the time of Iosephs being sold into Egypt, vnto his aduancement, considering that Putiphar who bought him, & whose daughter he may seeme to haue married, continued all that while chiefe Steward vnto Pharaoh; a thing not likely to haue been, if so violent alterations had happned the whilest in Egypt, as the tyrannous vsurpation of Typhon must needes haue brought in. If citing some fragment of a lost old Author, I should confidently say, that Putiphar for his faithfulnesse to Orus, the sonne of Osiris, was by him in the beginning of his reigne made his chiefe Steward: at which time buying Ioseph, and finding him a iust man, & one vnder whose hand all things did prosper, he rather committed his estate into Iosephs hands, than vnto any of his Egyptian followers (many of whom he had found either false-hearted, or weake and vnlucky in the troublesome dayes of Typhon) I know not what could be obiected against this. Perhaps I might proceed further, and say, That when the saying of Ioseph pleased Pharaoh, and all his seruants; then Putiphar Priest of On, being chiefe Officer to Pharaoh, did acknowledge in Ioseph, the ancient graces of God, & his iniurious imprisonment: whereupon he gaue him his daughter to wife, and being old, resigned his office of chiefe Steward vnto him; who afterward in regard of Putiphar, did take out the Priests, when hee bought the lands of all other Egyptians. This might appeare to some a tale not vnlike to the Frierly book of Aſenath, Putiphars daughter: but vnto ſuch as conſider that God workes vſually by meanes; and that Putaphar was the Steward of that King, vnder whom Iacob died: it would ſeeme a matter not probable, had it an Author of ſufficient credit to auouch it. Concerning the warres of Hercules, in which by this reckoning hee ſhould haue ſpent 42. yeares after he left Egypt, ere he began in Italy, it is a circumſtance which (the length of his Italian wars conſidered, and his former enterpriſes & atchieuements proportioned to them) doth not make againſt vs, but for vs: or if it vvere againſt vs, yet could it not ſo weaken our ſuppoſition, as theſe probabilities collected out of the vndiſputable truth of Scripture do confirm it. Neuertheleſſe I freely grant that all theſe proofes are no other, than ſuch as may be gathered out of Authors, not vvell agreeing, nor to be reconciled in ſuch obſcurity, otherwiſe than by likelihoods, anſwerable to the holy Text.

§. VI.

Of Typhon, Hercules, Ægyptus, Orus, and the two Seſoſtres, ſucceſſiuely reigning after Mizraim: and of diuers errors about the former Seſoſtres.

CONcerning the reigne of Typhon, and of Hercules, I find none that preciſely doth define how long either of them continued. Daniel Angelocrator giueth three yeares to Typhon, omitting Hercules. But he is ſo peremptory vvithout proofe, as if his own word were ſufficient authority, in many points very queſtionable; alleadging no vvitneſſe, but as it were ſaying, Teſte me ipſo: yet herein wee may thinke him to ſpeake probably, foraſmuch as the learned Krentzhemius affirmeth, that Hercules did very ſoone vndertake his Fathers reuenge; and was not long in performing it: and that leauing Egypt to his brother, hee followed other warres, in the ſame quarrell, as hath beene ſhewed before. True it is, that I cannot collect (as Krentzhemius doth) out of Beroſus, that Hercules reigned after Typhon: yet ſeeing Auentinus a follower of Beroſus hath it ſo, I will alſo beleeue it. That in the reigne of Typhon and Hercules, ſeuen yeares were ſpent, howſoeuer diuided betweene them, I gather out of Krentzhemius only, who placeth the beginning of Orus ſeuen yeares after the death of Oſiris: forgetting to ſet downe his reaſons, which in a matter ſo probable I thinke he vvanted not. Now vvhereas he alloweth 90. yeares of the eighteenth Dynaſtie to Oſiris, Typhon, Hercules, and Orus: it ſeemes that the reigne of Orus laſted 115. yeares. From the death of Orus to the departure of Iſrael out of Egypt, there paſſed 122. yeares by our account: who (according to Beroaldus and others) thinke that Abraham was borne in the 130. yeare of Terah, and thereupon reckon thus. which ſumme diuers other wayes may be collected. Since therfore to the departure out of Egypt, there doe remaine (as is aforeſaid) onely 122. yeares from the death of Orus: we are now to conſider how many of them are to be allowed vnto Seſoſtris or Seſonchoſis: who is placed next vnto Orus, by authority of the Scholiaſtes Apollonij: not without good probability. For this great king or conquerour, is by many Hiſtories recorded to haue ouer-run a great part of Aſia: to haue built a fleet of ſhips on the red Sea: and ſo to haue entred into India: likewiſe with another fleet on the middle-earth Seas, to haue paſſed into Europe, and ſubdued many Nations. This is he (as Reineccius iudgeth) whom Iuſtine erring in account of his time calleth Vexoris: For Iuſtine placeth Vexoris in ages before Ninus; whereby it would follow that Seſoſtris, if he were Vexoris, was more ancient than was Oſiris (otherwiſe Mizraim) a thing altogether vnlikely. Certaine it is that after the departure of Iſrael out of Egypt, no one Pharaoh came into the land of Canaan (which lieth in the way from Egypt into Aſia) till the Father in law of Salomon, Pharaoh Vaphres, tooke Gezer, and gaue it to his daughter: (as vvee may reade more at large in the holy Hiſtory of the Bible) after vvhich time Seſac oppreſſed Rehoboam, and Necho ſought paſſage through the land of Iſrael, vvhen hee made his expedition againſt the Chaldeans. Of King Vaphres and Necho it is out of queſtion, that neither of them vvas the great King Seſoſtris. Of Seſac it is doubted by ſome, foraſmuch as hee came into Iudea with vvith a great armie. Reineccius propounding the doubt, leaueth it vndecided; vnlesse it be sufficient proofe of his owne opinion, that he himselfe placeth Sesostris next to Orus: following the Scholiastes Apollonij. But further answer may be made to shew that they were not one. For, as Iustine witnesseth, Sesostris, otherwise Vexoris, made war on people farre remoued, abstaining from his neighbours. Sesac came vp purposely against Hierusalem. Sesostris, as Diodorus witnesseth, had but 24000. horse, Sesac had 60000. Sesostris had 8020. charriots, Sesac but 1200. Sesostris made his expedition for no priuate purpose, but to get a great name: Sesac, as most agree, had no other purpose than to succour Ieroboam, and giue him countenance in his new reigne; whom he had fauoured euen against Salomon: therefore Sesostris must needes haue reigned whilest Israel abode in Egypt.

Whereas Krentzhemius collecteth out of Herodotus, and Diodorus, that one Menas, or Menu, was next to Orus: because those Historians affirme that he reigned next after the gods; it moueth me nothing. For Osiris did succeede those fifteene gods, namely, the twelue greater, and three lesser: himselfe also (as the learned Reineccius noteth) being called Menas. Which name, as also Menaus, and Menu, were titles of dignity; though mistaken by some as proper names. Krenzhemius doth very probably gather, that Menas was Mercurius Ter-maximus; the Hebrew word Meni signifying an Arithmetician, which name Ter-maximus might vvell bee attributed to Osiris, vvho vvas a great Conquerour, Philosopher, and Benefactor to mankinde, by giuing good Lawes, and teaching profitable Arts. In prowesse and great vndertakings Sesostris vvas no whit inferiour to Osiris. For he sought victory not for gaine, but for honour onely: and being vvell contented, that many Nations had acknowledged his power, and submitted themselues to his vvill and royall disposition, leauing them in a manner to their liberty, returned into Egypt. Soone vpon his returne he vvas endangered by a great Treason, the house in vvhich he was, being by his owne brother purposely fired: vvhich neuertheless hee is said to haue escaped, and to haue reigned in all thirty three yeares: after which time he chose rather to die than to liue; because he fell blinde. Both Herodotus, and Diodorus, affirme that Sesostris left a sonne, vvhose name vvas Pheron or Pherones: who afterwards tooke the name of Sesostris; but was nothing like to his Father in glory: for he shortly fell blinde. The cause of his blindnesse Herodotus attributes to his assaulting the Riuer Nilus vvith a saueline: which tale Diodorus hauing likewise heard, yet reports as a fable, saying that perhaps he tooke the disease naturally from his Father. How long this man reigned it is no where expressed: yet forasmuch as Orus the second, (otherwise Busiris) vvho succeeded him, began 14. yeares after that this Sesostris had beene king, it must needes bee that this reigned 14. yeares at least. That Busiris began not vntill these 14. yeares at least were expired, the very account of time from the first of Busiris, to the departure of Israel out of Egypt, plainely shewes, being almost generally agreed vpon, to haue beene 75. yeares. That none came betweene Sesostris the second, and Busiris or Orus the second, it stands onely vpon probabilities: vvhich are these. After Sesostris had reigned some while, hee fell blinde; after certaine yeares he recouered his sight, as is said: which may haue been true, but is more like to haue beene a fable: surely the manner of his recouery as it is set downe, is very fabulous: namely, that by looking vpon a woman, or vvashing his eyes with her vvater, who had onely knowne her owne husband, hee got his sight againe. As the time of his reign, before his blindnesse, and when he was vvell again (if euer he were) may haue taken vp a good part of 14. yeeres: so his vvorkes which vvere great, do much more strongly argue, that his reigne vvas not very short. His works are largely set down by Herodotus, and Diodorus: a part of vvhich may seeme to haue beene the finishing of that which his Father had begun, about the channels and sluces of Nilus: vvhom I think he rather frighted, (as his Father had done) with spades and shouels, than with darts, and iauelins; and by his diligent ouersight of that worke, vvas like enough to lose both his eye-sight and his peoples loue; whom his Father had very busily employed in excessiue labour about it.

§. VII.

Of Busiris the first oppressor of the Israelites; and of his successor Queen Thermutis that took vp Moses out of the water.

AND herein (if I may presume to coniecture) Busiris, who was afterwards king, is like to haue dealt with him, as Ieroboam did with the sonne of Salomon. For that Busiris himselfe vvas much addicted to magnificent workes, it vvell appeared, by the drudgery vvherewith he wearied the children of Israel in his buildings: If therefore he were emploied by the great Sesostris, as Ieroboam was by Salomon, in the ouersight of those businesses, he had good opportunity to worke his greatnesse with the king by industry; and afterward with the people by incensing them against their new king, as Ieroboam did. For what the multitude will endure at one Princes hands, they will not at anothers: vnlesse hee haue either an equall spirit, or a surer foundation. If moreouer he sought to deriue all the paine and labour of publique workes from the Egyptians, to the Israelites: hee surely did that which to his owne people was very plausible: who (as appeares in Exodus) were nothing slack in fulfilling the kings cruelty. Now that Orus the second, or Busiris, was the king that first oppressed Israel, and made the Edict of drowning the Hebrew children, which (saith Cedrenus) lasted ten moneths: it is a common opinion of many great and most learned writers; who also thinke that hereupon grew the fable of Busiris sacrificing strangers. It is also a common interpretation of that place, Exod. 1. that the King who knew not Ioseph, was a king of a new family. That Busiris was of a new family, Reinecius doth shew; who also thinkes him Author of the bloudy Edict. Neuertheless, true it is, that Busiris, according to all mens computation, began his reigne fiue yeares after the birth of Moses; before whose birth it is most manifest, that the Law was made, and much more that the persecution began; which Bunting thinkes to haue lasted 87. yeares, ere the departure out of Egypt. Let vs therefore consider, besides the blindnesse of Sesostris the second, how great the power of the Regents or Vice-Royes in Egypt was; & how great confidence the kings did put in them; seeing Ioseph ruled with such full power, that hee bought all Egypt, and all the Egyptians for bread; giuing at the same time the best of the land to his own father and brethren, for nothing: seeing also that when the Egyptians cried out vpon Pharaoh, for bread; Pharaoh said to all the Egyptians, Go to Ioseph; what he saith to you, do ye. If to a stranger borne, lately fetcht out of prison, a king well able to haue gouerned himselfe, would giue such trust, & souereign authority; it is not vnlikely that a blind Prince should do it to a man of especial reputation. For God often prospers, not only the good (such as Ioseph was) but wicked men also, as his instruments against the day of wrath. Therfore perhaps the king did (as many haue done) resigne his kingdome to him, though his reigne was not accounted to haue begun, till the death of Sesostris. But whether Busiris did vsurpe the kingdome, or protection of the land by violence: or whether the blind king resigned it, keeping the title; or whether Busiris were only Regent, whilst the king liued, & afterwards (as is acknowledged by all) king himselfe: it might well be said that Pharaohs daughter tooke vp Moses, and that Pharaoh vexed Israel; seeing he both at that time was king in effect, and shortly after king in deed and title both. It were not absurd for vs to say that the blind king Sesostris the second oppressed Israel: but forasmuch as it may seeme that the wicked Tyrant shewed his euill nature euen when he first arose: I thinke it more likely, that Busiris did it, vsing at first the power of a king, and shortly after the stile. Thus of the 122. yeares vvhich passed betweene the beginning of Sesostris his reigne, & the departure of Israel out of Egypt, 47. being spent; the 75. which remain, are to be accounted to Busiris or Orus the second, and his children. Busiris himselfe reigned 30. yeares, according to Eusebius: whom very many iudicious authors herein approue. After him his daughter, who tooke Moses out of the vvater, is said by all that I haue read, to haue reigned 12. years. Her name vvas Thermutis Pharei: or Muthis according to Cedrenus: Euseb. cals her Acencris; and out of Artabanus his History Meris: Ioseph cals her both Acenchere, & Thermutis. Epiphanius in Panario saith that shee was honoured afterward of the Egyptians, by the name of Thermutis the daughter of Amenoph, the son of Pharaoh. Of this last title question might be made, and much spoken: for the Scriptures call her not Pharaohs sons daughter, but Pharaohs daughter. Amenophis indeed is set next before Busiris or Orus the second by Eusebius & others:

but whether he were a King or onely a Regent, I cannot coniecture. For Herodotus Diodorus, and the ancient Historians name the sonne of Sesostris, Pheron. Perhaps his name was Pharaoh Amenophis: and his daughter by the Egyptians called rather the Neece or Grand-child, than the daughter of Pharaoh because of the glory of Sesostris, & the dis-reputation of his son. If so, and if that Busiris or Orus the second marrying her, pretended any title by her, then is our coniecture strengthened, and then was shee both daughter, grand-childe, and wife vnto Pharaoh: and surviuing him, Queene of the land, 12. yeares. But if she were daughter of Orus the second, and sister of Atheris, or Ratheris, as many thinke, to whose coniecture I will not oppose mine, then may it seeme, that either her brethren were degenerate, or too young to rule, when her Father died.

§. VIII.

Of the two brethren of Queene Thermutis: and what king it was, vnder whom Moses was borne: and who it was that perished in the red Sea.

SHee had two brethren: the one was Ratheris or Atheris, who succeeded her; the other Telegonus, vvho is onely named by Eusebius; but his linage and off-spring described by Reineccius. Ratheris after his sisters death reigned nine yeares: after whom Chencres, thought to be his sonne, reigned ten years, and then perished in the red Sea. During the reigne of Chencres, Eusebius saith, that Telegonus begat Epaphus vpon Io: of which History elsewhere he reporteth otherwise. After the death of Chencres (whom some call Acencheres: but all or most doe stile θεόμαχον, a fighter against God) Acherres reigned 8. yeares, and then Cherres 15. This descent seems from Father to Sonne. In the 11. yeere of Cherres it is said by Eusebius, that Epaphus reigning in the lower part of Egypt, built Memphis. This is an argument of that which otherwise was not vnlikely: viz. That Egypt was greatly brought out of order by the plagues which God had laid vpon it, and the destruction of her king and army in the red Sea: else could it not haue had two reigning in it at once; the latter of whom, or his posterity seemes to haue taken all from Cherres the grand-childe of Chencres. For whereas Armais is said to haue reigned foure yeares after Cherres: and Armesis one after Armais: these two Kings are by Eusebius and others accounted as one, and his reigne said to haue beene fiue years. His name is called Armeus, otherwise Danaus: and his pedigree thus described by Reineccius in Historia Iulia.

Telegonus:
Epaphus:
Lybia, who had

Agenor, Belus, and Busiris.

Ægyptus or Rameſſes who gaue name to the Country, hauing expelled his brother Danaus, reigned, and begat Lynceus, married to Hypermneſtra.

Danaus or Armeus expelled by his brother Ægyptus, after hee had reigned fiue years, became king of Argos in Greece: was Father to Hypermneſtra.

How it might come to passe that the Nephewes sons of Epaphus should haue occupied the kingdome after Cherres, it is hard to say: considering that Epaphus himself is reported by Eusebius to haue beene borne in the time of Chencres. But forasmuch as the History of Epaphus his birth, is diuersly related by Eusebius, it may suffice, that Belus the father of Danaus & Ægyptus, otherwise called Armeus and Rameſſes, was equally distant from Busiris or Orus the second, with Cherres the grand-childe of Chencres. And that the posterity of Telegonus did marry very yong, it appears by the History of these two brethren, Danaus and Ægyptus: of whom the former had 50. daughters, the latter 50. sonnes: perhaps, or rather questionlesse, by diuers Women: yet surely they began to beget children in their first youth: How wsoeuer it were, the generall consent of writers is, that Armeus or Danaus did succeede Cherres: and (according to Eusebius and good Authors approuing him) reigned fiue yeares. Rameſſes followed, who reigned 68. yeares. This Rameſſes or Ægyptus is that Armeſeſmiamum or Armeſeſmiamus, vnder whom, in the opinion of Mercator, and of Bunting that followes Mercator, Moſes was borne: and the cruell Edict made of drowning the Hebrew children. The length of his reigne seemes to me the chiefe, if not the onely ground of Mercators opinion. For whereas the Lord said to Moſes, Goe, returne to Egypt, for they are all dead which were about to kill thee: Mercator hereupon conceiues, that it was one and the same king vnder whom Moſes was born, and vnder whom he slew the Egyptian at the 40. yeare of his age: and fled into the wilderneſſe, and there abode for feare: all which circumstances could agree with none, but this Rameſſes, who reigned so long: wherefore desirous rather to hold a true Paradox, than a common errour, he placeth one Alisfragmuthoſis (whose name is found in the list of Egyptian kings, but the time vncertaine wherein he reigned) in an age 112. or 113. yeares more ancient than others left him in: and so continuing the Catalogue of his succeſſors from Thmoſis (whom Eusebius cals Amoſis) downewards with no other variation of the length of each mans reigne, than is the difference betweene Manetho and Euſebius, he findes Moſes borne vnder Armeſeſmiamum, and Israel deliuered in the dayes of his sonne Amenophis. The very name of Alisfragmuthoſis seems to him with little alteration to sound like Pharatates, of which name one was thought to haue flouriſhed either as a king, or a wiſe man about the time of Isaac. For (saith he) from Alisfragmuthoſis to Phragmuthoſis, Pharmuthoſis, or Pharatates, the change is not great. Mercator was a man of excellent learning and industry: and one to whom the World is bound for his many notable works: yet my assent herein is with-held from him, by these reasons. First, I see all other writers agree, that Chencres was king who was drowned in the red Sea: Secondly, the place, Exod. 4. all are dead, &c. may better be vnderstood of Buſiris and all his children, than of one King alone: Thirdly, Saint Cyrill in his first booke against Iulian the Apoſtata, saith that Dardanus built Dardania, when Moſes was 120. yeares old: Rameſſes, which was this Armeſeſmiamum, being then King of Egypt. After Rameſſes, Amenophis reigned 19. yeares: who is thought by Mercator, and peremptorily by Bunting pronounced, to be the King that periſhed in the red Sea: of which our opinion being already laied open, I thinke it most expedient to referre the kings ensuing to their owne times (which a Chronologicall Table shall lay open) and here to speake of that great deliuerance of Israel out of Egypt: which for many great considerations depending thereupon, wee may not lightly ouerpaſſe.

CHAP. III.

Of the deliuery of Israel out of Egypt.

§. I.

Of the time of Moses birth, and how long the Israelites were oppressed in Egypt.

THe it is that the History it selfe is generally and well known: yet concerning the time of Moses his birth, who was the excellent and famous instrument of this and other great workes of the Highest, the different opinions are very neere as many, as the men that haue written of that Argument. Liues in his annotations vpon Saint Augustine citeth very many of their coniectures; as that of Porphyrie out of Sanchoniate, that Moses liued in the time of Semiramis: But if hee did meane the first Semiramis, it was but a fond conceit; for besides that the same is contrary to all Stories Diuine and humane, while that Semiramis liued, shee commanded Syria, and all the parts thereof absolutely: neither were the Ammonites, or Moabites, or Edomites, while she ruled, in rerum natura.

A second opinion hee remembreth of Appion, taken from Ptolomy a Priest of Mendes, who saith that Moses was borne while Inachus did rule the Argiues, and Amesis in Egypt.

The third opinion is taken out of Polemon, in his Greeke History the first Booke: that Moses was borne while Apis the third King ruled Argos.

A fourth is borrowed from Tatianus Assyrius, who though hee cite some authorities, that Moses liued after the Troian war, is himselfe of opinion, that Moses was farre more ancient, proouing it by many arguments.

Fiftly, he setteth downe the testimony of Numenius the Philosopher, who tooke Musæus and Moses to be one: confirming the same out of Artapanus, who confesseth that Moses was called Musæus, by the Grecians: and who farther deliuereth that he was adopted by Chenephis, or Thermutis, the daughter of Egypt: the same which Eupolemus calleth Meris; others (as Rabanus Maurus) Thermothes. Eusebius also affirmeth, that by Eupolemus in his first booke de bono, Moses, vir Deo coniunctissimus, is called Musæus Iudeorum. Eusebius in his Chronology, findes that Moses was borne while Amenophis ruled Egypt. The ancient Manethon calls that Pharao, which liued at Moses birth, Thumosis or Thmosis: the same perchance which Appion the Grammarian will haue to be Amosis, and elsewhere Amenophis the Father of Sethosis: to whom Lysimachus and Cornelius Tacitus gaue the name of Bocchoris. To me it seemes most probable, that while Saphrus, called also Spherus or Iphereus, gouerned Assyria; Orthopolis, Sicyonia; and Criasus the Argiues; that then (Sesostris the second ruling in Egypt) Moses was borne. For if wee beleeue S. Augustine, it was about the end of Cecrops time, that Moses led Israel out of Egypt. Eduxit Moses ex Ægypto populum Dei nouissimo tempore Cecropis Athenienſium Regis: Moses (saith he) led the people of God out of Egypt, about the end of Cecrops time, King of the Athenians. In this sort therefore is the time of Moses birth, and of his departure out of Egypt best proued. S. Augustine affirmes (as before remembred) that Moses was borne, Saphrus gouerning Assyria; and that hee left Egypt about the end of Cecrops time. Now Saphrus ruled 20. yeares; his successor Mamelus 30. yeares; Sparetus after him 40. yeares: in whose fourth yeare Cecrops began to gouerne in Attica: Ascatades followed Sparetus, and held the Empire 41: So as Moses being borne while Saphrus ruled Assyria; Orthopolis Sicyonia; and Criasus Argos (for these three kings liued at once at his birth, saith S. Augustine, as Cecrops did when he departed Egypt) it will follow that the birth of Moses was in the nineteenth yeare of the Assyrian Saphrus: for take one yeare remaining of 20. (for so long Saphrus reigned) to which adde the thirty yeares of Mamelus, melus, and the 40. years of Sparetus, these make 71. with which there were vvasted three yeares of Cecrops his 50. years: then take nine yeares out of the reigne of Ascatades, who was Sparetus successour, those nine yeares added to 71. make 80. at which age Moses left Egypt: and adde these nine yeares to the three yeares of Cecrops formerly spent, there will remaine but foure yeares of Cecrops his 50. and so it falleth right with S. Augustines words, affirming that towards the end of Cecrops his time, Moses led the people of Israel out of Egypt.

Now the time in which the Hebrewes were oppreſt in Egypt, seemeth to haue had beginning some eight or nine years before the birth of Moses, & 54. yeare, or rather more, after Ioseph: betweene vvhose death and the birth of Moses, there were consumed 64. yeares: some of vvhich time, and 80. yeares after, they liued in great seruitude and misery. For as it is vvritten in Exodus: They set taske-masters ouer them, to keepe them vnder with burdens: and they built the Cities, Pithom and Ramases, &c. And by cruelty they caused the children of Israel to serue; and made them weary of their liues, by sore labour in clay and bricke, and in all worke of the field, with all manner of bondage. All vvhich laid vpon them by a mastering power and strong hand, they endured to the time by the vvisedome of God appointed: euen from 54. yeares, or not much more after the death of Ioseph, who left the World when it had lasted 2370. yeares, to the eightieth yeare of Moses, and vntill he vvrought his miracles in the field of Zoan, vvhich he performed in the Worlds age 2514. towards the end thereof, according to Codoman, or after our account, 2513. And because those things vvhich we deliuer of Egypt, may the better bee vnderstood, I thinke it necessary to speak a few words of the principall places therein named, in this discourse.

Of diuers Cities and places in Egypt, mentioned in this Story, or elsewhere in the Scripture.

Numb. 33. Ezekiel 30. Hierem. 2. 43. 44. 46. Ioseph. l. 1. c. 9. Tyr. de Bel. sac. l. 19. c. 23.

THis City vvhich the Hebrewes call Zoan, was built seuen yeares after Hebron. Ezechiel calleth it Taphnes; and so doth Hieremy; the Septuagint, Tanis; Iosephus, Protaidis; after the name of an Egyptian Quęene; Antonius giues it the name of Thanis; Hegesippus, Thamna; and William Tyrius, Tapius. It adioyneth to the land of Gosen, and is the same, wherein Hieremy the Prophet was stoned to death, for preaching against the Egyptian and Iewish Idolatry.

Euseb. de prep. Euang. l. 9. c. 4. Gen. 12. 15. Esai. 19. 11.

Zoan or Taphnes was in Moses time the Metropolis of the lower Egypt, in vvhich their Pharaohs then commonly resided; & not vnlikely to be the same City, vvhere Abraham in his time found him. But Eusebius out of Artapanus affirmeth, that Abraham did read Astronomy in Heliopolis, or On, to Pharetates King of Egypt. Alex. Polyhistor, out of Eupolemus hath it otherwise, saying, that Abraham instructed the Egyptian Priests, and not the King; both which authorities Eusebius citeth. The Septuagint, and the Vulgar edition, for Zoan write Heliopolis. Pagnin, Vatablus, Iunius, and our English call it On; and Ptolomy, Onium. There are two Cities of that name; the one on the frontier of the lower Egypt, towards the South; the other somewhat lower on the Easter-most branch of Nilus falling into the Sea at Pelusium. And it may be that Heliopolis to the South of the riuer Traian, vvas the same which Vatablus & our English call Auen. Of the latter it is, that the Scriptures take certaine knowledge: the same, which Pomp. Mela, and Pliny call Solis oppidum; Tyrius in the Holy Warre, Malbec; the Arabians, Bahalbeth; and Simeon Setbi, Fons Solis. Of this Heliopolis, or On, was Putiphar Priest, or Prince, vvhose daughter Ioseph married. In the Territory adioyning Iacob inhabited, while hee liued in Egypt. In the confines of this City, Onias, the high Priest of the Iewes, built a Temple, dedicated to the eternall God; not much inferiour to that of Hierusalem (Ptolomy Philopater then gouerning in Egypt) vvhich stood in the time of Vespasian, 333. yeares after the foundation by Onias, whom Iosephus falsly reporteth herein to haue fulfilled a prophecy of Esay c. 19. In die illa erit Altare Domini in medio terræ Ægypti; In that day shall the Altar of the Lord bee in the middest of the Land of Egypt. Antiochus Epiphanes at that time of the building tyrannizing ouer the Iewes, gaue the occasion for the erecting of this Temple in Egypt. Lastly, there it was that our Sauiour Christ Iesus remained, while Ioseph and the Virgin Mary feared the violence of Herod: neere which (saith Brochard) the fountaine taine is still found, called Iesus well, whose streames doe afterward water the Gardens of Balsamum, no where else found in Egypt. And hereof see more in Breuerd, in his description of Egypt.

There is also the City of Noph, remembred by Esay and Ezekiel, the same vvhich Hosea the Prophet calleth Moph: which latter name it tooke from a Mountaine adioyning, so called; which Mountaine Herodotus remembreth. And this is that great City, which was called Memphis; and so the Septuagint write it. It is knowne to the Arabians by the name of Mazar. The Chaldeans name it Alchahyr; and Tudalensis Mizraim. Esa.19.13. Ezech.34. Hosea 9.6. Lib.2.

Pelusium, which Vatablus, Pagnin, Iunius, and our English write Sin; the Septuagint call Sais; and Montanus, Lebna; is not the same with Damiata, as Gul. Tyrius vvitnesseth. In the time of Baldwin the third, Pelusium vvas called Belbeis. Belbeis (saith Tyrius) quæ olim dicta est Pelusium; Belbeis, that in times past was called Pelusium. G.Tyr.l.20.c.13. lib.2.c.5.

The City of No, the Septuagint call Diospolis. Of which name there are two or three in Egypt, Hierome conuerts it Alexandria, by anticipation, because it was so called in the future. Ezec.30.15.16.

Bubastus, (for so Hierome and Zeigler doe write it) is the same which the Hebrewes call Pibeseth. Ezech.30.17.

To make the story the more perceiueable, I haue added a description of the land of Gosen, in which the Israelites inhabited; vvith those Cities and places so often remembred in the Scripture: as of Taphnes or Zoan, Heliopolis or Bethsemes, Balsephon, Succoth, and the rest; together with Moses passage through the Desarts of Arabia the Stony. For all story without the knowledge of the places vvherein the actions were performed, as it wanteth a great part of the pleasure; so it no way enricheth the knowledge and vnderstanding of the Reader; neither doth any thing serue to retaine, what wee reade, in our memories, so well as these pictures and descriptions doe. In which respect I am driuen to digresse in many places, and to interpose some such discourse, otherwise seeming impertinent: taking for my authority, after many others more ancient, that great learned man, Arias Montanus; vvho in his Preface to the Story of the Holy Land, hath these vvords: Si enim absque locorum obseruatione res gestæ narrentur, aut sine Topographia cognitione historiæ legantur, adeo confusa atq; perturbata erunt omnia, vt ex iis nihil non obscurum, nihil non difficile elici possit; If narration (saith he) bee made of those things which are performed, without the obseruation of the places, wherein they were done: or if Histories be read without Topographicall knowledge; all things will appeare so intricate and confused, as we shall thereby vnderstand nothing but obscurely, nor draw thence any knowledge, but with the greatest difficulty.

§. III.

Of the cruelty against the Israelites young children in Egypt: and of Moses his preseruation and education.

BVt to returne to the story it selfe. It appeareth that notwithstanding the labour and slauery, which the Israelites endured, yet they decreased not in numbers: insomuch as Pharaoh considering the danger of discontented pouerty, and the able bodies of an oppressed multitude, how perillous they might be to his estate, by suggestion of the Diuell, resolued to slaughter all the male children of the Hebrewes, as soon as they should be borne. To which end he sent for Sephora and Thura, women the most famous and expert amongst them, quæ præerant (saith Comestor) multitudini obstetricum, who had command giuen them ouer all mid-wiues; by whom (as it seemeth) hee gaue order to all the rest for the execution of his Edict. For to haue called all the Mid-wiues of Egypt together, had beene a strange Parliament. Now vvhether these two (before named) were of the Hebrewes, or of the Egyptians, it is diuersly disputed. S. Augustine calls them Hebrewes, because it is written Exodus the first, The King of Egypt commanded the Mid-wiues of the Hebrew women, &c. But Iosephus, Abulensis, and Pererius beleeue them to bee Egyptians. Whosoeuer they were, when it pleased God to frustrate the execution of that secret murder, to the end the world might witnesse both the wickednesse of the Egyptians, and the iust cause, therby made manifest, of his future indignation and reuenge: Pharaoh finding these women filled with piety, & the feare of God, Verse.16. Iosephant.l.2.c.5. Abul. & Perer. in Exod.

commanded

commanded others of his people to execute his former intent; and publikely, or howsoeuer, to destroy all the male Hebrew children borne within his dominions.

Now besides the doubts, which Pharaoh had of the multitudes of the Hebrewes, the greatest part of whom hee might haue assured, by affoording them the iustice, which euery King oweth to his vassals, and the rest hee might haue imployed or sent away at his pleasure; Iosephus giueth another cause of his rage against them, namely, That it was prophetically deliuered him by an Egyptian Priest, that among the Hebrews there should be borne a childe, who growing to mans estate, should become a plague and terrour to his whole Nation. To preuent which, (and presuming that he could resist the ordinance of God, by a meane, contrary to the lawes of heauen and of nature) he stretched out his bloudy and mercilesse hand to the execution of his former intent. The same preuention Herod long after practised, when fearing the spirituall Kingdome of Christ, as if it should haue beene temporall, he caused all the male children at that time borne, to be slaughtered. And that Pharaoh had some kinde of foreknowledge of the future successe, it may be gathered by these his owne words, in the tenth verse of the fift of Exodus: Come, let vs worke wisely with them, lest they multiply; and it come to passe, that if there be warre, they ioyne themselues also vnto our enemies, and fight against vs, and get them out of the Land. But we see, and time hath told it vs from the beginning, how God derideth the wisedome of the worldly men, when forgetting the Lord of all power, they rely on the inuentions of their owne most feeble, and altogether darkened vnderstanding. For euen by the hands of the dearely beloued daughter of this tyrant, was that great Prophet and Minister of Gods maruellous vvorkes taken out of Nilus, being thereinto turned off, in an Arke of reedes, a sucking and powerlesse infant. And this Princesse hauing beheld the childe his forme and beauty, though but yet in the blouth, so pierced her compassion, as shee did not onely preserue it, and cause it to be fostered, but commanded that it should be esteemed as her owne, and vvith equall care to the sonne of a King nourished. And for memory that it was her deede, she called the childe Moses, as it were, extractus or ereptus, taken out, to wit, out of the vvater: or after Iosephus and Glycas, Moy, a voyce expressing vvater, and Hises, as much to say, as that which is drawne out of water, or thence taken. Clemens Alexandrinus vvas of opinion, that Moses vvas circumcised, before he vvas put into the Arke of Reedes, & that Amram his father had named him Ioachim. In his youth he vvas carefully bred, by the care, & at the charge of Pharaohs daughter, and by men of the most vnderstanding, taught and instructed: quem regio more educauit, praefitis ei sapientibus Aegyptiorum Magistris, à quibus erudiretur, saith Basil; vnto whom shee gaue princely education, appointing ouer him wise masters of the Egyptians for his instructers. Thereby (say Iosephus and Philo) he became excellently learned in all the doctrine of the Egyptians; vvhich also the Martyr Stephen in the seuenth of the Acts confirmeth; And Moses was learned in all the wisedome of the Egyptians. Which wisedome or sapience, such as it was, or at least so much thereof as Sixt. Senensis hath gathered, vvee haue added, between the death of Moses, and the reigne of Iosua.

Phil. de vita Moysi.

§. IV.

Of Moses his flying out of Egypt; and the opinions of certaine ancient Historians of his warre in Aethiopia; and of his marriage there: Philo his iudgement of his Pastorall life: and that of Pererius of the Bookes of Genesis and Iob.

WHen Moses vvas growne to mans estate, Iosephus and Eusebius, out of Artapanus, tell vs of ten yeares warre that he made against the Aethiopians: of the besieging of Saba, afterward by Cambyses, called Meroe; and how he recouered that Citie by the fauour of Tharbis, a daughter of AEthiopia, whom hee took to vvife. So hath Comestor a pretty tale of Moses, How after the end of that warre, Tharbis resisting his returne into Egypt, Moses most skilfull in Astronomy, caused two Images to bee ingrauen in two precious stones, vvhereof the one increased memory; the other caused forgetfulnesse. These he set in two rings; whereof he gaue the one, to wit, that of obliuion, to his wife Tharbis, reseruing the other of memory for himselfe: vvhich ring of forgetfulnesse, after she had a while vvorne, she began to neglect the loue shee bare her husband: and so Moses vvithout danger returned into Egypt. But leauing these fancies to the Authors of them: It is true, that about the 40. yeare of Moses age, vvhen hee beheld an Egyptian offering violence to one of the oppressed Hebrewes, moued by compassion, in respect of his brother, and stirred vp by disdaine against the other, in the contention he slew the Egyptian. Soone after which fact, finding a disposition in some of his own Nation to accuse him, for whose defence he had thus greatly endangered his owne life: by the ordinance and aduice of God, whose chosen seruant hee was, he fled into Arabia Petræa, the next bordering Country to Egypt; where wandring all alone, as a man left and forsaken, in a place vnknowne vnto him, as among a Nation of barbarous strangers; and who in future times were the irreconcileable enemies of the Hebrewes: it pleased God (working the greatest things by the weakest worldly meanes) to make the watering of a few sheep, & the assisting of the Daughters of Raguel the Madianite, an occasion whereby to prouide him a wife of one of those, & a father in law, that fed him, and sustained him in a Country neerest Egypt, fittest to returne from: necessary to be knowne, because interiacent betweene Egypt and Iudæa, through which hee was to leade the Israelites; and wherein God held him, till the occasion which God presented, best serued. And lastly, where the glory of the world shined least, amidst mountainous Deserts, there the glory of God, which shineth most, couered him ouer, and appeared vnto him, not finding him as a Kings sonne, or an adopted childe of great Pharaohs daughter, but as a meeke and humble shepherd, sitting at a mountaines foot, a keeper and commander of those poore beasts only.

Egyptian

In that part of Arabia, neere Madian, hee consumed 40. yeares. And though (as Philo in the story of Moses life obserueth) he did not neglect the care of those flocks, committed to his charge, but that he excelled all others in that Pastorall knowledge; yet in that solitary Desart he enioyed himselfe: and being separate from the preasse of the world, and the troublesome affaires thereof, hee gaue himselfe to contemplation, and to make perfect in himselfe all those knowledges, whereof his younger yeares had gathered the grounds and principles: the same Author also iudging, that his Pastorall life did excellently prepare him for the execution of the Principality, which he afterward obtained. Est enim (saith Philo) ars Pastoralis, quasi præludium ad regnum, hoc est, ad regimen hominum, gregis mansuetissimi. Quemadmodum bellicosa ingenia præexercent se in venationibus, experientia in feris, quod postea in militia & bello perfectura sunt; brutis præbentibus materiam exercitij, tam belli quàm pacis tempore. At vero præfectura mansueti pecoris, habet quiddam simile cum regno in subditis; ideoq. Reges cognominantur Pastores populorum, non contumeliæ sed honoris gratia; The art of keeping sheepe is, as it were, an introductory exercise vnto a Kingdome, namely, the rule ouer men, the most gentle flocke: Euen as warlike natures doe before-hand exercise themselues in hunting, practising on wilde beasts those things, which after they will accomplish in warfare: those brute beasts affording matter, wherein to traine themselues, both in time of warre and of peace. But the gouernment of gentle cattell, hath a kinde of resemblance vnto a Kingly rule ouer subiects; therefore, Kings are stiled shepherds of the people, not in way of reproch, but for their honour.

That Moses, in this time of his abode at Madian, wrote the Booke of Iob, as Pererius supposeth, I cannot iudge of it, because it is thought, that Iob was at that time liuing. Neither dare I subscribe to Pererius opinion, That Moses while hee liued in that part of Arabia, wrote the Booke of Geneses; although I cannot deny the reason of Pererius coniecture, That by the example of Iobs patience he might strengthen the oppressed Hebrewes: and by the promises of God to Abraham, Isaac, and Iacob, put them in assurance of their deliuery from the Egyptian slauery, and of the Land of rest, and plentie promised. Pererius in 3. c. Exod.

Of this calling backe into Egypt by the Angell of God, and the maruailes and wonders which he performed, thereby to perswade Pharaoh, that hee was the messenger of the most High, the particulars are written in the first fourteene Chapters of Exodus; and therefore to treat of all the particulars therein contained, it were needlesse. But for the first, it is to be noted, that when Moses desired to be taught by God, by what name hee should make him knowne, and by whom he was sent; he receiued from God so much, as man could comprehend of his infinite and euer-being nature. Out of which he deliuered him in the first part of his answer, a name to bee considered of by the wisest: and in his second, to be vnderstood by all. For there is nothing that is, or hath being of it selfe, but the Eternall: which truely is, which is aboue all; which is immutable. The bodies of men are changed euery moment: their substance wasteth, and is repaired by nutri- Exod. c. 3. v. 13. 14. and 15.

Hier. ad Dā. Vna eſt Dei & ſola natura quæ verè eſt: id enim quod ſubſiſtit, non habet aliundè, ſed ſuum eſt. Cætera quæ creata ſunt, etiamſi videntur eſſe, non ſunt, quia aliquando non fuerunt, & poteſt rurſum non eſſe, quod non fuit; It is the one and onely nature of God, which truly is: for hee hath his being of himſelfe, and not from any thing without him. Other things that are created, although they ſeeme to be, yet they are not; for ſometimes they were not: and that which hath not beene, may againe want being. And vvith this, in reſpect of the Diuine nature, the ſaying of Zeno Eleates excellently agreeth: Tota rerum natura vmbra eſt, aut inanis, aut fallax; The whole nature of things is but a ſhadow, either empty or deceitfull: in com-

Eſ. 40. v. 13. pariſon of whom (ſaith Eſay) all Nations are as nothing, leſſe than nothing, and meere vanity.

Of the tenne plagues vvherewith the Egyptians were ſtricken, the firſt was by changing the Riuers into bloud: God puniſhing them by thoſe waters, into which their Forefathers had throwne, and in which they had drowned the innocent children of the Hebrewes.

Apoc. 16. v. 5. To which this place of the Reuelation may bee fitly applyed: And I heard the Angel of the waters ſay, Lord, thou art iuſt, which art, and which waſt, and holy, becauſe thou haſt iudged theſe things; for they ſhed the bloud of thy Saints and Prophets, and therefore haſt thou giuen them bloud to drinke.

The reſt of the plagues by Frogges, Lice, Flyes, or ſtinging Waſpes; by the death of their Cattaile; by leprous Scabbes; by Haile and Fire; by Graſhoppers; by Darkneſſe; after vvhich Pharaoh forbad Moſes his preſence: moued the hardned heart of the vnbeleeuing King, no longer, than the paine and perill laſted; till ſuch time as his owne firſt-borne, and the firſt-borne of all his Nation periſhed. He then, while he feared his owne life, (a time vvherin we remember God perforce) ſtood vpon no condition: vvheras before, he firſt yeelded but to the departure of the men, then of the men, women, and children, reſeruing their beaſtiall; but he was now content for the preſent, that the Iſraelites ſhould not onely depart vvith all their own, but with a part of the Siluer, Gold, and Iewels of his owne people: of vvhich (the feare being paſt) hee ſuddainly repented him, as his purſuit after them proued. For when euery one of the Hebrewes had (according to direction from Moſes receiued) ſlaine a Lambe, vvithout ſpot or blemiſh, for the Paſſeouer, (a Sacrament of the moſt cleane and vnſpotted Sauiour,) and with the bloud thereof coloured the poſte and linterne of the doores; the Angel of God in the night ſmote euery firſt-borne of Egypt, from the ſonne of the King, to that of the Beggar and Slaue: the children of the Iſraelites excepted. At vvhich terrible iudgemet of God, Pharaoh being more than euer amazed, yeelded, as before is ſaid, to their departure. The Egyptians (ſaith Epiphanius) did in after-times imitate this colouring with bloud, which the Iſraelites vſed after the Paſſeouer; aſcribing an exceeding vertue to the Red Colour: and therefore they did not onely marke their Sheepe and Cattell, but their Trees bearing Fruit, to preſerue them from lightning and other harmes.

§. V.

Of Pharaohs purſuit of the Iſraelites: and of their paſſage towards the Red Sea, ſo farre as Succoth.

NOw, when the people were remoued, and on their way, (his heart being hardned by God) hee bethought him as well of the Honour loſt, as of the ſhame remaining after ſo many Calamities and Plagues, in ſuffering them to depart with the ſpoiles of his people, and in deſpight of himſelfe. And hauing before this time great Companies of Souldiers in readineſſe, he conſulted with himſelfe, what way the Iſraelites were like to take. Hee knew that the ſhorteſt and faireſt paſſage was through the Countrey of the Philiſtims. But becauſe theſe people vvere very ſtrong, and a vvarlike Nation, and in all probability of his Allies, he ſuſpected that Moſes meant to finde ſome other out-let, to wit, through the Deſart of Etham; and there, becauſe the Countrey was exceeding mountainous, and of hard acceſſe, and that Moſes was peſtered with multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattell, hee thought it impoſſible for the Iſraelites to escape him that way. In the meane-while hauing gathered together all the Chariots of Egypt, and 600. of his owne, and Captaines ouer them; hee determined to set vpon them in the Plaines of Gosen, which way soeuer they turned themselues. For it vvas the ancient manner to fight in those Chariots, armed with broad and sharpe Hooks on both sides, in fashion like the Mowers Sythe. Which kinde of fight in Chariots, but not hooked, the Brittaines vsed against the Romanes, vvhile they made the Warre for the Conquest of this Land. Of this Army of Pharaoh, Iosephus affirmeth, that it consisted of 50000. Horse, and 20000. Foot; which, were it true, then it cannot bee doubted but that Pharaoh intended long before to assaile the Hebrews at their departure, or to destroy them in Gosen; and refused them passage, till such time as hee had prepared an Army, to set on them. For, as it is written in the first of Exodus, hee doubted two things; either that the Hebrewes might ioyne themselues to his enemies within the Land; or being so multiplied, as they were, might leaue his seruice, and get themselues thence at their pleasure. But the plagues which God grieued him withall, enforc't him at this time to giue an assent to their departure: perchance fore-running his intent. But, were it otherwise; and Iosephus partiall in this affaire, yet by the words of the Text it appeareth, that he gathered all the Chariots of Egypt, which could not bee done in haste. For Moses made but three dayes march, ere Pharaoh was at his heeles; and yet the last day he went on sixteene miles: which, in so hot a Countrey, and to driue their Cattell and Sheepe vvith them, pestered with a world of Women and Children, was a march witnessing the dread of a powerfull Enemy at hand. Now, as Moses well knew that hee went out vvith a mightie hand, and that God guided his vnderstanding in all his Enterprizes: so he lay not still in the ditch crying for helpe, but vsing the vnderstanding vvhich God had giuen him, hee left nothing vnperformed becomming a Wise man, and a valiant and skilfull Conducter; as by all his actions and counsailes from this day to his death, well appeared.

Iosephus lib.2.c.5.

Exod. 14.8

When Moses perceiued that Pharaoh was enraged against him, & cõmanded him not to dare to come thenceforth into his presence: after that he had warned Israel of the Passouer, he appointed a generall Assembly or Rende-vous of all the Hebrews at Ramases in the Territory of Gosen; a City standing indifferent to receiue from all parts of the Country the dispersed Hebrewes: and gaue commandement, that euery Family should bring with them such store as they had of Dow, and Paste, not staying to make it into bread: knowing then that Pharaoh was on foote, and on his way towards them. Which done, and hauing considered the great strength of Pharaohs Horse-men & Chariots, of which kind of defence Moses was vtterly vnprouided (though, as it is written, the Israelites went vp armed) he marched from Ramases East-ward, towards the Desarts of Etham, and incamped at Succoth; vvhich hee performed on the fifteenth day of the Moneth Abib. Which Moneth from that time forward they were commanded to account as the first Moneth of the yeare. Whether in former times they had beene accustomed to begin their yeare in some other Moneth, following the manner of the Egyptians, and were now recalled by Moses to the rule of their Fore-fathers, it is vncertain. Certaine it is, that they had, and retained, another beginning of their politicke yeare, which was not now abrogated, but rather by some solemnities thereunto annexed, was confirmed, and still continued in vse. Wherefore in referring things done, or happning among them, vnto the beginning, middest, or ending of the yeare; that distinction of the Sacred, and the Politike yeare is not to be neglected. Concerning the number of dayes in euery Moneth, and the whole forme of their yeare, like enough it is that Moses himselfe in forty years space, did sufficiently instruct the Priests, to whose care the ordering thereof (as common opinion holds) was giuen in trust: but that any rule of framing their Kalendar, was made publike, before the captiuity of Babylon, I do not finde. Now because time and motion begin together, it will not, I thinke, be any great breach of order, to shew heere at their first setting forth, what vvas the forme of the Hebrew yeare: with the difference betweene them and other Nations in ordering the accompt of time.

The territory of Gosen was afterward called Ramases, after the name of this City, as appeareth in *Gen.*47.& *Num.*33. *Exod.*13.

The twelfth, Adar, and Ve Adar.	12. Febrvary.

VE Adar was an intercalory Moneth, added, some yeares, vnto the other twelue, to make the Solarie and Lunary yeare agree; which (besides the generall inconuenience that would otherwise haue risen, by casting the Moneths of Summer into the Winter season, to the great confusion of all account) was more necessarily Deut. 16. to be regarded of the Hebrewes, because of the diuine Precept. For God appointed especiall Feasts to be celebrated precisely in such a Moneth of the yeare, and withall on a set day, both of the Moone and of the Moneth; as the Feast of the first fruits; the new Moones; and the like: which could not haue so beene kept, if either the day of the Moone had fallen in some other part of the Moneth, or the Moneth it selfe beene found farre distant from his place in the season of the yeare.

Other Nations, the better to obserue their Solemnities in the due time, and to ascertaine all reckonings and remembrances, (which is the principall commodity of time, that is the measure of endurance) were driuen in like manner to make their yeares vnequall, by adding sometimes, & sometimes abating one or more dayes, as the error committed in foregoing yeares required. The error grew at first, by not knowing what number of daies made vp a compleat yeare. For though by the continuall course of the Sun, causing Summer and Winter duly to succeed each other, it is plaine enough euen to the most sauage of all people, when a yeare hath passed ouer them; yet the necessity of ordinary occurrences, that are to be numbred by a shorter Tally, makes this long measure of whole years insufficient for the smaller sort of more daily affairs. Therfore men obseru'd the Monethly conspicuous reuolution of the Moone, by which they diuided the yeare 30. & 29. into twelue parts, subdiuiding the Moneth into 29. dayes and nights, and those againe into their quarters and houres. But as the markes of time are sensible and easily discerned: so the exact calculation of it is very intricate, and worketh much perplexity in the vnderstanding. Twelue reuolutions of the Moone, containing lesse time by 11. dayes or thereabout, than the yearly course of the Sunne, through the Zodiacke, in the space of sixteene yeares, euery moneth was found in the quite contrary part of the yeare, to that wherein it was placed at the first. This caused them to adde some daies to the year, making it to consist of twelue Moneths, and as many daies more, as they thought would make the courses of the Sun and Moon to agree. But herein were committed many new errors. For neither did the Sunne determine his yearely reuolution by any set number of whole dayes; neyther did the Moone change alwaies at one houre; but the very minutes and lesser fractions were to be obserued by him, that would seeke to reduce their motions (which motions also were not still alike) into any certaine rule.

Here lay much Wisedome and deep Art, which could not soone bee brought to perfection. Yet as making an estimate at randome, the Athenians held the year to containe three hundred and sixty daies, wherein most of the Greekes concurred with them. That 360. daies filled vp the Grecian yeare (besides many collaterall proofes) it is manifest Plin. l. 34. c. 6. by that which Pliny directly affirmeth, telling of the Statues, erected in honour of Bebromion Bucation, which were (saith he) 360. whilest as yet they were exacted not that number of dayes. By this account neither did any certaine age of the Moone begin or end their Moneths, neither could their Moneths continue many yeares in their owne places: but must needs be shifted by little and little from Winter to Summer, and from Summer to Winter, as they were forgotten to be inserted in the Almanacke by men, the not forgotten by the superiour bodies in their courses, should occupy their owne rooms in their due times. Now, because the solemnity of the Olympian games was to be held at the full Moone, and vpon all on the 25. day of the Moneth Metagitnion (which answereth in a manner to our June) they were careful to take order, that this Moneth might euer begin with the new Moone, which they effected by adding some two daies to the last Moneth of euery yeare, those Games being held once in foure yeares. This intercalation sufficed not to make the matter euen, which caused them sometimes to omit one day in the fourth yeare, which was the second of the Moneth Bedromion (agreeing nearly with our August) sometimes not to omit, or (which is all one) to insert another, for it is their fourth Lunary yeare, accounting by the Moone, after a manner that was not vulgar. All this notwithstanding, their Moneth of June would euery yeare haue growne colder and colder, had they not sought to keep all vpright, by intercalating in each other Olympiad, that is, each eighth yeare one whole Moneth, which they called the second Posideon or December, which was the deuice of Harpalus, who also taught them to make one Moneth of 29. daies, another of 30. daies, and so successively through the whole yeare. Thus with much labour they kept their yeare as neare as they could, vnto the high way of the Planets; but these markes which they obserued, were found at length to be deceitfull Guides. For it was not possible so to fashion this eighth yeares intercalation, that it should not deceiue therein 12. houres and 18. minutes at the least, or some waies in 34. houres and 10. minutes, or 36. and 42. minutes; which differences would, in few Ages, haue bred much confusion. The first that introduced a good method, likely to continue, was Meton the Athenian, who not regarding the Olympiads, and the eighth yeares intercalation, deuised a Cycle of 19. yeares, wherein the Moone hauing 235. times runne out her circuit, met with the Sunne in the same place, and on the same day of the yeare, as in the 19. yeare before past she had done. This inuention of Meton was entertained with great applause, and passing from Greece to Rome, was there inserted into the Kalendar in Golden Letters, being called the Golden Number, which name it retaineth vnto this day. Hereby were auoyded the great and vncertaine intercalations that formerly had been vsed, for by the intercalation of 7. Moneths in the 19. yeares, all was so euen, that no sensible difference could be found. Yet that errour which in one yeare could not be perceiued, was very apparant in a few of those Cycles, the new Moones anticipating in one Cycle 7. houres, and some minutes of the precise rule. Therefore Calippus deuised a new Cycle containing foure of Metons, that is to say, 76. yeares, and afterwards Hipparchus, a Noble Asian Mathematician, framed another, containing foure of Calippus his Periods, each of them finding some errour in the former obseruations, which they diligently corrected. The last reformation of the Kalendar was that which Iulius Cæsar made, who by the aduice of the best Mathematicians then to be found, examining the courses of those heauenly bodies, reduced the yeare vnto the forme which is now in vse with vs, containing 365. daies and six houres, which houres in foure yeares make vp one whole day, that is intercalated euery fourth yeare, the 24. of February. The correction of the Iulian yeare by Pope Gregorie the 13. Anno Domini 1582. is not as yet entertained by generall consent, it was indeed, but as a note added vnto the work of Cæsar, yet a note of great importance. For whereas it was obserued, that the Sunne, which at the time of the Nicene Councell, Anno Dom. 324. entred the Æquinoctiall on the 21. day of March, was in the yeare 1582. ten daies sooner found in that time, Pope Gregorie stroke out of the Kalendar ten daies, following the fourth of October, so that in stead of the fifth day was written the fifteenth, by which means the moueable Feasts depending on the Suns entrance into Aries, were againe celebrated in such time, as at the Nicene Councell they had been. And the better to preuent the like alterations, it was by the Councell of Trent ordained, that from thence forward in euery hundreth yeare, the Leape day should be omitted, excepting still the fourth hundred: because the Sun doth not in his yearely course take vp full sixe houres aboue the 365. daies, but faileth so many minutes, as in 400. yeares make about three whole daies.

But the Cycle of 19. yeares, which the Hebrewes vsed, was such as neither did need any nice curiosity of houres, minutes, and other lesser Fractions to helpe it; neyther did in summing vp the dayes of the whole yeare, neglect the dayes of the Moon, confounding one Moneth with another. For with them it fell out so, that alwayes the Kalends or first day of the Moneth was at the new Moone; and because that day was festiuall, they were very carefull as well to obserue the short yeare of the Moone, passing through all the 12 Signes in one Moneth, as that longer of the Sun, which is needfully regarded in greater accounts. First, therefore they gaue it to Nisan their first Moneth, which is about our March or April, 30. dayes; to Iar their second Moneth 29. dayes; and so successiuely 30. to one, 29. to another. Hereby it came to passe, that euery two Moneths of theirs contained somewhat euenly two reuolutions of the Moone, allowing 29. dayes, 12. houres, and odde minutes, from change to change. The spare minutes were bestowed among the superfluous or Epact dayes; which made vp 7. Moneths in 19. years; to 6. of which 7. were commonly giuen 30. dayes; to one of them 29. dayes, or otherwise as was found requisite. Their common yeare (as appeareth by the seuerall dayes of each Moneth) contained 354. dayes, which faile of the yeare, wherein the Sun finisheth his course, 11. whole dayes, with some fractions of time. But these dayes, and other broken pieces, howsoeuer they were neglected in one year, yet in the Cycle of 19. yeares were so disposed of by conuenient intercalations, that still at the end of that Cycle, both the Sun and Moone were found on the same day of the yeare, moneth and weeke, yea commonly on the same houre of the day, where they had been at the beginning of it 19. yeares before.

Diuers haue diuersly set downe the forme of the Hebrew yeare, with the manner of their Intercalations. Sigonius tells vs, that euery second year they did adde a Moneth of 22. dayes; euery fourth yeare a Moneth of 23. in the regard of 11. dayes and a halfe wanting in 12. Moones to fulfill a yeare of the Sun. But herein Sigonius was very much deceiued. For the Moone doth neuer finish her course in 22. or 23. dayes: and therfore to haue added so many daies to the end of the yeare, had beene the way to change the fashion of all the Moneths in the yeares following, which could not haue begun as they ought, with the new Moon. Genebrard saith, that euery third yeare, or second yeare, as neede required, they did intercalate one Moneth, adding it at the years end vnto the other 12. This I beleeue to haue beene true; but in which of the yeares the intercalation was (if it be worthy of consideration) me thinks they do not probably deliuer, who keep all farre from euennesse vntill the very last of the 19. yeares. For (to omit such as erre grossely) some there are who say, that after three yeares, when besides the daies spent in 36. courses of the Moone, 33. daies are left remaining, that is, 11. daies of each yeare; then did the Hebrewes adde a Moneth of 30. daies; keeping three daies, as it were in plusage vnto the next account. The like, say they, was done at the end of the sixt yeare; at which time, besides the Intercalary Moneth, remained sixe daies, namely, three surmounting that Moneth, and the Epact of three yeares, besides the three formerly reserued. Thus they goe on to the 18. yeare; at which time they haue 18. daies in hand: all which with the Epact of the 19. yeare, make vp a moneth of 29. daies, that being intercalated at the end of the Cycle, makes all euen.

Genub. Chron. lib. 2.

Whether this were the practise, I can neither affirm nor deny; yet surely it must needs haue bred a great confusion, if in the 18. yeare euery Moneth were remoued from his owne place by the distance of 48. daies, that is, halfe a quarter of the yeare and more; which inconuenience by such a reckoning was vnauoidable. Wherefore, I preferre the common opinion, which preuenteth such dislocation of the Moneths, by setting downe a more conuenient way of Intercalation in the 8. yeare. For the 6. daies remaining after the two former Intercalations made in the third and sixt years, added vnto the 22. daies, arising out of the Epacts of the 7. and 8. years, do fitly serue to make vp a Moneth, with the borrowing of one day or two from the year following; and this borrowing of two daies is so farre from causing any disorder, that indeed it helpes to make the years ensuing vary the lesse from the proper season of euery Moneth. This may suffice to bee spoken of the Hebrew Moneths and yeares, by which they guided their accounts.

§. VII.

Of the passage of Israel from Succoth towards the Red Sea: and of the diuers wayes leading out of Egypt.

FRom Succoth in the morning following, Moses led the Israelites towards the Desart of Etham, to recouer the Mountaine foot, by the edge of that Wildernesse, though he intended nothing lesse than to goe out of that way, of all other the neareſt. But being assured of the multitude of Horsemen and armed Chariots that followed him, he kept himselfe from being incompassed, by keeping the rough and mountainous ground on his left hand. At Etham he rested but one night, and then he reflected backe from the entrance thereof, and marched away directly towards the South; the distance betweene it and Succoth being about eight miles. That he forbare to enter Arabia being then in sight thereof, it seemeth to proceede from three respects, the first two naturall, the third diuine. For Pharaoh being then at hand, and hauing receiued intelligence of the way which Moses tooke, perswaded himselfe, that the numbers which Moses led, consisting of aboue a Million, if not two Millions of soules, (for as it is written, Exod. the 12. Great multitudes of sundry sorts of people went out with them) could not possibly passe ouer those desart and high Mountaines with so great multitudes of Women, Children, & Cattell, but that at the very entrance of that fastnesse he should haue ouertaken them, and destroyed the greatest numbers of them. For these his owne words: They are tangled in the Land, the Wildernesse hath shut them in, doe shew his hopes and intents; which Moses, by turning another way, did frustrate. Secondly, Moses by offering to enter Arabia that way, drew Pharaoh towards the East-side of the Land of Goſen, or Rameſes: from whence (missing Moses there) his pursuit after him with his Chariots was more difficult, by reason of the roughnesse of the way; and howsoeuer, yet while the Hebrewes kept the Mountaine foot on the left hand, they were better secured from the ouer-bearing violence both of the Horse & Chariots. Thirdly, Moses confidence in the Al-powerfull God was such, by whose spirit, only wise, he was directed, as he rather made choice to leaue the glory of his deliuerance & victory to Almighty God, than either by an escape the next way, or by the strength of his multitude, consisting of 600000 men, to cast the succesſe vpon his owne vnderstanding, wise conduction, or valour. The third day he marched with a double pace from Etham towards the Vally of Pihacheroth, 16. miles distant; and sate downe betweene two ledges of Mountaines adioyning to the Red Sea, to wit, the Mountains of Etham on the North, & Baalzephon towards the South; the same which Orosius calleth Climax: on the top whereof there stood a Temple dedicated to Baal. And, as Phagius noteth, the word so compounded, is as much to say, as, Dominus speculæ, sine custodiæ, Lord of the watch towre. For the Egyptians beleeued, or at least made their slaues beleeue, that if any of them offered to escape that way into Arabia, this Idoll would both arrest them, and force them to returne to their Lords and Masters. For the Egyptians had gods for all turnes. Ægypty dijs fœcundi; The Egyptians were fruitfull in gods, saith Saint Hierome. But Moses, who encamped at the foot of this Mountaine with a million of soules, or as other conceiue, with two millions, found this Lord of the watch-towre asleepe, or out of countenance.

It is probable that all those Egyptians and others brought by the Hebrewes to the knowledge of the true God, followed Moses at his departure.

Climax is rather so called in respect of a passage vp and downe, than that it is any proper name.

Now these two passages leading out of Egypt into Arabia vpon the firme land, Moses refused, as well that of Peluſium and Caſiotis, the faireſt and shorteſt of all other, in respect of Iudea, as the other by Etham, from which he reflected, for the reasons before remembred, and tooke the way by the Valley of Pihacheroth, betweene the Mountaines, which made a streight entrance towards the Sea. After whom Pharao made so great speed with his Horse-men and Chariots, as he gaue the Hebrewes no time at all to rest them after so long a march; but gate sight of them, and they of him, euen at the very brinke and wash of the Sea: insomuch as the Hebrewes being terrified with Pharaohs sudden approach, began to despaire, and to mutine, at that time when it behoued them most to haue taken courage for their owne defence, laying it to Moses charge, that themselues forsaw those perils in which they were wrapped. And feare, which, saith the book of wisedome, is the betraying of those succours which reason offereth, made them both despaire in Gods former promises, and to be forgetfull of their owne strength and multitudes.

Exod. 13. 17.

§. VIII.

Of their passage ouer the Red Sea: and of the Red Sea it selfe.

BVt Moses who feared nothing but God himselfe, perswaded them to be confident in his goodnesse, who hath neuer abandoned those, that assuredly trust in Exod. 14. 13. him, who thus comfortably and resolutely spake vnto them: Feare ye not, stand fast, and behold the saluation of the Lord, which he will shew vnto you this day: for the Egyptians whom you haue seene this day, ye shall neuer see them any more. The Lord shall fight for you, and you shall hold your peace. After which Moses calleth on God for succour, receiues comfort, & encouragement, & commandement how to go in: whereupon the Angel that went before the armie of Exod. 14. 16. Israel, departed and went behinde them, and the pillar of the cloud went from before their face, and stood behinde them: and it stood betweene the campe of the Egyptians and the campe of Israel, and lighted the night without warre, and the one came not neere the other all the night. And Moses stretched out his hand ouer the Sea, and the Lord caused the Sea to goe backe by a strong East wind all that night, and made the Sea drie land, and the waters were deuided. And the children of Israel went into the middest of the Sea vpon the drie ground, and the waters were a wall vnto them on their right hand, and on their left. Moses hoping the voice of God, in the darke of the night hasting through the sands vncouered, past on towards the other side and coast of Arabia: two parts of the night being spent ere he reached the Ford, which it pleased God by a forcible Easterne wind (by which Moses seemes to haue prepared himself, and his hand, before the diuine, supernaturall, and miraculous working) to lay open for him. For Pharaoh following him euen at the heeles, finding the same dry ground which Moses trod on: Therefore, as is written: The Angel of God which went before the hoast of Israel, removed, and went behinde them, and the pillar of the cloud went from before them, and stood behinde them, which is, that it pleased God therein either by his immediate power, or by the ministery of his Angel, to interpose his defence betweene the Hebrewes and their Enemies, to the end that the Egyptians might hereby be blinded, in such sort, as they could not pursue Israel with any harmefull speede. But in the morning watch Moses seized the other banke of Arabia Deserta and Pharaoh (as the dawne of day began to illighten the obscure aire) finding a beginning of the Seas return, hasted himself towards his own Coast:
Exod. 14. 27. But Moses stretched forth his hand, and the Sea returned to his force, that is, the Sea moued by the power of God, ran backe towards the land with vnresistable fury and swiftnesse, and ouerwhelmed the whole Army of Pharaoh, so as not one escaped. For it is written, that God tooke off their Chariot wheeles, that is, when the waters began to couer the sands, the Egyptians being stricken with feare of death, ran one athwart another, and missing the path by which they had past on after the Hebrewes, their wheeles stucke fast in the mud and quick-sands, and could not be drawne out: the Sea comming against them with supernaturall violence.

Lyranus vpon Exod. 14. and others, following the opinions or old Traditions of the Hebrewes, coniectured, that after Moses had by the power of God diuided the Red Sea, and that the children of Israel were fearefull to enter it, Aminadab Prince or Leader of the Tribe of Iuda first made the aduenture, and that therefore was that Tribe euer after honored and ouer honest, according to the prophecy of Iacob, Gen. 49. 8. Thy fathers sonnes shall bow downe vnto thee. But Hierome vpon the 11. of Hosea condemnes this opinion. And though it be true, that Iuda had the first place in all their marches in the Desart, and, as we now call it, led the Vantgard, (whereupon it may be inferred, that he also led the way through the Red Sea) yet that Moses himselfe was the Conducter of Israel at that time, it is generally receiued for, as it is written in the 77. Psalme: Thou didst leade thy people like sheepe by the hand of Moses and Aaron.

The Hebrewes haue also another fancy, that the Red Sea was diuided into twelue parts, and that euery Tribe past ouer in a path apart, because it is written in the 135. Psalme, according to the vulgar: Diuisit mare rubrum in diuisiones; He diuided the Red Sea in diuisions. Also that the bottome of the Sea became as a greene Field or Pasture. But Origen, Epiphanius, Abulensis, and Genebrard, fauouring this conceit, had forgotten to consider, that there were not twelue Pillars, nor twelue Armies of the Egyptians. It is written in Psalme 77. Thy way is in the Sea, not thy waies; and in the last of the booke of Wisedome, Chap. 19. In the Red Sea there was a way.

Now this Sea, through which Moses past, and in which Pharaoh, otherwise called Chenerus, perished in the 16. yeare of his reigne, is commonly knowne by the name of the Red Sea, though the same differ nothing at all in naturall colour from other waters. But as Philostratus in his third booke noteth, and our selues know by experience, it is of a blewish colour, as other Seas are. It entreth at a narrow strait betweene Arabia the Happy and Æthiopia, or the land of the Abyssins: the mouth of the indraught, from the Cape, which Ptolomy calleth Possidium, to the other Land of Æthiopia, hath not aboue ſixe leagues in breadth, and the ſame alſo filled euery where with Ilands, but afterwards it extendeth it ſelfe 58. Leagues from Coaſt to Coaſt, and it runneth vp between Arabia the Happy, and Arabia Petræa, on one ſide, and Æthiopia and Egypt on the other, as far as Sues, the vttermoſt end and indraught of that Sea: where the Turk now keepeth his fleet of Gallies. The Coſmographers commonly giue it the name of the Arabian Gulfe: but the North part towards Sues, and where Moſes paſt, is called Heropolites of the City Hero; ſometime Troy, and of later times Sues. Pliny cals it Cambiſa, by which name it was knowne, ſaith he, before it was called Hero many yeares. The Arabians call this Sea towards the North Apocopa, Eccant, and Eant. Artemidorus writes it Æleniticum; King Iuba Leniticum, others more properly Elaniticum, of the Port and City Elana: which the Septuagint call Elath: Ptolomy, Elana: Pliny, Lana: Ioſephus, Ilana: and Marius Niger, Aila; there is alſo Ilalah in Aſſyria, to which Salmanaſſar carryed the Iſraelites captiue, 2. Kings 6. 8. v. 11. which Ilalah in Aſſyria, the Septuagint call Elaa: and in the firſt of Chron. the 5. Ala. But as for this Red Sea or the parts thereof, thus diuerſly named, the Moores and Arabians (Vaſſals to the Turk) know it by no other appellation, than the Gulfe of Mecca, after the name of Mahomets Towne Mecca. The Greekes write it the Sea Erythraum, of a King called Erythras, or Erythreus: and becauſe Erythros in the Greeke ſignifieth Red: hence it is, that being denominated of this Erythraus, the ſonne of Perſeus and Andromeda, yet it tooke the name of the Red Sea, as Quin. Curtius coniectureth: which Arianus and Strabo confirme. But it ſeemeth to me by the view of a diſcouery of that Sea in the yeare 1544. performed by Steuen Gama, Viceroy of the Eaſt India for the King of Portugall, that this Sea was ſo called from a reflection of redneſs, both from the banks, clifts, and ſands of many Ilands, and part of the Continent bordering it. For I finde by the report of Caſtro, a principall Commander vnder Gama (which diſcourſe I gaue Maſter Richard Hacluit to publiſh) that there is an Iland called Dalaqua, ſometime Lequeo, containing in length 25. Leagues, and 12. in breadth; the earth, ſands, & clifts, of which Iland, being of a reddiſh colour, ſerue for a foile to the waters about it: and make it ſeeme altogether of the ſame colour. Secondly, the ſame Caſtro reporteth, that from 24. degrees of Septentrionall Latitude, to 27. (which make in length of Coaſt 180. miles, lying as it doth Northerly and Southerly) all the clifts and banks are of red earth or ſtone, which by reflection of the Sun-beames, giue a kinde of reddiſh luſter to the waters. Thirdly, thoſe Portugals report, and we know it by many teſtimonies, that there are found in the bottome of this Sea towards the ſhore, great abundance of red ſtones, on which the greateſt ſtore of Corrall growes, which is carryed into moſt parts of Europe, & elſewhere. There are alſo on the Ilands of this Sea many red Trees, ſaith Strabo, & thoſe growing vnder water may alſo be a cauſe of ſuch a colour. Of theſe appearances of redneſſe by the ſhadowes of theſe ſtones, ſands, earth, & clifts, I ſuppoſe that it firſt took the name of the Red Sea, becauſe in ſo many places it ſeemeth to be ſuch: which Iohannes Barros in his ſecond Decade, eight Booke and firſt Chapter, confirmeth.

The breadth of this Sea from Elana or Ezion-Gaber adioyning, now Toro, called by the ancient Coſmographers Sinus Elaniticus, which waſheth the banks of Madian or Midian, is for 16. or 17. Leagues together, along Northward towards Sues, ſome three Leagues or nine Engliſh miles ouer, and from this Port of Toro to Sues, and the end of this Sea it is in length about 28. Leagues, of which the firſt 26. haue nine miles breadth, as afore-ſaid, and afterward the lands both from Egypt and Arabia, thruſt themſelues into the Sea, & ſtreighten it ſo faſt, as for ſix miles together it is not aboue three miles ouer; from thence vpward the land on Egypt ſide, falleth away and makes a kinde of Bay or Cone for ſome ten miles together, after which the land growes vpon the Sea againe, and ſo binds it into the very end thereof, at foure miles breadth or thereabout, in which tract it was that Moſes paſt it ouer, though others would haue it to be ouer againſt Elana or Toro, but without iudgement: for from Ramaſes to Pihacheroth and Baalzephon, there is not aboue 30. miles interiacent, or 35. miles at moſt, which Moſes paſt ouer in three dayes: and betweene the land of Egypt oppoſite to Elana or Toro, the diſtance is aboue 80. miles. For Ramaſes (to which City Moſes came (being the Metropolis of Goſen) when hee left Pharao at Zoan, and tooke his laſt leaue, ſtandeth in 30. degrees fiue minutes of Septentrionall Latitude, and Migdol, or the Valley of Pihacheroth, at the foot of the Mountaine Chiroth, or Baalzephon, in nine and twenty and a halfe, which made a difference of fiue and thirty Engliſh miles, the way lying in effect North and South.

That the passage through the Red Sea was miraculous, and not at a low Ebbe.

THe Egyptians, and of them the Memphites, and other Heathen Writers, who in hatred of the Hebrewes haue obiected that Moses past ouer the Red Sea at a low ebbe, vpon a great spring-tyde, and that Pharaoh, conducted more by fury than discretion, pursued him so farre, as before he could recouer the coast of Egypt, he was ouer-taken by the floud and therin perished, did not well consider the nature of this place with other circumstances. For, not to borrow strength from that part of the Scriptures, which makes it plaine, that the Waters were diuided, and that God wrought this miracle by an Easterly winde, and by the hand & rod of Moses (which authority to men that beleeue not therein, perswadeth nothing) I say, that by the same naturall reason vnto which they fasten themselues, it is made manifest, that had there been no other working power from aboue, or assistance giuen from God himselfe to Moses and the children of Israel than ordinary and casuall, then could not Pharao and all his Army haue perished in that pursuit.

For whersoeuer there is any ebbing of the Sea in any gulfe, or indraught, there doe the waters fall away from the Land, and run downwards toward the Ocean, leauing all that part towards the Land as farre as the Sea can ebbe, or fall off, to be dry Land. Now Moses entring the Sea at Migdol vnder Baalzephon (if he had taken the aduantage and opportunity of the tyde) must haue left all that end of the Red Sea towards Sues, on his left hand dry and vncouered. For if a passage were made by falling away of the vvater ten or twelue miles farther into the Sea than Sues, and betweene it and where Moses past, who entred the same so farre below it, and towards the body of the same Sea: it followeth then, that if all that part of the Sleeue or Strait, had been by the ebbe of a spring-tyde discouered, when Pharao found the floud increasing, he needed not to haue returned by the same way toward Egypt side, but might haue gone on in his returne before the tyde, on his right hand: & so taken ground againe at the end of that Sea, at Sues it selfe, or elsewhere. But the Scriptures doe truely witnesse the contrary, that is, That the Sea did not fall away from the Land, as naturally it doth, but that Moses past on betweene two Seas, and that the waters vvere diuided. Otherwise Pharao by any returne of waters could not haue perished, as he did: and therefore the effects of that great Armies destruction, proue the cause to haue beene a power aboue nature, and the miraculous worke of God himselfe. Againe, those words of the Scriptures, that God caused the Sea to runne backe by a strong East-winde, doe rather proue the miracle, than that thereby vvas caused an ebbe more than ordinary: for that Sea did not lye East and West, but in effect North and South. And it must haue beene a West and North-west winde, that must haue driuen those waters away through their proper Channels, and to the South-east into the Sea. But the East winde blew athwart the Sea, and cut it asunder: so as one part fell backe towards the South and maine body thereof, the other part remained towards Suez, and the North. Which being vnknowne to Pharao: while hee vvas checkt by that Sea which vsed in all times before to ebbe away, the floud prest him & ouer-whelmed him. Thirdly, seeing Iosephus auoweth, that Moses was not onely of excellent iudgement generally, but also, so great a Captaine, as he ouer-threw the Aethiopians in battels, being imployed by Pharao, and vvanne diuers Cities seeming impregnable: it vvere barbarous to condemne him of this grossenesse, and distraction: that rather than he vvould haue endured the hardnesse of a Mountainous passage at hand (had not God commanded him to take that vvay, and foretold him of the honour vvhich hee would there winne vpon Pharao) he vvould haue trusted to the aduantage of an ebbing vvater. For hee knew not the contrary, but that Pharao might haue found him, and prest him, as well when it flowed as when it ebbed, as it seemeth hee did. For the people, beholding Pharaohs approach, cryed out against Moses, and despaired altogether of their safetie: and vvhen Moses prayed vnto God for helpe, hee vvas answered by God: wherefore cryest thou vnto mee? Speake vnto the children of Israel that they goe forward, and lift thou vp thy rod, and stretch out thy hand vpon the Sea, and diuide it: vvhich proues, that there was not at the time of Pharaohs approach any ebbe at all, but that God did disperse and cut through the vveight of waters, by a strong East-winde, vvhereby the Sands discou-discouered themselues betweene the Sea on the left hand toward Sues, from whence the waters moued not, and the Sea which was towards the South on the right hand, So that the waters were a wall vnto them on the right hand, and on the left hand, that is, the waters so defended them on both sides, as the Egyptians could only follow them in the same path; not that the waters stood vpright as wals doe, as some of the Schoole-men haue fancied. For had Pharaoh and the Egyptians perceiued any such buildings in the Sea, they would soone haue quitted the chase and pursuit of Israel. Furthermore, there is no man of iudgement, that can think, that Pharaoh and the Egyptians, who then excelled all Nations in the obseruations of heauenly Motions, could be ignorant of the fluxes & refluxes of the Sea, in his owne Country, on his own Coast, and in his owne most traded and frequented Ports and Hauens; and wherein, his people hauing had so many hundreds of years experience of the tydes, he could not be caught, as hee was, through ignorance, nor by any foreknown or naturall accident, but by Gods powerfull hand onely; which then falleth most heauily on all men, when looking through no other spectacle but their own prosperitie, they least discerne it comming, and least feare it. Lastly, if the Army of the Egyptians had been ouer-taken by the ordinary returne of the floud before they could recouer their own Coast; their bodies drowned would haue beene carried with the floud which runneth vp to Sues, and to the end of that Sea, & not haue been cast ashore on that Coast of Arabia where Moses landed, to wit, vpon the Sea-bank ouer against Baalzephon, on Arabia side: where it was that the Israelites saw their dead bodies; & not at the end of the Red Sea, to which place the ordinary floud would haue carried them: Which floud doth not any where crosse the Channell, and run athwart it, as it must haue done from Egypt side to Arabia, to haue cast the bodies there; but it keepes the naturall course towards the end of that Sea: and to which their carkasses should haue been carried, if the worke had not been supernaturall and miraculous. Apollonius in the liues of the Fathers affirmeth, that those of the Egyptians which staied in the country, and did not follow Pharaoh in the pursuit of Israel, did euer after honour those Beasts, Birds, Plants, or other Creatures, about which they were busied at the time of Pharaohs destruction: as he that was then labouring in his garden, made a god of that Plant or Root, about which he was occupied: and so of the rest. But how those multitudes of gods were erected among them, a more probable reason shall bee giuen elsewhere. Orosius in his first Booke and tenth Chapter against the Pagans, tels vs, that in his time, who liued some 400. years after Christ, the prints of Pharaohs Chariot wheeles were to be seen at a low water on the Egyptian sands: and though they were sometime defaced by winde and weather, yet soone after they appeared again. But hereof I leaue euery man to his own beliefe. cap.14.v.21.

CHAP. IV.

Of the iournying of the Israelites from the Red Sea, to the place where the Law was giuen them: with a discourse of Lawes.

§. I.

A transition, by way of recapitulation of some things touching Chronologie: with a continuance of the storie, vntill the Amalekites met with the Israelites.

BVt to goe on with the storie of Israel, in this sort I collect the times. Moses was borne in the yeare of the World 2434. Saphrus then gouerning Assyria; Orthopolis Sycionia, or Peloponnesus; Crioſus the Argiues; Orus Egypt, and Deucalion Thessalie. He fled into Midian when he had liued 40. years, in the yeere of the World 2474. and two yeares after was Caleb borne. He returned by the commandement and ordinance of God into Egypt, and wrought Acts 7. Iosua 14. 2474

2514. his miracles in the fields of Zoan, in the yeare 2514. the last moneth of that yeare. On the 14. day of the first Hebrew moneth Abib, or the 15. of that moneth, beginning the day
Pag. 254. (as they) at Sun setting, in the yeare of the world 2514. was the celebration of the Passeouer: and in the dead of the night of the same day were all the first-borne slain through Egypt, or in all those parts where the Hebrewes inhabited not. The 15. day of the first moneth of the Hebrewes called Abib, being about the beginning of the yeare of the Exod. 12. Num. 33. World 2514. Moses with the children of Israel remoued from the generall assembly at Ramases, and marched to Succoth.

Exod. 15. Num. 33. extreame thirst, murmured against Moses the second time; first at Pharaohs approach in Pihacheroth, and now in Arabia. But Moses taking the branches of a tree, growing neer a Lake of bitter water, and casting the same therinto, made the same sweet: a plain Type and Figure of our Sauiour; who vpon the tree of the Crosse changed the bitternesse of euerlasting death into the sweetnesse of eternall life. Plinie remembers these bitter Fountaines in his sixth Booke and 29. Chapter. From whence to Delta in Egypt, Sesostris first, Darius after him, and lastly Ptolomie the second, began to cut an artificiall Riuer, therby by Boats and small Shipping to trade & nauigate the Red Sea, from the great Cities vpon Nilus. From Marah he remoued to Elim, the sixth Mansion, a march of eight miles:
Exod. 15. Num. 33. where finding twelue Fountaines of sweet water, and threescore and ten Palme trees, he rested diuers dayes.

Whether this Helim were the name of a Towne or City in Moses time, I cannot affirme. And yet the scarcity of waters in that Region was such, as Helim, which had twelue Fountaines, could hardly be left vnpeopled. William, Archbishop of Tyre, in his Hist. of the Holy Warre, found at Helim the ruines of a great and ancient City. And Will. Tyr. l. 11. cap. 19. at such time as Baldwine the first past that way into Egypt. Ingressus (saith he) Helim, Ciuitatem antiquissimam, populo Israelitico aliquando familiarem; ad quam cum peruenissent, loci illius incolæ, Regis aduentu praecognito, nauiculam ingredientes, in mare vicinum se contulerunt, Entring Helim a very ancient City, well known sometime to the people of Israel; whither, when he came, the inhabitants forewarned of the Kings approach, took Boate, and shifted themselues into the Sea, lying neere them. From Elim he returned again towards the South, and sate downe by the banks of the Red Sea: the seuenth mansion. For it seemeth that he had knowledge of Amalech, who repaired to resist his passage through that part of Arabia. And Moses who had not as yet trained those of the Hebrewes, appointed to beare armes: nor assured the mindes of the rest, who encountring with the least misery, were more apt to returne to their quiet slauery, than either to endure the wants and perils which euery where accompanied them in that passage, or at this time to vndertake or sustaine so dangerous an enemie: he therfore made stay at this Mansion, vntill the fif-
Exod. 16. teenth of this second Moneth called Zim, or Iiar: and made the eight Manfion in the Desart of Zin; where the children of Israel mutined against Moses the third time, hauing want of food. In the sixteenth Chapter of Exodus, Moses omitteth this retrait from Elim to the red Sea, but in the collection of euery seuerall incamping, in the 33. of Numbers, it is set down.

Here it pleased God to send so many flights of Quailes, as all the Country about their incamping was couered with them. The morning following it also rained Manna, being the sixteenth of their Moneth, which serued them in stead of bread. For now was the Exod. 16. store consumed which the people carried with them out of Egypt. And though they had great numbers of cattell and sheepe among them, yet it seemeth that they durst not feed themselues with many of those: but reserued them both for the milke to releeue the children withall: and for bread to store themselues when they came to the Land promised.

From hence towards Raphidim they made two remoues of twenty miles: the one to Daphca, the other to Alus, distant from Raphidim sixe miles. Here being againe prest with want of water, they murmured the fourth time, and repented them of their departure from Egypt, where they rather contented themselues to be fed and beaten after the manner of beasts, than to suffer a casuall and sometime necessary want, and to vndergoe the hazzards and trauailes which euery manly minde seeketh after, for the loue of God, and their own freedomes. But Moses with the same rod which he diuided the Sea withall, in the sight of the Elders of Israel, brought waters out of the rocke, wherewith the whole multitude were satisfied. Exod.17.

to

§. II.

Of the Amalekites, Madianites, and Kenites, vpon occasion of the battell with the Amalekites, and Iethroes comming: who being a Kenite, was Priest of Madian.

AND while Moses incamped in this place, the Amalekites who had knowledge of his approach, and ghessed that he meant to leade the children of Israel through their Country (which being barren of it selfe, would be vtterly wasted by so great a multitude of people and cattell) thought it most for their aduantage to set vpon them at Raphidim: where the want of water, and all other things needfull for the life of man infeebled them. On the other side, Moses perceiuing their resolutions, gaue charge to Iosua to draw out a sufficient number of the ablest Hebrewes, to incounter Amaleth. Between whom and Israel, the victory remained doubtfull, for the most part of the day: the Hebrewes and Amalekites contending with equall hopes & repulses for many hours. And had not the strength of Moses prayers to God been of far greater force, and more preualent, than all resistance and attempt made by the bodies of men; that valiant and warlike Nation had greatly endangered the whole enterprise. For those bodies which are vnacquainted with scarcity of food, and those mines whom a seruile education hath dulled, being beaten, & despaired in their first attempts, will hardly, or neuer be brought again to hazzard themselues. Exod.17.

After this victory, Iethro repaired to Moses, bringing with him Moses his wife, and his two Sons, which either Iethro forbare to conduct, or Moses to receiue, till he had by this ouerthrow of Amalech the better assured himselfe of that part of Arabia. For it is written in the 18. of Exod. v.1. When Iethro the Priest of Midian, Moses Father in Law heard all that God had done for Moses, &c. of which, the last deed, to wit, the ouerthrow of Amalech, gaue Iethro courage and assurance, hee then repaired to his sonne in law Moses, at Sinai; where amongst other things, he aduised Moses to appoint Iudges, and other Officers, ouer Israel, being himselfe vnable to giue order in all causes and controuersies, among so many thousands of people, full of discontentment and priuate controuersie.

This Iethro, although he dwelt amongst the Midianites, yet he was by Nation a Kenite, as in the fourth of *Iudges. v.*11. & 17. it is manifest; where it is written; Now Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, to wit, the sonne of Iethro, the father in law of Moses, was departed from the Kenites, and pitched his Tents vntill the Plaine of Zaanaim, which is by Kedesh. Likewise in the first of Samuel, Saul commanded the Kenites to depart from among the Amalekites, lest hee should destroy them with the Amalekites. For the Kenites inhabited the mountaines of Sin Kadesh: and the Amalekites dwelt in the Plains, according to the saying of Balaam, speaking of the Kenites; Strong is thy dwelling place, and thou hast put thy nest in the Rocke. And that Saul spared this Nation, hee giueth for cause, that they shewed mercy to all the children of Israel, when they came vp from Egypt. For these Kenites were a Nation of the Madianites, and the Madianites were of the issues of Madian, one of the sixe sonnes which Abraham begat on Kethura: and might also take that name of Kenites from Kethura, of whom they descended by the Mother, who (as it seemeth) kept the knowledge of the true God among them, which they receiued from their parent Abraham. For Moses, when hee fled out of Egypt into Midian, and married the daughter of Iethro, would not (had he found them Idolaters) haue made Iethroes daughter the Mother of his children. And although the Kenites are named amongst those Nations, vvhich God promised, that the seede of Abraham should roote out, and inherite their lands; yet it cannot bee meant by these, who are descended from Abraham himselfe: but by some other Nation, bearing C.15.v.18. Num.24.v.21. 1 Sam.c.15. Gen.25.

the same name; and in all likelihood of the race of Chus. For in the fifteenth of Genesis verse nineteenth, these Kenites or Chusites are listed with the Hittites & Perizzites, with the Amorites, Canaanites, Gergesites, and Iebusites, which were indeed afterwards rooted Gen.15. out. But these Kenites, descended from Abraham, had separated themselues from among the rest, which were altogether idolatrous. For, as it is before remembred, Heber the Ke- Iud.4. nite, which was of the children of Hobab, was departed from the Kenites, that is to say, from those Kenites of Canaan, and inhabited in Zaanaim, which is by Kedesh or Kadesh. Againe, Moses nameth that Nation of the Kenites, before Midian, or any of Abrahams other sonnes were borne: which he did (referring my self to better iudgement) rather, because they were more ancient, than by anticipation.

Gen.25.4. And as of the Kenites, so wee may consider of the Madianites, parted by Moses in to fiue Tribes. For some of them were corrupted, and heathens; as those of Madian by the Riuer Zared, afterwards destroyed by Moses. But the Madianites neere the bankes of the Red Sea, where Moses married his wife Zippora, and with whom he left her and his children, till after the ouerthrow of Amaleth, seeme likewise not to haue beene corrupted. For these Madianites with the Kenites, assisted Israel, and guided them in the Desarts. But the Madianites in Moab, and to the North of the Metropolis of Arabia, called Petræa, were by Israel rooted out, when those adioyning to the Red Sea were not touched.

And though it may be doubted, whether those of Madian, of whom Iethro was Priest, and the other Cities in Moab were the same, yet the contrary is more probable. For Moses would not haue sent 12000. Israelites, as far backe as the Red Sea, from the Plaines of Moab, to haue destroyed that Madian, where his wiues kindred inhabited; seeing himself comming with 600000. able men, was encountred by Amaleth, in that passage. Neither could Moses forget the length of the way through those discomfortable Desarts, wherin himselfe and Israel had wandred 40. yeeres.

That Iethro, or Iothor, Raguel, or Reuel, and Hobab, were but one person, the Scriptures teach vs. For the Vulgar and Septuagint, which call him Raguel, and our English Reuel, Exodus 2.18. cals him Iethro, or Iothor, Exod. 3. & v. 1. c. 4. v. 18. & c. 18. 1. & 6. 9. 10. & 12. and in Num. c. 10. v. 29. Hobab. Others take Iethro & Hobab to be the same, but not Raguel.

§. III.

Of the time when the Law was giuen; with diuers commendations of the inuention of Lawes.

THe rest of the moneths of this yeere 2515. were spent in the Desart of Sinai, neere the mountaine of Sinai or Horeb, the twelfth Mansion. Eusebius thought that Sinai or Horeb were distinct mountaines: Hierome, to be but one, of a double name. And so it appeareth by many Scriptures. For, in Exod. 3. v. 1. it is called Horeb: and in Exod. 24. v. 19. it is written Sinai. In the 106. Psalme v. 19. Horeb: in Exod. 19. 11. Sinai. And so it is called, Galatians 4. 24. and againe, Deut. 4. 10. & 15. & Deut. 5. 2. Horeb. And so is it in the first of Kings 8. 6. and the second of Chron. 5. 10. and in Malachie 4. 4. Finally, in Ecclesiasticus the 48. 7. they are named as one. which heardest (saith Ecclesiasticus) the rebuke of the Lord in Sinai, and in Horeb the iudgement of the vengeance. Somewhat they are dis-ioyned at the top by the report of Peter Belonius; who in the yeere 1588. past out of Egypt into Arabia, with Monsieur de Fumet of France, and trauailed to the top both of Sinai and Horeb: Sinai being by far the higher hill. From the side of Horeb (saith he) there falleth a very faire spring of water into the Valley adioyning: where he found two Monasteries of Christian Marronites, containing some 100. Religious persons of diuers Nations, who had pleasant gardens, delicate fruits, and excellent wine. These (saith the same Author) giue entertainment to all strangers, which passe Pet. Bell. l. 2. c. 62. that way.

Now that there was some such Torrent of water neere Sinai in Moses time, it is very probable: First, because hee incamped thereabout almost a yeere, and drew no water, as in other places, by miracle: secondly, because it is written, Exod. 32. 20. that when Moses had broken the golden Calfe to powder, which Aaron set vp in his absence, hee cast the powder thereof into the water, and made the children of Israel to drinke thereof.

On this mountaine, the Law by the Angel of God was giuen to Moses, where hee staied staied a whole yeere, wanting some ten or twelue daies; for he remoued not till the 20. day of the second moneth of the second yeere; and hee arriued about the 45. day after the egression: the Law being giuen the 50. day.

At this Mansion all was done, which is written from the beginning of the 29. Chapter of Exodus, to the end of that booke; all in Leuiticus; and all in Numbers, to the 10. Chapter. Whereof (because there is no storie nor other passage) I will omit the repitition, and in place thereof speake somewhat of the Law, and the kindes and vse therof: whereby, if the Reader finde the story any way dis-ioyned, hee may turne ouer a few leaues, and, omitting this, finde the continuation thereof. We must first consider, that as there can bee neither foundation, building, nor continuance of any Common-wealth, without the rule, leuell, and square of Lawes: so it pleased God to giue thereby vnto Moses the powerfullest meane (his miraculous grace excepted) to gouern that multitude which he conducted; to make them victorious in their passage, and to establish them assuredly in their conqueſt. For as the North starre is the most fixed directour of the Seaman to his desired Port: so is the Law of God the guide and conducter of all in generall, to the hauen of eternall life: the Law of nature, from God his eternall law deduced, the rule of all his creatures: the Law humane, depending on both these, the guard of Kings, Magistrates, and vertuous men; yea, the very spirit, & the very sinewes of euery Estate in the world, by which they liue and moue: the Law, to wit, a iust law, being resembled to an Heart without affection, to an Eye without lust, and to a Minde without passion; a Treasurer, which keepeth for euery man what he hath, and distributeth to euery man what he ought to haue. This benefit the Ancient, though barbarous, esteemed so highly, that among them, those which were taken for the first makers of Lawes, were honoured as gods, or as the sonnes of gods: and the rest, that made either additions or corrections, were commended to all posteritie for men of no lesse vertue, and no lesse liberally beneficiall to their Countries, than the greatest and most prosperous Conquerours that euer gouerned them. The Israelites, the Lacedemonians, and the Athenians, receiued their Lawes from one: as the Israelites from Moses; the Lacedemonians from Lycurgus; the Athenians from Solon; the Romanes sometime from their first Kings, from their Decem viri, from their Senatours, from their Lawyers, and from the people themselues: others from the Prince, Nobilitie, and People; as in England, France, and in other Christian Monarchies and Estates.

§. III.

Of the name and meaning of the words, Law, and Right.

THe word Lex, or Law, is not alwaies taken alike, but is diuersly, and in an indifferent sense vsed. For if wee consider it at large, it may bee vnderstood for any rule prescribing a necessarie meane, order, and methode, for the attaining of an end. And so the rules of Grammer, or other Arts, are called Lawes. Or it is taken for any priuate ordinance of Superiours to Inferiours: for the commandements of Tyrants, which they cause to be obserued by force, for their decrees do also vsurpe that title, according to the generall acceptation of the word Law: of which Esay, Woe vnto them that decree wicked decrees, and write grieuous things. Likewise, the word is vsed for the tumultuary resolutions of the people. For such constitutions doth Aristotle also call Lawes, though euill and vnsufficient: Mala lex est, quæ tumultuariè posita est; It is an ill law that is made tumultuously. So as all ordinances, either good or euill, are called by the name of Lawes.

Ethic. l. 4. c. 1.

The word Law is also taken for the morall habit of our minde, which doth (as it were) command our thoughts, words, and actions: framing and fashioning them according to it selfe, as to their patterne and platforme. And thus the law of the flesh which the Diuines call legem fomitis, is to be vnderstood. For euery law is a kinde of patterne of that which is done according vnto it: in which sense as* elsewhere, this moral habit or disposition of the heart is called the frame or figmentum of the heart: so in S. Paul to the Romanes it is called a Law: But I see another Law in my members, rebelling against the Law of my minde, and leading me captiue vnto the law of sinne. Againe, the nature and inclinations of all creatures bee sometime called Lawes, so far as they agree with the reason of the law eternall; as the law of a Lyon, to be fierce or valiant.

* Gen. 6. 5. Item 8. 21.

a So Virgil, continuo has leges æternaque fœdera certis imposuit natura locis; where also it is to bee noted that hee ioynes leges & fœdera together, as in the Scripture the law is often-times called the couenant.

Also priuate contracts among Merchants and other Tradesmen, do often put on the name of lawes. But law commonly and properly, is taken for a right rule, prescribing a necessary meane, for the good of a Common-wealth, or Ciuill communitie. The rest, to wit, the cõmandements of Tyrants, &c. which haue not the common good for their end, but being leges iniquæ, are by Thomas called violentia magis quàm leges; rather compulsions than lawes: And whatsoeuer is not iust, S. Augustine doth not allow for lawes, howsoeuer established: for he calls them iniqua hominum constituta, quæ nec cura discenda, nec putanda sunt; The vniust constitutions of men which are neither to bee termed nor thought lawes. For, saith Aristotle, Legalia iusta sunt factiua, & conseruatiua felicitatis; Iust lawes are the workers and preseruers of happinesse: because by them we are directed ad vitam quietam, to a quiet life, according to Cicero: Yea, to life euerlasting, according to the Scriptures. For the end of the Law, saith Plato, is God and his worship: Finis legis Deus & cultus eius. Lex, or the Law is so called by the Latines à legendo, or à ligando, of reading or binding: Leges quia lectæ & ad populum latæ, saith Varro; For after Lawes were written and published, all men might reade them, and behold in them whereto they were bound. The other Etymology, à ligando, is no lesse agreeable with the nature of a Law: whence in the Scripture it is called also a yoke, and a band: as confregerunt iugum, diruperunt vincula: they haue broken the yoke, they haue broken the bands. And in the second Psalme, Dirumpamus vincula eorum, & proiciamus à nobis funes ipsorum; Let vs break their bands in sunder, and cast away their cords from vs.

Psal. 2.

The Couenant it is called, because of the conditionall promises of God: and because of Gods peoples voluntary submission of themselues vnto it: for which vvord the Septuagint, and the Epistle to the Hebrewes, vse the word διαθηκη, a Testament or last Will: which name it hath, because it is not otherwise effectuall for our saluation, but in respect of the death of the Testator; for without the death of the Testator, the Testament is of no force: as Hebr. 9. 17. it is said, Testamentum in mortuis ratum est.

The Hebrewes call the law Thorah of teaching, because euery man is thereby taught his dutie, both to God and Men. The Greekes call it Nomos of distributing, because it distributeth to euery man his owne due; the power of the law is the power of God: Iustice being an attribute proper vnto God himselfe. Imperium legis imperium Dei est; The reigne of the law, is the reigne of God.

Law in generall is thus defined by the Philosophers: Lex est vitæ regula, præcipiens quæ sunt sequenda, & quæ fugienda; Law is the rule of life, commanding what to follow, and what to shun: or Lex est omnium diuinarum & humanarum rerum Regina; Law is the Queene or Princesse of things both humane and diuine. But this description is grounded vpon the opinion of ineuitable fate. Law is the very wisedome of Nature: the reason and vnderstanding of the prudent: and the rule of right and wrong. For as a right line is called Iudex sui & curui, the demonstrance of it selfe, and of the crooked: so is the law, the iudge and measure of right and wrong.

M. Hooker cals the Law a directiue rule to goodnesse of operation: and though law as touching the substance and essence, consist in vnderstanding: Comprehendit tamen actum voluntatis; Yet it comprehends the act of our will. The vvord Ius is also diuersly taken, as sometime for the matter of the law and for common right: sometime for the law it selfe: as Ius ciuile, or Ius gentium. Isidore distinguisheth the two generall words Ius and Fas: whereof Ius, saith he, hath reference to men, Fas to God. Fas lex diuina, Ius lex humana. To goe ouer another mans field, is permitted by Gods law, not by mans; and therfore in a thing out of controuersie, Virgil vsed both these words: as Fas & iura sinunt, God and men permit.

Isid. Etym.

The word Ius or Right, is derined or taken from the old substantiue Nowne iussu, a bidding or commandement: or perhaps from the Greeke Ζευς which is the name of Iupiter, or of the Latine genitiue case Iouis; because as the Scripture speakes, the iudgement is Gods. For as it is certaine that ius-iurandum came of Iouis-iurandum, (for so we find it written in Nonius out of the ancient, in which sense the Scripture calls it iuramentum Iehoue) so also we may say, that Ius came of Iouis, quia Iouis est: because as God is the Author, and Patterne, and Maintainer of right, so also in his Vicegerents the Magistrates, he is the pronouncer and executor of right. Of this Ius the iust are denominated, dicuntur iure, and iustitia à iusto; The right gives name to the righteous: and iustice takes her name from the iust.

§. V.

§. V.

Of the definition of Lawes, and of the Law eternall.

BVt becauſe lawes are manifold, and that euery kinde hath a proper and peculiar definition, it agreeth with order, firſt to diuide and diſtinguiſh them. I meane thoſe ſorts of lawes, from whence all other particulars are drawne: leauing the indiuiduals of humane lawes to their infinite and horrible confuſion.

The law eternall is thus defined by Thomas. Lex aeterna eſt aeternus diuinae ſapientiae conceptus, ſecundum quod ordinatur ad gubernationem rerum ab ipſo praecognitarum; The eternall law is the eternall conceit of Gods wiſedome as it is referred to the gouernment of things foreknowne by himſelfe. Or, Lex aeterna eſt ſumma atque aeterna ratio diuinae ſapientiae: quatenus res omnes ad deſtinatos fines ita dirigit, vt illis iuxta conditionem ipſarum modum aliquem neceſsitatis adferat; It is the high and eternall reaſon of diuine ſapience: as it directeth all things in ſuch ſort to their proper ends, impoſing a kinde of neceſsity according to their ſeuerall natures, or conditions. Now the difference lieth in this: That as the ſame diuine vnderſtanding directs all theſe to their proper ends; ſo it is called prouidence: but as it impoſeth a neceſsity according to the naturs of all things which it directs, ſo is it called a Law.

P. 2. q. 2. art. 10.

Th. q. 36. art. 3.

Of this eternall law Cicero took knowledge, when in his booke of Lawes, he wrote in this manner. Erat ratio perfecta, rerum natura, & ad recte faciendum impellens & a delicto auocans: qua non tum incipit lex eſſe cum ſcripta eſt: ſed tum cum orta eſt. Orta autem ſimul eſt cum mente diuina: quamobrem lex vera atque princeps, apta ad iubendum & ad vetandum ratio eſt recta ſummi Iouis; That perfect reaſon and nature of things incouraging or impelling to righteous actions, and calling vs backe from euill, did not (ſaith hee) then begin to bee a law when it was written: but when it had being. Being and beginning it had together with diuine vnderſtanding, and therefore a true law and a fit Princeſſe to command and forbid, is the right reaſon of the moſt high God. This eternall law, (if we conſider it in God, or as God,) is alwaies one and the ſame; the nature of God being moſt ſimple: but as it is referred to diuers obiects, ſo the reaſon of man findes it diuers and manifold. It alſo ſeemeth one law in reſpect of things neceſſary, as the motions of the heauens; ſtabilitie of the earth; &c. but it appeareth otherwiſe to things contingent: another law to men, another to other creatures, hauing life, and to all thoſe that be inanimate.

By this eternall law all things are directed, as by the counſaile and prouidence of God: from this law all lawes are deriued, as from the rule vniuerſall: and thereto referred, as the operation of the ſecond to the firſt.

The eternall, and the diuine Law, differ only in conſideration; the eternall directing more largely: as well euery creature, to their proper and naturall ends, as it doth man to his ſupernaturall: but the diuine law to a ſupernaturall end only: the naturall law is thence deriued, but an effect of the eternall: as it were a ſtreame from this fountaine.

Tho. 4. q. 2.

The Law humane or temporall is alſo thence drawn: in that it hath the forme of right reaſon; from which if it differ, it is then impoſitio iniqua, a wicked impoſition: and only borroweth the name of a law.

To this eternall law all things are ſubiected, as well Angels and Men, as all other creatures, creatures, or things created; whether necessary or contingent, naturall or morall, & humane. For the Law eternall runneth through all the vniuersall, and therefore it is the law also of things which are simple, naturall and inanimate.

Hence it is, that all things created are commanded to praise God their Creator and Director: as, Praise him all ye his Angels; praise him Sunne and Moone, all bright Starres: heauens of heauens, for he hath established them for euer and euer. He hath made an ordinance which shall not passe: Praise ye the Lord from the earth ye Dragons and all Deepes: Fire and haile, snow and vapours, stormie windes which execute his word: mountaines and hils, fruitfull trees and all Cedars: Beasts, and all Cattell, &c. Psal. 148. Now as the reasonable Creatures are by this eternall law bound, by the glory and felicity proposed vnto them (beatitude being both the attractiue, and the end) so all other naturall things and creatures, haue in themselues, and in their own natures, an obedience formall to it, without any proper intention, known cause, or end proposed. For beasts are led by sense, and naturall instinct: things without life by their created forme, or formall appetites, as that which is heauy to fall downward: things light to mount vpward, &c. and fire to heate whatsoeuer is apposed. This kinde of working the Aristotelians ascribe to common nature: others to fate; a difference vsed in termes only; it being no other than Gods generall prouidence: for as it is truly said of God, that he is omnia super omnia: so are all things which appeare in themselues thence deriued: there-vnder subiected: thence-from by his eternall law and prouidence directed, euen from the greatest to the least of his creatures, in heauen and in earth.

The Schoolemen are very curious and ample in the consideration of these lawes: and in discourse of the profit, and of the matter, and obiect of the eternall law. But as the profit is manifest in the good of all creatures, who haue thence-from, either reason, sense, vegetation, or appetition, to conduct them: so is the obiect and matter of the law, the whole creature. For according to S. Augustine, Lex eterna est, qua iustum est, vt omnia sint ordinatissima; The law eternall is that, wherby it is iust, that all things should be disposed in the best and goodliest order. L. 1. de lib. arb. cap. 6.

Lastly, it is disputed, whether the eternall law be immutable, yea or no? But the resolution is, that it changeth not; for which S. Augustine vseth a sufficient argument in his first Booke of Free-will, the sixth Chapter. For the law of Moses which had a time prefixed, was eternally by God ordained to last vntill the time of the Pædagogie of Gods people, or introduction to Christ should bee expired; which time of expiration some thinke our Sauiour noted to be come, when on the Crosse he said, Consummatum est. But I rather thinke these words of our Sauiour to haue no other signification, than that now the prophecie of their giuing him Vinegar to drink was fulfilled. For so Saint Iohn expounds it, when hee saith v. 28. That Christ seeing all (other) things to be fulfilled, Vt consummaretur Scriptura, That the Scripture in this also might be fulfilled, said, I thirst: though I deny not, but at the same time also the date of the Law was expired, to wit, of the law ceremoniall, and of so much of the iudiciall, as appertained peculiarly to the Iewes, and agreeth not with the law of the new Testament and Gospel of Christ. For the immutable law of God, though prescribing things mutable, is not therfore changed in it selfe; but the things prescribed, change according to this eternall ordinance, of which the Wisedome of Salomon, And being one shee can doe all things, and remaining in her selfe renewe-eth all. Iohn 18. 30. Psal. 69. 22.

§. VI.

Of the Law of Nature.

OF the law of Nature as it is taken in generall, I finde no definition among the Schoolemen: only as it is considered in man, it is called the impression of diuine light, and a participation of the eternall law in the reasonable creature. Lex naturalis est impressio diuini luminis in nobis, & participatio legis æternæ in rationali creatura. Vlpian defines the naturall law to be the same which nature hath taught all liuing creatures: Ius naturale est quod Natura omnia animalia docuit: and hee afterward addeth, Ius istud non humani generis proprium, sed omnium animalium quæ terra marique nascuntur, auium quoque commune est; The law of Nature is not proper to man alone, but the same is common to all liuing creatures, as well to birds, as to those which the Land and Sea produceth: Aug. in Ep. ad Hil. 89. & in Euang. Ioh. trac. 49. Vlp. de iustitia & iure l. 1. tit. 1.

But

But this definition is not generall, but of the naturall Law in things of life.

The Law of nature in generall, I take to be that diſpoſition, inſtinct, and formall quality, which God in his eternall prouidence hath giuen and imprinted in the nature of euery creature, animate, and inanimate. And as it is diuinum lumen in Men, inlightning our formall reaſon; ſo is it more than ſenſe in Beaſts, and more than vegetation in plants. For it is not ſenſe alone in Beaſts, which teacheth them at firſt ſight, and without experience or inſtruction, to flie from the enemies of their liues: ſeeing that Bulles and Horſes appeare vnto the ſenſe more fearefull and terrible, than the leaſt kinde of Dogges; and yet the Hare and Deere feedeth by the one, and flieth from the other, yea, though by them neuer ſeene before, and that as ſoone as they fall from their Dammes. Neither is it ſenſe which hath taught other Beaſts to prouide for Winter, Birds to build their neſts, high or low, according to the tempeſtuous or quiet ſeaſons: or the Birds of India to make their neſts on the ſmalleſt twigges which hang ouer Rivers, and not on any other part of the tree, or elſe-where: to ſaue their egges and young ones from the Monkies, and other Beaſts, whoſe weight ſuch a twigge will not beare: and which would feare to fall into the water. The inſtances in this kinde are exceeding many which may bee giuen. Neither is it out of the vegetable or growing nature of plants, that ſome trees, as the female of the Palmitto, will not beare any fruite except the male grow in ſight. But this they doe by that Law, which the infinite and vnſearchable wiſdome of God had in all eternity prouided for them, and for euery nature created. In man this Law is double, corrupt, and incorrupt; corrupt, where the reaſon of man hath made it ſelfe ſubiect, and a Vaſſall to paſſions, and affections brutall: and incorrupt, where time and cuſtome hath bred in men a new nature, which alſo, as is aforeſaid, is a kinde of Law. For it was not by the Law of Nature incorrupt, which Saint Auguſtine calleth the Law of reaſon, but by a nature blinded and corrupted, that the Germans did anciently allow of theft: and that other Nations were by Law conſtrained to become Idolaters; that by the Lawes of Lycurgus it was permitted to men to vſe one anothers Wife, and to the Woman to chooſe them others beſides their Husbands, to beget them with childe: which law in thoſe parts hath laſted long, and is not forgotten to this day.

Supra. §. 4. ex loco ad Rom. 7. 23.

Theod. l. 9. de curandis affect. Grecorum.

The Scythians, and the people of both Indies, hold it lawfull to bury with them the beſt beloued wiues: as alſo they haue many other cuſtomes remembred by G. Valentia, againſt nature and right reaſon. Acoſta.

And I know not from what authority it is, that theſe Lawes ſome men auow to be naturall: except it be of this corrupt nature, as (among others) to pay guile with guile: to become faithleſſe among the faithleſſe: to prouide for our ſelues by another mans deſtruction: that iniury is not done to him that is willing: to deſtroy thoſe whom we feare, and the like. For taking the definition of naturall Lawes, either out of Saint Auguſtine or Aquinas, (the one calling it the impreſſion of diuine light; the other, the dictate or ſentence of practique reaſon) the ſame can teach vs, or incline vs to no other thing, than to the exerciſe of Iuſtice and vprightneſſe: and not to offer or performe any thing toward others, ſaue that which we would be content ſhould be offered or performed toward our ſelues. For ſuch is the Law of Nature to the minde, as the eye is to the body; and that which according to Dauid ſheweth vs good, that is, the obſeruation of thoſe things which leade vs thereby to our laſt end; which is eternall life: though of themſelues not ſufficient without faith and grace.

Now, that which is truly and properly the law of Nature, where the corruption is not taken for the Law, is, as aforeſaid, the impreſſion of Gods diuine light in men, and a participation of the Law increated and eternall. For without any Law written, the right reaſon and vnderſtanding, which God hath giuen vs, are abilities within our ſelues, ſufficient to giue vs knowledge of the good and euill, which by our gratitude to God, and diſtribution of right to men, or by the contrary, we prepare and purchaſe for our ſelues. For when the Gentiles (ſaith Saint Paul) which haue not the Law, doe by nature thoſe things contained in the Law: they hauing not the Law, are a Law vnto themſelues. Now, to loue God by whom we are, and to doe the ſame right vnto all men, which we deſire ſhould be done vnto vs, is an effect of the pureſt reaſon: in whoſe higheſt Turrets, the quiet of conſcience hath made her reſting place, and habitation, In arce altiſſima rationis quies habitat. Therefore, the Gentiles (ſaith Saint Paul) which ſhew the effects of the Law written in their hearts, haue their conſciences for a witneſſe of thoſe effects: and the reprobate their thoughts to accuſe them.

Rom. 2. 14.

Rom. 2. 15.

And it is most true, that whosoever is not a law unto himselfe (while hee hopeth to abuse the world by the advantage of hypocrisie) worketh nothing else, but the betraying of his owne soule, by crafty unrighteousnesse, purchasing eternall perdition. For it helpeth us not to hide our corrupt hearts from the worlds eye, seeing from him, who is an infinite eye, we cannot hide them: some Garlands we may gather in this May-game of the world, Sed flos ille, dum loquimur, arescit; Those flowers wither while we discourse of their colours, or are in gathering them. That we should therefore inhabite and dwell within our selves, and become fearefull witnesses of our secretest euils, did that reuerend Philosopher Pythagoras teach in this golden precept: Nil turpe committas, neque coram alijs, neque tecum, maximè omnium verere teipsum; Commit nothing foule or dishoneſt, saith he, neither to bee knowne to others, nor to thine owne heart: but above all men reuerence thine owne conscience. And this may be a precept of nature and right reason: by which law, men, and all creatures, and bodyes, are inclined to those operations, which are answerable to their owne forme; as fire to give heate. Now, as the reasonable minde is the forme of man, so is he aptly moued to those things which his proper forme presenteth vnto him: to wit, to that which right reason offereth; and the acts of right reason, are the acts of vertue: and in the breach of the rules of this reason, is man least excusable: as being a reasonable creature. For all else, both sensitiue, growing, and inanimate, obey the Law which God imposed on them at their first creation.

Gen. 1. The Earth performeth her office, according to the Law of God in nature: for it bringeth forth the bud of the hearbe which seedeth seede, &c. and the Beast, which liueth thereon. Iob. c. 28. Hee gaue a Law to the Seas, and commanded them to keepe their bounds: which they obey. Hee made a decree for the raine, and a way for the lightning of the thunders. He caused the Sunne to moue, and to giue light, and to serue for signes and for seasons. Were these as rebellious as man, for whose sake they were created, or did they once breake the law of their natures and formes; the whole world would then perish, and all returne to the first Chaos, darkenesse, and confusion.

By this naturall Law, or Law of humane reason, did Cain perceiue his owne wickednesse, and offence, in the murther of Abel: for he not onely feared the displeasure of God, but the revenge of men: it being written in his reason, that whatsoeuer he performed towards others, the same by others might be done vnto him againe. And that this judgement of well and evill doing, was put into our natures by God, and his eternall Law, before the Law written: Moses in the person of God witnesseth, Gen. 4. If thou doe well, shalt thou not be accepted, and if thou doe not well, sinne lyeth at thy doore.

The Schoolemen are large also in this question of the naturall Law: the same being opened amply by Reinerius, Antonius, and Valentia. But it is not my purpose to write a Volumne of this subiect.

But this Law which Thomas Aquinas calleth an act of reason taken properly, and not a habite, as it is an euident naturall iudgement of practique reason: they diuide into indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration (as that good is to bee followed, and euill eschewed) and demonstrable, which is euidently proued, out of higher and more vniuersall propositions. Againe, as it answereth the naturall appetite, prescribing things to be desired as good, or to be auoyded as euill (as of the first, to desire to liue, and to satisfie hunger, &c. and of the second, to eschew paines, sorrow, and death) in this consideration Tho. 1.2. q. 94. art. 2. they diuide it, according to the diuers kindes of appetites that are in vs. For in euery man there are three sorts of appetites, which answer the three degrees of naturall Law. The first is, to be that which we are; in which is comprehended the desire, both to liue, and to preserue our being and life, also the desire of issue, with care to prouide for them: for the Father after his death liues in his children; and therefore the desire of life comprehends the desire of children. And to these appetites are referred the first indemonstrable lawes of nature, for the most part. For it needs no proofe, that all creatures should desire to be, to liue, and to be defended, and to liue in their issue, when they cannot in themselues. And as man is a being, Ens or Res: so he doth desire good, and shun euill. For it is common to all things, to desire things agreeable to their owne natures, which is, to desire their owne good. And so is Good defined by Aristotle, to be that which all desire. Which definition Basil vpon the 44. Psalme approueth: Ethic. l. 1. c. 1. Recte quidem Bonum definierunt. Quod omnia expetunt; Rightly haue some men defined Good, or Goodnesse, to be that which all things desire.

The

The ſecond kinde of appetite is of thoſe things which appertaine to vs, as wee haue ſenſe. Whence, by the law of Nature, we deſire the delights of euery ſenſe; but with ſuch moderation, as may neither glut vs with ſatiety, nor hurt vs with exceſſe. For as Senſe it ſelfe is for the preſeruation of life and being: ſo is it meete, euen by the Law of nature, that the ſenſitiue appetite ſhould not carry vs to the deſtruction, either of our life or being. And although (ſeeing both theſe kindes of appetites are in beaſts) we may well ſay, that Nature hath giuen diuers Lawes vnto them: In which ſenſe the Ciuilians define Naturall right, or Ius naturale, to be the ſame which Nature hath taught all liuing creatures; Yet the Schoolemen admit not, that the inſtincts of beaſts can bee properly called a Law, but onely a Ius, or Right, which is the matter, and aime of euery Law. For ſo they diſtinguiſh it; where Vlpian affirmeth, that Ius naturale is that, which Nature hath taught all liuing creatures. In this place (ſaith Valentia) Ius is not to be taken for a Law, but for the matter of the Law. And yet where Vlpian alſo diſtinguiſheth the right belonging to liuing creatures in generall, from the right belonging to men; calling the one Ius naturæ, the other Ius gentium: the Diuines vnderſtand the law of nature more largely, that is, for all euident dictates, precepts, or biddings of diuine reaſon: both in beaſts and men; and reſtraine the law of Nations to a kinde of humane right.

The third appetite is of thoſe things which appertaine properly to man, as hee is a liuing creature reaſonable: as well with relation to God, and to our Neighbour, as for our ſelues: and the Lawes of this appetite are the Commandements of our Religion.

Now although there are many other branches and diuiſions of this law of nature anſwering the diuiſion of matter, which it preſcribeth, and as manifold, as the morall actions are which it commandeth or forbiddeth: yet is the law of nature but one law, according to Aquinas: firſt, becauſe it hath one fountaine or roote in the naturall or motiue faculty, which is but one, ſtirring vp to good, and declining the contrary: ſecondly, becauſe all is contained in that generall naturall precept, That good is to bee followed, and ill auoyded: and thirdly, becauſe all the parts are reduced to one and the ſame laſt ende.

That this law of nature bindeth all creatures, it is manifeſt: and chiefly man; becauſe he is indued with reaſon; in whom as reaſon groweth, ſo this band of obſeruing the law of nature increaſeth, Poſtquam ratio ad perfectum venit, tunc fit quod ſcriptum eſt, Adueniente mandato, peccatum reuixit; When reaſon grew to perfection, then it came to paſſe, which was written by Saint Paul, when the Commandement came, ſinne reuiued. Neither is it a ſmall warrant for this law of nature, when thoſe which breake the ſame, are ſaid by Saint Paul, To be deliuered ouer into a reprobate ſenſe (or minde) to doe thoſe things which are not conuenient: and againe, that their conſciences beare witneſſe, and their thoughts accuſe them. For, though this law of nature ſtretch not to euery particular: as to command faſting and the like: yet, it commandeth in generall all good, and whatſoeuer is agreeable to right and reaſon. And therefore, ſaid Demophene; Homines ſolli ſunt mali, declinando in id quod contra naturam eſt; Men (ſaith he) are made euill, by declining vnto that which is contrary to nature: and Saint Auguſtine, Omne vitium naturæ nocet, ac per hoc contra naturam eſt; Euery vice doth wrong to nature, and is therefore contrary vnto it.

Basil. Rom. 1. 28. Rom. 2. 15. L. 2. Vid. orba. c. 30.

Neither yet are the rules of this law of nature ſo ſtraight, but that they ſuffer exceptions in ſome particulars. For whereas by this law all men are borne Lords of the earth, yet it well alloweth inequality of portions, according to vnequall merit: by taking from the euill, and giuing to the good: and by permitting and commanding that all men ſhall enioy the fruites of their labours to themſelues: according to the rules of iuſtice and equitie.

And though the Law of nature command, that all things be reſtored which are left in truſt, yet in ſome cauſes, this her law ſhee ſuffereth to be broken: as to denie a mad man his weapons, and the like, which he left in keeping while he was ſober. But the vniuerſall principles can no more be changed, than the decrees of God are alterable: who according to Saint Paul, abideth faithfull, and cannot denie himſelfe. 2 Tim. 2.

§. VII. Of the written Law of GOD.

AFter the eternall, and naturall, the law Positiue or imposed is the next in order, which law, being nothing but an addition, or rather explication of the former, hath two kindes: Diuine and Humane. Againe, the diuine positiue law is double; the Olde and New: The Old was giuen vnto Moses in Mount Sinai or Horeb, at such time as the world had stood 2513. whole yeeres: and in the 67. day of this yeere, when as Ascatades or Ascades gouerned the Assyrians, Marathus the Sycionians, Triopus the Argiues, Cecrops Attica, and Acherres Egypt; to wit, after the promise to Abraham, 430. yeeres. And this it seemes, was the first written law which the world receiued. For the very word Nomos, signifying a law, was not then, nor long after inuented by the Grecians: no not in Homers time, who liued after the fall of Troy 80. yeares at least: and Troy it selfe was cast downe 335. yeeres, after Moses led Israel out of Egypt. This Law, it pleased God to ingraue in stone, that it might remaine a lasting booke of his expreſt will in the Church; and that the Priests and people might haue, whereof to meditate, till the comming of Christ: and that so these Children of Israel, though bred among an Idolatrous people in Egypt, might be without excuse: the slight defences of ignorance being taken from them.

Aug. de Ciuit. Dei lib. 1.

The reason knowne to vs why this Law was not written before, is, that when the people were few, and their liues long, the Elders of Families might easily without any written Law, instruct their owne Children: and yet as they increased, so doubtlesse they had, besides the law of Nature, many precepts from God, before the Law written. But now at length, forasmuch as the law of Nature did not define all kindes of good, and euill; nor condemne euery sinne in particular: nor sufficiently terrifie the consciences of offenders: nor so expound diuine worship, as for those after-ages was required, who gaue euery day lesse authority than other to the naturall Law; In these respects it was necessary, that the Law should be written, and set before the eyes of all men: which before, they might, but would not reade, in their owne consciences. The Schoolemen, and the Fathers before them, inlarge the causes and necessity, why the Law was written, whereof these are the cheefest.

The first, for restraining of sinne, directly grounded vpon this place of Dauid, The law of the Lord is vndefiled, converting soules: The testimonies of the Lord are faithfull, giuing wisedome to children. For the humane Law, saith Saint Augustine, meeteth not with all offences, either by way of prohibition or punishment; seeing thereby it might take away something seeming necessary, and hinder common profit: but the diuine law written, forbiddeth euery euill, and therefore by Dauid it is called vndefiled.

Secondly, it serueth for the direction of our mindes. For the Lawes of men can onely take knowledge of outward actions, but not of internall motions, or of our disposition and will: and yet it is required, that wee be no lesse cleane in the one, than in the other. And therefore were the words conuerting our soules added by Dauid: wherein are all our outward acts first generated, according to the Cabalists. Actiones hominum nullæ essent, nisi prius in mente dicerentur; The actions of men (say they) would be none at all, were they not first conceiued in the minde.

Thirdly, it leadeth vs to the knowledge of truth, which by reason of diuersitie of opinion, and difference of peculiar Lawes among sundrie Nations, wee cannot bee assured of; but the Law of GOD bindeth all men, and is without errour: and therefore also said Dauid, That the testimony of the Law of God is faithfull: giuing wisedome to children.

§. VIII. Of the vnwritten Law of God, giuen to the Patriarkes by Tradition.

NOW, that in all this long tract of time, betweene the creation and the written Law, the world and people of God were left altogether to the law of reason and nature, it doth not appeare. For the Patriarkes of the first Age receiued many precepts from God himselfe, and whatsoeuer was first imposed by Adam, the same was obserued by Seth, who instructed Enos: from whom it descended to Noah, Sem, Abraham, Isaac, Iacob, Ioseph, and Moses. Yea many particular Commandements afterward written, were formerly imposed and deliuered ouer by Tradition; which kinde of teaching the Iewes afterward called called Cabala, or Receptio: precepts receiued from the mouth of their Priests and Elders: to which the Iewes after the law written, added the interpretation of secret mysteries, reserued in the bosomes of their Priests, and vnlawfull to be vttered to the people. But the true Cabala was not to be concealed from any; as being indeed the diuine law reuealed to the Patriarks, and from them deliuered to the posterity, when as yet it was vnwritten. The Commandements which God gaue vnto Adam in the beginning, were, that hee should impose names to all beasts, according to their natures; to whose perfection of vnderstanding they were sufficiently knowne. For finding the reason of his owne name Adam, or Adamah, Earth, or red clay, he gaue other names significant, not onely to beasts, but to his Children and Nephewes, which afterward his issues imitated; as the name of Seth signifieth, as some take it, one that was laid for the ground or foundation of the Church, or rather, one giuen in recompence for Abel that was slaine: and Enosh signifieth man or miserable; &c. Further, God commanded Adam to till the ground, and to liue by the labour thereof: God also gaue him the choise of all fruits, but the forbidden; and in Adam also was mariage first instituted: all men thence-after being commanded to cohabit with their Wiues, rather than with their Father or Mother.

That murther and cruelty was also forbidden, both before the law written, and before the flood it selfe, it is manifest. God himselfe making it appeare, that it was one of the greatest causes of the destruction of mankinde by the generall flood. For God said vnto Noa, An end of all flesh is come before me: for the earth is filled with cruelty through them: and behold, I will destroy them from the earth.* That offence therefore, for which all perished, could not be vnknown to all that perished: Gods mercy and iustice interposing between the vntaught, and reuenge. This commandement God repeated to Noa, after the waters were dried vp from the earth: Who so sheddeth mans blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the Image of God hath he made man.

* The cõmon reading is cum terra: but God did not destroy the earth: and why may not this præposition in this place, haue the same force, which it hath according to Iunius, Gen. 4. 1. Item 44. 4. & Deut. 34. 1. especially, seeing these words are but a repetition of that which is said, verse 7. Delebo homines de superficie terræ.

Also the law of honouring and reuerencing our parents, was obserued among the faithfull, and the contrary punished by the fathers curse: as, Cursed be Canaan; a seruant of seruants shall he be vnto his brethren. Againe, we finde that the vnnaturall sin of the Sodomites was punished in the highest degree, as with fire from heauen. The sinne of Adulterie and Rauishment, was before the law no lesse detested than the rest, as appeareth by that reuenge, taken for Dina's forcing: and by the iudgement which Iuda gaue against Tamar, That she should be burnt: and by the repentance of Pharaoh & Abimelech, against whom this sentence was pronounced, Thou art but dead, because of the woman which thou hast taken: for she is a mans Wife: To these we may adde the ordinance of Sacrifice, of distinction of cleane and vncleane beasts; of Circumcision, of the brother to raise vp seed to his brother that left a widow childlesse, and diuers other constitutions, partly Morall, and partly Ceremoniall, which being deliuered before the written law, were after by it confirmed. So that this Diuine Law imposed, of which the Law of Moses containeth that which is called The old Testament, may be said, not onely to haue beene written in the hearts of men, before it was engrauen in stone, but also in substance to haue bene giuen in precept to the Patriarks. For as S. Paul witnesseth of himselfe, I knew not sinne, but by the Law: so euer the Law naturally preceded, and went before offences, though written after offences committed. It is true, that all the creatures of God were directed by some kinde of vnwritten law; the Angels intuitiuely; Men by reason; Beasts by sense and instinct, without discourse; Plants by their vegetatiue powers; and things inanimate by their necessary motions, without sense or preception.

§. IX. Of the Morall, Iudiciall, and Ceremoniall Law, with a note prefixed, How the Scripture speaketh not alway in one sense, when it nameth the Law of Moses.

NOW as the word (Law) in generall, as is aforesaid, hath diuers significations, and is taken for all doctrine which doth prescribe and restraine: so the Law, called the Law of Moses in particular, is taken by S. Paul diuersly; as sometime for all the old Testament, as, Now we know what soeuer the Law saith, it saith to them which are vnder the Law. Rom. 3. 19.

When it is opposed, or differenced from the Prophets and Psalmes, it is there taken for the fiue Bookes of Moses. For so S. Luke hath distinguished them; as, All must bee fulfilled which are written of me in the Law, in the Prophets, and in the Psalmes. Luc. 24. 44.

When it is opposed to the Gospell, then it is taken for the Law Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall; as, Therefore we conclude, that a man is iustified by Faith, without the works of the Law. Rom. 3. 28.

When it is opposed to Grace, it signifieth the declaration of Gods wrath, and our guilt of condemnation; or the extremity of the law, and summum ius: as, For ye are not vnder the Law, but vnder Grace. Rom. 6. 4. Gal. 3. 18.

When it is opposed to the Truth, namely, where the Ceremonies or signes are taken for the things signified; as the Sacrifice for Christ, and the like: then it signifieth but shadowes and figures; as, The Law was giuen by Moses, but grace & truth came by Iesus Christ. Iohn 1. 17.

Lastly, when it is opposed to the time of Christs comming, it signifieth the whole policy of the Iewes Common-weale; as, Before faith came, we were kept vnder the Law, &c. Gal. 3. 23. Luc 16. 6. Of the Law of the order and institution of the Aaronicall Priesthood; as, All the Prophets and the Law, or the Priests propheſied vnto Iohn. And if the Priesthood be changed, the Law also, to wit, of the Priesthood, must needs be changed. Heb. 7. 12. & 10. 1.

The word (Law) is sometime also taken by the Figure Metonymia, for Interest, Authority, and Empire, or for constraining force; as, The Law of the Spirit of life, the law or the force of sinne and death, the enforcements of concupiscence, &c. Rom. 8. 2. Rom. 7. 23.

But the Written Law of Moses, or the Law of the Olde Testament, of which we now speake, is thus defined. The Law is a doctrine, which was first put into the minds of men by God, and afterwards written by Moses, or by him repeated, commanding Holinesse and Iustice, promising eternall life conditionally, that is, to the obseruers of the law, and threatning death to those which breake the law in the least. For, according to S. Iames, Whosoeuer shall keepe the whole, and faileth in one point, is guilty of all. Iames 2. 10. The definition vsed by the Schoolemen, in which both the Old and New law are comprehended, is thus giuen. Lex diuina est diuinum decretum, hominibus prescribens modum necessarium vt aptè peruenire possint ad supernaturalem beatitudinem, quæ est vltimus humanæ vitæ finis; The diuine Law (say they) is the decree of God, prescribing vnto men a necessary meane, whereby they may aptly attaine supernaturall beatitude, which is the last end of mans life.

The law of Moses hath three parts: Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall. The Morall part commandeth this or that good to be done, and this or that euill to be auoided, in particular; as also it declareth, for whose sake it is to be done; as, Do this, for I am the Lord; whereas the law of nature commands it but in generall. Againe, the Morall law entreateth of vertue and goodnesse; the Ceremoniall of diuine seruice, and of holinesse; (for eternall worship, and the order of hallowing our selues vnto God is called Ceremony) and the Iudicial teacheth the particular gouernment, fit for the Common-wealth of the Iewes, and prescribeth orders for iustice and equity. And therefore was it said of Saint Paul, The commandement is iust, holy, and good: iust, or iustice being referred to the Iudiciall: holy, or holinesse to the Ceremoniall; good, or honest to the Morall. The Iudiciall part is touching the gouernment of the Common-wealth of the Iewes, in which many things must needs be proper to that estate, as such as were instituted either in respect of place or persons. Rom. 7. 12.

The Ceremoniall is diuided into foure parts, according to the foure kindes of things of which it speaketh, to wit; Sacrifice, Holy things, Sacraments, and Obseruances. To Sacrifices belong beasts, and the fruites of the earth; to Holy things the Tabernacle, Temple, Vessels, Altars and the like; to Sacraments, Circumcision, the Passeouer, and such like. For Obseruances, they consisted either in prohibition of certaine meates, as not to eate the blood and fat of beasts: or in some other outward things, as in washings, purifyings, annointings, and attire, as not to weare mixt garments of Linnen and Woollen: as also it prohibiteth other vnnaturall and vnproper commixtions, as, Thou shalt not yoake together in a Plough an Oxe and an Asse, or cast mingled seed in one field. It also exhorteth to naturall compassion, and forbiddeth crueltie euen to beasts, birds, and plants, whereby the creatures of God might be destroyed without any profit to man. For so some referre these precepts, Thou shalt not kill the bird sitting on her nest; nor beate downe the first buds of the tree, nor muzzell the labouring Oxe, and the like, to the Ceremoniall Law.

Neither is there any of these three parts of the Law of Moses, but it hath as yet in some respects the same power which it had before the comming of Christ. For the Morall liueth still, and is not abrogated or taken away: sauing in the ability of iustifying or condemning; for therein are wee commanded to loue and worship God: and to vse charitie one towards another: which for euer shall be required at our hands. Therein also are we in particular directed, how this ought to bee done: which power of directing by speciall rules and precepts of life, it retaineth still. For these things also are commanded in both Testaments to be obserued: though principally for the feare of God in the one, and for the loue of God in the other.

The Ceremoniall also liueth in the things which it fore-signified. For the shadow is not destroyed, but perfected, when the body it selfe is represented to vs. Besides, it still liueth, in that it giueth both instruction and testimony of Christ, and in that it giueth direction to the Church, for some Ceremonies and Types of holy signification, which are still expedient; though in a farre fewer number than before Christs comming, and in a far lesse degree of necessitie.

Lastly, the Iudiciall liueth in substance, and concerning the end, and the naturall and vniuersall equitie thereof.

But the Morall faileth in the point of iustification, the Ceremoniall as touching the vse and externall obseruation (because Christ himselfe is come, of whom the ceremonies were signes and shadowes) and the Iudiciall is taken away, as farre forth as it was peculiar to the Iewes Common-weale and policie.

§. X. A proposall of nine other points to be considered, with a touch of the fiue first.

As for that which remaineth in the generall consideration of the diuine written Law, it may in effect be reduced into these nine points.

1. The dignity and worth of the Law.
2. The Maiesty of the Law-giuer.
3. The property and peculiarity of the people receiuing it.
4. The conueniency of the time in which it was giuen.
5. The efficacie and power thereof.
6. The difference and agreement of the old and new Testament.
7. The end and vse of the Law.
8. The sense and vnderstanding of the Law.
9. The durance and continuance thereof.

1. The dignity of the Law is sufficiently proued by S. Paul, in these words: Wherefore the Law is holy, and the Commandement is holy, and iust, and good: which three attributes are referred, as aforesaid, to the Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall.

2. The Maiesty of the Law-giuer is approued in all his creatures: who as he hath giuen all things their liues and beings, so he onely gaue the Law, who could onely giue the end & reward promised to wit, the saluation of mankind: but he gaue it not to Moses immediately, but by the ministery of Angels: as it is said: And the Law was ordained by Angels, in the hand of a Mediator: and in the Acts, He gaue the Law by the ordinance of Angels. Galath. 3. 19.

3. The propriety and peculiarity of the people, receiuing the Law, is in three respects. First, in that they were prepared. Secondly, in that they were a Nation apart and disseuered: Thirdly, in that they were the children of the promise made to Abraham. Prepared they were, because they had the knowledge of one God, when all other Nations were Idolaters. A Nation apart and seuered they were, because of Gods choice and election. Children of the promise they were, for the promise was made by God vnto Abraham & his seed: not vnto his seedes, as to Esau and Iacob, but to his seed, as to Iacob or Israel singularly, of whom Christ. Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made: hee saith not to the seeds, as speaking of many, but to thy seed, as of one, which is Christ. Gal. 3. 6.

4. The conueniency of the time, in which it was giuen, is noted by S. Augustine: that it was about the middle time, betweene the Law of Nature, and Grace: the Law of Nature continued from Adam to Moses: the Law written in the Commandements receiued by Moses in the worlds yeere 2514. continued to the Baptisme of Iohn: from which time, begun the Law of Grace, which shall continue to the worlds end. Other reasons for the conueniency are formerly giuen.

5. The fift consideration is of the efficacie of this Law, the same being a disposition to, or signe of our Iustification: but not by it selfe sufficient, but as a figure of Christ in ceremonies, and a preparation to righteousnesse in morall precepts. For through the passion of Christ were sinnes forgiuen, who taketh away the sinnes of the world: and therefore

or

Gal. 4. S. Paul calleth the rudiments of the law beggerly and weake; beggerly as containing no
Heb. 9. grace, weake as not able to forgiue and iustifie. The bloud of Goats and Bulles, and the ashes of an Heifer could onely cleanse the body; but they were figures of Christs blood, Gal. 2. which doth cleanse the inward soule. For if the law could iustifie, then Christ died in vaine.

§. XI. Of the sixt point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the Old and New Testament.

THe Old and New Testament differ in name, and in the meane and way proposed for attaining to saluation; as the Olde by workes, the New by grace: but in the thing it selfe, or obiect and remote end, they agree: which is mans happinesse and saluation.

The Old Testament, or Law, or Letter, or the Witnesse of Gods will, was called the Old, because it preceded the New Testament; which is an explication of the Old: from which the New taketh witnesse. Yet the New of more excellencie, in that it doeth more liuely expresse, and openly and directly delineate the wayes of our redemption. It is also
Heb. 8. 13. called the Old, to shew that in part it was to be abrogated: In that he saith the New Testament, he hath abrogated the Old. For the Old law, though greatly extolled by the Prophets, and deliuered with wonderfull miracles, yet was it constituted in a policy perishable: but the New was giuen in a promise of an euerlasting Kingdome, and therefore called in the Apocalyps, a Testament and Gospel for euer during.

The Old Testament is called the Law, because the first and cheefe part is the Law of Moses, of which the Prophets and Psalmes are Commentaries, explicating that Law.

The New Testament is called the Gospell, because the first and cheefe part thereof, is the glad tidings of our Redemption: the other Bookes, as the Epistles, or Letters of the Apostles, and the Acts or story of the Apostles, are plentifull interpreters therof: The word Euangelion, signifying a ioyfull, happy, and prosperous message, or (as Homer vsed it) the reward giuen to the Messenger, bringing ioyfull newes. It is also sometime taken for a sacrifice, offered after victory, or other pleasing successe, as by Xenophon. In the Scriptures it hath three significations. First, for glad tydings in generall, as in Esay the 52. verse 7. concerning peace: Secondly, by an excellencie it is restrained, to signifie that most ioyfull message of Saluation, as in Luc. 2. 10. whence also by figure it is taken for the History Acts. 1. of Christ: and so we vnderstand the foure Gospels.

Lastly, for the preaching and diuulging the doctrine of Christ, as 1 Cor. 9. 14. & 2. Cor. 8, 18.

The agreement of both Testaments (taken, I thinke, as they are diuided in volumes) is by Danæus comprised in these foure.

In their Author.
In the substance of the Couenant, or things promised.
In the foundation, to wit, Christ.
In the effects, that is, in righteousnesse and iustification,

In the Author they agree, because both are of God, and therefore both one Testament and will of God in substance of doctrine. For as there was euer one Church, so was there one Couenant, one Adoption, and one Doctrine. As the old law doth point at Christ, so doth the new Law teach Christ: the olde proposing him as to come, the new as alreadie come; one and the same thing being promised in both; both tending to one, and the same end: euen the saluation of our soules: which according to S. Peter, is the end of our Faith. For although it be said, that Moses did promise by obseruing the Law, an earthly Kingdome, a land flowing with milke and hony, the propagation of children, and other worldly blessings: yet all these were but figures to teach, and pledges to assure the Fathers of those spirituall blessings by Christ; for by the earthly, he raised their minds to the hope of heauenly. And the Fathers notwithstanding these worldly goods, did yet acknowledge themselues strangers, and pilgrims, expecting the heauenly Hierusalem: according to this
Cap. 11. v. 13. place of the Hebrewes: All these dyed in faith, and receiued not the promises, but saw them a
Lib. de Ciuit. Dei. 18. 6. 1. 5. farre off, and beleeued them; confessing that they were strangers and pilgrimes on the earth. To which purpose also Saint Augustine: Omnino pauci veterem legem intelligunt, non attendentes, tendentes per promissa terrena, eterna promitti: Few (saith he) do vnderstand the old Law not attending that by things earthly eternall are promised. And S. Hierome: Noluit Deus pascere Iudeos morè pecorum corporalibus donis opibusque, vt Iudei somniant; God would not feed the Iewes as beasts with corporall gifts and riches, as themselues dreame. And this may bee gathered out of Gods owne words, Ego sum Deus tuus; & ero vobis in Deum; I am thy God, and I will be your God. For the words, I will be your God, proue that it was not for the present, or for perishable things, that God gaue them this promise, but in respect of the future: to wit, the safetie of their soules. For as God created both body and soule; so hath he of his goodnesse, not left the better part vncared for, which liueth euer. In Sophon. cap. 3. v. 9.

The agreement betweene the Old and New Testament in substance, inferres also the agreement in foundation. For Christ is called the foundation of the law, laide both by the Apostles and Prophets; in whom all the promises of God in the Olde and New, are assured: the Fathers hauing eaten the same spirituall foode, which we eate in our Sacraments.

The agreement in effects is, in that the knowledge of our sinne and miserie, which is taught vs by the law, maketh way, and as it were, serueth in subordination to the Gospel, the proper effects whereof are mercy and saluation: to which the Law seruing as an introduction (for to those which acknowledge their sin and misery, God sheweth his mercy and saluation) may be said to agree with the Gospell in the effect. For otherwise if we seuer the Law from subordination to the Gospell, the effects are very different: the one sheweth the way of righteousnesse by workes, the other by faith: the Law woundeth, the Gospell healeth: the Law terrifieth, the Gospell allureth; Moses accuseth, Christ defendeth: Moses condemneth, Christ pardoneth. The Old restraineth the hand, the New the minde. Data est lex quae non sanaret (saith Saint Augustine) sed quae aegrotantes probaret; The Law was giuen, not to helpe, but to discouer sicknesse: and Saint Chrysostome, Data est lex, vt se homo inueniret, non vt moribus sanaretur, sed vt medicus quaereretur; The Law was giuen that man might finde and know his owne imperfection: not that his disease was thereby holpen, but that he might then seeke out the Physitian. For Christ came to saue the world, which the law had condemned. And as Moses was but a seruant, and Christ a Son; so the greatest benefit was reserued to bee brought, as by the worthiest person, saith Cyril: for this law made nothing perfect, but was an introduction of a better hope. Homil. ad Rom. Heb. 7.

§. XII. Of the rest of the points proposed.

THe seuenth consideration is of the end, and vse of the law: which is to bring vs to Christ: for finding no righteousnesse in our owne workes, wee must seeke it in some other. But this is the last, and remote, and vttmost end: the next and proper end of the law, is to prescribe righteousnesse, and to exact absolute and perfect obedience to God. Cursed is he which continueth not in all the things of this law. Leuit. 18. 5.

The second end of the Law, is to render vs inexcusable before God: who knowing so perfect a law, doe not keepe it: the law requiring a perfect and intire, not a broken or halfe obedience: but both inward and outward righteousnesse, and performance of duty to God and Men.

The third and cheefe end of the law, is, as hath beene said, to send vs to Christ, and his grace, being in our selues condemned and lost. For the law was deliuered with thunder, and with a most violent and fearfull tempest, threatning eternall death.

The fourth end of the law was to designe, and preserue, the place of the Church and true people of God: and to holde them in one Discipline, and awe, till the comming of Christ: after whom the Church was to be dispersed ouer the whole world.

These be the ends of the Morall law. The end and vse of the Ceremoniall law, is to confirme the truth of Christ, and the new Testament. The vse of the Iudiciall, to teach vs naturall equity, and right, whereto we must conforme our selues.

The sense and vnderstanding of the Law is double, literall and spirituall: by the literall we are taught the worship and seruice of God: by the spirituall, the figures and mysticall fore-speakings of Christ.

Lastly, for the durance or continuance of the * Law, the same had being vntill the passion of Christ: before which time, and while Christ taught in the world, both the old and the new were in force. But after that the true sacrifice was offered vpon the Altar of the Crosse, Heb. 9. 10.

* Gen. 49. 10. The Scepter shall not depart from Iuda, nor a Lawgiuer from betweene his feet, vntill Shi to come.

Crosse, then the Iewish sacrifices and ceremonies, which were Types and figures of Christ (Christ being the body of those shadowes) ceased to binde the consciences any longer: the mystery of our redemption being now by Christ and in him finished. In token whereof, the vaile of the Temple rent asunder; noting that the ceremoniall vailes and shadowes were now to be removed, not that the morall law of the Commandements was hereby abolished, or weakned at all: otherwise than that it had not power to condemne according to the Iewish doctrine, as aforesaid. For the obseruing of the law was by Christ himselfe seuerely commanded: our loue towards God being thereby to be witnessed. And herein Dauid so much reioyced, as hee preferred the obseruation of the Law, before all that the world could yeeld. In via testimoniorum tuorum delectatus sum, sicut in omnibus diuitijs; I haue been delighted in thy law, as in all manner of riches: And againe, The law of thy mouth is good for me aboue thousands of gold and siluer. This is the loue of God (saith S. Iohn) that we keepe his Commandements. And that there is no excuse for the neglect of the things commanded in the law, God himselfe in Deuteronomy witnesseth. This Commandement (saith he) which I command thee this day, is not hid from thee, neither is it farre off. It is not in heauen that thou shouldst say, Who shall go vp for vs to heauen, and bring it vs, and cause vs to heare it that we may do it? neither is it beyond the Sea, that thou shouldest say, Who shall go ouer the Sea for vs, and bring it vs? &c. but the word is very neere vnto thee, euen in thy mouth, and in thy heart for to doit. Behold (saith Moses) I haue set before thee this day, life and death good and euill, in that I command thee this day, to loue the Lord thy God, to walke in his waies, and to keepe his Commandements, and his Ordinances, and his Lawes, that thou maist liue, &c. Neither is it said in vaine in Saint Mathew: Si vis ad vitam ingredi, serua mandata; If thou wilt enter into life keepe the Commandements: and in S. Iohn; Scio quia mandatum eius vita aeterna est; I know that his Commandement is life euerlasting. And if this bee the charitie of God, or of Men towards God, as S. Iohn hath taught, to wit, that we keepe his Commandements: certainely hee is but a lyar, that professeth to loue God, and neglecteth to obserue the word of his will, with all his power. And though I confesse it not in mans ability, without the speciall grace of God, to fulfill the law (Christ only as man excepted) yet if wee rightly consider the mercifull care which God had of his people in those his Commandements, we shall finde in our selues, how wee borrow liberty, and rather let slip our affections, and voluntarily loosen them from the chaines of obedience, to which the word of God and diuine reason hath fastened them, than that wee are excusable by those difficulties and impossibilities, which our minde (greedy of libetie) proposeth to it selfe. For this is the loue of God, that we keepe his Commandements, & his Commandements are not greeuous. 1 Iohn 5. 12. and if wee examine euery precept apart, and then weigh them each after other, in the ballance of our consciences: it is not hard for any man to iudge, by what easie perswasions, we steale away from our owne power, as vnwilling to vse it against our pleasing desires.

§. XIII. Of the seuerall Commandements of the Decalogue: and that the difficulty is not in respect of the Commandements, but by our default.

FOr by the first we are commanded to acknowledge, serue, and loue one God. Now, whereby are we inticed to the breach of this precept? seeing euery reasonable man may conceiue and know, that infinite power cannot be diuided into many infinities: and that it is of necessitie, that by this almighty Vnitie, all things haue bin caused, and are continued. And if brute beasts had this knowledge of their Creator, and how in his prouidence he hath also prouided for euery of them, which giueth to beastes their foode, &c. there is no doubt but that they would also serue and loue him only.

Psal. 147. 9.

The second precept is the forbidding of Idolatry, and worship of Images: the making whereof, out of doubt, was not the inuention of an ill intent in the beginning, seeing this is generally true: Omnia mala exempla bonis initijs orta sunt; All ill examples did spring and arise from good beginnings. For their first erection was to keep the memory of men famous for their vertue: vntill (saith Lactantius) the diuell crept into them, and (hauing blotted out the first intent) working in weak and ignorant soules, changed the nature of the one, and the reason of the other, to serue himselfe thereby. For what reasonable man, if hee be not forsaken of God, will call on those blinde, deafe, dumbe, and dead stocks, more worthlesse worthlesse then the most worthlesse of those, that hauing life and reason, implore their helpe, which haue neither: yea, of more vilde prize and baser, than the baseſt of beasts, who haue sense and estimation? For what doe we thereby (saith the Wisedome of Salomon) but call to the weake for helpe, pray to the dead for life, require aide of him that hath no experience, assistance in our iournies of him that cannot goe, and successe in our affaires of him that hath no power? And whether the Idolater, or the blocke, to which he prayeth, bee more senseleſſe; Dauid maketh a doubt. For (saith he) they that make them are like vnto them, and so are all the rest that trust in them. Wisd.13.v.19. Psalme 35.18.

The breach of the third Commandement, is neither perswaded by worldly pleasure, nor worldly profit: the two greatest inchanters of mortall men. No, we are no way allured to this horrible disdaine of God, vnlesse the hate of good men, and Gods curse, be accounted an aduantage. For as our corrupteſt nature giues vs nothing towards it, so can it satisfie no one appetite, except everlasting sorrow, and hell dwell in our desire. And therefore this strange custome hath the diuell brought vp among men, without all subtletie of argument, or cunning perswasion, taking thereby the greatest and most scornfull aduantage ouer vs. For slaughter satisfieth hatred, Theft giues satisfaction to need, Adultery to lust, Oppression to couetousnesse: but this contemptuous offence of blasphemy, and the irreuerent abuse of Gods name, as it giueth no helpe to any of our worldly affections, so the most saluage Nations of the world doe not vse it.

The fourth Commandement, to keepe the Sabbath day holy, hath neither pain, burthen, nor inconuenience. For it giueth rest to the laborer, and consolation to their Masters. And that this law was imposed on man for his benefit, Moses teacheth in the reason of the law: as in Exod. 23.12. And in the seuenth day thou shalt rest, that thine Oxe and thine Asse may rest, and the sonne of thy maide, and the stranger may be refreshed.

The first of the second Table to honour our Parents, with whom wee are one and the same, is a gratitude which nature it selfe hath taught vs towards them, who after God gaue vs life and being, haue begotten vs, and borne vs, cherished vs in our weake and helpleſse infancie, and bestowed on vs the harueſt and profit of their labours and cares. Therefore, in the Temporall and Iudiciall ordinances, cursing of parents, or the offering them violence, was made death.

The next is, that thou shalt not Murther, that is, thou shalt not doe the actes following the affections of hatred. For the law of God, and after it our owne lawes, and in effect the law of all Nations, haue made difference between slaughter casuall, and furious. Affectio enim tua (saith Bracton) imponit nomen operi tuo; It is the affection and will that makes the worke such as it is. And certainly, whosoeuer cannot forbeare to commit murther, hath neither the grace of God, nor any vse of his owne will.

The third of the second Table, commands vs from Adultery. Now, if the preseruation of Virginity haue bene possible, for thousands of Men and Women, who in all Ages haue mastered their fleshly desires, and haue returned chaste to their graue: It cannot be accounted a burthen, to forbeare the dishonour and iniurie, which wee offer to others by such a violation, seeing marriage is permitted by the lawes of God, and Men, to all that affect it. And there is no man liuing whom the desire of beauty and forme hath so constrained, but he might with ease forbeare the prosequution of this ill: did not himselfe giue sucke to this Infant, and nourish warmth till it grow to strong heate, heate till it turne to fire, and fire to flame. Nuptiæ replent terram, Virginitas Paradisum.

The fourth of the second Table, is, that we shall not steale. And if that kinde of violent robbery had beene vsed in Moses time, which many Ruffians practise now a-dayes in England, and to the dishonor of our Nation more in England, than in any Region of the world among Christians; out of doubt, he would haue censured them by death, and not by restitution, though quadruple. For I speak not of the poore and miserable soules, whom hunger and extreame necessitie inforceth, but of those detested Theeues, who to maintaine themselues Lord-like, assault, rob, and wound the Merchant, Artificer, and Labouring man; or breake by violence into other mens houses, and spend in Braueric, Drunkennesse, and vpon Harlots, in one day, what other men sometime haue laboured for all their liues: impouerishing whole Families, and taking the bread and foode from the mouthes of their children. And that this Commandement might easily be obserued; it would soone appeare, if Princes would resolue, but for a few yeeres to pardon none. For, it is the hope of life, and the argument of sparing the first offence, that incourageth these Hell-hounds. And if euery man presume to be pardoned once, there is no State or Common-wealth, but these men would in a short time impouerish or destroy it.

The fifth Commandement of this second Table, is, the prohibition of false witnesse: from which if men could not forbeare, all surety of estate and life were taken away. And so much did God detest a false witnesse, and a false accuser, especially in matters criminall, that the law ordained him to suffer the same death or punishment, which he sought by falshood to lay on his brother.

The last of the ten Commandements forbiddeth vs to couet any thing, which belongeth to another man, either the bodies of their wiues for concupiscence, or their goods for desire of gaine. And this precept seemeth the hardest for men to obserue; so esteemed by reason of our fraile affections: and yet if wee iudge hereof rightly, it may bee doubted whether it extend to all our inconsiderate fancies and vaine thoughts. For, although it be not easie to master all our sudden passions, yet we may restraine and hinder the growing, and farther increase, if we please to intend our strength, and seeke for grace. How the word Coueting reacheth to all those it is to bee considered. For Concupiscentia, according to some, Est effrænatus habendi appetitus; An vnbrideled, or vnrestrained appetite of hauing: And as touching such an appetite, we cannot excuse our selues by any our naturall frailty, or vnaduised error; But as I suppose, the word Concupiscence is more largely taken, either for a determinate and vnbridled euill intent, or for some vrging inclination thereunto. All the question is of the later sort: which is, Actus imperfectus, id est, non deliberatus ratione, que est principium proprium actus boni aut vitiosi; Such passions, or inclinations are vnperfect acts, that is, not deliberated vpon by reason, which is the proper principle of a good or vicious action. And sure, it may seeme, that so long as we resist such motions, they harme vs not: as they say, Quamdiu refragamur nihil nocent: nocent autem cum eas dominari permittimus; As long as wee giue no assent vnto them, it is thought by some that they hurt vs not; and that then onely they hurt, when we suffer them to beare sway. But these men, as it seemes, make nothing forbidden in this tenth precept, but what hath bene forbidden in the other: for in euery Commandement, not onely the outward act, but also the inward assent vnto euill, though it breake not out into acte, is forbidden: therefore, that we may know the difference between this Commandement and the rest, the distinction of desires is to be held: that some are with assent, and vnbridled; others bridled, and without assent. For so euen the Morall Philosopher can tell vs, that the Continent man hath euill desires, but without assent (for they are bridled by the strength of right reason) as on the other side the Incontinent hath good desires, but restrained and suppressed by contrary passions. The euill desires when they are accompanied with assent, are in euery Commandement forbidden, together with the outward act: and therefore, if we will haue any thing proper to this Commandement, wee must needs say, that the euill desires of the Continent man (that is, euen those which wee resist and bridle) are here forbidden. For though he that bridleth his euill desires, bee much better than he that yeeldeth vnto them: yet such a man, euen according to the Heathen Philosopher, is not worthy the name of a vertuous man. For Aristotle himselfe makes Continentia, not to be vertue, but onely a degree vnto it: confessing, that though the Continent man doe well in bridling his euill affections, yet he doth not all, seeing he ought not so much as to haue them at all. Neither is it much more, that true diuinity deliuereth touching this matter. For, as he saith, that in the continent man the hauing of these euill desires, though he resist them, is the cause that he cannot be called a vertuous man: so we, that the hauing of them is a sinne. Only in this we excell him here: that we are able out of diuinity to giue the true reason of this doctrine: which is, that euery one sinneth, that doeth not loue God with his whole heart and affection: whence it followeth, that the euill desires of the Continent man; that is, of him which bridleth them, must needs be sinne: seeing such desires, though bridled, are a pulling away of a part of our heart and affection from God.

Seeing therefore it hath pleased God, to make vs know, that by our faithfull endeuours to keepe his commandements, we witnesse our loue toward himselfe; we may not safely giue libertie to our vanities, by casting backe vpon God (who is iustice it selfe) that he hath giuen vs precepts altogether beyond our power, and Commandements impossible for vs to keepe. For, as hee is accursed (saith Saint Hierome) that auowes that the Law is in all things possible to be obserued: so he hath made this addition: Maledictus qui qui dicit impossibilia Deum præcepisse; Accursed is hee that saith that God hath commanded things (in themselues, and not through our fault) impossible. Now, as the places are many which command vs to keepe the Law: so is our weakenesse also in the Scriptures laide before vs, and therefore it is thus safely to be vnderstood, that we should without euasion, or without betraying of our selues, doe our faithfull endeuours to obserue them: which if we doe vnfainedly, no doubt, but God will accept our desires therein. For that there is no man iust, Dauid witnesseth: Enter not into iudgement with thy seruant, for in thy sight no flesh that liueth shall be iustified. And in the first of Kings, There is no man that sinneth not: And againe, who can say, I haue made my heart cleane? But seeing there is no sinne grieuous without deliberation; let euery mans conscience iudge him, whether hee giue way willingly, or restraine himselfe in all that he can; yea, or no? For when a King giues to his subiect a commandement vpon paine of losse of his loue, to performe some seruice: if the subiect neglecting the same, seeke to satisfie his Soueraigne with shifting excuses, out of doubt such a Prince will take himselfe to be derided therein. Psal. 143. 2. Reg. 8. v. 46. Prou. 20. v. 9.

§. XIIII.

If there were not any Religion, nor Iudgement to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessary to be obserued.

AND if wee consider aduisedly and soberly, of the Morall Law, or ten Commandements, which God by the hand of Moses gaue vnto his people, it will appeare that such was his mercifull prouidence in the choise of them, as were there neither paine, nor profit adioyned to the obseruing, or not obseruing of them; were there no diuine power at all, nor any Religion among men; yet if wee did not for our owne sakes striue to obserue these Lawes, all society of men, and all endeuours, all happinesse and contentment in this life would be taken away: and euery State and common-weale in the World fall to the ground and dissolue. Therefore, these Lawes were not imposed as a burthen, but as a blessing: to the end that the innocent might be defended, that euery man might enioy the fruites of his owne trauaile, that right might be done to all men from all men: that by iustice, order, and peace, we might liue the liues of reasonable men, and not of beasts; of free-men, and not of slaues; of ciuill men, and not of sauages. And hereof making our humane reason onely Iudge, let vs see the inconueniences in this life which would follow by the breach and neglect of these Lawes.

As first, what would the issue be if we acknowledged many Gods? would not a farre greater hatred, warre, and bloud-shed follow, than that which the difference of ceremonie, and diuersity of interpretation, hath already brought into the World, euen among those Nations which acknowledge one God, and one Christ?

And what could it profit man-kinde to pray to Idols, and Images of gold, mettall, dead stones, and rotten wood, whence nothing can be hoped, but the losse of time, and an impossibilitie to receiue thence-from, either helpe or comfort?

The breach of the third Commandement bringeth there-with this disaduantage, and ill to man, that whosoeuer taketh the name of God in vaine, shall not at any time benefit himselfe by calling God to witnesse for him, when hee may iustly vse his holy name.

The obseruing the Sabbath holy, giueth rest to men and beasts, and nature her selfe requireth intermission of labour.

If we despise our Parents, who haue giuen vs being, we thereby teach our owne children to scorne and neglect vs, when our aged yeeres require comfort and helpe at their hands.

If murther were not forbidden, and seuerely punished, the race of man-kinde would be extinguished: and whosoeuer would take the liberty to destroy others, giueth liberty to others to destroy himselfe.

If adultery were lawfull and permitted, no man could say vnto himselfe; This is my sonne: there could be no inheritance proper, no honour descend to posterity, no endeuour by vertue and vndertaking to raise Families: murthers and poysonings betweene man and wife would be daily committed: and euery man subiect to most filthy and vncleane diseases.

If stealth and violent rapine were suffered, all man-kinde would shortly after perish, or liue as the saluages, by roots and acornes. For no man laboureth but to enioy the fruites thereof. And such is the mischiefe of robbery, as where Moses for lesser crimes appointed restitution fourefold, policie of State and necessity hath made it death.

To permit false witnesses, is to take all mens liues and estates from them by corruption: the wicked would sweare against the vertuous: the waster against the wealthie: the idle beggar and loyterer, against the carefull and painfull labourer: all triall of right were taken away, and iustice thereby banished out of the world.

The couering of that which belongs to other men, bringeth no other profit than a distraction of minde, with an inward vexation: for while we couet what appertaines to others, we neglect our owne: our appetites are therin fed with vaine and fruitlesse hopes, so long as we do but couet; and if we doe attaine to the desire of the one, or the other, to wit, the wiues or goods of our neighbours, we can look for no other, but that our selues shall also, either by theft or by strong hand, be depriued of our owne.

Wherein then appeareth the burthen of Gods Commandements, if there bee nothing in them, but rules and directions for the generall and particular good of all liuing? Surely, for our owne good, and not in respect of himselfe, did the most mercifull & prouident God ordaine them; without the obseruation of which, the vertues of heauenly bodies, the fertility of the earth, with all the blessings giuen vs in this life, would be vnto vs altogether vnprofitable, and of no vse. For wee should remaine but in the state of brute beasts, if not in a farre more vnhappy condition.

§. XV. Of humane Law, written and vnwritten.

HVmane Law, of which now it followeth to speake, is first diuided into two, (Viz.) Written, and Vnwritten. The vnwritten consists of vsage, approued by time: which Isidore calls Mores: and he defines Mores to be Consuetudines vetustate probatæ; to bee customes approued by antiquitie, or vnwritten lawes. Now custome differeth from use, as the cause from the effect: in that custome is by vse and continuance established into a Law: but yet there where the law is defectiue, saith Isidore.

And of customes there are two generall natures, containing innumerable particulars; the first are written customes, receiued and exercised by Nations, as the customes of Burgundie and Normandie, the ancient generall custome of England, and the customes of Castill, and other Prouinces.

The second are these petty customes, vsed in particular Places, Cities, Hundreds, and Mannors. The generall or Nationall customes are some written, others vnwritten.

The particular or petty customes are seldome written, but witnessed by testimonie of the inhabitants. The Customes of the Duchie of Cornwall, comprehending also the Stannerie of Deuon, as touching Tin, and Tin causes, are written in Deuon, but not in Cornwall. But howsoeuer vse and time hath made these customes as lawes, yet ought euery custome to be rationabilis, as well as prascripta. Non firmatur tractu temporis quod de iure ab initio non subsistit; That which at first was not grounded vpon good right, is not made good by continuance of time. And (saith Vlpian) quod ab initio vitiosum est, non potest tractu temporis conualescere; Course of time abandes not that which was naught from the first beginning. For these two defences are necessary in all lawes of custome; the one, that it be not repugnant to the law diuine, and naturall: the other, that the cause and reason be strong, prouing a right birth, and necessary continuance: it being manifest, that euery custome which is against the law, had his beginning from euill deeds, and therefore not without the former considerations to be allowed. And it is true, that all customes of this nature were but tolerated for a time, by the Law-makers, though they haue beene since continued, because posterity is not bound to examine by what cause their Ancestors were thereto moued. For, non sufficit simplex toleratio. And it is in this sort ouer-ruled in the law; Per populum consuetudo contra legem induci non potest, nisi de voluntate illius qui nouam legem, & nouam constitutionem statuere potest, qui solus Princeps est; The people cannot bring in a new custome against law: saue by his will, who hath power to make a new law and ordinance, which is onely the Prince.

In Reg. Iur. v. 2. q. 117. art. 1.

Vlp. l. 29.

Humane Law generally taken, to wit, humane law written, is by some defined to be the decree or doome of practique reason: by which humane actions are ruled and directed. Papinian calls the Law a common precept, the aduisement of wise men, and the restraint reſtraint of offences committed, either willingly or ignorantly. Iſidore calles the Law a Conſtitution written, agreeing with Religion, fitteſt for Gouernment and common profit: And more largely, Omne id quod ratione conſiſtit; All that ſtands with reaſon.

Laſtly, and more preciſely it is thus defined. Humane Law is a righteous decree, agreeing with the Law natural, and eternall: made by the rational diſcourſe of thoſe, that exerciſe publike authority: preſcribing neceſſary obſeruances to the ſubiect. That euery Law ought to be a righteous decree, S. Auguſtine teacheth, ſaying: Mihi lex eſſe non videtur, quæ iuſta non fuerit; It ſeemes to be no law at all to me, which is not iuſt: and iuſt it cannot be, except it agree with the law naturall and eternall. For there is no Law iuſt and legitimate (ſaith S. Auguſtine) which the Law-makers haue not deriued from the eternall. Nihil iuſtum atque legitimum eſt, quod non ab æterna lege ſibi homines derinauerint.

Secondly, it ought to be conſtituted by diſcourſe of reaſon, whereby it is diſtinguiſhed from the Law naturall, to wit, the naturall, indemonſtrable, or needing no demonſtration, from whence the law humane is taken and deduced.

Thirdly, that it ought to bee made by an authoriſed Magiſtracie, it cannot bee doubted, be the gouernment of what kinde ſoeuer. For it falleth otherwiſe vnder the Title of thoſe decrees called Violentiæ, or iniquæ conſtitutiones; Violences, or wicked conſtitutions.

Of humane Law there are foure properties, eſpecially anſwering theſe foure conditions in the former definition. Firſt, as it is drawne out of the law of nature: ſo euery particular of the humane Law may be reſolued into ſome principle or rule of the naturall.

4. Parts.

Tho. q. 9. 5. art. 2.

Secondly, it is to be conſidered as it is referred vnto, and doth reſpect the common good.

Thirdly, it is to be made by publique authority.

Fourthly, concerning the matter of the Law, it preſcribeth, and directeth, all humane actions. And ſo is the Law as large and diuers, as all humane actions are diuers, which may fall vnder it. For according to Thomas, Alia lex Iulia de Adulteriis, alia Cornelia de Sicariis; The Law of Iulian againſt Adultery is one, the Cornelian againſt Ruffians, is another. Now the humane Law, generally taken, is in reſpect of the firſt of theſe conſiderations, diuided into the Law of Nations, and the Ciuill.

The Law of Nations is taken leſſe or more properly; leſſe properly for euery Law which is not of it ſelfe, but from other higher principles deduced: and ſo it ſeemeth that Vlpian vnderſtands it: for he defineth Ius gentium, or the Law of Nations, to be that which is onely common amongſt Men, as Religion, and the worſhip of God: which is not in the very nature of this Law of Nations; but from the principles of the Scriptures, and other diuine Reuelations. But the Law of Nations properly taken, is that dictate, or ſentence, which is drawne from a very probable, though not from an euident principle, yet ſo probable, that all Nations doe aſſent vnto the concluſion, as that the free paſſage of Ambaſſadours be granted betweene enemies, &c. which Nationall Law, according to diuers acceptions, and diuers conſiderations had of the humane Law, may be ſometime taken for a Species of the Naturall, ſometime of the Humane.

Ius Ciuile, or the Ciuill Law, is not the ſame in all Common-wealths, but in diuers eſtates it is alſo diuers and peculiar, and this Law is not ſo immediately deriued from the Law of Nature, as the Law of Nations is: For it is partly deduced out of ſuch principles as all Nations doe not agree in, or eaſily aſſent vnto; becauſe they depend on particular circumſtances, which are diuers, and doe not fit all eſtates. Hereof Vlpian, Ius ciuile, neque in totum à naturali & gentium recedit, neque per omnia ei ſeruit: itaq; cum aliquid addimus vel detrahimus Iuri communi, Ius proprium, id eſt, Ciuile efficimus; The Ciuill Law (ſaith he) doth neither wholly differ from the Law of Nature, and Nations, nor yet in all points obey it: therefore when we adde ought to, or take from the Law that is common, we make a Law proper, that is, the Ciuill Law.

In Leg. 6. ff. de Iuſtitia Iure.

The Law now commonly called the Ciuill Law, had its birth in Rome: and was firſt written by the Decem-viri, 303. yeeres after the foundation of the City. It was compounded as wel out of the Athenian, & other Grecian Lawes, as out of the ancient Romane cuſtomes and Lawes Regall. The Regal Lawes were deuiſed by the firſt Kings, and called Leges Regiæ, or Papyrianæ, becauſe they were gathered by Papyrius, Tarquin then reigning. For though ſo many of the former Lawes as maintained Kingly authority, were aboliſhed, Dion. Hal. shed, with the name; yet those of Seruius Tullius, for Commerce and Contracts, and all that appertained to Religion, and common vtility, were continued, and were a part of the Lawes of the twelue Tables. To these Lawes of the twelue Tables were added (as the times gaue occasion) those made by the Senate, called Senatus-consulta: those of the common people called Plebei-scita, those of the Lawyers, called Responsa-prudentum: and the Edicts of the Annuall Magistrate: which Edicts being first gathered and interpreted by Iulian, and presented to Adrian the Emperour, they were by him confirmed and made perpetuall Lawes, and the Volume stiled Edictum perpetuum; as those and the like Collections of Iustinian afterward were.

C. Sigon. l. 1. out of Pomponius.

The difference anciently betweene Lawes and Edicts, which the French call Reglements, consisted in this, that Lawes are the Constitutions made or confirmed by soueraigne authority (be the soueraignty in the people, in a few, or in one) and are withall generall and permanent: but an Edict (which is but Iussum Magistratus, vnlesse by authority it be made a Law) hath end with the Officer, who made the same, saith Varro. Qui plurimum Edicto tribuunt, legem annuam esse dicunt; They who ascribe the most vnto an Edict, say that it is a Law for one yeere: Though Isidore doth also expresse by the word Constitutions or Edicts, those Ordinances called Acts of Prerogatiues; as Constitutio vel Edictum est quod Rex, vel Imperator constituit, vel edicit; An Ordinance or Edict is that which a King or Emperour doth ordaine or proclaime.

Lastly, the Humane Law is diuided into the Secular, and into the Ecclesiasticall, or Canon. The Secular commanding temporall good, to wit, the peace and tranquility of the Common-weale: the Ecclesiasticall the spirituall good, and right Gouernment of the Ecclesiasticall Common-wealth, or Church, Illud naturæ legem, hoc diuinam spectat; That respecteth the Law of Nature, this the Law of God, And so may Ius Ciuile be taken two wayes; first, as distinguished from the Law of Nations, as in the first diuision: Secondly, as it is the same with the Secular, and diuers from the Ecclesiasticall. But this diuision of the Schoolemen is obscure. For although the Ciuill be the same with the Secular, as the Ciuill is a Law, yet the Secular is more generall, and comprehendeth both the Ciuill, and all other Lawes not Ecclesiasticall. For of Secular Lawes, in vse among Christian Princes, and in Christian Common-weales, there are three kindes; the Ciuill, which hath euery where a voyce; and is in all Christian estates (England excepted) most powerfull; the Lawes of England called Common, and the Lawes of custome or Prouinciall. In Spaine besides the Law Ciuill, they haue the customes of Castill, and other Prouinces. In France besides the Ciuill, the customes of Burgundy, Bloys, Berri, Niuernois, and Lodunois, &c. Tous lieux situez & assis en Lodunois, seront gouernez selon les coustumes du dit pays; All places lying within the precincts of Loduneis, shall be gouerned according to the customes of that place. There are also in France the customes of Normandy, and these of two kindes; Generall, and Locall; and all purged and reformed by diuers Acts of the three Estates. The Charters of confirmation of these ancient customes, before and since their reformation haue these words; Nos autem, registrum predictum, vsus laudabiles, & consuetudines antiquas, &c. laudamus, approbamus, & authoritate Regia confirmamus; The Register aforesaid, laudable vse, and ancient customes we praise, approue, and by our Kingly authority confirme. The common Law of England is also compounded of the ancient customes of the same, and of certaine Maximes by those customes of the Realme approoued. Vpon which customes also are grounded those Courts of Record, of the Chancery, Kings Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, with other small Courts.

Art. 3. tit. 5. G. Cust.

These ancient customes of England haue beene approued by the Kings thereof, from age to age: as that custome by which no man shall be taken, imprisoned, disseised, nor otherwise destroyed, but he must first be put to answer by the Law of the Land, was confirmed by the Statute of Magna Charta. It is by the ancient custome of England, that the eldest sonne should inherite without partition. In Germany, France, and elsewhere otherwise, and by partition. In Ireland it is the custome for all Landes (that haue not beene resigned into the Kings hands) that the eldest of the House shall enioy the Inheritance during his owne life; and so the second and third eldest (if there be so many brothers) before the Heire in lineall descent: this is called the custome of Tanistrie. For example, if a Lord of Land haue foure sonnes, and the eldest of those foure haue also a Sonne, the three Brothers of the eldest Sonne, shall after the death of their Brother, enioy their Fathers Lands before the Grand-childe: the custome being grounded grounded vpon the reason of necessity. For the Irish in former times, hauing alwayes liued in a subdiuided Ciuill Warre, not onely the greatest against the greatest, but euery Baron and Gentleman one against another, were enforst to leade successors of age and ability, to defend their owne Territories. Now as in Normandie, Burgundie, and other Prouinces of France, there are certaine peculiar and petty Customes, besides the great and generall custome of the Land, so are there in England, and in euery part thereof. But the greatest bulke of our Lawes, as I take it, are the Acts of Parliament: lawes propounded and approued by the three estates of the Realme, and confirmed by the King, to the obedience of which all men are therefore bound, because they are Acts of choise, and selfe-desire. Leges nulla alia causa nos tenent, quam quod iudicio populi receptæ sunt; The lawes doe therefore binde the subiect, because they are receiued by the iudgement of the subiect. Tum demum humanæ leges habent vim suam, cum fuerint non modò institutæ, sed etiam firmatæ approbatione communitatis; It is then that humane lawes haue their strength, when they shall not onely be deuised, but by the approbation of the people confirmed. Vlp. ff. de Leg. Leg. 32. Aug. de vera relig. cap. 31. Gratian in dec. dist. 4. Cum in ipsis.

Isidore fasteneth these properties to euery Christian Law, that the same bee honest, that it bee possible, that it bee according to Nature, and according to the custome of the Countrey; also for the time and place conuenient, profitable, and manifest, and without respect of priuate profite, that it be written for the generall good. He also giues foure effects of the Law, which Modestinus comprehends in two; to wit, obligation, and instigation: the former bindes vs by feare, to auoide vice; the latter incourageth with hope, to follow vertue. For according to Cicero, Legem oportere esse vitiorum emendatricem, commendatricemque virtutum: It behoueth the Law to bee amender of vices, and a commender of vertues. The part obligatorie or binding vs to the obseruation of things commanded or forbidden, is an effect common to all lawes: and it is two-fold; the one constraineth vs by feare of our consciences, the other by feare of externall punishment. These two effects the law performeth, by the exercise of those two powers, to wit, Coactiue and Directiue.

The second of these two effects remembred by Modestinus, is Instigation, or incouragement to vertue, as Aristotle makes it the end of the law, to make men vertuous. For lawes being such as they ought to be, doe both by prescribing and forbidding, vrge vs to well doing; laying before vs the good and the euill, by the one and the other purchased. And this power affirmatiue commanding good, and power negatiue forbidding euill, are those into which the law is diuided, as touching the matter: and in which Dauid comprehendeth the whole body and substance thereof: saying, Declina à malo, & fac bonum: Decline from euill, and doe good. Psalme 37.

NOW whether the power of the humane Law bee without exception of any person, it is doubtfully disputed among those that haue written of this subiect, as well Diuines as Lawyers: and namely, whether Soueraigne Princes bee compellable; yea, or no. But whereas there are two powers of the law, as aforesaid; the one Directiue, the other Coactiue: to the power Directiue they ought to bee subiect, but not to that which constraineth. For as touching violence or punishments, no man is bound to giue a prejudiciall iudgement against himselfe; and if equals haue not any power ouer each other, much lesse haue inferiours ouer their superiours, from whom they receiue their authority and strength.

And speaking of the supreme power of lawes, simply then is the Prince so much aboue the lawes, as the soule and body vnited, is aboue a dead and senselesse carkasse. For the King is truly called, Lex viuans, & lex animata: An animate and liuing law. But this is true, that by giuing authority to lawes, Princes both adde greatnes to themselues, & conserue it, and therefore was it said of Trajan out of Iustinian; Merito debet Rex tribuere legi quod lex tribuit ei: nam lex facit vt ipse sit Rex; Rightfully ought the King to attribute that to the law, whereby the Law it selfe attributeth the King: for it is the law that doth make King.

But where Bracton giues liberty in this power to the humane law, he is therein mistaken. For Kingdome made by God, and lawes diuine; and by humane lawes onely, declared to bee Kings. As for the places remembred by the Diuines and Lawyers, which inferre Bract. l. 2.

a kinde of obligation of Princes, they teach no other thing therein, than the bond of conscience, and profit arising from the examples of vertuous Princes, who are to giue an account of their actions to God onely.

Psal. 50. ff. de Leg. Tibi soli peccaui, saith Dauid; Against thee onely haue I sinned: therefore, the Prince can not bee said to be subiect to the Law; Princeps non subijcitur legi. For seeing according to the Schoolemen, the Law humane is but quoddam organum & instrumentum potestatis gubernatiuæ: non videtur posse eius obligatio ad eum se extendere, ad quem ipsa vis potestatis humanæ non pertinet; sed vis potestatis humanæ non se extendit ad gubernatorem, in quo illa residet. Ergo neq; lex condita per talem potestatem obligare potest ipsum conditorem. Omnis enim potentia actiua, est principium transmutandi aliud; Seeing humane Law (say they) is but a kind of Organ or Instrument of the power that gouernes h, it seemes that it cannot extend it selfe to binde any one whom no humane power can controll, or lay hold of: but the Gouernour himselfe, in whom the gouerning power doth reside, is a person that cannot by himselfe, or by his own power be controlled. And therefore the Law which is made by such a power, cannot binde the law-maker himselfe: for euery actiue ability, is a cause or principle of alteration in another body, not in the body in which it selfe resides. And seeing Princes haue power to deliuer others from the obligation of the Law: Ergo etiam potest ipsemet Princeps siue legislator sua se voluntate pro libito ab obligatione legis liberare; Therefore also may a Prince or Law-maker at his owne will and pleasure deliuer himselfe from the bond of the Law. Therefore in the rules of the Law it is thus concluded: Subditi tenentur leges obseruare necessitate coactionis, Princeps vero sola voluntate sua, & intuitu boni communis; The subiects are bound to fulfill the Law by necessity of compulsion, but the Prince onely by his owne will, and regard of the common good.

Greg. de Valentia de Leg.

Now concerning the politique Lawes, giuen by Moses to the Nation of the Israelites, whether they ought to be a President, from which no ciuill institutions of other people should presume to digresse, I will not presume to determine, but leaue it as a question for such men to decide, whose professions giue them greater ability. Thus much I may be bold to affirme, That we ought not to seeme wiser than God himselfe, who hath told vs that there are no Lawes so righteous, as those which it pleased him to giue to his Elect people to be gouerned by. True it is, that all Nations haue their seuerall qualities, wherein they differ, euen from their next borderers, no lesse than in their peculiar languages: which disagreeable conditions to gouerne aptly, one and the same Law very hardly were able. The Roman ciuill Lawes did indeed containe in order a great part of the then knowne World, without any notable inconuenience, after such time as once it was receiued and become familiar: yet was not the administration of it alike in all parts, but yeelded much vnto the naturall customes of the sundry people, which it gouerned. For whether it be through a long continued perswasion; or (as Astrologers more willingly grant) some influence of the Heauens; or peraduenture some temper of the soile and climate, affoording matter of prouocation to vice (as plenty made the Sybarites luxurious: want and opportunity to steale, makes the Arabians to be Theeues) very hard it were to forbid by Law an offence so common with any people, as it wanted a name, whereby to be distinguished from iust and honest. By such rigour was the Kingdome of Congo vnhappily diuerted from the Christian Religion, which it willingly at the first imbraced, but after with great fury reiected, because plurality of Wiues was denied vnto them, I know not how necessarily, but more contentiously than seasonably. In such cases, me thinkes, it were not amisse to consider that the high God himselfe permitted some things to the Israelites, rather in regard of their naturall disposition (for they were hard-hearted) than because they were consonant vnto the ancient rules of the first perfection. So, where euen the generall nature of man doth condemne (as many things it doth) for wicked and vniust; there may the Law, giuen by Moses, worthily be deemed the most exact reformer of the euill, which forceth man, as neere as may be, to the will and pleasure of his Maker. But where nature or custome hath entertained a vicious, yet not intolerable habite, with so long and so publike approbation, that the vertue opposing it would seeme as vncouth, as it were to walke naked in England, or to weare the English fashion of apparell in Turkie: there may a wise and vpright Law-giuer, without presumption, omit somewhat that the rigour of Moses his Law required; euen as the good King Hezekia did, in a matter meerely Ecclesiasticall, and therefore the lesse capable of dispensation, praying for the people; The good Lord be mercifull vnto him, that prepareth his whole heart to seeke the Lord God, the God of his Fathers, though hee be not cleansed according to the purification of the Sanctuary: which prayer the Lord heard and granted. 2 Chron. cap. 30. v. 18. 19.

To this effect it is well obserued by Master Doctor Willet, that the morall Iudicials of Moses doe partly binde, and partly are let free. They doe not hold affirmatiuely that we are tyed to the same seuerity of punishment now, which was inflicted then; but negatiuely they doe hold, that now the punishment of death should not be adiudged, where sentence of death is not giuen by Moses: Christian Magistrates ruling vnder Christ the Prince of peace, that is, of Clemency and Mercy, may abate of the seuerity of Moses Law, and mitigate the punishment of death, but they cannot adde vnto it to make the burden more heauy: for to shew more rigour than Moses, becommeth not the Gospell. Isa. 9.

But I will not wander in this copious argument, which hath beene the subiect of many learned discourses, neither will I take vpon me, to speak any thing definitiuely in a case which dependeth still in some controuersie among worthy Diuines. Thus much (as in honour of the Iudiciall Law, or rather of him that gaue it) I may well and truly say, that the defence of it hath alwayes beene very plausible. And surely howsoeuer they be not accepted (neither were it expedient) as a generall and onely Law: yet shall we hardly find any other ground, whereon the conscience of a Iudge may rest, with equall satisfaction in making interpretation, or giuing sentence vpon doubts, arising out of any Law besides it. Hereof, perhaps, that Iudge could haue beene witnesse, of whom Forteseue that notable Bulwarke of our Lawes doth speake, complaining of a iudgement giuen against a Gentlewoman at Salisbury, who being accused by her owne Man, without any other proofe, for murdering her Husband, was thereupon condemned, and burnt to ashes: the Man who accused her, within a yeere after being conuict for the same offence, confest that his Mistris was altogether innocent of that cruell fact, whose terrible death hee then (though ouer-late) greeuously lamented: but this Iudge, saith the same Author, Sepius ipse mihi fassus est, quòd nunquam in vita sua animum eius de hoc facta ipse purgaret; He himselfe often confessed vnto me, that he should neuer during his life, be able to cleare his conscience of that fact. Cap. 5. 3. Wherefore that acknowledgement which other Sciences yeeld vnto the Metaphysiques, that from thence are drawne propositions, able to proue the principles of Sciences, which out of the Sciences themselues cannot be proued, may iustly be granted by all other politique institutions, to that of Moses; and so much the more iustly, by how much the subiect of the Metaphysiques, which is, Ens quatenus Ens; Being as it is being, is infinitely inferiour to the Ens Entium; The being of beings, the onely good, the fountaine of truth, whose feare is the beginning of wisedome. To which purpose well saith Saint Augustine, Conditur legum temporalium si vir bonus est & sapiens, illam ipsam consulit aternam, de qua nulli animæ iudicare datum est; The Author of temporall Lawes, if he be good and wise, doth therein consult the Law eternall, to determine of which there is no power giuen to any soule. And as well Prince Edward, in Forteseue his discourse, Nemo potest melius aut aliud fundamentum ponere, quàm posuit Dominus; No man can lay a better, or another foundation than the Lord hath laide.

CHAP. V.

The Story of the Israelites from the receiuing of the Law to the death of MOSES.

§. 1. Of the numbring and disposing of the Host of Israel, for their marches through the Wildernesse; with a note of the reuerence giuen to the worship of God, in this ordering of their troupes.

WHen Moses had receiued the Law from God, and published it among the people, and finished the Tabernacle of the Arke and Sanctuary; he mustred all the Tribes and Families of Israel: and hauing seene what numbers of Men fit to beare armes, were found in euery Tribe, from 20. yeeres of age vpwards; he appointed vnto them, by direction from the Lord, such Princes and Leaders, as in worth and reputation were in euery Tribe most eminent. The number of the whole Army was 603550. able men for the warres, besides women & children; also, besides the strangers which followed them out of Egypt. This great Army was diuided by Moses into foure grosse and mighty Battalions, each of which contained the strength of three whole Tribes.

The first of these containing 186400. able men, consisted of three Regiments, which may well, in respect of their numbers, be called Armies; as containing the three whole Tribes of Iudah, Issachar, and Zabulon. In the Tribe of Iudah were 74600. fighting men, led by Naasson: in Issachar 54400. led by Nathaniel: in Zabulon 57400. led by Eliab. All these marched vnder the Standard of the Tribe of Iudah, who held the Vauntgaurd, and was the first that moued & marched, being lodged and quartered at their generall incamping on the East-side of the Army, which was held the first place, and of greatest dignity.

The second Battalion or Army, called in the Scriptures the Host of Reuben, had ioyned vnto it Simeon and Gad, in number 151450. All which marched vnder the Standard of Reuben. In the Tribe of Reuben were 46500. vnder Elizur: in Simeon: 59360. vnder Shelumiel: in Gad 45650. vnder Eliasaph: These had the second place, and incamped on the South-side of the Tabernacle.

The third Army marched vnder the Standard of Ephraim, to whom were ioyned the Regiments of Manasse and Beniamin; who, ioyned together, made in number 108100. able men. These marched in the third place, incamping on the West quarter of the Tabernacle. Ephraim had 40500. vnder Elishama: Manasse 32200. vnder Gamliel: Beniamin 35400. vnder Abidam.

The fourth and last Army, or Squadron, of the generall Army, containing 157600. able men, marched vnder the Standard of Dan; to whom were ioyned the two Tribes of Nephtali and Asher. And these had the Rereward, and moued last, incamping on the North-side. Dan had 62700. vnder Ahiezer: Asher 41500. vnder Pagiel: Nephtali 53400. vnder Ahira.

Besides these Princes of the seuerall Tribes, there were ordained Captaines ouer Thousands, ouer Hundreds, ouer Fifties, and ouer Tens; as it may appeare by that mutinie and insurrection against Moses; Num. 16. v. 1. & 2. For there arose vp against Moses 250. Captaines of the Assembly, famous in the Congregation, and men of renowne: of which number were Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. Which three principall Mutiners, with those 250. Captaines that followed them, were not any of the 12. Princes of the Tribes or Generall Colonels before spoken of, as by their names, Num. 1. is made manifest.

The blessing which Israel gaue to his children, tooke place not onely in the diuision of the Land of promise, and other things of more consequence, long after following; but euen in sorting them vnder their seuerall Standards in the wildernesse it was obserued. For Iudah had the precedency and the greatest Army, which also was wholly compounded of the Sonnes of Leah. Iacobs eldest sonne Reuben hauing lost his birth-right, followed in the second place, accompanied with his brother Simeon, who had vnder-gone the Fathers curse; and with Gad, the sonne of his Mothers Hand-maide. Ioseph, who in temporall blessings had the prerogatiue of the first borne a double portion, was accounted as two Tribes, and diuided into two Regiments: the younger (according to Iacobs prophecy) taking place before the elder. He was assisted by Beniamin, his best beloued brother, the other son of Rachel. To Dan, the eldest son of Iacobs Concubines, was giuen the leading of the fourth Army, according to Iacobs prophecy. He had with him vnder his Standard none of the children of Lea, or Rachel, but only the sonnes of the Hand-maides.

In the middle of these foure Armies, was the Tabernacle, or portable Temple of the Congregation carried, sur-rounded by the Leuites. Neere vnto which, as the Heathens and Pagans could not approach, by reason of these foure powerfull Armies which guarded the same: so was it death for any of the children of Israel to come neere it, who were not of the Leuites, to whom the charge was committed. So sacred was the moueable Temple of God, and with such reuerence guarded and transported, as 22000. persons were dedicated to the seruice and attendance thereof: of which 8580. had the peculiar charge, according to their seuerall offices and functions; the particulars whereof are written in the third and fourth of Numbers. And as the Armies of the people obserued the former order in their incampings: so did the Leuites quarter themselues, as in an inner square on euery side of the Tabernacle; the Gersonites on the West, within the Armie, and Standard of Ephraim, ouer whom Eliasaph commanded, in number 7500.

The

The Family of Cohath on the South-side guided by Elizaphan, within the Army of Reuben, and betweene him and the Tabernacle, in number 8600. The third company were of the Family of Merari, ouer whom Zuriel commanded, in number 6200. and these were lodged on the North side, within the Army of Dan; On the East-side, and next within those Tribes and Forces which Iudah led, did Moses and Aaron lodge, and their children, who were the first and immediate Commanders, both of the Ceremonies and of the People; vnder whom, as the chiefe of all the other Leuiticall Families, was Eleazar the sonne of Aaron, his successour in the high Priest-hood.

This was the order of the Army of Israel, and of their incamping and marching; the Tabernacle of God being alway set in the middle and center thereof. The reuerend care, which Moses the Prophet, and chosen seruant of God, had in all that belonged euen to the outward and least parts of the Tabernacle, Arke and Sanctuary, witnessed well the inward and most humble zeale borne towards God himselfe. The industry vsed in the framing thereof, and euery, and the least part thereof; the curious workmanship thereon bestowed; the exceeding charge and expence in the prouisions; the dutifull obseruance in the laying vp, and preseruing the holy Vessels; the solemne remouing thereof; the vigilant attendance thereon, and the prouident defence of the same, which all Ages haue in some degree imitated, is now so forgotten and cast away in this super-fine Age, by those of the Family, by the Anabaptist, Browniſt, and other Sectaries, as all cost and care bestowed and had of the Church, wherein God is to be serued and worshipped, is accounted a kinde of Popery, and as proceeding from an idolatrous disposition: insomuch as Time would soone bring to passe (if it were not resisted) that God would be turned out of Churches into Barnes, and from thence againe into the Fields and Mountaines, and vnder the hedges; and the Offices of the Ministery (robbed of all dignity and respect) be as contemptible as these places; all Order, Discipline, and Church-gouernment, left to newnesse of opinion, and mens fancies: yea, and soone after, as many kindes of Religions would spring vp, as there are Parish-Churches within England: euery contentious and ignorant person clothing his fancie with the Spirit of God, and his imagination with the gift of reuelation; insomuch, as when the Truth, which is but one, shall appeare to the simple multitude, no lesse variable than contrary to it selfe, the Faith of Men will soone after dye away by degrees, and all Religion be held in scorne and contempt. Which distraction gaue a great Prince of Germany cause of this answer to those that perswaded him to become a Lutheran, Si me adiungo vobis, tunc condemnor ab alijs; si me alijs adiungo, à vobis condemnor; quid fugiam video, sed quid sequar, non habeo: If I adioyne my selfe to you, I am condemned by others; If I ioyne with others, I am condemned by you: what I should auoide I see, but I know not what I should follow.

§. II. The offerings of the twelue Princes: the Passeouer of the second yeere: The departing of Iethro.

NOw when Moses had taken order for all things necessary, prouided for the seruice of God, written the Lawes, numbred his Army, and diuided them into the battailes and troupes before remembred, and appointed them Leaders of all sorts; The twelue Princes or Commanders of the Tribes brought their offerings before the Lord, to wit, sixe couered Chariots, and twelue Oxen to draw them, therein to transport, as they marched, the parts of the Tabernacle, with all that belonged thereunto: the Sanctuary excepted, which for reuerence was carried vpon the shoulders of the sons of Korah, to whom the charge was committed; and the Chariots in which was conueyed the other parts of the Tabernacles and Vessels thereto belonging, were deliuered to the Leuites for that seruice, namely to the Sonnes of Gershon and Merari. Num. 4. 6.

Besides these Chariots, each of these Commanders, Princes, or Heads of Tribes, offered vnto God, and for his seruice in the Temple, a Charger of fine siluer, weighing 130. sheckles; a siluer Boll of 70. sheckles; after the sheckle of the Sanctuary; and an Incense-Cup of gold, of ten sheckles, which they performed at the same time when the Altar was dedicated vnto God by Aaron: and before they marched from Sinai towards halfe-pence sterling: the Sicle of the Sanctuary (as it is expounded, Exod. 30. 13.) containeth 20. Gerahs, so a Sanctuary is about 7. grots, the common Sicle is but halfe as much, to wit ten Gerahs: as it is vsually expounded; though Villalpandus labours to proue that the common and the Sanctuary Sicle were all one, Num. 9. verse 5. Num. 10. 11. Exodus. vlt. 34. Numbers 9. 37.

their conqueſt, beſides the Beaſts which they offered for ſacrifice, according to the Law Ceremoniall, the weight of all the twelue ſiluer Chargers, and twelue ſiluer Bolles, amounted vnto 2400. ſheckles of ſiluer; and the weight of gold in the Incenſe-Cuppes, to 120. ſheckles of gold; which makes of ſheckles of ſiluer 1200. euery ſheckle of gold valuing ten of ſiluer, ſo that the whole of gold and ſiluer which they offered at this time, was about foure hundreth and twenty pound ſterling. This done, Moſes, as in all the reſt by the Spirit of God conducted, gaue order for the celebrating of the Paſſeouer, which they performed on the foureteenth day of the ſecond moneth of the ſecond yeare: and on the twentieth day of the ſame, the cloude was lifted vp from aboue the Tabernacle, as a ſigne of going forward; Moſes beginning his march with this inuocation to God: Riſe vp Lord, and let thine enemies be ſcattered, and let them that hate thee, flie before thee. Then all the people of Iſrael remoued from their incamping at the foote of the Mountaine Sinai, towards Paran, the Armie, or great ſquadron of Iuda, led by Naaſhon, taking the Vaunt-guard, followed by Nethanael and Eliab, Leaders of the Tribes of Iſſacar and Zabulon: after whom the reſt marched, as in the figure expreſt. And becauſe the paſſage through ſo many deſerts and mountaines, was exceeding difficult: Moſes leauing nothing vnforethought which might ſerue for the aduancement of his enterpriſe, he inſtantly intreated his Father in Law, whom in the tenth of Numbers he calleth Hobab, to accompany them in their iourney towards Canaan; promiſing him ſuch part and profit of the enterprize, as God ſhould beſtow on them: for this man, as he was of great vnderſtanding & iudgement (as appeared by the Counſell hee gaue to Moſes for the appointing of Iudges ouer the people) ſo was he a perfect guide in all thoſe parts, himſelfe inhabiting on the frontier thereof, at Midian, or Madian: and (as it ſeemeth) a man of great yeeres and experience; for he was then the Prieſt or Prince of Madian, when Moſes fled firſt out of Egypt, and married his Daughter, which was 42. yeeres before this requeſt made. And though Moſes himſelfe had liued 40. yeeres in theſe parts of Arabia, through which he was now to trauell: yet the better to aſſure his paſſage, and ſo great a multitude of ſoules, which could not be ſo few as a Million, it was neceſſary to vſe many guides, and many conducters. To this requeſt of Moſes, it may ſeeme by the places, Exod. 18.27. and Num. 10.30. that Iethro, otherwiſe called Hobab, yeelded not: for it is euident, that he went backe from Moſes into his owne Countrey. But becauſe it appeareth by other places of Scripture, that the poſterity of this Hobab was mingled with the Iſraelites, it is moſt likely that this his returne to his owne Countrey, was rather to fetch away his Family, and to take his leaue of his owne Countrey, by ſetting things in order, than to abide there.

§. III.

The voyage from Horeb to Kades: the mutinies by the way: and the cauſe of their turning backe to the Red Sea.

After this diſmiſſion of Hobab, Iſrael began to march towards the Deſerts of Paran: and after three daies wandring, they ſate downe at the Sepulchers of luſt, afterward called Tabeera, or Incenſio: by reaſon that God conſumed with fire thoſe Mutiners and Murmurers which roſe vp in this remoue, which happened about the 23. day of the ſame Moneth. And from this 23. day of the ſecond Moneth, of the ſecond yeere, they reſted and fed themſelues with Quailes (which it pleaſed God by a Sea-winde to caſt vpon them) to the 24. day of the third moneth, to wit, all the moneth of Sinan or Iune: whereof ſurfaiting there dyed great numbers: from whence in the following moneth, called Thamus, anſwering to our Iuly, they went on to Hazeroth, where Miriam the ſiſter of Moſes was ſtricken with the leproſie, which continued vpon her ſeuen dayes, after whoſe recouery Iſrael remooued toward the border of Idumæa; and incamped at Rithma, neere Kades Barnea, from whence Moſes ſent the twelue diſcouerers into the Territory of Canaan, both to informe themſelues of the fertility and ſtrength of the Country; as alſo to take knowledge of the Wayes, Paſſages, Riuers, Fords, and Mountaines. For Arad king of the Canaanites ſurprized diuers companies of the Iſraelites, by lying in ambuſh neere thoſe wayes, through which the diſcouerers and ſearchers of the Land had formerlie paſt. Now, after the returne of the diſcouerers of Kades, the wrath of God was turned againſt Iſrael; whoſe ingratitude and rebellion after his ſo many benefits, ſo many remiſſions, ſo many miracles wrought, was ſuch, as they eſteemed their deliuerance from the

the Egyptian ſlauery, his feeding them, and conducting them through that great and terrible wildernesse (for ſo Moſes calleth it) with the victory which he gaue them againſt the powerfull Amalekites, to be no other than the effects of his hatred, thinking that hee led them on and preſerued them, but to bring them, their wiues, and children to be ſlaughtered, and giuen for a prey and ſpoyle to the Amorites or Canaanites. For it was reported vnto them, by the ſearchers of the Land, that the Cities of their enemies were walled and defended with many ſtrong Towers and Caſtles; that many of the people were Gyant-like, (for they confeſt that they ſaw the ſonnes of Anac there) who were men of fearefull ſtature, and ſo farre ouer-topped the Iſraelites, as they appeared to them, and to themſelues, but as Graſhoppers in their reſpect. Now, as this mutiny exceeded all the reſt, wherein they both accuſed God, and conſulted to chooſe them a Captaine (or as they call it now adayes, an Electo) to carry them backe againe into Egypt; ſo did God puniſh the ſame in a greater meaſure, than any of the former. For he extinguiſhed euery ſoule of the whole multitude (Joſua and Caleb excepted) who being confident in Gods promiſes, perſwaded the people to enter Canaan, being then neere it; and at the mountaine foote of Idumea, which is but narrow; laying before them the fertility thereof; and aſſuring them of victory. But as men, whom the paſſion of feare had bereaued both of reaſon and common ſenſe, they threatned to ſtone theſe encouragers to death; accounting them as men either deſperate in themſelues, or betrayers of the liues, goods, and children of all their brethren, to their enemies; but God reſiſted theſe wicked purpoſes, and interpoſing the feare of his bright glory between the vnaduiſed fury of the multitude, and the innocency and conſtancy of his ſeruants, preſerued them thereby from their violence; threatning an intire deſtruction of the whole Nation, by ſending among them a conſuming and mercileſſe peſtilence. For this was the tenth inſurrection and rebellion, which they had made, ſince God deliuered them from the ſlauery of the Egyptians. But Moſes (the mildeſt or meekeſt of all men) prayed vnto God to remember his infinite mercies; alledging, that this ſo ſeuere a iudgement, how deſeruedly ſoeuer inflicted, would increaſe the pride of the Heathen Nations, and giue them occaſion to vaunt, that the God of Iſrael, failing in power to performe his promiſes, ſuffered them to periſh in theſe barren and fruitleſſe Deſarts. Yet as God is no leſſe iuſt than mercifull, as God is ſlow to anger, ſo is his wrath a conſuming fire; the ſame being once kindled by the violent breath of mans ingratitude: and therefore, as with a hand leſſe heauy than hoped for, he ſcourged this iniquity, ſo by the meaſure of his glory (euermore iealous of neglect and deriſion) he ſuffered not the wicked to paſſe vnpuniſhed; reſeruing his compaſſion for the innocent: whom, becauſe they participated not with the offences of their Fathers, he was pleaſed to preſerue, and in them to performe his promiſes, which haue neuer beene fruſtrate.

§. III.

Of their vnwillingneſſe to returne: with the puniſhment thereof, and of diuers accidents in the returne.

NOW when Moſes had reuealed the purpoſes of God to the people, and made them know his heauy diſpleaſure towards them, they began to bewaile themſelues, though ouer-late: the times of grace and mens repentance, hauing alſo their appointment. And then when God had left them to themſelues, and was no more among them, after they had ſo often plaid and dallied with his mercifull ſufferings, they would needs amend their former diſobedience by a ſecond contempt: and make offer to enter the Land contrary againe to the aduice of Moſes; who aſſured them, that God was not among them; and that the Arke of his couenant ſhould not moue, but by His direction, who could not erre; and that the enemies ſword which God had hitherto bended and rebated, was now left no leſſe ſharpe than death; and in the hands of the Amalekites, and Canaanites no leſſe cruell. But as men from whom God hath with-drawne his grace, doe alwayes follow thoſe counſels which carry them to their owne deſtructions: ſo the Hebrewes, after they had forſaken the opportunity by God and their Conducters offered: and might then haue entered Iudea before their enemies were prepared and ioyned; did afterward, contrary to Gods commandement, vndertake the enterpriſe of themſelues; and ranne head-long and without aduice into the mountaines of Idumea. There the Canaanites and the Amalekites being ioyned, and attending their aduantage, set on them, brake them: and of their numbers slaughtered the greatest part: and following their victory and pursuite, consumed them all the way of their flight, euen vnto Hormah, the Amalekites in reuenge of their former losse, and ouerthrow at Raphidim: the Canaanites to preuent their displantation and destruction threatned. Of which powerfull assembly of those two Nations (assisted in all likelihood with the neighbour Kings ioyned together for their common safetie) it pleased God to forewarne Moses, and to direct him another way, than that formerly intended. For he commanded him to returne by those painefull passages of the Deserts, through which they had formerly trauelled, till they found the bankes of the red Sea againe: in which retraite before they came backe to passe ouer Iordan, there were consumed 38. yeeres; and the whole number of the 600. and odde thousand, which came out of Ægypt (Moses, Iosbua, and Caleb excepted) were dead in the Wildernesse, the stubborne and careless generations were wholly worne out, and the promised Land bestowed on their children; which were increased to 600000. and more. For besides the double fault both of refusing to enter the Land vpon the returne of their discouerers, and the presumption then to attempt it, when they were countermaunded: it seemeth that they had committed that horrible Idolatry of worshipping Moloch, and the Host of Heauen. For although Moses doth not mention it, yet Amos doth, and so doth the Martyr Stephen; as also that the Israelites worshipped the Sunne and Moone in after-times, it is proued out of sundry other places.

Amos 5.25. Acts 7.42. 2 Kin. 17. 16. & cap. 21. v. 3. & c. 23. v. 4, 5. 11. 2 Chron. 33. 3. Hierem. c. 19. v. 13. &c.

Now after the broken Companies were returned to the Campe at Cades, Moses according to the commandement receiued from God, departed towards the South from whence hee came, to recouer the shoares of the Red Sea. And so from Cades or Rithma hee remoued to Remmonparez, so called of abundance of Pomegranates there found and diuided among them. From whence he went on to Libnah, taking that name of the Frankincense there found. From Libnah he croft the Valley, and sate downe at Ressa, neere the foote of the mountaine. And after he had rested there, he bended towards the West, and incamped at Ceelata; where one of the Hebrewes, for gathering broken wood on the Sabbath, was stoned to death. After which, Moses alwayes keeping the Valley, betweene two great ledges of mountaines, (those which bound the Desert of Sinne, and those of Pharan) croft the same from Ceelata, and marched Eastward to the mountaine of Sapher, or Sepher: this making the Twentieth mansion. From thence hee passed on to Harada; then to Maceloth; and then to Thahah, and so to Thara or Thare; the foure and twentieth mansion. Where Moses rested, the people began that insolent and dangerous mutiny of Korah, Dathan, & Abiram; who for their contempt of God & his Ministers, were some of them swallowed vp aliue, and by the Earth opening her mouth deuoured; others, euen two hundred and fifty which offered incense with Korah, were consumed with fire from Heauen; and 14700. of their party, which murmured against Moses, stricken dead with a sudden pestilence: one of the greatest maruailes and iudgements of God, that hath been shewed in all the time of Moses his gouernment, or before. For among so great a multitude, those lay-men who would haue vsurped Ecclesiasticall authority, were suddenly swallowed vp aliue into the Earth with their families and goods; euen while they sought to ouerthrow the Order, Discipline, and power of the Church, and to make all men alike therein, rebelliously contending against the High Priest and Magistrate, to whom God had committed the gouernment both of his Church, and Common-weale of his people. And the better to assure the people, and out of his great mercy to confirme them, it pleaseth him in this place also to approue by miracle the former election of his seruant Aaron, by the twelue rods giuen in by the Heads of the twelue Tribes; of which Moses receiued one of euery Head, and Prince of his Tribe: which being all withered and dried Wands, and on euery rod the name of the Prince of the Tribe written, and Aarons on that of Leui, it pleased God, that the rod of Aaron receiued by his power a vegetable spirit, and hauing laine in the Tabernacle of the Congregation, before the Arke one night, had on it both Buddes, Blossomes, and ripe Almonds.

Num. 33.

From Tharah the whole Army remoued to Methra; and thence to Esmona; and thence to Moseroth, (or Masurit, after Saint Hierome) and from Moseroth to Beneiacan; and so to Gadgad, which Hierome calleth Gadgada; thence to Ietabata, the thirtieth Mansion; where from certaine fountaines of water gathered in one, Adrichomius maketh a Riuer, which falleth into the Red Sea, betweene Madian and Asiongaber.

Now

Now although it be very probable, that at Asiongaber, where Salomon furnished his Fleetes for the East Indies, there was store of fresh water; and though Herodotus maketh mention of a great Riuer in Arabia the stonie, which he calleth Corys, from whence (saith he) the inhabitants vse queigh water in pipes of leather to other places, by which deuice the King of Arabia relieued the Army of Cambyses: yet is Adrichomius greatly deceiued, as many times else is, in finding these Springs at Gadgad, or Ietabata, being the nine and twentieth or thirtieth Mansion. For it was at Punon, that those Springs are spoken of, which in Deuteronomy the tenth, and the seuenth Verse, is also called Gedhaduy, or Iadhath, a Land of running waters, and which by all probability fall into the Riuer Zared, the next adioyning. And that those Springs should fall into the Red sea at Asiongaber, or Eloth, I cannot beleeue, for the way thither is very long. And this I finde in Belonius, that there are diuers Torrents of fresh water in those sandy parts of Arabia, which though they continue their course for a few miles, yet they are drunke vp by the hot and thirsty sand, before they can recouer the banks of the Red Sea.

From Ietabata, Moses directed his iourney towards the Red Sea, and incamped at Hebrona, and from thence to Esiongaber; which City in Iosephus time had the name of Berenice; and in Hieromes, Esion. From thence, keeping the Sea, and Eloth on his right hand, hee turned towards the North, as hee was by God commanded. Esiongaber being the farthest place towards the South East, that Moses trauailed in that passage. Deut. 2.

It seemeth that Esiongaber or Asiongaber, Eloth and Madian, were not at this time in the possession of the Kings of Edom. For it is said, That the Lord spake vnto Moses and Aaron in the Mount Hor, neere the Coast of the Land of Edom; so as the Mount Hor was at this time in the South border of Idumea. And if Esiongaber, and the other places neere the Red Sea, had at this present beene subiect vnto the Idumeans, Moses would also haue demanded a free passage through them. It is true, that in the future the Idumeans obtained those places; for it is said, And they arose out of Midian, and came to Paran, and tooke men with them; which were those companies that followed young Hadad of Idumea, into Egypt, when he fled from Ioab. Likewise it is said of Salomon, that hee made a Nauy of shippes in Esiongaber besides Eloth, in the Land of Edom. Num. c. 20. v. 13. 1 Kings 11. 18.

§. V.

Of Moses arriuall at Zin Kades and of the accidents while that they abode there.

From Esiongaber hee turned againe towards the North, and pitched in the wildernesse of Zin, which is Kadesh, or in Beroth, of the children of Iacan; where they sate downe in the first Moneth of the fortieth yeere, after they left Egypt. For at the next Mansion Aaron died in the first day of the fifth Moneth of the fortieth yeere: the nine and thirtieth yeere taking end at Esiongaber. And at this City of Kades (for so it was thought to be) or neere it, died Miriam, or Mary, Moses sister, whose Sepulcher was to be seene in Saint Hieromes time, as himselfe auoweth. From hence ere they departed to the Mountaine Hor, all the people murmured most violently against Moses, by reason of the scarcity of water. For neither the punishments by fire from Heauen; by being deuoured and swallowed vp by the earth; by the sudden pestilence, which often seized them; nor any miracle formerly shewing, either the loue or wrath of God, could preuaile with this Nation any longer, than while they were full fed and satisfied in euery of their appetites: but in stead of seeking for helpe and relieue at Gods hands, when they suffered hunger, thirst, or any other want, they murmured, repined, and rebelled, repenting them of their changed estates, and casting vngratefully on Moses all their miseries. Yea, though they well knew that their owne Fathers had left their bodies in the Deserts, and that they were now entred into the fortieth yeere, wherein all their miseries were to take end. And being, as it were, in the sight of the Land promised, they againe as obstinately tempted God as in former times, and neither trusted his promises, nor feared his indignation. But as the will and purposes of Num. 20. 1. Num. 20. 3.

GOD are without beginning; so his mercies being without end, he commanded Moses Num. 20. 9. to strike a Rocke adioyning with his rod; and the waters issued out in a great abundance, with which both themselues and their cattell were satisfied. Neuertheless, because God perceiued a kinde of diffidence both in Moses and Aaron, at this place; therefore he permitted neither of them to enter the Land promised, whereto perchance their worldly desires might inuite them. But it pleased him to end the trauailes of Aaron at the Mount-2553. taine Hor, being the next, and foure and thirtieth Station. At which Mountaine of Hor, Aaron was despoyled of the garments of his Priest-hood, and the same put on Eleazar his sonne, as God had commanded. Which done, MOSES and ELEAZAR descended the Mountaine; but GOD receiued Aaron on the top thereof, and he was no more seene.

Of this Mountaine called Hor, otherwise Mosera, as in Deuteronomy 10. Verse 6. those Horites tooke name, which the Idumæans had formerly vanquished. Some there are which make Mosera, which was the seauen and twentieth Mansion; and Mosera which they write Moseroth for difference, which was the foure and thirtieth Mansion, and is also called Hor, to be two distinct places: because Moses in passing from Cadesbarne towards Iongabon, incamped at Mosera, after hee departed from Hesmona, and before he came to
Num. 33. Beniaacan. And this Mosera, which is also called Hor, he came vnto after he left Cades, where Miriam, Moses sister dyed; the first being the seauen and twentieth, and the second being the foure and thirtieth Mansion. But for Hor, which is also called Mosera, it should haue beene written, Hor iuxta Mosera; Hor neere Mosera: for it is but one roote of a Mountaine, diuided into diuers tops, as Sinai and Horeb are: Whereof the West part Moses calleth Mosera, and the East part Horeb. By the West part Moses encamped, as hee past towards the Red Sea, on his left hand; by the East part, as hee were backe againe North-wards towards Moab: as in the description of Moses his passage through Arabia, the Reader may perceiue.

Now it was from Cades, before they came to Hor, because Hor belonged to Edom, that Moses sent messengers to the Prince of Idumæa; praying him that he might passe with the people of Israel through his Territory into the Land of Canaan, which bordered it. For it was the neerest way of all other from the City of Kadesh, where Moses then encamped; whereas otherwise taking his iourney by the Riuers of Zared, Arnon, and Iordan, hee might haue runne into many hazards in the passage of those Riuers, the farre way about, and the many powerfull Kings, which commanded in those Regions. Now the better to perswade the Prince of Idumæa hereunto, Moses remembred him, that hee was of the same race and family with Israel: calling him by the name of brother, because both the Edomites and Israelites were the sonnes of one father, to wit, Isaac; inferring thereby that hee had more reason to fauour and respect them, than hee had to assist the Canaanites; against whom Esau his Ancester had made warre, and driuen out the Horites (who were of their ancient races descended of Cham) out of the Region of Seir, calling it by his owne name Edom, or Edumæa. He also making a short repetition of Gods blessings bestowed on them, and of his purposes and promises; assured Edom, or the King thereof, that hee would no way offend his people, or waste his Countrey, but that hee would restraine his Army within the bounds of the Common, and Kings high wayes, paying money for whatsoeuer he vsed, yea, euen for the water, which themselues or their Cattell should Deut. 2. 4. drinke. For Moses was commanded by God, not to prouoke the children of Esau. But the King of Edumæa knowing the strength of his owne Countrey, the same being neere Canaan, rampard with high and sharpe mountaines: and withall suspecting, as a naturall wise man, that 600000. strangers being once entred his Countrey, it would rest in their wills to giue him law, resoluedly refused them passage, and deliuered this answer to the Num. 20. 20. & 21. Messengers: That, if they attempted to enter that way, he would take them for enemies, and resist them by all possible meanes. And not knowing whether such a deniall might satisfie or exasperate, hee gathered the strength of his Countrey together, and shewed himselfe prepared to defend their passage. For, as it is written; Then Edom came out against him (to wit, Moses) with much people, and with a mighty power. Whereupon Moses
Num. 20. 20. considering, that the end of his enterprise was not the conquest of Seir or Edumæa, and that the Land promised was that of Canaan: like vnto himselfe who was of naturall vnderstanding the greatest of any man, and the skilfullest man of warre that the world had, hee refused to aduenture the Army of Israel against a Nation, which being ouercome, gaue but a passage to inuade others; and which by reason of the seate of their mountainous Countrey, could not but haue endangered, or (at least) greatly enfeebled the strength of Israel, and rendred them lesse able, if not altogether powerlesse, to haue conquered the rest.

§. VI.

Of their compassing Idumea, and trauelling to Arnon, the border of Moab.

THerefore leauing the way of Idumea, turned himselfe towards the East, and marched towards the Deserts of Moab. Which when Arad King of the Canaanites vnderstood, and that Moses had blanched the way of Idumea; and knowing that it was Canaan, and not Edom, which Israel aimed at, he thought it safest, rather to finde his enemies in his neighbours Countrey, than to be found by them in his owne: which he might haue done with a farre greater hope of victory, had Moses beene enforst first to haue made his way by the Sword through Idumea, and thereby though victorious, greatly haue lessened his numbers. But although it fell out otherwise than Arad hoped for, yet being resolued to make triall, what courage the Israelites brought with them out of Egypt, before they came neerer his owne home; leading the strength of his Nation to the edge of the Desert, he set vpon some part of the Army; which, for the multitude occupied a great space, and for the many heards of Cattell that they draue with them, could not encampe so neere together, but that some quarter or other was euermore subiect to surprise. By which aduantage, and in that his attempts were then perchance vnexpected, he slew some few of the Israelites, and carried with him many prisoners.

Now it is very probable, that it was this Canaanite, or his Predecessour, which ioyned his forces with the Amalekites, and gaue an ouerthrow to those mutinous Israelites, which without direction from God by Moses, would haue entred Canaan from Cadesbarne. For it seemeth that the greatest number of that Army were of the Canaanites, because in the first of Deuteronomy, 44. the Amorites are named alone without the Amalekites, and are said to haue beaten the Israelites at that time. And this Arad, if he were the same that had a victory ouer Israel, neere Cadesbarne; or if it were his Predecessour that then preuailed, this man finding that Moses was returned from the Red Sea; and in his way towards Canaan, and that the South part of Canaan was first to be inuaded, and in danger of being conquered, not knowing of Moses purpose to compasse Moab, determined while he was yet in the Desert, to trie the quarrell. And whereas it followeth in the third verse of the twelfth Chapter of Numbers, that the Israelites vtterly destroyed the Canaanites and their Cities, they are much mistaken that thinke, that this destruction was presently performed by the Israelites. But it is to be vnderstood, to haue beene done in the future, to wit, in the time of Iosua. For had Moses at this time entred Canaan in the pursuit of Arad, he would not haue fallen backe againe into the Deserts of Zin and Moab, and haue fetcht a wearisome and needlesse compasse, by the Riuers of Zared and Arnon. Num. 14. 45.

Neither is their coniecture to be valued at any thing, which affirme, that Arad did not inhabite any part of Canaan it selfe, but that his Territory lay without it, and neere the Mountaine Hor. For Hor and Zin Cades were the South borders of Edom, and not of Canaan. And it was in the South of the Land of Canaan, that Arad dwelt: which South part of Canaan was the North part of Edom. Num. 33. 40.

Againe, Horma (for so farre the Israelites after their victory pursued the Canaanites) is seated in the South of Iudea. There is also a City of that name in Simeon. But there is no such place to the South of Edom. And were there no other argument, but the mutiny which followed presently after the repetition of this victory, it were enough to proue, that the same was obtained in the future, and in Iosua his time, and not at the instant of Arads assault. For had the Israelites at this time sackt the Cities of Arad, they would not the next day haue complained for want of water and bread. For where there are great Cities, there is also water and bread. But it was in the time of Iosua, that the Israelites tooke their reuenge, and after they had past Iordan: Iosua then gouerning them; who in the twelfth Chapter and foureteenth Verse, nameth this Arad by the name of his Citie so called; and with him the King of Horma: to which place the Israelites pursued the Canaanites. And he nameth them amongst those Kings, which he vanquished, and put to death.

Now after this assault and surprize by Arad, Moses finding that all entrance on that side was defended, he led the people Eastward to compasse Idumæa and the Dead Sea, and to make his entrance by Arnon and the Plaines of Moab, at that time in the possession of the Amorites. But the Israelites, to whom the very name of a Desert was terrible, began againe to rebell against their Leader; till God by a multitude of fiery Serpents, (that is, by the byting of Serpents, whose venom inflamed them, and burnt them as fire) made them know their error, and afterward, according to his plentifull grace, cured them againe by their beholding an artificiall Serpent, by his Commandement set vp.

From the Mount Hor, Moses leauing the ordinary way which lyeth betweene the Red Sea, and Cœlosyria, encamped at Zalmona: and thence hee remoued to Phunon, where hee erected the Brazen Serpent; making these iourneys by the edge of Idumæa, but without it. For Phunon was sometime a principall City of the Edomites. Now where it is written in Numbers 21. Verse 4. That from Mount Hor they departed by the way of the Red Sea, which grieued the people, it was not thereby meant that the Israelites turned backe towards the Red Sea; neither did they march (according to Fonseca) per viam quæ habet à latere mare rubrum; By the way that sided the Red Sea, but indeed they crost, and went athwart the common way from Galaad, Traconitis, and the Countreys of Moab, to the Red Sea, that is, to Esiongaber, Eloth, and Midian: which way, as it lay North and South, so Israel to shunne the border of Edom, and to take the vtmost East part of Moab, crost the common way towards the East, and then they turned againe towards the North, as before.

From Phunon he went to Oboth; where they entred the Territory of Moab, adioyning to the Land of Suph, a Countrey bordering on the Dead Sea; and from thence to Abarim, the eight and thirtieth Mansion, that is, where the Mountaines so called take beginning, and are as yet but small Mountures of Hills, on the East border of Moab; From thence they recouered Dibon Gad; or the Riuer of Zared, which riseth in the mountaines of Arabia, and runneth towards the Dead Sea, not farre from Petra the Metropolis thereof, being the nine and thirtieth Station. And hauing past that Riuer, they lodged at Dibon Gad, and from thence they kept the way to Diblathaim, one of the Cities of Moab; which Hieremie the Prophet Chap. 48. Verse 22. calleth the House of Diblathaim, the same which afterward was destroyed among the rest by Nabuchadnezzar. From thence they came to the Riuer of Arnon, and encamped in the mountaines of Abarim: though in the 22. of Numbers, Moses doth not remember Helmondiblathaim, but speaketh of his remoue from the Riuer of Zared, immediately to the other side of Arnon; calling Arnon the border of Moab, betweene them and the Amorites: speaking, as he found the state of the Countrey at that time. For Arnon was not anciently the border of Moab, but was lately conquered from the Moabites, by Sehon, King of the Amorites: euen from the Predecessour of Balac Peor then reigning. From Diblathaim, Moses sent messengers to Sehon, King of the Amorites, to desire a passage through his Countrey: which though he knew would be denied him, yet he desired to giue a reason to the neighbour Nations, of the warre he vndertooke. And though Edom had refused him as Sehon did, yet he had no warrant from God to enforce him. Moses also in sending messengers to Sehon, obserued the same precept, which he left to his posterity and successours, for a law of the warre; namely in Deut. 20. Verse 10. in these words; When thou commest neere vnto a Citie to fight against it, thou shalt offer it peace, which if it doe accept of and open vnto thee, then let all the people found therein be tributaries vnto thee, and serue thee; but if it refuse, &c. thou shalt smite all the males thereof with the edge of the sword. Which ordinance all commanders of Armies haue obserued to this day, or ought to haue done.

Of the Booke of the battailes of the Lord, mentioned in this Story, and of other Bookes mentioned in Scripture, which are lost.

Num. c. 21. v. 14.

NOw concerning the Warre betweene Israel and Sehon, Moses seemeth to referre a great part of this Story to that Booke intituled, Liber bellorum Domini; The booke of Gods battailes: and therefore passeth ouer many encounters, and other things memoramemorable, with greater brevity in this place. His words after the Geneua Translation are these: Wherefore it shall be spoken in the Booke of the battailes of the Lord, what things he did in the Red Sea, and in the Riuers of Arnon. The Vulgar copie differeth not in sense from this: But the Greeke Septuagint vary. For the Greeke writes it to this effect; For thus it is said in the Booke: The warre of the Lord hath burnt (or inflamed) Zoob, and the brookes of Arnon. Iunius for the Red Sea, which is in the Geneuian and Vulgar Edition, names the Region of * Suph, a Country bordering the Dead Sea towards the East, as he coniecture th. The Text he readeth thus. Idcircò dici solet in recensione bellorum Iehouæ, contra Vahebum in Regione Suph: & contra flumina, flumina Arnonis; Therefore is it spoken in repeating of the battailes of Iehouah, against Vaheb in the Country of Suph: and against the Riuers, the Riuers of Arnon. In which words he vnderstands, that amongst the warres which the Lord disposed for the good of the Israelites, there was in those times a famous memory in the mouth of most men, concerning the warre of Sehon against Vaheb, the King of the Moabites, and of his winning the Country neere Arnon, out of the possession of the Moabites. For this Vaheb was the immediate predecessour of Balac, who liued with Moses: though it be written that this Balac was the son of Zippor, and not of Vaheb. For it seemes (as it is plaine in the succession of the Edomites) that those Kingdomes were elective, and not successiue. And as Iunius in this Translation vnderstandeth no speciall Booke of the battailes of the Lord: so others, as Vatablus in his Annotations, doubt whether in this place any speciall Booke be meant; and if any, whether it be not a prediction of warres in future ages, to be waged in these places, and to be written in the Book of Iudges. Syracides c. 46. tells vs plainely, that those battailes of the Lord were fought by Iosua; Who was there (saith he) before him like to him? for he fought the battailes of the Lord. But seeing the Histories of the Scripture elsewhere often passe ouer matters of great weight in few words, referring the Reader to other Bookes, written of the same matter at large: therefore it seemeth probable, that such a Booke as this there was; wherein the seuerall victories by Israel obtained, and also victories of other Kings, making way for the good of the Israelites, were particularly and largely written. And that the same should now be wanting, it is not strange, seeing so many other Volumes, filled with diuine discourse, haue perished in the long race of time, or haue beene destroyed by the ignorant and malicious Heathen Magistrate. For the Bookes of Henoch, how soeuer they haue beene in later ages corrupted, and therefore now suspected, are remembred in an Epistle of Thaddeus, and cited by Origen [illegible], and by Tertullian.

That worke also of the Patriarch Abraham, of Formation, which others bestow on Rabbi Akiba, is no where found. The Bookes remembred by Iosua c. 10. v. 13. and in the second of Samuel, c. 1. v. 18. called the Booke of Iasher, or Iustorum, is also lost; wherein the stay of the Sunne and Moone in the middest of the Heauens is recorded, and how they stood still till Israel had auenged themselues of their enemies: out of which also David tooke the precept, of teaching the children of Iuda, to exercise their bowes against their enemies.

Some thinke this to be the Booke of eternall Predestination, in which the iust are written, according vnto the sixty and ninth Psalme, Verse 28. where it is said; Let them bee put out of the Booke of Life, neither let them bee written with the righteous. Hierome thinkes, that David by this Booke vnderstood those of Samuel; Rabbi Salomon, that the Bookes of the Law are thereby meant, in which the acts of the iust Abraham, of Isaac, Iacob, and Moses, are written; Others, that it was the Booke of Ezechiel; others, as Theodoretus, that it was a Commentary vpon Iosua, by an vnknowne Author.

The booke of Chozai, concerning Manasse, remembred in the second of Chron. 33. v. 18. & 19. Of this booke, also lost, Hierome conceiues that the Prophet Isay was the Author.

The same mischance came as well to the Story of Salomon, written by Ahia Silonites, who met with Ieroboam, and foretold him of his obtaining the Kingdome of Israel from the sonne of Salomon; as to the bookes of Nathan the Prophet, and to those of Iedo the Seer, remembred in the second of Chron. c. 9. v. 29. With these haue the bookes of Shemaiah and of Ido, remembred in the second of Chron. c. 12. v. 15. perished: and that of Iehu the sonne of Hanani, of the acts of Iehosaphat, cited in the second of Chron. c. 20. v. 34. Also that booke of Salomon which the Hebrewes write Hasirim, of 5000. verses,

Of these and other Bookes many were consumed with the same fire, wherewith Nebuchadnezzar burnt the Temple of Hierusalem. But let vs returne thither where wee left.

§. VIII.

Of Moses his sparing the issue of Lot; and of the Giants in those parts; and of Sehon and Og.

WHen Moses had past Arnon, he incamped on the other side thereof at Abarim, opposite to the City of Nebo, leauing the City of Midian on the left hand, & attempting nothing vpon the Moabites on that side. For Moab did at this time inhabite on the South-side of Arnon, hauing lost all his ancient and best Territory, which was now in the possession of Sehon the Amorite. For Moses was commanded by God not to molest Moab, neither to prouoke them to battaile, God hauing giuen that Land to the children of Lot; the same which was anciently possest by the Emims, who were men of great stature, and comparable to those Giants called Anakims, or the sonnes of Anac.

Deut. 2. v. 9. & 10, 11, & 12.

God also commanded Moses to spare the Ammonites, because they likewise were descended of Lot: who had expelled from thence those Giants, which the Ammonites called Zamzummims. For it seemeth that all that part, especially to the East of Iordan, euen to the Desert of Arabia, as well on the West, as on the East-side of the Mountaines of Gilead, was inhabited by Giants. And in the plantation of the Land promised, the Israelites did not at any time passe those Mountaines to the East of Basan, but left their Countrey to them, as in the description following is made manifest. We find also, that as there were many Giants both before and after the floud: so these Nations, which anciently inhabited both the border of Canaan, and the Land it selfe, had among them many Families of Giant-like men. For the Anakims dwelt in Hebron, which sometimes was called the City of Arbah, which Arbah in Iosua is called the father of the Anakims; and the greatest man of the Anakims. There had also beene Giants in the Land of the Moabites, called Emim: and their chiefe City was Aroer or Ar, neere the Riuer of Arnon. To the Giants of the Rephaims, the Ammonites gaue the name of Zamzummims; which were of the same ancient Canaanites: and their chiefe City was Rabba, afterward Philadelphia. They were also called Zuzims, which is as much to say, as Viri robusti, horrendiq; Gigantes; Strong men, and fearefull Giants, who inhabited other Cities of Ham, or Hom, in the same Prouince, and not farre to the North of Aroer.

Ios. 15. v. 13. c. 14. v. 15.

Now Moses hauing past Arnon, and being encamped at Abarim; and hauing (as before) sent to Sehon, as he had done to Edom, to pray a passage through his Countrey, was denied it. For Sehon being made proud by his former conquest vpon Vaheb the Moabite; which Nation the Amorites esteemed but as strangers and vsurpers, (themselues being of the sonnes of Canaan, and the Moabites of Lot) refused to grant Israel any entrance that way; and withall prepared to encounter Moses with as much speed as he could, because Moses encamped in the Countrey of his new conquests, to wit, the Plaines of Moab, the two and fortieth and last Mansion: which Moses wasted with the multitude of his people, and cattell. Towards him therefore hasting himselfe, they encountred each other at Jahaz; where Sehon with his children and people were broken and discomfited, and the victory so pursued by Moses, as few or none of the Amorites escaped. He also slaughtered all the Women and Children of the Amorites, which he found in Esebon, and all the other Cities, Villages, or Fields; they being of the race of Canaan, as those of Basan also were: and descended of Emoreus or Amoreus: for Moses calleth the Basanites also Amorites. And although Israel might now haue taken a ready way and passage into Iudea: being at this time, and after this victory at the bankes of Iordan: yet he knew it to be perillous to leaue so great a part of that Nation of the Amorites on his backe, as inhabited all the Region of Basan or Traconitis: and therefore he led on his Army to inuade Og: a person of exceeding strength and stature: and the onely man of marke remaining of the ancient Giants of those parts, and who at that time had 60. Cities walled and defenced: lying betweene the Mountaine of Hermon (which Mountaine, saith Moses, the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites Shenir) and the Riuer of Iordan. And it befell vnto the King of Basan (who attended Moses comming at Edrei) as it did vnto Sihon: for he and his sonnes perished, and all his Cities were taken and possest. After this, Moses with-drawing himselfe backe againe to the Mountaines of Abarim, left the prosequution of that warre vnto Iair the sonne of Manasse: who conquering the East parts of Basan, to wit, the Kingdome of Argob, euen vnto the Nations of the Gessuri and Machati, 60. walled Cities: called the same after his owne name Hauoth Iair: of all which conquests afterward the halfe Tribe of Manasse possest the North part as farre as Edrei, but the East part that belonged to Sihon the Amorite, with the Mountaines of Gilead adioyning, was giuen to Reuben and vnto Gad.

Of the troubles about the Madianites, and of Moses his death.

AFter these victories, and while Israel sojourned in the valley of Moab, the Madianites and Moabites (ouer both which Nations it seemeth that Balac King of the Moabites then commanded in chiefe) sought, according to the aduice of Balaam, both by alluring the Hebrewes to the loue of their daughters, and by perswading them to honour and serue their Idols, to diuide them both in Loue and Religion among themselues: thereby the better both to defend their owne interest against them, as also to beate them out of Moab, and the Countreys adioyning. The Israelites as they had euer beene inclined, so were they now easily perswaded to these euill courses, and thereby drew on themselues the plague of pestilence, whereof there perished 24000. persons: besides which punishment of God, the most of the offenders among the Hebrewes, were by his commandement put to the Sword, or other violent deaths: after this, when that Phineas the sonne of Eleazar had pierced the bodies of Zimri, a Prince of the Simeonites, together with Cosbi a daughter of one of the chiefe of the Midianites, the plague ceased, and Gods wrath was appeased. For such was the loue and kindnesse of his all-powerfulnesse, respecting the ardent zeale of Phineas in persequuting of Zimri (who being a chiefe among the Hebrewes, became an Idolater) as he sorgane the rest of Israel, and stayed his hand for his sake. Num. 25. v. 9.

In this valley it was that Moses caused the people to be numbred the third time: and there remained of able men fit to beare armes, 601730. of which as his last enterprise, he appointed 12000. to bee chosen out, to inuade the Cities of Midian, who together with the Moabites practised with Balaam to curse Israel: and after that sought to allure them (as before remembred) from the worship of the true God, to the seruice of Beth-Peor: and to the rest of their barbarous Idolatry. Ouer which companies of 12000. Moses gaue the charge to Phineas, the sonne of Eleazar the high Priest: who slew the fiue Princes of the Midianites, which were, or had lately beene, the vassals of Sehon, as appeareth by Iosuah. These fiue Princes of the Midianites slaine by Eleazar, were at this time but the vassals of Sehon the Amorite, to wit, Eui, Rekem, Zur, Hur, and Reba, the Dukes of Sehon saith Iosuah. He slew also all the men, male-children, and women: sauing such as had not yet vsed the company of men, but those they saued, and dispierst them among the children of Israel to serue them. Num. 31. v. 8. Ios. c. 13. v. 21. Cap. 13. 22.

And Moses hauing now liued 120. yeeres, making both his owne weakenesse of body knowne to the people, and his vnability to trauaile: and also that he was forewarned of his end by the Spirit of God: from whom hee receiued a new commandement to ascend the Mountaines of Abarim, and thereon to render vp his life: He hastned to settle the Gouernment in Iosua: whom hee perswaded with most liuely arguments to prosequute the conquest begun, assuring him of Gods fauour and assistance therein. And so hauing spent these his later dayes after the Conquest of Og and Sehon, King of the Amorites, in the repetition and exposition of the Law, (or an iteration of the Law, according to Saint Augustine) vsing both arguments, prayers, and threats vnto the people: which he often repeated vnto them; thereby to confirme them in knowledge, loue, feare, and seruice, of the all-powerfull God: He blessed the twelue Tribes, that of Simeon excepted, with seuerall and most comfortable blessings: praysing the greatnesse and goodnesse Deut. 31. v. 1. nesse of him, vnto whom in his prayers he commended them: He also commanded the Priests to lay vp the Booke of the Law, by the side of the Arke of God: The last that he indited was that Prophetical Song, beginning: Hearken ye Heauens and I will speake, and let the Earth heare the words of my mouth: and being called by God from the labours and sorrowes of this life, vnto that rest which neuer afterward hath disquier, hee was buried in the Land of Moab, ouer against Beth-Peor: but no man knoweth of his Sepulcher to this day; which happened in the yeere of the World 2554.

Obseruations out of the Story of Moses, how God disposeth both the smallest occasions, and the greatest resistances, to the effecting of his purpose.

NOw let vs a little, for instruction, looke backe to the occasions of sundry of the great euents, which haue beene mentioned in this Story of the life of Moses, for (excepting Gods miracles, his promise, and fore-choise of this people) hee wrought in all things else by the media of mens affections, and naturall appetites. And so we shall finde that the feare which Pharaoh had of the increase of the Hebrewes, multiplied by God to exceeding great numbers, was the next naturall cause of the sorrowes and losse, which befell himselfe, and the Egyptian Nation: which numbers when he sought by cruell and vngodly policies to cut off and lessen, as when he commanded all the male-children of the Hebrewes to be slaine, God (whose prouidence cannot be resisted, nor his purposes preuented by all the foolish and saluage craft of mortall men) moued compassion in the heart of Pharao's owne daughter, to preserue that childe, which afterward became the most wise, and of all men the most gentle and milde, the most excellently learned in all Diuine and Humane knowledge, to be the conductor and deliuerer of his oppressed brethren, and the ouerthrow of Pharao, and all the flower of his Nation; euen then, when he sought by the strength of his men of Warre, of his Horse, and Chariots, to tread them vnder, and bury them in the dust. The griefe which Moses conceiued of the iniuries, and of the violence offered to one of the Hebrewes in his owne presence, moued him to take reuenge of the Egyptian that offered it: the ingratitude of one of his owne Nation, by threatning him to discouer the slaughter of the Egyptian, moued him to flie into Midian: the contention betweene the Shepheards of that place, and Iethro's Daughters, made him knowne to their Father: who not onely entertained him, but married him to one of those Sisters: and in that solitary life of keeping of his Father in lawes sheepe, farre from the presse of the World, contenting himselfe (though bred as a Kings Sonne) with the lot of a poore Heardsman, God found him out in that Desert, wherein he first suffered him to liue many yeeres, the better to know the wayes and passages through which he purposed that he should conduct his people, toward the Land promised: and therein appearing vnto him, he made him know his will and diuine pleasure for his returne into Egypt. The like may be said of all things else, which Moses afterward by Gods direction performed in the Story of Israel before remembred. There is not therefore the smallest accident, which may seeme vnto men as falling out by chance, and of no consequence: but that the same is caused by God to effect somewhat else by: yea, and oftentimes to effect things of the greatest worldly importance, either presently, or in many yeeres after, when the occasions are either not considered, or forgotten.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Nations with whom the Iſraelites had dealing after their comming out of Egypt; and of the men of renowne in other Nations, about the times of Moſes and Iosua, with the ſumme of the Hiſtory of Iosua.

§. I.

How the Nations with whom the Iſraelites were to haue warre, were diuers wayes, as it were, prepared to be their enemies.

IN like manner if we look to the quality of the Nations, with whom the Iſraelites, after their comming out of Egypt, had to doe, either in the wilderneſſe, or afterward: we ſhall finde them long before-hand, by the diſpoſing prouidence of God, as it were prepared for enmity: partly in reſpect that they were moſt of them of the iſſue of Canaan, or at leaſt of Ham: and the reſt (as the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, & Iſraelites) were mingled with them by mutuall marriages: whereas the Iſraelites ſtill continued ſtrangers, and ſeparate from them: and ſo partly in this reſpect, and partly by ancient iniuries or enmities, and partly by reaſon of diuerſity in Religion, were theſe Nations, as it were prepared to be enemies to the Iſraelites: and ſo to ſerue for ſuch purpoſes as God had reſerued them for. To make theſe things more manifeſt, wee muſt vnderſtand that this part of Syria, bounded by the mountaines of Libanus, and Zidon on the North, by the ſame mountaines continued as farre as the Springs of Arnon on the East: by the way of Egypt, and the Red Sea, on the South: and by the Mediterran Sea on the Weſt: was inhabited and peopled by two Nations, the one ſpringing from the ſonnes of Cham, the other from Sem: but thoſe of Sem, were but as ſtrangers therein for a long time, and came thither in effect but with * one Family, to wit, that of Abraham, and a few of his kindred. The other for the greateſt part were the Cananites, the ancient Lords and poſſeſſors of thoſe Territories; by proceſſe of time diuided into ſeuerall Families and names: whereof ſome of them were of eminent ſtature and ſtrength, as the Anakims, Zamzummims, or Zuzei, Emims, Horites, and others. Theſe (as men moſt valiant and able commonly doe) did inhabite the vtter borders and mountaines of their Countries: the reſt were the Zidonians, Iebuſites, Amorites, Heuites, Hetites, and others, who tooke name after the ſonnes of Canaan, and after whom the Countrey in generall was ſtill called.

As for the Hebrewes which deſcended of Shem by Abraham, they were of another Familie, and ſtrangers in that Countrey, eſpecially the Iſraelites: and this was ſome cauſe that the Canaanites did not affect them, or indure them: no more than the Philiſtims did, who deſcended alſo of Cham by Mizraim. For though Abraham himſelfe being a ſtranger, was highly eſteemed and honoured among them; eſpecially by the Amorites inhabiting the Weſt part of Iordan: yet now euen they which deſcended from Abraham, or from his kindred, abode and multiplied in thoſe parts, were alienated in affections from the Iſraelites: as holding them ſtrangers and intruders: making more account of their alliance with the Canaanites, and the reſt of the iſſue of Cham, with whom they daily contracted affinity, than of their old petigree from Abraham.

True it is, that theſe Nations deſcended of Abraham, or of his kindred, who had linked themſelues and matched with the Canaanites and others, had ſo farre poſſeſt themſelues of the borders of thoſe Regions, as they began to be equall in ſtrength to the bordering Canaanites, if not ſuperiour. For of Lot came thoſe two great Families of the Moabites, & Ammonites: of Eſau the Idumæans: of Madian the Madianites: of Iſmael the eldeſt ſonne of Abraham, came the Iſmaelites, with whom are ioyned as of the ſame Nation, the Amalekites, whom though the more common opinion thinketh to haue beene a Tribe of Edom, becauſe Eſau had a grand-childe of that name, yet manifeſt reaſon conuinceth uinceth it to haue beene otherwise. For the Israelites were forbidden to prouoke the Edomites, or doe them any wrong, whereas contrariwise Amalek was cursed, and enlesse warre decreed against him: but hereof more elsewhere, Chap. 8. §. 3. Of Ismaels eldest sonne Naboth sprung the Arabians of Petræa, called Nabathei. Now euen as Abraham besought God to blesse Ismael, so it pleased him both to promise and performe it. For of him those twelue Princes came, which inhabited, in effect, all that Tract of Land betweene Hauilah vpon Tigris, and Sur which is the West part of the Desert of Arabia Petræa. Yet howsoeuer the strength of these later named Nations, which descended from Abraham, were great; it is not vnlikely, but that some reason which moued them not to fauour the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan, was in respect of feare: because all Princes and States doe not willingly permit any stranger or powerfull Nation to enter their Territories. Wherefore, though all these Families before named, were not so vnited, in and among themselues, but that they had their iealousies of each other, and contended for dominion: yet fearing a third more strong than themselues, whether they stood apart or vnited, they were taught by the care of their owne preseruation, to ioyne themselues together against Israel: though they did it nothing so maliciously and resoluedly as the Canaanites did. For the Edumæans onely denied the Hebrewes a passage; which the Moabites durst not denie: because their Countrey lay more open; and because themselues had lately beene beaten out of the richest part of their Dominions, by the Amorites: and as for the Ammonites, their Countrey lay altogether out of the way, and the strength of Sehon and Og Kings of the Amorites, was interiacent: and besides that, the border of the Ammonites was strong, by reason of the mountains which diuided it from Basan. Againe, that which moued the Moabites in their owne reason not much to interrupt Israel, in the conquest of Sehon the Amorite, and of Og his confederate, was that the Moabites might hope after such time as the Amorites were beaten by Moses, that themselues might recouer againe their owne inheritance: to wit, the Vallies and Plaines lying betweene the mountaines of Arabia and Iordan: But as soone as Sehon was slaine, and that the King of Moab, Balac, perceiued that Moses allotted that valley to the Tribes of Gad and Ruben, he began to practise with Balaam against Israel, and by the daughters of Midian as aforesaid, to allure them to Idolatry: and thus at the length the Moabites by speciall occasion were more and more stirred vp to enmity against Israel. And as for diuers of the rest that were descended from Abrahams kindred, we may note, how in the beginning, betweene the Authors of their Petigrees, God permitted some enmities to be as it were presages of future quarrels, which in the posterity might be the easier incensed, by the memory of old grudges: and withall by some disdaine from the elder in nature to the younger. For the Ismaelites being descended from the eldest sonne of Abraham, and the Edomites from the eldest sonne of Isaac, Iacob, being but a second sonne, of a second brother; those Princes which were descended of the elder Houses, being naturall men might scorne to giue place, much lesse to subiect themselues to their inferiours, as they tooke it: and for a more aggrauation, the issues of Esau Princes of Edumæa, might keepe in record that their Parent was bought out of his birth-right by Iacobs taking his aduantage, and that he was deceiued of his fathers blessing also by him: and that Iacob after reconciliation came not vnto him as he promised, into Seir or Idumæa.

* It ſeemeth alſo that Hus, the Sonne of Nachor, and Buz his Brother, planted themſelues in the Eaſt ſide of Iordan, about Baſan: where they finde the Land of Huz in which Iob dwelt as one of the iſſue of Hus the Sonne of Nachor, and Elihu, his friend which is called a Buzit. See hereafter cha. 10. §. 7. Exod. 17. 16.

So also in the posterity of Ismael, it might remaine as a seed or pretence of enmity, that their fore-father was by the instigation of Sara, cast out into the Desert, with his mother Hagar; and had therein perished, but that it pleased God by his Angell to relieue them. Ismael also had an Egyptian both to his mother and to his wife: and Amalec was also an Horite by his mother: which Horites were of the ancient Canaanites. The Edumæans also, or Edomites, were by their Maternall line descended of the Canaanites. For Esau tooke two wiues of that Nation: one of them was Adath, the daughter of Elon, the Hittite, and the other Aholibamah, the grand-child of Zibeon the Heuite, Lord of Seir, before the same was conquered by Esau, and called after his name, Edom, or Edumæa.

Gen. 36.

Lastly, it appeareth that all those Families of the Ismaelites, Amalekites, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, &c. were in processe of time corrupted, and drawne from the knowledge and worship of God, and became Idolaters, infected and seduced by the conuersation of those people among whom they dwelt, and by those wiues of the Canaanites which they had married: onely a few of the Kenites and those Madianites, which inhabited on the edge of the Red Sea, whereof Iethro was Priest, or Prince, or both, worshipped the true and euer-liuing God. §. 11.

§. II.

Of the Kings of the Canaanites and Madianites, mentioned in the ancient Warres of the Israelites.

IF the Kings of the Canaanites, descended of Cham, (for Melchizedek may be thought to be of a better Petigree) we finde foure named by Moses: and one and thirty remembred by Iosue; though few of these named, otherwise than by the Cities ouer which they commanded: to which each of them had a small Territory adioyning, and no other Dominion. These Canaanites in a generall consideration are to be vnderstood for all those Nations, descended of Cham by Canaan, as the Hittites, Iebusites, Amorites, Gergesites, Heuites, &c. and so here we vnderstand this name in speaking of the Kings of the Canaanites: and so also we call the Countrey of their habitation, the holy Land, or the Land of promise: for God hath appointed that the seuen principle Families should be rooted out: and that his owne people should inherite their Lands and Cities. But if we consider of the name and Nation in particular, then is their proper habitation bounded by Iordan, on the East, and by the Mediterran Sea on the West: in which narrow Countrey, and in the choysest places thereof, those Canaanites which held their Paternall name chiefly inhabited.

The first King of these Nations, named in the Scriptures, was Hamor or Hemer, of the Heuites, whom Simeon and Leui slew, together with his sonne Sichem, in reuenge of their sisters rauishment. Gen. 34.

Arad was the second King which the Scriptures haue remembred, who had that part of Canaan towards the South, neighbouring Edom and the dead Sea, the same which surprised Israel, as they encamped in the Wilderneſſe in the edge of Edumea. Num. 21. 1.

The third named was Sehon King of Essebon, who before Moses arriuall had beaten the Moabites out of the West part of Arabia Petraea or Nabathea, and thrust them ouer Arnon into the Deserts, the same whom Moses ouerthrew in the plaines of Moab: at which time he tooke Esseban, and all the Cities of the Amorites. Num. 21. 24. Ios. 9. Ioseph. ant. lib. 4. c. 5.

Presently after which victory, Og was also slaine by Israel, who commanded the North part of that Valley betweene the Mountaines Traconi or Galaad and Iordan, who was also a King of the Amorites. Num. 21. 35.

The fift was Adonizedek King of the Iebusites, and of Hierusalem, with whom Iosua nameth foure other Kings.

Hoham, King of Hebron.

Piram, King of Iarmuth.

Iapia, King of Lachis: and Deber, King of Eglon, who were all Amorites ouerthrowne in battell: and hanged by Iosua. After this ouerthrow Iosua nameth Iabin, King of Hazor, and Iobab, King of Madon: whom he also slaughtered, and tooke his Cities: and this Iabin seemed to haue some dominion ouer the rest; for it is said in the Text, For Hazor before time was the head of all those Kingdomes. Iosua 10. Ioseph ant. lib. 5. cap. 1. Iosua 11. v. 10.

After these Adonibezek that notorious Tyrant is named: who confest that he had cut off the thumbes of the hands and feete of seuenty Kings, inforcing them to gather crummes vnder his Table: who, after Iuda and Simeon had vsed the same exequution vpon himselfe, acknowledged it to be a iust reuenge of God: this King was carried to Hierusalem where he died. Iud. 1. Ioseph. lib. 5. cap. 2.

The last King named is Iabin the second, who as it seemeth had rebuilt Hazor, burnt by Iosua. For at such time as he employed Sisara against Israel, whom he oppresst twenty yeeres, after the death of Ehud, He inhabited Hazor. This Iabin, Barac (encouraged by Debora) ouerthrew; and his Captaine Sisara had by Iael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, a naile driuen into his head while he slept in her Tent: Iabin himselfe perishing afterward in that warre. Iud. 4. Iud. 4. Psal. 83.

The Madianites had also their Kings at times, but commonly mixt with the Moabites: and they held a corner of Land in Nabathea: to the South-east of the Dead Sea. They descended from Madian, Abrahams sonne, by Cethura. Raguel surnamed Gethegleus or Iethres, saith Iosephus, called Iethro in Exodus, Kenis in the first of Iudges, the sonne of Dathan, the grand-childe of Iexanus, or Iokshan, the great grand-childe of Abraham by Cethura, Ioseph. l. 5. c. 6. Exod. 3.

cedron. pag. 34. thura, was Priest or Prince of the Madianites by the Red Sea: whose Daughter or Neece, Moses married: and of whom I haue spoken elsewhere more at large. This Iethro who were not the same with Hobab, must be his father: and this Hobab had seauen daughters. He guided Moses in the wilderneſſe: and became one of the Israelites: of him descended the Kenites, so called of his father Raguels surname, of which Kenites was Heber, which had peace with Iabin the second, euen now remembred.

Iud. 1. but in the time as Saul inuaded the Amalekites, he knowing the good affection of the Kenites to Israel, gaue them warning to separate themselues: and yet the Kenites had strong seats, and lurked in the mountaines of the Deserts.

1. Sam. 15. 6. The Kings of the Canaanites, and Madianites, and the Amalekites, as many as I find named, were these:

1. Horam the Hemite of Sichem
2. Arad of the South parts
3. Sehon of Esſebon
4. Og of Basan
5. Adonizedek the Iebuſite, King of Hieruſalem
6. Hoham of Hebron

Ios. 10.

7. Piram of Iarmuth
8. Iapia of Lachis
9. Debir of Eglon
10. Iabin of Hazor

Ios. 12.

11. Iobab of Madon
12. Adanibezek of Bezak, and
13. Iabin the second King of Hazor.

Of the Madianites these:

* These fiue were first all at one time Kings of seuerall portions of the Madianites: slaine by Phinehas and the 12000. which hee led against them: Num. 31. v. 8.

* Evi or Evis.
Rekam or Recem who built Petra the Metropolis of Petraa, so called by the Greekes: and by Esai. cap. 16. verse 1. and Selah, which is as much as Petra: and so also it is called 2 Reg. 14. 7. where it is also called Iokthael.
Zur
Hur and
Reba

* These foure last were likewise at one time, slaine in the pursuite of Gideons victory: Iud. c. 7. v. 25. & cap. 8. v. 12.

* Oreb
Zeb
Zebah
Zalmunna.

After the death of Barac, Iudge of Israel, the foure last named of these Madianite Kings, vexed Israel seuen yeeres: till they being put to flight by Gideon, two of them, to wit, Oreb and Zeb, were taken and slaine by the Ephraimites, at the passage of Iordan, as in the 6. 7. and 8. of Iudges it is written at large. Afterward in the pursuite of the rest, Gideon himselfe laide hands vpon Zebah and Salmana, or Zalmunna, and executed them, being pursuers, in which expedition of Gideon there perished 120000. of the Madianites and their confederates. Of the Idumeans, Moabites, and Ammonites, I will speake hereafter in the description of their Territories.

§. III.

Of the Amalekites, and Ismaelites.

Gen. 17. 20. Iud. c. 7. OF the Kings of the Amalekites and Ismaelites, I finde few that are named, and though of the Ismaelites there were more in number than of the rest (for they were multiplied into a greater Nation, according vnto the promise of God made vnto Abraham) yet the Amalekites, who together with the Midianites were numbred among them, were more renowned in Moses time than the rest of the Ismaelites. So also were they when Saul gouerned Israel. For Saul pursued them from Sur vnto Hauilah, to wit, ouer a great part of Arabia Petraea, and the Desert. The reason to me seemeth to be this: That the twelue Princes which came of Ismael, were content to leaue those barren Deserts of Arabia Petraea, called Sur, Paran, and Sin, to the issue of Abraham by Cethura, that that ioyned with them (for so seeme the Amalekites to haue been, and so were the Madianites:) themselues taking possession of a better soyle in Arabia the Happy, and about the Mountaines of Galaad in Arabia Petræa. For Nabaioth the eldest of those twelue Princes planted that part of Arabia Petræa, which was very fruitfull though adioyning to the Desert, in which Moses wandred, afterward called Nabathea: the same which neighboureth Iudæa on the East side. They also peopled a Prouince in Arabia the Happy, where of the people were in after-times called Napathei (B) changed into (P).

Kedar, the second of Ismaels sonnes, gaue his own name to the East part of Basan, or Batanea, which was afterward possest by Manasse, so much therof as lay within the mountaines Traconi, or Gilead. Which Nation Lampridius calleth Kedarens, & Plinie Cedræans.

Abbeel sate downe in the Desert Arabia, neere the Mountaines which diuide it from the Happy: and gaue name to the Adubens, which Ptolomy calleth Agubens.

Mibsam was the Parent of the Masamancuses, neere the Mountaine Zamath, in the same Arabia the Happy.

The Raabens were of Mibsma: who ioyned to the Orchens, neere the Arabian gulfe, where Ptolomy setteth Zagmais.

Of Duma were the Dumæans, betweene the Adubens and Raabens: where the Citie Dumeth sometimes stood.

Of Massa the Massani, and of Hadar, or Chadar the Athritæ, who bordered the Napatheans in the same Happy Arabia.

Thema begat the Themaneans, among the Arabian Mountaines, where also the Citie of Thema is seated.

Of Ietur the Itureans, or Chamathens: of whom Tohu was King in Dauids time. Plin. l. 6. c. 28

Of Naphri the Nubeian Arabians: inhabiting Syria Zoba: ouer whom Adadezer commanded, while Dauid ruled Israel.

Cadma, the last and twelfth of Ismaels sonnes, was the Ancestor of the Cadmoneans: who were afterward called Asitæ: because they worshipped the Fire with the Babylonians. Iunius.

The Amalekites gaue their Kings the name of Agag, as the Egyptians the name of Pharaoh to theirs, and the ancient Syrians Adad to theirs, and the Arabian Nabatheans Aretas, as Names of Honour.

The Amalekites were the first that fought with Moses, after he past the Red Sea: when of all times they flourished most, and yet were vanquished. Exod. 17. Num. 14.

Afterward they ioyned with the Canaanites, and beate the Israelites neere Cadesbarne. After the gouernment of Othoniel, they ioyned them with the Moabites: after Barac with the Madianites: and inuaded Israel. God commanded that as soone as Israel had rest, they should roote out the name of the Amalekites: which Saul exequuted in part, when he wasted them from the border of Egypt, to the border of Caldea: from Hauilah to Shur. 1. Sam. 30.

In Dauids time they tooke Siklag in Simeon: but Dauid followed them, and surprised them, recouering his prisoners and spoiles. And yet, after Dauid became King, they againe vexed him, but to their owne losse. 2. Sam. 8, 12.

In Ezekias time as many of them as ioyned to Edumea were wasted and displanted by the children of Simeon. 1.

§. IIII.

Of the instauration of Ciuility in Europe about these times, and of Prometheus and Atlas.

HEre liued at this time, and in the same age together with Moses, many men exceeding famous, as well in bodily strength, as in all sorts of learning. And as the World was but euen now enriched with the written Law of the liuing God, so did Art and Ciuility (bred and fostered farre off in the East, and in Egypt) begin at this time to discouer a passage into Europe, and into those parts of Greece, neighbouring Asia and Iudæa. For if Pelasgus besides his bodily strength, was chosen King of Arcadia, because he taught those people to erect them simple Cottages, to defend them from raine and storme: and learned them withall to make a kinde of Meale, and bread of Acornes, who before liued for the most part, by Hearbes and Rootes: wee may thereby iudge how poore, and wretched those times were, and how falsly those Nations haue vaunted of those their antiquities, accompanied not onely with ciuill learning, but with all other kindes of knowledge. And it was in this age of the World, as both Eusebius and Saint Augustine haue obserued, that Prometheus flourished: Quem propterea fingunt de luto formasse homines, quia optimus sapientiæ doctor fuisse perhibetur; Of whom it is reported that he formed men out of clay, because he was an excellent teacher of wisedome: and so Theophrastus expounderh the inuention of fire ascribed to Prometheus, Ad inuenta sapientia pertinere; To haue reference to wise inuentions: and Æschylus affirmeth, That by the stealing of Iupiters fire, was meant, that the knowledge of Prometheus reached to the Starres, and other celestiall bodies. Againe, it is written of him, that he had the art so to vse his fire, as thereby he gaue life to the Images of Wood, Stone, and Clay: meaning that before his birth and being, those people among whom hee liued, had nothing else worthy of men, but externall forme and figure. By that fiction of Prometheus, being bound on the top of the Hill Caucasus, his entrailes the while deuoured by an Eagle, was meant the inward care and restlesse desire he had to inuestigate the Natures, Motions, and Influences of Heauenly bodies; for so it is said: Ideo altissimum ascendisse Caucasum, vt sereno cœlo quàm longissimè astra, signorum obitus & ortus spectaret; That he ascended Caucasus, to the end that he might in a cleere skye discerne afar off the settings and risings of the Starres: though Diodorus Siculus expounds it otherwise, and others diuersly.

Africanus makes Prometheus farre more ancient, and but 94. yeeres after Ogyges. Porphyrius sayes that he liued at once with Inachus, who liued with Isaac.

Aug. l. 18. c. 3. de Ciuit. Dei.

There liued also at once with Moses, that famous Atlas, brother to Prometheus, both being the sonnes of Iapetus, of whom though it bee said, that they were borne before Moses dayes, and therefore are by others esteemed of a more ancient date: yet the aduantage of their long liues gaue them a part of other ages among men, which came into the World long after them. Besides these sonnes of Iapetus, Aesculus findes two other, to wit, Oceanus and Hesperus, who being famous in the West, gaue name to the Euening, and so to the euening Starre. Also besides this Atlas of Lybia, or Mauritania, there were others which bare the same name: but of the Lybian, and the brother of Prometheus, it was that those Mountaines which crosse Africa, to the South of Marocco, Bus, and Hea, with the Sea adioyning, tooke name, which memory Plato in Critias bestowes on Atlas, the sonne of Neptune.

Cicero in the fifth of his Tusculan questions, affirmeth that all things written of Prometheus and Atlas, were but by those names to expresse diuine knowledge. Nec verò Atlas sustinere cælum, nec Prometheus affixus Caucaso, nec stellatus Cepheus cum vxore traderetur, nisi diuina cognitio nomen eorum ad errorem fabulas traduxisset; Neither should Atlas be said to beare vp Heauen, nor Prometheus to bee fastened to Caucasus, nor Cepheus with his wife to be stellified; vnlesse their diuine knowledge had raised vpon their names these erroneous fables.

Orpheus sometime expresst Time by Prometheus; sometime he tooke him for Saturne; as Rhea coniux alme Promethen. But that the story of Prometheus was not altogether a fiction:

a fiction: and that he liued about this time, the moſt approued Hiſtorians and Antiquaries, and among them Euſebius and Saint Auguſtine haue not doubted; For the great iudgement which Atlas had in Aſtronomy, ſaith Saint Auguſtine, were his daughters called by the names of conſtellations, Pleiades and Hyades: Others attribute vnto him the finding out of the Moones courſe, of which Archas the ſonne of Orchomenus challengeth the inuention. Of this Arcas Arcadia in Peloponneſus tooke name; and therefore did the Arcadians vaunt that they were more ancient than the Moone: Et Luna gens prior illa fuit: which is to be vnderſtood, ſaith Natalis Comes, before there had been any obſeruation of the Moones courſe: or of her working in inferiour bodies. And though there be that beſtow the finding out thereof vpon Endymion: others (as Xenagoras) on Typhon: yet Iſacius Tzetzes, a curious ſearcher of antiquities, gaue it Atlas of Libya: who beſides his gifts of minde, was a man of vnequalled and incomparable ſtrength: from whom Thales the Mileſian, as it is ſaid, had the ground of his Philoſophy.

§. V.

Of Deucalion and Phaeton.

AND in this age of the World, and while Moſes yet liued, Deucalion reigned in Theſſalie, Crotopus then ruling the Argiues. This Deucalion was the ſon of Prometheus, ſaith Herodotus, Apollonius, Heſiodus, and Strabo. Heſiodus gaue him Pandora for mother; the reſt Clymene: Homer in the fifteenth of his Odyſſees, makes Deucalion the ſonne of Minos: but hee muſt needs haue meant ſome other Deucalion; for elſe either Vlyſſes was miſtaken, or Homer, who put the tale into his mouth. For Vlyſſes after his returne from Troy, fained himſelfe to be the brother of Idomeneus, who was ſonne to this later Deucalion, the ſonne of Minos: but this Minos liued but one age before Troy was taken: (for Idomeneus ſerued in that warre) and this Deucalion the ſonne of Prometheus, who liued at once with Moſes, was long before. In the firſt Deucalions time happened that great inundation in Theſſalie: by which in effect euery ſoule, in thoſe parts, periſhed, but Deucalion, Pyrrha his wife, and ſome few others. It is affirmed that at the time of this floud in Theſſalie, thoſe people exceeded in all kinde of wickedneſſe and villany: and as the impiety of men is the forcible attractiue of Gods vengeance, ſo did all that Nation for their foule ſinnes periſh by waters: as in the time of Noah, the corruption and cruelty of all man kinde drew on them that generall deſtruction by the floud vniuerſall. Onely Deucalion, and Pyrrha his wife, whom God ſpared, were both of them eſteemed to be louers of Vertue, of Iuſtice and of Religion. Of whom Ouid:

Clem. Alex. ſtrom. lib. 1. Strabo. lib. 9.

Non illa melior quiſquam, nec amantior æqui
Vir fuit: aut illa reuerentior vlla deorum.

No man was better, nor more iuſt than he:
Nor any woman godlier than ſhee.

It is alſo affirmed that Prometheus fore-told his ſonne Deucalion of this ouer-flowing; and aduiſed him to prouide for his ſafty: who hereupon prepared himſelfe a kinde of Veſſell, which Lucian in his Dialogue of Timon calles Cibotium; and others Larnax. And becauſe to theſe circumſtances, they afterward adde the ſending out of the Doue, to diſcouer the waters fall and decreaſe, I ſhould verily thinke that this Story had been but an imitation of Noahs floud deuiſed by the Greekes, did not the times ſo much differ, and Saint Auguſtine with others of the Fathers and reuerent Writers approue this Story of Deucalion. Among other his children Deucalion had theſe two of note, Hellen of whom Greece had firſt the name of Hellas, and Melantho, on whom Neptune is ſaid to haue begot Delphus, which gaue name to Delphos, ſo renowned among the Heathen for the Oracle of Apollo therein founded.

Auguſt. de Ciuit. Dei. l. 18. c. 10. ex Euſebio & Hieronymo.

And that which was no leſſe ſtrange and maruailous than this floud, was that great burning and conflagration which about this time alſo happened vnder Phaeton; not onely in Ethiopia, but in Illria, a Region in Italy, and about Cumæ, and the Mountaines of Veſuuius: of both which the Greekes, after their manner, haue inuented many ſtrange fables.

§. VI.

Of Hermes Trismegistus.

BVt of all other which this age brought forth among the Heathen, Mercurius was the most famous, and renowned; the same which was also called Trismegistus, or Ter Maximus; and of the Greekes, Hermes.

Many there were of this name; and how to distinguish, and set them in their owne times, both S. Augustine & Lactantius finde it difficult. For that Mercury which was esteemed the God of Theeues, the God of Wrestlers, of Merchants, and Sea-men, and the God of Eloquence (though all by one name confounded) was not the same with that Mercury, of whose many workes some fragments are now extant.

Cicero, Clemens Alexandrinus, Arnobius, and certaine of the Greekes reckon fiue Mercuries. Of which, two were famous in Egypt, and there worshipped; one, the sonne of Nilus, whose name the Egyptians feared to vtter, as the Iewes did their Tetragrammaton; the other, that Mercury, which slew Argus in Greece, and flying into Egypt, is said to haue deliuered literature to the Egyptians, and to haue giuen them Lawes. But Diodorus affirmeth, that Orpheus, and others after him, brought learning and letters out of Egypt into Greece: which Plato also confirmeth, saying; That letters were not found out by that Mercury which slew Argus, but by that ancient Mercury, otherwise Theuet; whom Philo Byblius writeth Taautus; the Egyptians Thoyth; the Alexandrians Thot; & the Greekes (as before) Hermes. And to this Taautus, Sanconiatho, who liued about the war of Troy giues the inuention of letters. But S. Augustine making two Mercuries, which were both Egyptians, calles neither of them the son of Nilus, nor acknowledgeth either of them to haue slaine Argus. For he findes this Mercury the slayer of Argus, to be the grand-child of that Atlas, which liued while Moses was yet young. And yet L. Vives vpon S. Augustine seemes to vnderstand them to be the same with those, whom Cicero, Alexandrinus, and the rest haue remembred. But that coniecture of theirs, that any Gracian Mercury brought letters into Egypt, hath no ground. For it is manifest, (if there be any truth in prophane antiquitie) that all the knowledge which the Greekes had, was transported out of Egypt or Phœnicia, & not out of Greece, nor by any Græcian into Egypt. For they all confesse, that Cadmus brought letters first into Bœotia, either out of Egypt, or out of Phœnicia: it being true, that betweene Mercurius, that liued at once with Moses; and Cadmus, there were these descents cast; Crotopus King of the Argiues, with whom Moses liued, and in whose time, about his tenth yeere Moses died; after Crotopus, Sthenelus, who reigned eleuen yeeres; after him Danaus fifty yeeres; after him Linceus: in whose time, and after him in the time of Minos King of Crete, this Cadmus arriued in Bœotia. And therefore it cannot bee true that any Mercurius about Moses his time, flying out of Greece for the slaughter of Argus, brought literature out of Greece into Egypt. Neither did either of those two Mercuries of Egypt, whom Saint Augustine remembreth, the one the grand-father, the other the Nephew or grand-child, come out of Greece. Eupolemus and Artapanus note, that Moses found out Letters and taught the vse of them to the Iewes; of whom the Phœnicians their neighbors receiued them; & the Greeks of the Phœnicians by Cadmus. But this inuention was also ascribed to Moses, for the reason before remembred; that is, because the Iewes & the Phœnicians had them first from him. For euery Nation gaue vnto those men the honour of first Inuentors, from whom they receiued the profit. Ficinus makes that Mercury, vpon part of whose workes hee Commenteth, to haue beene foure descents after Moses; which he hath out of Virgil, who calles Atlas, that liued with Moses, the maternall grand-father of the first famous Mercury, whom others, as Diodorus, call the Counsailer and Instructer of that renowned Isis, wife of Osiris. But Ficinus giueth no reason for his opinion herein. But that the elder Mercury instructed Isis, Diodorus Siculus affirmeth, and that such an inscription was found on a pillar erected on the Tombe of Isis. Lod. Vives vpon the fixe and twentieth Chapter of the eight Booke of Saint Augustine de Ciuitate Dei, conceiueth, that this Mercury, whose workes are extant, was not the first which was entituled Ter maximus, but his Nephew or grand-child, Sanchoniaton, an ancient Phœnician, who liued shortly after Moses, hath other fancies of this Mercury: affirming that he was the Scribe of Saturne, and called by the Phœnicians Taautus; and by the Egyptians Thoot, or Thoyt. It may be, that the many yeeres which he is said said to haue liued, to wit, three hundred yeeres, gaue occasion to some Writers to finde him in one time, and to others in other times. But by those who haue collected the grounds of the Egyptian Philosophie and Diuinitie, he is found more ancient than Moses: because the inuentor of the Egyptian wisedome, wherein it is said, that Moses was excellently learned. Vines in lib. 8 c. 26. Aug. de Ciuit. Dei.

It is true, that although this Mercurie or Hermes doth in his Diuinitie differ in many particulars from the Scriptures, especially in the approuing of Images, which Moses of all things most detested: yet whosoeuer shall reade him with an euen iudgement, will rather resolue, that these workes which are now extant, were by the Greeke and Egyptian Priests corrupted, and those fooleries inserted, than that euer they were by the hand of Hermes written, or by his heart and spirit deuised. For there is no man of vnderstanding, and master of his owne wits, that hath affirmed in one and the same Tract, those things which are directly contrary in doctrine, and in nature: For out of doubt (Moses excepted) there was neuer any man of those elder times that hath attributed more, and in a stile more reuerend and diuine, vnto Almighty God, than he hath done. And therefore if those his two Treatises, now among vs; the one conuerted by Apuleius, the other by that learned Ficinus, had beene found in all things like themselues: I thinke it had not beene perillous to haue thought with Eupolemus, that this Hermes was Moses himselfe; and that the Egyptian Theologie hereafter written, was deuised by the first, and more ancient Mercurie, which others haue thought to haue been Ioseph, the son of Iacob: whom, after the exposition of Pharaohs dreames, they called Saphanetphane, which is as much to say, as absconditorum repertor; A finder out of hidden things. But these are ouer-venturous opinions. For what this man was, it is known to God. Enuy and aged time hath partly defaced, and partly worne out the certaine knowledge of him: of whom, whosoeuer he were, Lactantius writeth in this sort: Hic scripsit libros, & quidem multos, ad cognitionem diuinarum rerum pertinentes, in quibus Maiestatem summi ac singularis Dei asserit, ijsdemque nominibus appellat, quibus nos, Deum & Patrem; Hee hath written many bookes belonging to, or expressing the knowledge of diuine things, in which he affirmeth the Maiesty of the most High and one God, calling him by the same names of God and Father, which wee doe. The same Father also feareth not to number him among the Sybils and Prophets. And so contrary are these his acknowledgements to those Idolatrous fictions of the Egyptians and Grecians, as for my selfe I am perswaded, that whatsoeuer is found in him contrary thereunto, was by corruption inserted. For thus much himselfe confesseth: Deus rerum Dominus, & Pater, fons & vita, potentia & lux, & mens, & spiritus; & omnia in ipso, & sub ipso sunt. Verbum enim ex eius esse prodiens, perfectissimum existens, & generator & opifex, &c. God (saith he) the Lord and Father of all things, the fountaine, and life, and power, and light, and minde, and spirit: and all things are in him and vnder him. For his word out of himselfe proceeding, most perfect, and generatiue, and operatiue, falling vpon fruitfull nature, made it also fruitfull and produting. And hee was therefore (saith Suydas) called Ter maximus, quia de Trinitate loquutus est: in Trinitate vnum esse Deum asserens; Because hee spake of the Trinity, affirming that there is one God in Trinity. Hic ruinam (saith Ficinus) præuidit prisce Religionis, hic ortum noue fidei, hic aduentum Christi, hic futurum iudicium, resurrectionem seculi, beatorum gloriam, supplicia peccatorum; This Mercurie foresaw the ruine of the old or superstitious Religion, and the birth of the new faith, and of the comming of Christ, the future iudgement, the resurrection, the glory of the Blessed, and the torment or affliction of the wicked or damned. Maſius. L. 1. c. 6. fol. 4. In Pref. Merc. Trismeg.

To this I will onely adde his two last speeches reported by Calcidius the Platonist, and by Volteran out of Suydas. Hactenus fili pulsus à patria, vixi peregrinus & exul, nunc incolumis repeto: cumq; post paulum à vobis corporeis vinculis absolutus discessero, videte ne me quasi mortuum lugeatis: Nam ad illam optimam beatamq; Ciuitatem regredior, ad quam vniuersi ciues mortis conditione venturi sunt. Ibi nanq; solus Deus est summus Princeps: qui ciues suos replet suauitate mirifica: ad quam hæc, quam multi vitam existimant, mors est potius dicenda quam vita; Hitherto, O Sonne being driuen from my Country, I haue liued a stranger and banished man; but now I am repaired home-ward againe in safty. And when I shall after a few dayes (or in a short time) by being loosed from these bonds of flesh and bloud depart from you, see that you doe not bewaile me as a man dead, for I doe but returne to that best and blessed Citie, to which all her Citizens (by the condition of death) shall repaire. Therein is the only God, the most high and chiefe Prince, who filleth or feedeth his Citizens with sweetnesse more than maruelous: in regard whereof, this thing, which others call a life, is rather to be accounted a death than a life. The other, and that which seemeth to be his last, is thus conuerted by others, agreeing in sense but not in words with Suydas: O celum magni Dei sapiens opus, te quo vox patris quam ille primam emisit, quando vniuersum constituit mundum, adiuro per vnigenitum eius verbum, & Spiritum cuncta comprehendentem, miseremini mei. I adiure thee O heauen, thou wise worke of the great God, and thee O voyce of the Father, which he first vttered, when he framed the whole world, by his only begotten word, and Spirit, comprehending all things, Haue mercy vpon me.

But Suydas hath his inuocation in those words: Obtestor te celum magni Dei sapiens opus, obtestor te vocem Patris quam loquutus est primùm, cum omnem mundum firmauit, obtestor te per vnigenitum Sermonem omnia continentem, propitius, propitius esto; I beseech thee O heauen, wise worke of the great God, I beseech thee O voyce of the Father, which he spake first when he established all the world, I beseech thee by the only begotten Word containing all things, be fauourable, be fauourable.

§. VII.

Of Iannes and Iambres, and some other that liued about those times.

THere were also in this age both Æsculapius, which after his death became the God of Physicians, being the brother of Mercurius, as Viues thinks in his Commentary vpon Augustine, de Ciuitate Dei. lib. 8. and also those two notorious Sorcerers, Iannes and Iambres; who in that impious art excelled all that euer had beene heard of to this day: and yet Moses himselfe doth not charge them with any familiary with Diuels, or ill Spirits: words indeed that seldome came out of his mouth; how-euer by the Septuagint they are called Sophistæ or Venefici and Incantatores, Sophists Poysoners and Inchanters: by Hierome, sapientes & malefici; Wise men, and euill doers: and so by Vatablus, who also vseth the word Magi. The Greeke it selfe seemes to attribute somewhat of what they did to naturall Magick: calling them, φαρμακους, workers by drugs. The Genevian, Sorcerers and Inchanters: Iunius, Sapientes præstigiatores & Magi. Magicians and Wise men here by him are taken in one sense: and Prestigiators are such as dazell mens eyes, and make them seeme to see what they see not: as false colours, and false shapes. But as some vertues and some vices are so nicely distinguished, and so resembling each other, as they are often confounded, and the one taken for the other: (Religion and superstition hauing one face and countenance) so did the workes and workings of Moses, and of Pharaos Sorceres appeare in outward shew, and to the beholders of common capacities, to be one and the same art and gift of knowledge. For the Diuell changeth himselfe into an Angell of light: and imitateth in all he can the waies and workings of the most High. And yet on the contrary euery worke which surmounteth the wisedome of most men, is not to be condemned, as performed by the helpe or ministery of ill Spirits. For the properties and powers which God hath giuen to naturall things, are such as where he also bestoweth the knowledge to vnderstand their hidden and best vertues, many things by them are brought to passe, which seeme altogether impossible, and aboue nature or art: which two speculations of workes of nature, and of miracle, the Cabalists distinguished by these names; Opus de Bereshith, & opus de mercana: the one they call Sapientiam naturæ; The Wisedome of nature: the other Sapientiam diuinitatis; The wisedome of diuinity: the one Iacob practised in breeding the pied Lambes in Mesopotamia, the other Moses exercised in his miracles wrought in Egypt, hauing receiued from God the knowledge of the one in the highest perfection, to wit, the knowledge of nature: of the other so farre as it pleased God to proportion him, both which he vsed to his glory that gaue them: assuming to himselfe nothing at all, either in the least or most. Also Saint Augustine noteth, that from the time that Moses left Egypt, to the death of Iosua, diuers other famous men liued in the World, who after their deaths for their eminent vertues and inuentions, were numbred among the Gods: as Dionysius, otherwise Liber Pater, who taught the Grecians the vse of the Vine in Attica: at which time also there were instituted Musicall playes to Apollo Delphicus: thereby to regaine his fauour, who brought barrennesse and scarcity vpon that part of Greece, because they resisted not the attempts of Danaus, who spoiled his Temple and set it on fire: so did Erichthonius institute the like games to Minerua: where in the Victor was rewarded with a present of Oyle, in memory of her that first prest it out of the Oliue.

In this age also Xanthus rauished Europa: and begat on her Radamanthus, Sarpedon and Minos, which three are also giuen to Iupiter by other Historians. To these Saint Augustine addeth Hercules; the same to whom the twelue labours are ascribed, native of Tyrinthia a City of Peloponnesus: (or as others say, only nursed and brought vp there) who came into Italy, and destroyed many Monsters there, being neither that Hercules, which Eusebius surnameth Delphin, famous in Phœnicia; nor that Hercules, according to Philostratus, which came to Gades, whom he calleth an Egyptian: Manifestum sit, non Thebanum Herculem, sed Ægyptium ad Gades peruenisse, & ibi finem statuisse terræ (saith Philostratus:) It is manifest that it was the Egyptian Hercules, and not the Theban, which trauailed as farre as the streights of Gades, and there determined the bounds of the earth. In this time also while Moses wandered in the Deserts, Dardanus built Dardania. Lib. de Ciuit. Dei. cap. 12. Philost. l. 2.

But whosoeuer they were, or how worthy soeuer they were that liued in the dayes and age of Moses, there was neuer any man, that was no more than man, by whom it pleased God to worke greater things; whom he fauoured more, to whom (according to the appearing of an infinite God) he so often appeared; neuer any man more familiar and conuersant with Angels; neuer any more learned both in Diuine and Humane knowledge; neuer a greater Prophet in Israel. He was the first that receiued and deliuered the Law of God entire; the first that left to posterity by letters, the truth and power of one infinite God; his creating out of nothing the World vniuersall, and all the creatures therein; that taught the detestation of Idolatry, and the punishment, vengeance, and eradication, which followed.

Syracides calleth Moses the beloued of God and Men, whose remembrance is blessed. Hee made him (saith the same Author) like to the glorious Saints, and magnified him by the feare of his enemies, made him glorious in the sight of Kings, shewed him his glory, caused him to heare his voyce, sanctified him with faithfulnesse and meekenesse, and chose him out of all men. Syrac. 45. 1. 2. 13

Hee is remembred among prophane Authors; as by Clearchus the Peripatetick) by Megasthenes, and Numenius the Pythagorian. The long liues which the Patriarchs enioyed before the floud, remembred by Moses, Eslius, Hieronymus Egiptius, Hecateus, Elanicus, Acusilaus, Ephorus, and Alexander the Historian, confirme. The vniuersall floud which God reuealed vnto Moses, Berosus, Nicolaus Damascenus, and others haue testified. The building of the Tower of Babel, and confusion of tongues, Abydenus, Eslius, and Sybilla haue appoued. Berosus also honoureth Abraham. Hecateus wrote a Booke of him. Damascenus before cited, speaketh of Abrahams passage from Damascus into Canaan, agreeing with the Bookes of Moses. Eupolemon writeth the very same of Abraham, which Moses did. For beginning with the building of Babel, and the ouerthrow thereof by diuine power, he saith that Abraham, borne in the tenth generation, in the City called Camerina, or Vrien, excelled all men in wisedome: and by whom the Astrologie of the Caldeans was inuented. Is iustitia pietateq; sua (saith Eusebius out of the same Author) sic Deo gratus fuit, vt diuino præcepto in Phœnicem venerit, ibiq; habitauerit; For his iustice and piety he was so pleasing vnto God, as by his commandement he came into Phœnicia, and dwelt there. Likewise Diodorus Siculus, in his second Booke and fift Chapter, speaketh reuerently of Moses: There are many other among prophane Authors, which doe confirme the Bookes of Moses, as Eusebius hath gathered in the ninth of his Preparation to the Gospell, Chapter the third and fourth, to whom I referre the Reader. Lastly, I cannot but for some things in it commend this notable testimony of Strabo, who writeth of Moses in these words. Moses enim affirmauit, docebatq; Aegyptios non recte sentire, qui bestiarum & pecorum imagines Deo tribuerunt: itemq; Afros & Græcos, qui Dijs hominum figuram affinxerunt: id verò solum esse Deum, quod nos & terram & mare continet, quod cœlum & mundum, & rerum omnium naturam appellamus: cuius profectò imaginem, nemo sanæ mentis, alicuius earum rerum, quæ penes nos sunt, similem audeat effingere. Proinde (omni simulachrorum efficione repudiata) dignum ei Templum ac Delubrum constituendum, ac sine aliqua figura colendum: Moses affirmed and taught, that the Egyptians thought amisse, which attributed vnto God the Images of beasts and cattell: Also that the Affricans and Greekes greatly erred in giuing vnto their Gods the shapes of men: whereas that onely is God indeed, which containeth both vs, the Earth and Sea, which we call Heauen, the World, and the nature of all things, whose Strabo l. 16.

image, doubtlesse, no wise man will dare to fashion out vnto the likenes of those things, which are amongst vs: That therefore (all deuising of Idols cast aside) a worthy Temple and place of prayer was to be erected vnto him, and he to be worshipped without any figure at all therein.

Now concerning the Egyptian wisedome, for which the Martyr Stephen commended Moses, saying, That Moses was learned in all the wisedome of the Egyptians, and was mighty in his workes and words; the same is comprised (how truly I know not) by Diodorus, Diogenes Laertius, Iamblicus Philo Iudeus, and Eusebius Cæsariensis, and diuided into foure parts, viz. Mathematicall, Naturall, Diuine, and Morall.

Act. 7. v. 22.

In the Mathematicall part, which is distinguish't into Geometrie, Astronomie, Arithmetick, and Musick; the ancient Egyptians exceed all others. For Geometry which is by interpretation measuring of grounds, was vsefull vnto them: because it consisting of infallible principles, directed them certainly in bounding out their proper Lands, and Territories, when their fields and limits, by the inundations of Nilus, were yeerely ouerflowne and confounded, so as no man could know what in right belonged vnto him.

For the second part, to wit, Astronomie, the site of the Country being a lenell and spacious Plaine, free and cleere from the clouds, yeelded them delight with ease, in obseruing and contemplating the risings, fallings, and motions of the Starres.

Arithmeticke also, which is the knowledge of numbers, they studied; because without it, in Geometry and Astronomy, nothing can be demonstrated or concluded. But of Musicke they made no other account, nor desired farthar knowledge, than seemed to them sufficient to serue and magnifie their Gods, their Kings, and good Men.

The Naturall part of this Wisedome, which handleth the principles, causes, elements, and operations of naturall things, differs little from Peripateticall Philosophie; teaching, that Materia prima is the beginning of all things; that of it all mixt bodies & liuing creatures haue their being; that Heauen is round like a Globe; that all Starres haue a certain fouent heate, and temperate influences, whereby all things grow and are produced; that raines proceed and be from mutations in the ayre; that the Planets haue their proper soules, &c.

The Diuine part of this wisedome, which is called Theologie, teacheth and beleeueth that the world had a beginning, and shall perish; that men had their first orignall in Egypt; partly by meanes of the temperateneſſe of that Country, where neither Winter with cold, nor Summer with heate are offensiue; and partly through the fertility, that Nilus giueth in those places; That the soule is immortall, and hath transmigration from body to body; That God is one, the Father and Prince of all Gods; and that from this God, other Gods are, as the Sunne and Moone, whom they worshipped by the names of Osiris and Isis, and erected to them Temples, Statues, and diuers Images, because the true similitudes of the Gods is not known; that many of the Gods haue beene in the estate of mortall men, and after death, for their vertues, and benefits bestowed on mankinde, haue beene Deified; that those beasts, whose Images and formes the Kings did carrie in their Armes, when they obtained victory, were adored for Gods: because vnder those Ensignes they preuailed ouer their enemies. Moreouer the Egyptian Diuines had a peculiar kinde of writing, mysticall and secret, wherein the highest points of their Religion and worship of God, which was to be concealed from the vulgar sort, were obscured.

Clemens distributeth the whole summe of this later Egyptian learning into three seuerall sorts, viz. Epistolar, which is vsed in writing common Epistles; Priestlie, which is peculiar to their Priests; and Sacred, which Sacred contained Scripture of two kindes: the one proper, which it expressed by letters Alphabeticall in obscure and figuratiue words; as for example, where it is written: The Ibis by the Hornet participateth the beauty of the Hawke; which is read thus: The Moone doth by the Sunne borrow part of the light of God: because Light is an Image of Diuine beauty; the other symbolicall, or by signatures, which is threefold, viz. Imitatiue, Tropicall, and Ænygmaticall: Imitatiue, which designeth things by characters, like to the things signified, as by a Circle the Sun; and by the Hornes of the Moone, the Moone it selfe: Tropicall or transferent, which applies the diuers formes and figures of naturall bodies or creatures, to signifie the dignities, fortunes, conditions, vertues, vices, affections, and actions of their Gods, and of men. So with the Egyptian Diuines, the Image of an Hawke signifieth God, the figure of the Hornet signifieth the Sunne, the picture of the Bird Ibis signifieth the Moone:

by

by the forme of a Man, Prudence and Skilfulneſſe: by a Lion, Fortitude: by a Horſe, Libertie: by a Crocodile, Impudency: by a Fiſh, Hatred is to be vnderſtood: Ænigmaticall is a compoſition or mixture of Images or Similitudes: in which ſenſe, the monſtrous Image of a Lions body hauing a Mans head, was grauen on their Temples and Altars, to ſignifie, that to men all diuine things are Ænigmaticall and obſcure. So the Image of the Sun ſet on the head of a Crocodile, (which liueth aſwell in the Waters, as on Land) expreſſeth that the Sun nouriſheth Meteors in the Aire, aſwell from the Waters as from the Earth. So a Scepter, at the top wherof is made an Eye, and an Eare, ſignifieth God, Hearing, Seeing, and gouerning all things. The Scythians are thought to haue been delighted with this kinde of writing. For Pherecides Syrius reporteth, That when Darius ſending letters, threatned Idanthura, King of the Scythians, with ruine & deſtruction of his Kingdome, unleſſe he would acknowledge ſubiection: Idanthura returned to him a Mouſe, a Frog, a Bird, a Dart, and a Plough-ſhare: which Orontopagas, Tribune of the Souldiers, interpreted to ſignifie, that by the mouſe, their dwellings: by the Frog, their waters: by the Bird, their ayre: by the Dart, their weapons: by the Plough, their landes: were ſignified to bee ready to be deliuered to Darius, as their Soueraigne Lord. But Xyphodres made another conſtruction, viz. that the King meant, That except Darius with his men did haſten away, as a Bird through the Ayre, or creep into holes as a mouſe, or runne into the waters which they had paſſed as a Frog, they ſhould not eſcape his armes, but either be ſlaine, or being made Captiues; Till his grounds. The ſame Hiſtory is with little difference reported by Herodotus. Herod. l. 4

The fourth and laſt part, which is Morall and Politique, doth containe eſpecially the Lawes, which (according to Laertius) Mercurius Triſmegiſtus, or Ter Maximus deviſed: who in his Bookes or Dialogues of Pimander & Aſclepius, hath written ſo many things of God, worthy of admiration; aſwell (ſaith Sixtus Senenſis) of the Trinity, and of the comming of Chriſt, as of the laſt and fearefull day of Iudgement: that (as ſaith the ſame Author, the opinion being alſo ancient) he is not onely to be accounted a Philoſopher, but a Prophet of things to come.

Iamblicus in his Bookes of Myſteries of the Egyptians, taking two very ancient Hiſtorians for his Authors, to wit, Seleucus & Menetus, affirmeth that this Mercury was not onely the Inuentor of the Egyptian Philoſophy, but of all other learning, called, the Wiſedome of the Egyptians before remembred: and that he wrote of that ſubiect 365. 5. Books, or Pages. Of which there were numbred, of Fiery Spirits, one hundred Books; of Æreall Spirits as many, and of Spirits Celeſtiall a thouſand; which becauſe they were out of the Egyptians language conuerted by certaine learned Philoſophers into the naturall Greeke, they ſeemed to haue beene firſt written in that Tongue. Clemens Alexandrinus writeth, that among the Bookes of Hermes, to wit, of the Wiſedome of the Egyptians, there were extant in his time 36. of Phyſick ſixe Bookes; of the orders of Prieſts ten; and of Aſtrology foure. *Clem. §. VIII.

A Briefe of the Hiſtory of Ioſua; and of the ſpace betweene him and Othoniel: and of the remainders of the Canaanites; with a note of ſome Contemporaries to Ioſua: and of the breach of Faith.

AFter the death of Moſes, and in the one and fortieth yeere of the Egreſſion, in the firſt moneth called Niſan, or March, Ioſua the ſon of Nun, of the Tribe of Ephraim, being filled with the Spirit of wiſedome, tooke on him the gouernment of Iſrael: God giuing him comfort, and encouraging him to paſſe the Riuer of Iordan, and to poſſeſſe, and diuide among the Iſraelites the Land promiſed.

The beginning of Ioſua's rule, Saint Auguſtine dates with the raigne of Amyntas, the eighteenth King in Aſſyria; with Corax the ſixteenth King in Sicyonia, when Danaus gouerned the Argiues; and Erichthonius, Athens. Lib. 18. de Ciuit Dei. c. 11.

Ioſua imitating in all things his Predeceſſor, ſent ouer Iordan certaine diſcouerers to view the ſeate and ſtrength of Ierico, the next City vnto him on the other ſide of the Riuer, which hee was to paſſe ouer. Which diſcouerers being ſaued, and ſent back by Rahab, a woman of ill fame, becauſe ſhe kept a Tauerne or Victling-houſe, made Ioſua know that the inhabitants of Ierico, and thoſe of the Countrey about it, hearing of the approach Ioſ. 2. 1. Ioſ. 2. 11.

Ios.2.11. of Israel, had lost courage. Whereupon the day after the returne of the Spies, which was Ios.3.1. the sixth day of the one and fortieth yeere after the Egression, Iosua remooued from Sit-tim in the plaines of Moab, and drew down his Army to the bankes of the Riuer Iordan; Ios.3.3. and gaue them commandement to put themselues in order to follow the Arke of God, when the Leuites tooke it vp, and moued towards the Riuer; giuing them withall this forcible encouragement, That they should thereby assure themselues of his fauour and Ios.3.13. presence who is Lord of all the world, when the Riuer of Iordan should be cut off and diuided, and the waters comming from aboue should stand still in a heape, whereby those below towards the Dead Sea wanting supply, they might passe ouer into the land of Canaan with dry feet.

Ios.1.12. Hee also commanded Reuben, Gad, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse, to prepare themselues (according to their Couenant made with Moses) to march in the head of the rest, and as we call it in this age, to leade in the Vanguard, which through all the Deserts of Arabia, from the Mount Sinai to this place, those of the Tribe of Iuda had performed. For these Tribes being already prouided of their habitations, and Countrie and Cities of the Amorites, by the helpe of the rest, conquered for them: It agreed with iustice and equa-litie, that Reuben, Gad, and the halfe of Manasse should also assist their brethren in the obtaining of their parts, as yet in their enemies possession.

On the banks of Iordan they rested themselues from the sixth day to the ninth; and on the tenth day of the first moneth Nisan, or March, they past ouer to the other side, taking with them twelue stones from the drie ground in the middest of the Riuer: which, for a memory of that miracle by God wrought, they set vp at Gilgal, on the East side of the Ios.4.19. Citie of Ierico, where they encamped the first night. At which place Iosua gaue comman-Ios.5.2. dement, that all born in the last fortieth yeere in the Deserts should be circumcised, which ceremonie to that day had beene omitted. Of the neglect whereof S. Augustine giueth Aug.q.3.in Ios. for cause, The peoples contempt of their superiours. Thomas excuseth it in this sort; That Thom. part 3. quæst.70.art.4. ad.3. the Israelites knew not the certaine time of their remouing from one place to another:
Damascen, That it was not needfull by circumcision to distinguish them from other Nations, at such time as they liued by themselues, and a-part from all Nations.

On the fourteenth day of the same Moneth, the children of Israel celebrated the Passe- Ios.5.10. ouer now the third time; first, at their leauing Egypt; secondly, at Mount Sinai; and now at Gilgal. After which being desirous to taste of the fruits of the Countrie, and hauing, as it were, surfeted on Man, they parched of the Corne of the land, being not yet fully ripe, and ate thereof.

And as Moses began to distribute those Regions beyond Iordan, to wit, the Lands of the Amorites, which Og of Basan, and Sehon held, so did Iosua performe the rest; and after a view and partition made of the Territories, hee gaue to each Tribe his portion by lot.
But this partition and distribution was not done at once, but at three seuerall times; first, Ios.14.3. by Moses to Gad, Reuben, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse, of the Lands ouer Iordan; Secondly, by Iosua, to the Tribe of Iuda, Ephraim, and the other halfe Tribe of Manasse, about the fift yeere of his gouernment; proued in the 14. of Iosua, v. 10. and a third di-Ios.18. uision was made to the other seuen Tribes, at Shilo, where Iosua seated the Tabernacle of the Congregation.

The victories of Iosua against the Kings of the Canaanites, are so particularly set down in his own bookes, as I shall not need to lengthen this part by their repitition. In whose Storie I chiefly note these particulars. First, how in the beginning of the warre, those little Kings or Reguli of the Canaanites, had not so much vnderstanding, as to vnite themselues together against the Israelites; but according to the custome of those estates, from whose Gouernours God hath taken away all wisedome and fore-sight, they left those of their owne Nation, which were next the inuaders, to themselues, and to their owne defences; hoping that the fire kindled somewhat farre off, might againe haue been quenched, ere it could spread it selfe so farre as their owne Territories and Cities. But after such time as Ierico and Ai were entred, and the Kings, People, and Cities consumed; fiue of those 31. Kings (all which at length perished in that warre) ioyned themselues together, first attempting the Gibeonites, who had rendred themselues to Iosua. Onely fiue (the rest looking on to the successe) namely, the King of the Iebusites, in Iebus, or Hieru-salem, the Kings of Hebron, Iarmoth, Lachis, & Eglon, addrest themselues for resistance:
whose Armie being by Iosua surprised and broken, themselues despairing to escape by flight,

flight, and hopelesse of mercy by submission, creeping into a Caue vnder ground, were thence by Iosua drawne forth and hanged. In the prosequution of which victory he also tooke Makkedath, and Libnah, and Lachis. To the relieſe whereof Horam King of Gezar hastened, and perished. After which Iosua possest himselfe of Eglon, Hebron, and Debir, destroying the Cities with their Princes. Ios. 10. Ios. 10.

In the end, and when the South Countries were possest, the Cities thereof conquered, and their Kings and People made dust: the rest of the Canaanites, guided by the ouerlate counsailes of necessitie, vnited themselues, to make one grosse strength and body of an Armie: which Iabin, King of Hazor, practised and gathered together, by Iosua discouered, as the same rested neere the Lake of Merom, he vsed such diligence, as he came on them vnawarres, and obtaining absolute victory ouer them, he prosecuted the same to the vtmost effect. And, besides the slaughter of the defendants, he entred their Cities, of which he burnt Hazor only, reseruing the rest for Israel to inhabite and enioy.

Secondly, I note, that Iosua shewed himselfe a skilfull man of Warre, for that in those ancient times he vsed the stratagem of an ambush in taking of Ai; and in that hee broke the Armies of the first fiue Kings of the Amorites, which attempted Gibeon by surprise. For hee marched all night from his campe at Gilgal, and set on them early the next day; when he ouerthrew Iabin and his confederates. After which, making the best profit of his victory, he assaulted the great Citie of Hazor. Ios. 10. v 9.

Thirdly, the miracles which God wrought during this warre, were exceeding admirable; as the stay of the Riuer Iordan at the Springs, so as the Armie of Israel past it with a drie foote; the fall of Iericho by the sound of the Hornes; the showres of Haile-stones, which fell vpon the Amorites in their flight from Gibeon, wherby more of them perished than by the sword of Israel: againe, the arrest of the Sunne in the firmament, whereby the day was so much the more lightened, as the Israelties had time to execute all those which fled after the ouerthrow: a wonder of wonders, and a worke only proper to the all-powerfull God. Ios. 3. v. 13. Cap. 10. v. 11.

Fourthly, out of the passage betweene Iosua and the Gibeonites, the Doctrine of keeping Faith is so plainely and excellently taught, as it taketh away all euasion, it admitteth no intrusion, nor leaueth open any hole or out-let at all to that cunning perfidiousnes, and horrible deceit of this latter age, called Equiuocation. For, notwithstanding that these Gibeonites were a people of the Leuites, expresly and by name, by the commandement of God to be rooted out, and notwithstanding that they were liars, and deceiuers, and counterfeits, and that they did ouer-reach, and as it were, deride Iosua, and the Princes of Israel, by faining to bee sent as Embassadours from a farre Country, in which trauaile their clothes were worne, their bread mouldie, which they auowed to haue been warme for newnesse when they first set it out; their barrels and bottels of wine broken; their shoes patcht; and their sacks rent and ragged: Yet Iosua hauing sworne vnto them by the lord God of Israel, hee durst not, though vrged by the multitude of the people, to laie violent hands on them; but hee spared both their Liues, and the Cities of their inheritance. Ios. 9. from the 5. to the 13. v.

Now if euer man had warrant to breake Faith, and to retract his promise made, Iosua had it. For first, the commandement which he receiued from God to roote out this Nation among the rest, preceded by farre the peace which he had granted them. Secondly, he might iustly haue put these men to the sword, and haue sackt their Cities; if there be any euasion from a promise made, whereof the liuing God is called to witnesse. For it was not to the Gibeonites hee gaue peace, because hee knew them to be a people hated of God. He told them, that if they were of the Heuites, it was not in his power to make a league with them. But it was to a strange people that he gaue faith, & to a Nation which came from farre, who hearing of the wonders which the God of Israel had done in Egypt and ouer Iordan, sought for peace and protection from his people. Thirdly, the accord, which Israel made with these crafty Canaanites, was without warrant. For it is written in the same place, That the Israelites accepted their tale, that is, beleeued what they had said, and counsailed not with the mouth of the Lord. Fourthly, these men who were knowne Idolaters, and serued those Puppets of the Heathen, men of an Apish Religion, as all Worshippers of Images are, could not challenge the witnesse of the true God, in whom they beleeued not. I say therefore, that if euer man might haue serued himselfe by any euasion or distinction, Iosua might iustly haue done it. For hee needed Ios. 9. v. 14.

not in this case the helpe of Æquiuocation or Mentall Reseruation. For what he sware, he sware in good Faith; but he sware nothing, nor made any promise at all to the Gibeonites. And yet, to the end that the faithlesse subtiltie of man should borrow nothing in the future from his example, who knowing well, that the promises hee made in the name of God, were made to the liuing God, and not to the dying Man, hee held them firme, and inuiolable, notwithstanding that they, to whom he had sworne it, were worshippers of the Deuill.

For it is not, as faithlesse men take it, that he which sweareth to a Man, to a Societie, to a State, or to a King, and sweareth by the name of the liuing Lord, and in his presence, That this promise, (if it bee broken) is broken to a man, to a Societie, to a State, or to a Prince; but the promise in the name of God made, is broken to God. It is God, that we therein neglect: we therein professe that we feare him not, and that we set him at naught and defie him. If he that without Reseruation of honour giueth a lie in the presence of the King, or of his Superiour, doth in point of Honour giue the lie to the King himselfe, or to his Superiour; how much more doth he breake Faith with God, that giueth Faith in the presence of God, promiseth in his name, and makes him a witnesse of the Couenant made?

Out of doubt, it is a fearefull thing for a Sonne to breake the Promise, Will, or Deed of the Father; for a State, or Kingdome, to breake those Contracts which haue beene made in former times, and confirmed by publike faith. For though it were 400 yeeres after Iosua, that Saul, euen out of deuotion, slaughtered some of those people descended of the Gibeonites: yet God, who forgat not what the Predecessors and Fore-fathers of Saul and the Israelites had sworne in his name, afflicted the whole Nation with a consuming famine; and could not be appeased, till seuen of Sauls sonnes were deliuered to the Gibeonites grieued, and by them hanged vp.

And certainely, if it be permitted by the helpe of a ridiculous distinction, or by a God-mocking equiuocation, to sweare one thing by the name of the liuing God, and to reserue in silence a contrary intent: the life of man, the estates of men, the faith of Subiects to Kings, of Seruants to their Masters, of Vassals to their Lords, of Wiues to their Husbands, and of Children to their Parents, and of all trialls of right, will not only be made vncertaine, but all the chaines wherby free men are tied in the world, be torne asunder. It is by oath (when Kings and Armies cannot passe) that wee enter into the Cities of our enemies, and into their Armies: it is by oath that warres take end, which weapons cannot end. And what is it or ought it to bee that makes an oath thus powerfull, but this; That he that sweareth by the name of God, doth assure others that his words are true, as the Lord of all the World is true whom he calleth for a witnesse, and in whose presence he that taketh the oath hath promised? I am not ignorant of their poore euasions, which play with the seuerity of Gods commandements in this kinde: But this indeed is the best answer, That hee breakes no faith, that hath none to breake. For whosoeuer hath faith and the feare of God, dares not doe it.

The Christians in the Holy Land when they were at the greatest, and had brought the Caliph of Egypt to pay them tribute, did not onely lose it againe, but were soone after beaten out of the Holy Land it selfe: by reason (saith William of Tyre, a reuerend Bishop which wrote that Storie) that Almerick the fiftieth King after Godfrey brake faith with the Caliph Elhadech, and his Vicegerent. The Soldan Sanar, who being suddenly inuaded by Almerick, drew in the Turke Syracon to their aide: whose Nephew Seladine, after he had made Egypt his owne, beat the Christians out of the Holy Land; neither would the wooden Crosse (the very Crosse, say they, that Christ died on) giue them victorie ouer Seladine, when they brought it into the field as their last refuge: seeing they had forsworne themselues in his name, that was crucified thereon. And if it be a direction from the holy Ghost, That he that speaketh lies shall be destroyed, and that the mouth which vttereth them, slaieth the soule: how much more perillous is it (if any perill be greater than to destroy the soule) to sweare a lie? It was Eugenius the Pope, that perswaded, or rather commanded the King of Hungarie after his great victory ouer Amurath the Turk, & when the said King had compelled him to peace, the most aduantagious that euer was made for the Christians, to breake his Faith, and to prouoke the Turke to renew the warre. And though the said King was farre stronger in the field than euer, yet hee lost the battaile with 30000 Christians, and his owne life. But I will stay my hand: For this first volume will not hold the repetition of Gods iudgements vpon faith-breakers; bee it against Infidels, Turks, or Christians of diuers Religions. Lamentable it is, that the taking of oathes now-a-dayes, is rather made a matter of custome than of conscience.

It is also very remarkeable, That it pleased God to leaue so many Cities of the Canaanites vnconquered by Israel, to scourge and afflict them, by fore-seeing their Idolatrie, and as it is said in the scriptures, To be Thornes in their eyes to prouoke them, and to stitch them to make warre. Iosu. 23. For these Cities hereafter named did not only remaine in the Canaanites possession all the time of Iosua; but soone after his death the Children of Dan were beaten out of the plaine Countries, and enforst to inhabite the Mountaines, and places of hardest accesse. And those of Iuda were not able to be Masters of their owne Vallies; because, as it is written in the Iudges, The Canaanites had Chariots of Iron. And those principall Cities which stood on the Sea-side, adioyning vnto Iuda, were still held by the remainder of the Anakims, or Philistims: as Azzah, Gath, Asdod; out of one of which Cities came Goliath, remembred in Samuel. Iudg. 1. v. 34. Iud. 1. v. 19. Ios. 11. v. 19. Sam. 1. 17. 4.

Neither did the children of Manasse ouer Iordan expell the Geshurites, nor the Maachathites: which inhabited the North parts of Basan, afterward Traconitis.

Nor the Nepthalims possesse themselues of Bethshemish, nor of Bethanah; but they inforst those Canaanites to pay them tribute. Neither did Asher expell the Zidonians, nor those of Acho, or Acon, Athlab, Achzib, Heblah, Aphike, & Rehob, nor inforce them to tribute. Ios. 13. v. 13. Iud. 1. v. 31.

No more could Zabulon enioy Kitron, and Nahalol, but receiued tribute from them. Also the Canaanites dwelt in Gezer among the Ephraims: and among the children of Manasse, on the West of Iordan, the Canaanites held Bethshean, Taacnach, Dor, Ibleam, and Megaddo; yea, Hierusalem it selfe did the Iebusites defend aboue foure hundred yeeres, euen till Dauids time. Ios. 16. v. 10. Iud. 2. v. 27.

Now Iosua liued one hundred and ten yeares, eighteene of which he gouerned Israel, and then changed this life for a better. The time of his rule is not expressed in the Scriptures, which causeth diuers to coniecture diuersly of the continuance. Iosephus giues him fiue and twenty yeeres: Seder Olam Rabbi the Authors of the Hebrew Chronologie eight and twentie; and Musseus sixe and twentie: Maimonius cited by Masius, foureteene: Iohannes Lucidus, seuenteene: Caietanus ten: Eusebius giueth him seuen & twentie: and so doth S. Augustine: Melanthon, two and thirtie: Codoman, fiue and twentie. But whereas there passed 480. yeares from the deliuery of Israel out of Egypt, vnto the building of the Temple, it is necessary that wee allow to Iosua onely eighteene of them, as finding the rest supplied otherwise, which to mee seemes the most likely, and as I thinke, a well approued opinion.

The same necessity of retaining precisely 480. yeeres from the departure out of Egypt vnto the building of the Temple, conuinceth of errour, such as haue inserted yeeres betweene Iosua and Othoniel, of whom Eusebius findes eight yeeres, to which Arius Montanus adhereth; and for which hee giueth his reason in his foure and twentieth and last Chapters vpon Iosua: Bunting reckoneth nine yeeres: Bucholzer and Reusner but one, Codoman twentie, and Nicephorus no lesse than three and thirtie: whereas following the sure direction of these 480. yeeres, there can be no voide yeeres found betweene Iosua, and Othoniel, vnlesse they be taken out of those eighteene ascribed vnto Iosua by the account already specified. The prayses and acts of Iosua are briefly written in the sixe and fortieth Chapter of Ecclesiasticus, where among many other things it is said of him, who was there before him like to him, for he fought the battels of the Lord? Euseb. Prep. Euang.

That he wrote the booke called by his name, it was the opinion of Arius Montanus, because it is said in the last Chapter, v. 26. And Iosua wrote these words in the booke of the Law of God, which seemeth rather to haue beene meant by the couenant which Iosua made with Israel in Sichem, where they all promised to serue & obey the Lord: which promise Iosua caused to be written in the booke of the Law: and of this opinion were Caietan and Abulensis: Theodoret doth likewise conceiue that the booke of Iosua was collected out of an ancient Volume, intituled Liber Iustorum, remembred by Iosua himselfe, and others, that it was the worke of Samuel: Iob whereas Masius groundeth his opinion vpon these words of the 26. verse, And Iosua wrote these words, &c. this place hath nothing in it to proue it: for when the people had answered Iosua, The Lord our God will we serue, and his voice will we obey, it followeth that Iosua made a couenant with the people, and wrote the same in the booke of the Law of God. Iosu. 1. 10. 13. Ios. last v. 24. v. 26.

There liued at once with Iosua, Erictthonius in Attica, who taught that Nation to yoke beasts together, thereby to till the ground with more ease and speed: And about the same time the fiftie Daughters of Danaus (as it is said) slew the fiftie Sonnes of Ægyptus, all but Lynceus, who succeeded Danaus, if the tale be true. There liued also with Iosua, Phœnix, and Cadmus, and neere the end of Iosua's life, Iupiter is said to haue rauished Europa the Daughter of Phœnix, (afterward married to Asterius King of Creta) and begat on her Minos, Radamanthus, and Sarpedon. But S. Augustine reports this rauishment to bee committed by Xanthus, and yet they are more commonly taken for the Sons of Iupiter. But it may be doubted whether Minos was father to Deucalion, & Deucalion to Idomeneus, who was an old man at the warre of Troy, and Sarpedon was in person a young or strong man at the same Troian war. And so doth Nestor reckon vp in the Councell of the Greeks, Theseus and Perithous for men of Antiquitie, and of Ages past: Minos being yet more ancient than any of these. But hereof else-where.

Chap. VII.

Of the Tribes of Israel, that were planted in the borders of Phœnicia, with sundrie Stories depending vpon those places.

§. I.

The Proeme to the description of the whole Land of Canaan, with an Exposition of the name of Syria.

THE story of the Iudges ought to follow that of Iosua, after whom the Common-wealth of the Iewes was gouerned by Kings, of which so many of them as ruled the tenne Tribes, shall be remembred when we come to the description of Samaria: but because the Land of Canaan, and the borders thereof, were the Stages and Theaters, whereon the greatest part of the Story past, with that which followeth, hath beene acted, I thinke it very pertinent (for the better vnderstanding of both) to make a Geographicall description of those Regions: that all things therein performed by the places knowne, may the better be vnderstood, and conceiued. To which purpose (besides the addition of the Neighbour Countries) I haue bestowed on euery Tribe his proper portion: and doe shew what Cities and Places of strength were by the Iewes obtained: and what numbers it pleased God to leaue vnconquered; by whom he might correct and scourge them, when vngratefull for his many graces, they at sundry times forgat or neglected the Lord of all power, and adored those deafe and dead Idols of the Heathen. Diuina bonitas (saith Augustine) ideo maximè irascitur in hoc seculo, ne irascatur in futuro: & misericorditer temporalem adhibet seueritatem, ne æternam iustè inferat vltionem; The Diuine goodnesse is especially therefore angry in this world, that it may not be angry in the world to come, and doth mercifully vse temporall seuerity, that it may not iustly bring vpon vs eternall vengeance.

To the Cities herein described, I haue added a short Story of the beginnings and ends of diuers Kingdomes and common-weales: and to helpe my selfe herein, I haue perused diuers of the best Authors vpon this subiect: among whom because I finde so great disagreement in many particulars, I haue rather in such cases aduentured to follow mine owne reason, than to borrow any one of their old patternes.

And because Canaan, with Palestina of the Philistims, and the Lands of Og and Sehon Kings of Basan, and the Arabian Amorites, were but small Prouinces of Syria: it shall be necessarie, first to diuide and bound the generall, and so to descend to this particular, now called the holy Land.

Syria, now Soria, according to the largest description, and as it was anciently taken; imbraced all those Regions from the Euxine Sea, to the Red Sea: and therefore were the Cappadocians, which look into Pontus, called Leucosyrians or white Syrians. But taking it shorter, ſhorter, and from the coaſt of Cilicia, which is the North border, vnto Idumæa towards the South, Tigris towards the Sunne riſing, and the Mediterran Sea Weſtward: it then containeth beſides Babylonia, Chaldæa, Arabia the Deſert, & Arabia Petræa, that Region alſo which the Greekes call Meſopotamia, the Hebrewes Syria, of the two Riuers, to wit, Tigris and Euphrates, for ſo Aran Nahairaim is expounded: alſo Padan Aram; that is, Iugum Syriæ, becauſe the two Riuers goe along in it as it were in a yoke.

Edeſſa, ſometime Rages, now Rage, was the Metropolis of this Region of Syria. In Syria taken largely, there were many ſmall Prouinces, as Cœleſyria which the Latines call Syria Cana, becauſe it lay in that fruitfull Valley betweene the Mountaines of Lybanus, and Antylibanus, in which the famous Cities of Antioch, Laodicea, Apamea, with many others were ſeated. Then Damaſcena, or Syria Lybanica, taking name of the Citie Damaſcus, and the Mountaines of Lybanus, the Regall ſeate of the Adades, the firſt Kings of Syria. Adioyning to it was the Prouince of Sophene, or Syria Soba, Choba, or Zobal: ouer which Adadezer commanded in Salomons time. Then Phœnicia and the people Syraphœnicies: and laſtly Syria Palæſtina bordering Egypt: of which Ptolomie maketh Iudæa alſo a part: and to that Prouince which Moſes calleth Seir and Edom, Pomponius Mela giueth the name of Syria Iudæa.

§. II.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan, and of the promiſes touching this Land.

BVt that Land which was anciently Canaan, taketh a part of Phœnicia, and ſtretcheth from behinde Lybanus to the great Deſerts betweene Idumæa and Egypt: bounded by the Mid-land Sea on the Weſt, and the Mountaines of Hermon: Galaad and Arnon towards the Eaſt: the ſame Hills which Strabo calleth Traconi or Traconita, and Ptolomie Hippus. The name of Canaan it had from Canaan the ſonne of Cham, & lingua appellata fuit Canaan; The language was alſo called Canaan, ſaith Montanus: and after Hebræa of the Hebrewes: who tooke name from Heber, the ſonne of Sale, according to S. Auguſtine. But Arias Montanus not ſo well allowing of this deriuation, makes it a common name to all thoſe of Noahs Sonnes, which paſt ouer Euphrates towards the Weſt Sea. For the word Heber, ſaith hee, is as much as tranſiens or tranſmittens, of going or paſſing ouer. And becauſe the children of Abraham had for a long time no certaine abiding: therefore as he thinkes, they were by the Egyptians called Hebrei, as it were paſſengers, which is alſo the opinion of C. Sigonius, and of Euſebius long before them both. It had alſo the name of Iudea from Iuda; and then afterwards intituled the holy Land, becauſe therein our Sauiour Chriſt was borne and buried. Now this part of Syria was againe diuided into foure; namely, into Edom, (otherwiſe Sier, or Edumæa) Galilee, Samaria, and Iudæa. Galilee is double, the ſuperior called Gentium, and the inferiour: and that Galilee and Iudea are diſtinguiſhed, it is plaine in the Euangeliſts, though both of them belong to Phœnicia.

Strab. l. 16. Caleb. f. 62. Euſeb. Prep. Euang. l. 7. c. 3. Matth. 4. Luke 2. Iohn 4.

Now beſides theſe Prouinces of Phœnicia, and Paleſtina (both which the Riuer of Iordan boundeth; ſauing that Phœnicia ſtretcheth a little more Eaſterly towards Damaſcus) that part alſo to the Eaſt of Iordan, and within the Mountaines of Hermon Gilead, and Arnon, otherwiſe Traconi, fell to the poſſeſſion of halfe Manaſſe, Gad, and Reuben, and therefore are accounted a part of Canaan alſo: aſwell becauſe anciently poſſeſt by the Amorites, as for that they were conquered and enioyed by the Iſraelites, which Eaſtermoſt parts are againe diuided into Baſan or Batanea, into Gilead, Moab, Midian, Ammon, and the Territories of the Machati, Geſſuri, Argobe, Has. They are knowne to the latter Coſmographers by the name of Arabia in generall: and by the names of Traconitis, Pieria, Batanea, &c. of which I will ſpeake in their proper places.

But where Moſes deſcribeth the Land of Canaan in the tenth of Geneſis, hee maketh no mention of the later Prouinces, which fell to Manaſſe, Gad, and Reuben; for theſe be his words, Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon, and thou commeſt to Gerar vntill Azzah (which is Gaza) and this was the length of the Country North and South: then it followeth in the Text; And as thou goeſt vnto Sodome and Gomorah, and Admah, and Seboym, euen vnto Laſha: by which words Moſes ſetteth downe the breadth, to wit, from the Dead Sea to the Mediterran. But in Deuteronomie it ſeemeth to be far more large: For it is therein written; All the places whereon the ſoale of your feet ſhall tread, ſhall bee yours: Deut. 11. 24.

your coast shall be from the wildernesse, and from Libanon, and from the Riuer Perah, vnto the vttermost Sea. Now for the length of the Countrie North and South, this description agreeth with the former: only Libanon is put for Zidon: and the Wildernesse for Gerar and Azzah, which make no difference: but for the breadth and extent East and West, if Perah be taken for Euphrates: then the Land promised stretcheth it selfe both ouer Arabia Petræa, and the Desert, as farre as the border of Babylon: which the Israelites neuer possest; nor at any time did so much as inuade or attempt. And therfore Vadianus doth conceiue, that by the Riuer Perah, was meant Iordan, and not Euphrates: taking light from this place of Iosua: Behold, I haue diuided vnto you by lot these Nations, that remaine to bee an inheritance according to your Tribes: from Iordan with all the Nations that I haue destroyed, euen vnto the great Sea Westward. Iosua 23. v. 4.

And though it be true that Dauid greatly enlarged the Territorie of the Holy Land: yet as Vadianus well noteth, if Perah in the former place be taken for Euphrates: then was it put per gentes in amicitiam receptas. For Dauid did not at any time enter so farre to the East as Assyria, or Babylonia. Neither doth the not possessing of all these Countries giue aduantage to those that would make any irreligious cauill, as touching the promise of God to the Israelites vnperformed: For when both their Kings, Magistrates, and People, fell from his worship and seruice, it pleased him not onely to inclose them within that Territorie, which was for so many people exceeding narrow; but therein and elsewhere to subiect them vnto those Idolatrous Nations, whose false and foolish gods themselues also serued and obeyed. And sure the promise by which the Hebrewes claimed the inheritance of Canaan, and the lasting inioying thereof, to wit, as long as the heauens were aboue the earth, was tied to those conditions, both in the Verses preceding, and subsequent; which the Israelites neuer performed. And therefore they could not hope for other than all mankinde could or can expect; who knew that all sorts of comforts from the mercifull goodnesse of God looked for, as well in this life as after it, are no longer to be attended, than while we persеuere in his loue, seruice, and obedience. So in the eight Verse of the eleuenth of Deuteronomy, the keeping of Gods Commandements was a condition ioyned to the prosperity of Israel. For therein it is written, Therefore shall ye keepe all the Commandements which I command you this day: that ye may be strong, and goe in, and possesse the Land, whither yee goe to possesse it. Also that you may prolong your dayes in the Land which the Lord sware vnto your Fathers, &c. Vadian. Epitō triū terræ partitiū. cap. Palæstin. Deut. 11. v. 21. Deut. 11.

The like condition was also annexed to the enioying of the Land conquered, and the possession thereof, so long as the heauens were aboue the earth. For if yee keepe diligently, saith he, all these commandements, which I command you to doe, that is, to loue the Lord your God, &c. then will the Lord cast out all these Nations before you, and yee shall possesse great Nations, & mightier than you. And here, though it be manifest, that by reason of the breach of Gods Commandements, and their falling away from the worship of his all-powerfull Maiestie, to the Idolatry of the Heathen, the conditionall promises of God were absolutely void, as depending vpon obedience vnperformed: yet I cannot mislike that exposition of Melanthon: Ostendit promissionem præcipuam non esse de hoc Politico regno; He sheweth that his chiefe promise is not of a ciuill Kingdome. To which agrees that answer which S. Hierome made to a certaine Heretique in his Epistle ad Dardanum, who accused S. Hierome that he quite threw the reputation of the Iewes Storie, & brought the truth thereof in question, by drawing it altogether into an Allegorie, and ad illam duntaxat viuentium terram quæ in cœlis est; (that is) Onely to that Land of the liuing which is in Heauen. Quoniam tota Iudæorum Regio adeo angusta sit ambitu, vt vix longitudinem habeat 160. millium, latitudinem verò 40. & in his etiam regiones, loca, vrbes & oppida sunt plurima, nunquam ab his deis occupata, sed tantùm diuina pollicitatione promissa; Because the whole Countrey of the Iewes is so narrow in compasse, that it scarce hath 160. miles in length & 40. miles in breadth, and in these are Countries, places, Cities, & many Townes, which the Iewes neuer possest, but were onely granted by diuine promise. In like manner the same Father speaketh vpon Esay touching the blessings promised vnto Hierusalem: where hee hath these words: De qua dicimus Hierusalem nequaquam in Palæstina Regione petendam: quæ totius Prouinciæ deterrima est: & saxosis montibus asperatur, & penuriam patitur sitis: ita vt cœlestibus vtatur pluuijs, & raritatem fontium iugi cisternarum extractione suppleat: sed in Dei manibus, ad quam dicitur, festinauerunt structores tui; From whence, saith he, we learne, that Hierusalem is not to be sought in that region of Palæstina, which is the worst of the whole Prouince, & ragged Deut. 11. Esay cap. 49. 14.

with craggie Mountaines, and suffereth the penurie of thirst: so as it preserueth raine water, and supplieth the scarcitie of Wells by building of Cesternes; but this Hierusalem is in Gods hands, to which it is said, Thy builders haue hastened: so farre S. Hierome, where also to preuent mistaking, he thus expoundeth himselfe. Neq; hoc dico in suggillationem terræ Iudææ, vt hæreticus Sycophanta mentitur: aut quo auferam historiæ veritatem: qua fundamentum est intelligentiæ spiritualis, sed vt decutiam supercilium Iudæorum: qui Synagogæ angustias latitudini Ecclesiæ præferunt. Si enim occidentem tantùm sequuntur literam, & non spiritum viuificantem: ostendant terram promissionis lacte & melle manantem; Neither (saith hee) say I this to disgrace the land of Iudæa (as the Hereticall Sycophant doth belie me) or to take away the truth of the Historie, which is the foundation of spirituall vnderstanding, but to beat down the pride of the Iewes, which enlarge the straits of the Synagogue farther than the breadth of the Church: for if they follow onely the killing letter, and not the quickening spirit, let them shew the Land of promise, flowing with milke and honey.

By this it may also be gathered, howsoeuer it be vnlikely (seeing the West-bound in the place, Deut. 11. 24. had his truth in the literall sense, that Euphrates or Perath, which is made the East-bound, should be taken onely in a spirituall sense) yet neuertheless that Hieroms opinion inclineth to this, as if this Perath were not to be vnderstood for Euphrates, and that the promise it selfe was neuer so large: much lesse the plantation and conquest of Israel.

And now for a more particular description of this Holy Land, because Asher, Nephtalim, and Zabulon, held the Northermost part, and were seated in Phœnicia, I will begin with these three, taking Asher for the first: of which Tribe yet before I speake, I must admonish the Reader touching the names of places in this, and the other Tribes to bee mentioned, that he remember that many names by reason of the diuers fancies of Translators, are diuersly expressed, so that to the vnskilfull they may seeme diuers, when they are one and the same: the reason of this diuersitie (as by those learned in the Hebrew I am taught) is, partly because the ancient Editions of the Hebrew want vowels, the old Translators imagined other vowels than now the Hebrew Editions haue; and partly because the Ancient expressed or omitted diuers consonants, otherwise than the latter doe thinke fit.

THE TRIBE OF ASHER.

†. I.
The bounds of the Tribe of Asher.

THe Asherites descended of Asher the Sonne of Iacob by Zelpha, the handmaid of Lea, were increased while they abode in Egypt, to the number of 41500. and odde persons, all men aboue twenty yeeres of age, and able to beare armes, at the time when they were mustered by Moses at Mount Sinai: all which number perishing in the Deserts, there remained of their issues, besides women and children 53400. bodies fit for the warres: which past the Riuer of Arnon, into the Plaines of Moab, and after the Conquest of Canaan, had for their portion that part of Phœnicia, from Zidon and the fields of Libanus, vnto Ptolomais Acon alongst the Seacoast: containing thirtie English miles or thereabout: and from the Mid-land sea to the East border some twelue miles: though Antoninus makes it somewhat larger. Antiqu. This part of Canaan was very fruitfull, abounding in Wine, Oyle, and Wheate, besides the Balsamum, with other pleasant and profitable commodities: according to that Prophecie, Asser pinguis panis: Concerning Asser, his bread shall bee fat: And hee shall giue pleasures for a King. Gen. 49.

†. II.
Of Zidon.

THe first City seated on the North border of the Territory of Asser, was Zidon, which Iosua calleth the great Zidon, both for strength and magnitude. The Greekes and Iustin. l. 18. Q. Curtius make Agenor the founder thereof: and Iustine deriues the name from the abundance of fish found on those shores: whereof it hath beene called Zidona. But that it

Gen. 10. Ioseph. was farre more ancient, Moses, Iosua, and Iosephus witnesse, the same being founded by Zidon the eldest of Canaans Sonnes: and so strong it was in Iosua's time, as neither did himselfe attempt it, neither could the Asserites, or any of their successors master it: but it continued all the time of the Iudges and Kings, euen vnto the comming of Christ, a Citie interchangeably gouerned, by their owne Princes or other Magistrates: though accor-
Esa. 23. Hier. 47. Ezek. 28. & 32. Zac. 9. ding to the warnings and threats of the Prophets, Esay, Hieremie, Ezechiel, and Zacharie, it was often afflicted both by the enemies sword, and by the pestilence.

Zidon is seated on the very wash of the Phœnician Sea, which is a part of the Mediterran or Mid-land Sea. It hath to the North the Citie of Berythus, and the Riuer Leontis: and to the South Sarepta, or Sarphat: which standeth betweene it and Tyre, the distance betweene which two great and famous Cities, to wit, Zidon and Tyre, is 14. thousand paces, Paleſt. Seig. f. 19. Vadian. Phœn. f. 178. Strab. l. 16. saith Seiglerus: but Vadianus makes it two hundred furlongs, and so doth Weissinburie in his description of the holy Land, and both from Strabo: which two hundred furlongs make fiue and twentie miles. This difference of distance as well betweene these two knowne Cities, as all the rest, make it ouer-difficult to deuise any new scale to the Mappe and description of the holy Land.

What Kings it had till Agenors time there is no memorie: The story which Zeno the Philosopher, who was a Zidonian, wrote thereof, being by time consumed and lost. It Strab. l. 16. Zach. 9. v. 2. Herod. l. 5. Plin. l. 5. c. 9. seemeth to bee more ancient than Tyre; which was also built by the Zidonians. For as Strabo noteth, Homer speaking of Zidon, neglecteth the memorie of Tyre, because it was but a member of Zidon, and a City subiect to the Kings thereof: though it be true that in after-times it contended with Zidon for Primacie, and became farre more renowned, opulent, and strong: From Zidon had Salomon and Zorobabel their principall workemen, both in Timber and Stone, for the building of the Temple. For as it flourished in all sorts of learning, so did it in all other Mechanicall Arts or Trades: the Prophet Zacharie calling them the wise Zidonians. The Citie was both by nature & Art exceeding strong, hauing a Castle or Citadell on the North-side, standing vpon an vnaccessible Rocke, and compassed by the Sea, which after the Citizens became Christians, was held and defended by the Knights of the Dutch Order: and another Castle it hath on the South side by the Port of Egypt, which the Templers guarded. It also sent many other Colonies beside that of Tyre, into places remote: as vnto Thebes, and Sephyra, Cities of Bœotia in Greece. Strabo and Plinie giue the Zidonians the inuention of * Glasse, which they vsed to make of those sands which are taken out of the Riuer Belus, falling into the Mediterran Sea, neere Ptolomais or Acon: and from whence the Venetians fetch the matter of those cleere Glasses which they make at Murana: of which S. Hierome and Plinie: Zidon insignis artifex vitri: Zidon vitrarijs officinis Nobilis; Zidon a famous Glasse-maker, or a skilfull worker in Glasse houses.

* It seems that euen in Iosua's time they practised glasse-making, whence Iunius for Misphreboth mayim, which ad verbū is as much as combustiones aquarū, readeth fornaces vitrarias Ios. 11. 8. as it seems, because these fornaces were where there was store of water, either for the mouing of the bellows by the force of the water, or for other necessary vses. But there are others that take them for salt pits, & other againe for hot baths.

They were in Religion Idolaters (as the rest of the Canaanites) worshippers of Baal and Astaroth: which Idols though common to the other of the issue of Canaan (as Pineda gathers out of 1. Sam. 31. 10. and Iudg. 10. 6.) yet especially and peculiarly were accounted the Gods of the Zidonians: as appeares 1. Kings 11. 5. in the story of Salomons Idolatrie: where Astaroth is called the God of the Zidonians: and 1. Reg. 16. 33. in the story of Achab, the chiefe worshipper of Baal, where it is said that hee marrying Iezabel the Daughter of the King of the Zidonians, worshipped their Baal. Diuers Baals & diuers Astaroths in their Idolatries they acknowledged: as it appeares by the plurall names of Baalim and Astaroth, 1. Sam. 12. 10. and elsewhere: for euen the name Astaroth, as I am informed by a skilfull Hebritian, is plurall: the singular being Astoreth: whence Iudg. 2. 13. the Septuagint reade λατρευσαν ταις ἀστάρταις: They worshipped the Astarties. The occasion of this their multiplying of their Baals, & Astoreths, may be diuersly vnderstood: either in respect of the diuersitie of the formes of the Images, or of the worship in diuers places, or of the stories depending vpon them: which (as fables vse to be) were doubtlesse in diuers Cities diuers. Augustine quæst. 19. in Iudg. thinkes Baal and Astarte to be Iupiter and Iuno. For the Carthaginians (which were Tyrians) call Iuno by such a name as Astarte. Tullie, lib. 3. de Nat. Deorum, making diuers Goddesses of the name of Venus, expounds the fourth to bee Astarte: whom hee makes to bee borne of Tyrus and Syria, and to haue beene the Wife of Adonis: as also Macrob. 2. Saturn. cap. 21. saies that Adonis was with great veneration veneration commonly worshipped of the Assyrians: and Hierome vpon Ezek. 8. 44. notes that Thammuz (whom there the Idolatrous women are noted to bewaile) is the name of Adonis among the Syrians. So that it may seeme that in the worship of Astarte or Venus, they did bewaile her Husband Adonis: as also the Græcians did in their songs of Adonis: Mourne for Adonis the faire, dead is Adonis the faire. Howbeit others in that place of Ezekiel not without good probability, expound the mourning for Thammuz, to bee the mourning for Osiris in the sacrifice of Isis: whose losse of her Husband Osiris, was as famous in the Egyptian Idolatrie, as with the Grecians, Venus losse of Adonis. And to this agreeth that which Plutarch hath, de Iside & Osiride; that Osiris with the Egyptians is called Ammuz: which word may seeme to be the same with Ezekiels Thammuz. But howsoeuer these Zidonians were thus anciently fostered with the milke of Idolatry: yet they were more apt to receiue the Doctrine and Gospell of Christ after his Ascension, than the Iewes: who had beene taught by Moses and the Prophets so many yeeres, whereof our Sauiour in Mathew and Luke: Woe be to thee Corazin, &c. for if the great works which were done in thee, had beene done in Tyrus and Zidon, they had repented long agone, &c. but I say vnto you, it shall be easier for Tyrus and Zidon, at the day of Iudgement, than for you. Mat. 11. v. 21.

Seemeth to haue beene a sheep, for Deut. 7. 13. the word in the plurall number signifieth sheepe: & this may confirm Augustins opinion, that Astarte was Iuno: for the forme of her husband Iupiter Hammon was a Ram.

It receiued a Christian Bishop with the first: who was afterward of the Dioceese of Tyre. But in the yeere of our Redemption 636. it fell into the hands of the Saracens: and continued in their possession till Balduinus the first, then King of Hierusalem: in the yeere 1111. by the helpe of the Danes and Norwaies, who came with a Fleet to visite the holy Land, and tooke Port at Ioppa, it was againe recouered, the commandement thereof being giuen to Eustace Gremer, a Noble man of that Countrey. And againe in the yeere 1250. it was reedified and strengthened by Lodowicke the French King: while hee spent foure yeere in the Warre of the holy Land. Lastly, in the yeere 1289. it was reconquered by the Saracens: and is now in possession of the Turke, and hath the name of Zai.

Of Sarepta, with a briefe History of Tyre in the same Coast.

Sarepta, or after the Hebrew, Sarphath, is the next City Southward from Zidon, between it and the Riuer called Naar, or Fons hortorum Libani (of which more hereafter) standing in the way towards Tyre, a City very famous for the excellent wine growing neere it: of which Sidonius:

Vina mihi non sunt Gazetica, Chia, Falerna.
Quæq; Sareptano palmite missa bibas.

I haue no wine of Gaza, nor Falerna wine,
Nor any for the drinking of Sarepta's vine.

This City had also a Bishop, of the Dioceese of Tyre: after it came to the Saracens and Turkes, as the rest: and is now called Saphet, saith Postellus.

Not farre from Sarepta was situate that sometime famous City of Tyre, whose fleetes of shippes commanded, and gaue the law ouer all the Mediterran Sea, and the borders thereof: during which time of greatnesse and power, the Tyrians erected Vtica, Leptis, and Carthage in Affrica, of which Virgil. Vrbs antiqua fuit, Tyrij tenuere Coloni, Carthago. And Carthage was therefore called Punica quasi Phœnicum, a Colonie of the Phœnicians. In Spaine they founded Gades, now Caliz. In Italie, Nola: in Asia the lesse, Dromos Achillis, which Citie the Scholiast of Apollonius placeth neere the Riuer Phyllis, in Bythinia.

It had anciently the name of Zor, or Tzor: and so it is written in Iosua the 19. taking name from the situation; because built on a high Rocke, sharpe at one end. The Latines, as it seems, knew it by the name of Sarra: for Virgil calleth the purple of Tyre, Ostrum Sarranum, by wich name Iuuenal and Silius remember it. The Zidonians built it vpon a high Hill, whereof many ruines remaine to this day; the place being still knowne by the name of the ancient Tyre: and because it was a Colonie of the Zidonians, the Prophet

Cap. 23. Esay calleth it the Daughter of Zidon, which Trogus also confirmeth, though Berosus by affinity of name makes Thiras the sonne of Iaphet to be the Parent thereof: and though no doubt it was very ancient (for so much the Prophet Esay also witnesseth, Is not this your glorious Citie, whose antiquity is of ancient dayes?) yet, that Thiras the sonne of Iaphet set himselfe in the bosome of the Cananites who built Zidon, and peopled all that Region: I see nothing to perswade me.

For strength and for the commodity of the harbour, and the better to receiue Trade from all places, it was in this new erection founded in an Iland, 700. paces from the continent; and therefore Ezekiel placeth it in the middest of the Sea, as some reade, or as others in the inner-most part of the Sea, whence he calleth it situate at the entry of the Sea, as also the same Prophet calleth it the Mart of the people for many Iles: and Esay, a Mart of the Nations: and so Proude, Wealthy, and Magnificent was this City, as the Prophet Esay calleth the Merchants thereof Princes, and their Chapmen the Nobles of the World.

It excelled both in learning, and in manu-facture: especially in the making and dying of Purple, and Scarlet-cloth: which, saith Iulius Pollux, was first found out by Hercules Dogge, who passing along the Sea-coast, and eating of the Fish Conchilis or Purpura: the haire of his lippes became of that colour. It worshipped the same Idols that Zidon did: sauing that Hercules became their Patron in after-times. For Alexander Macedon, when the Tyrians presented him with a Crowne of gold, and other gifts, desiring to remaine his friends and allies, answered them, that he had vowed a sacrifice to Hercules, the Defender of their City, and the Ancester of the Macedonians Kings: and must therefore enter it. Whereupon they sent him word, that Hercules his Temple was in the Mountaine of old Tyre: where he might performe that ceremony. But this auailed not: For Alexander was not so superstitious, as ambitious; he desired to enter the Towne, which being denied, he as one whom no perill could feare, nor labour weary, gathered together as many ships as he could, and brought from Libanus so great a number of Cedars, and so many weighty stones, from the old City of Tyre adioyning, as notwithstanding that his materials were often washt away with the strength of the Sea and the Tydes, yet he neuer rested, till hee had made a foote passage from the Continent to the Iland: and hauing once approached their Walls, he ouer-topt them with Turrets of wood, and other frames: from whence (hauing filled the body of force with the violent mouing spirit of resolution) he became Lord thereof, putting all to the Sword that resisted; after which, he caused 2000. more to be hung vp in a ranke all alongst the Sea-shore: which exequution vpon cold blood hee performed (as some Authours affirme) vpon the issues of those slaues which had formerly slaine all their Masters, taking their Wiues, Children, Riches, and power of Gouernement to themselues. This victory of Alexander ouer the Tyrians, Iosephus remembreth: and how Sanaballat reuolted from Darius, and came to Alexander with 8000. Souldiers: who was the last Satrapa or Prouinciall Gouernour, which Darius seated in Samaria: the same who hauing married his Daughter to Manasse, brother to Iaddas the high Priest of Hierusalem, obtained of Alexander that a Temple might be built on the Mountaine Gariaim ouer Samaria: that the forces of the Iewes being diuided, Alexander might the better hold them in obedience. The honour of which Priesthood hee bestowed on his son in law Manasse, whom the Iewes oppugned, for that he had married out of their Tribes, and with a Gentile: but while Alexander besieged Gaza, Sanaballat, whom Guil. Tyrius calleth Sanabula, died.

Long before this desolation of Tyre by the cruelty of Alexander, it was attempted by Salmanasser the Assyrian King: when the growing pride of the Assyrians, after that they had conquered the ten Tribes, with the rest of Syria, became enuious of the beauty, riches, and power of that City. He besieged it both on the Land-side, and with threescore shippes of Warre held the Port: to the end that neither any victuals nor any supply of men might enter it: but the Tyrians with twelue saile scattered that fleet, and tooke 500. prisoners of the Assyrians: notwithstanding, the Assyrian continued his resolution, and lay before it by his Lieutenants fiue yeeres, but with ill succesſe. And this ſiege Menander Ephesius, cited by Ioſephus, made report of in his Chronicles, as hee found the Story among the Annalls of the Tyrians (which the ſaid Menander conuerted into Greeke) adding, that Elulæus, whom Tyrius calleth Heliſeus, was then King of Tyre, hauing gouerned the ſame ſixe and twenty yeeres. Soone after this repulſe of Salmanaſſar, and about 200. yeeres before the victory of Alexander, Nabuchodonoſor at ſuch time as he deſtroyed Hieruſalem with the Temple, came before this City: who indeed gaue to Alexander the example of that deſpairefull worke, of ioyning it to the Continent. For Nabuchodonoſor had formerly done it: though by the diligence of the Citizens, and the ſtrength of the Sea, the ſame cawſey and paſſage was againe broken downe, and demoliſhed.

Againſt Nabuchodonoſor, for many yeeres, the Tyrians defended themſelues: for ſo long did thoſe Babylonians continue before it, As euery head was made bald, and euery ſhoulder made bare, ſaith Ezekiel, who with the Prophet Eſay had manifeſtly foretold the deſtruction of this proude place. In the end and after thirteene yeeres ſiege or more, the Tyrians deſpoiled of all their hopes, and remembring ouer-late the predictions and threatnings of Gods Prophets, hauing prepared a conuenient number of ſhippes, abandoned their City, tranſporting with themſelues the ableſt of all that remained: and with their wiues, children, and portable riches, ſayled thence into Cyprus, Carthage, and other Maritimate Cities of their Tributaries, or Confederates: ſo as the Babylonians finding nothing therein, either to ſatisfie ſo many labours and perils, or any perſon vpon whom to auenge themſelues for the loſſe of ſo many bodies in that Warre: It pleaſed God in recompence thereof (who ſtrengthened this reſolution, as in a worke of his owne) to make Nebuchodonoſor victorious ouer the Egyptians: and gaue him that Kingdome and the ſpoile thereof, as it were in wages for his Army. Whereupon Saint Hierome noteth, that God leaueth not the good deeds of the Heathen vnrewarded: who though they cannot hope by any laudable worldly action, to attaine vnto that eternall happineſſe reſerued for his Seruants and Saints: yet ſuch is the boundleſſe goodneſſe of God, as he often repayeth them with many worldly gifts and temporall bleſſings.

After theſe two great Vaſtations by the Kings of Babylon and Macedon: this City of Tyre repaired and recouered it ſelfe againe: and continued in great glory about 300. yeers, euen to the comming of our Sauiour Chriſt: and after him flouriſhed in the Chriſtian Faith neere 600. yeeres: the Archbiſhop whereof gaue place to none but to the Patriarke of Hieruſalem onely, who within his owne Dioceſſe and foureteene great Cities, with their Biſhops and ſuffragans: namely Caipha, otherwiſe Porphiria, Acon, or Ptolomais, Sarepta, Zidon, Cæſarea Philippi, Berytus, Byblus, Botrys, Tripolis, Orthoſia, Archis, Aradus, Antaradus (or Tortoſa) and Maraclea. The Citizens finding themſelues reduced into great famine, and many other miſeries, they at once with certaine rafters of timber, fiered, burnt, and brake the Saracens fleete, and ſallyed out reſoluedly vpon his Army, ſlew ſo great numbers of them, and followed their victory with ſuch fury, as that the Saracens forſaking their Trenches and Tents, remoued in great diſorder and diſhonour. Two yeeres after which victory the body of that famous Fredericke Barbaroſſa, who by the lamentable accident of following the Chriſtians enemies ouer a Riuer vnfoordable, periſhed by the weight of his armour therein, was brought and interred in the Cathedrall Church of Tyre, neere vnto that glorious Sepulchre of Origen, garniſhed and grauen with guilt pillars of Marble, 940. yeeres before before therein buried: but in the yeere 1289. the Saracens againe attempted it, and carried it, and it now remaineth subiect to the Turkes.

Of Ptolomais or Acon.

THe third City alongst the coast of the Sea, which the Asserites could not obtaine, on the South bound of Asser was Acho, which was the ancient name thereof after Hierome, though other good Authours affirme that it tooke name from Acon the brother of Ptolomy. Plinie calleth it Ace: and otherwise the Colonie of Claudius. It had also the name of Coth, or Cod, and by Zeiglerus it is called Hactipos.

Plin. lib. 5. c. 19.
In descrip. terr. sanct.

But lastly, it was intituled Ptolomais after the name of one of the Egyptian Ptolomies: which City also as it is, 1 Mac. 11. another of the Ptolomies, infideliously wrested from his sonne in law Alexander, which called himselfe the sonne of Antiochus Epiphanes: the same Alexander hauing married Cleopatra daughter of the said Ptolomie not long before. Therein also was Ionathan Machabeus treacherously surprised and slaine, as it is 1 Mac. 12.48. by the perfidiousnesse of Tryphon, whom soone after Antiochus pursued, as it is in the Story ensuing: and by like reason about the same time was the aforesaid Alexander in the warre against Demetrius, one of the sonnes of Antiochus the great with whom Ptolomie ioyned, ouerthrowne & treacherously murthered by Zabdiel the Arabian: to whom he fled for succour: and his head presented vnto his father in law Ptolomie: who enioyed not the glory of his victory and treason aboue three dayes, for God strucke him by death.

1 Mace. 11.18.

For the beauty and strength of this City, this Alexander made it his regall seate; two parts of the same being inuironed by the Sea, and the port for safety and capacity not inferiour to any other in all that Tract. This Citie is distant from Hierusalem some foure and thirty miles: foure miles to the North from the Mountaine Carmel, and as much to the South from Castrum Lamberti: from Tyre, Antonius maketh it two and thirty Italian miles. In the middest of the City there was a Tower of great strength, sometime the Temple of Bel-zebub: and therefore called the Castle of Flies, on the top whereof there was maintained a perpetuall light, like vnto that called Pharus in Egypt: to giue comfort in the night to those shippes, which came neere and sought that part. It had in it a Bishops seate, of the Diocesse of Tyre, after it became Christian: but in the yeere 636. (a fatall yeere to the Christians in those parts) it was forced and taken by Haomarus the Saracen. In the yeere 1104. it was regained by Baldwine the first, by the helpe of the Gallies of Genoa: to whom a third of the reuenew was giuen in recompence. Againe, in the yeere of our Lord God, one thousand one hundred fourescore and seuen, Saladine King of Egypt, and Syria, became Lord thereof. In the yeere of Christ, one thousand one hundred ninety and one, by Richard King of England, and Philip King of France, it was repossessed and redeliuered to the Christians. Lastly, in the yeere 1291. it was by the fury of the Saracens besieged with an Army of 150000. entred, sackt, and vtterly demolished: though in some sort afterward reedified, and it is now Turkish.

Of the Castle of Saint George.

FIue miles from Ptolomais towards the East, is the Castle of Saint George seated, in which he was borne: the Valley adioyning bearing the same name. And though for the credit of Saint Georges killing the Dragon, I leaue euery man to his owne beliefe: yet I cannot but thinke, that if the Kings of England had not some probable record of that his memorable act, among many others: it was strange that the Order full of Honour, which Edward the third founded, and which his Successours royally haue continued, should haue borne his name, seeing the World had not that scarcity of Saints in those dayes, as that the English were driuen to make such an erection vpon a fable, or person fained. The place is described by Adrichomius in his description of Asser, to haue beene in the fields of Libanus: betweene the Riuer Adonis, and Zidon: his owne words are these:

these: Hoc loco qui ab incolis Cappadocia appellatur, non longè à Beryto, memorant inclytum Christi Militem D. In cuius rei memoriam Ecclesia postmodum fuit edificata; In this place, which by the Inhabitants is called* Cappadocia, not far from Berytus, men say that the famous Knight of Christ, Saint George, did rescue the Kings Daughter from a huge Dragon: and having killed the beast, delivered the Virgin to her Parent. In memory of which deed a Church was after built there: Thus farre Adrichomius. His Authours he citeth Lodouicus Roman, Patric. Nauigationum l. 1. c. 3. and Bridenbach Itin. 5. The Valley vnder this Castle sometime called Asser, was afterward called the Valley of Saint George. If this authority suffice not, we may rather make the Story allegoricall, figuring the victory of Christ, than except of George the Arrian Bishop, mentioned by Am. Marcellinus.

Of Acziba, Sandalium, and others.

BEtweene Ptolomais and Tyre alongst the Sea coast, was the strong City of Acziba, or Achazib, which Saint Hierome calleth Achziph, and Iosephus Ecdippos, Plinie Ecdippa, one of those which defended it selfe against the Asserites. Belforrest findes Acziba and Sandalium, or the Castle of Alexander to be one, but I know not whence he had it.

The twelue searchers of the Land which Moses sent from Cadesbarne, trauailed as far to the North as Roob, or Rechob, in the Tribe of Asser, which Rechob, as also Berothæ which by Ezekiel cap. 47. verse 16. is placed in these North borders, belonged in Dauids time to the King Hadarhezer, as it may be gathered out of the second of Samuel the 8. chap. and 8. verse, and cap. 10. verse 6. and it defended it selfe against the Asserites, as Zidon, Tyre, Achziph, Ptolomais, Alab, Helbah, and Aphek did. Hieron. de Locis Hebr. Ioseph. Bell. Iud. Li. c. 11. Plin. l. 5. c. 19.

This Aphek it was, whose wall falling downe, slew seuen and twenty thousand of Benhadads Souldiers, after that a hundred thousand had beene slaughtered by the Israelites, vnder the conduct of Ahab. Here Iunius findes that the Philistims encamped a little before the battaile at Gilboa, though in his note vpon the first of Samuel, the 9. and 1. he takes Aphek there mentioned (at which battaile the Arke was taken) to haue beene in Iuda. Of which Ios. 15. and 53. and in the second of Kings 13. 17. he reades, Fortiter, for, in Aphek. Where others conuert it, Percutiens Syros in Aphek. 1 Kin. 20. 29. 1 Sam. 29. 1.

The next place alongst the coast is Sandalium, first called Schandalium of Schander, which we call Alexander, for Alexander Macedon built it, when he besieged Tyre: and set it on a point of Land which extendeth it selfe into the Sea, betweene Acziba and Tyre: which Castle Baldwine the first rebuilt and fortified, in the yeere of Christ 1157. when he vndertooke the recouery of Tyre.

Not much aboue a mile from this Castle, there ariseth that most plentifull Spring of water, which Salomon remembreth, called the well of liuing waters: from whence not onely all the fields and plaines about Tyre are made fruitful by large pipes hence drawn: but the same Spring, which hath not aboue a bow-shot of ground to trauaile till it recouer the Sea, driueth sixe great Milles in that short passage, saith Brochard. Cant. 4. Itin. 1.

Within the Land, and to the east of Acziba, and Sandalium, standeth Hosa: and beyond it, vnder the Mountaines of Tyre, the City of Achsaph, or Axab, or after Saint Hierome Aciſap, a City of great strength, whose King amongst the rest was slaine by Iosua, at the waters of Merom. Ios. 11. 20.

†. VII.

Of Thoron, Giscala, and some other places.

FArther into the Land towards Iordan, was seated the Castle of Thoron, which Hugo de Santto Abdemare built on the Easter-most Hils of Tyre, in the yeere 1107. thereby to restraine the excursions of the Saracens, while they held Tyre against the Christians: the place adioyning being very fruitfull, and exceeding pleasant. From this Castle the Lords of Thoron, famous in the Story of the Warres for the recouery of the Holy Land, deriue their names, and take their Nobility. It had in it a curious Chappell, dedicated to the blessed Virgin, in which Hunfrey of Thoron, Constable to Baldwine the 3. King of Hierusalem, lyeth buried: There were fiue Castles besides this within the Territory of Asser:

where-

whereof foure are seated almost of equall distance from each other: to wit, Castrum, Lamperti, Montfort, Indin (or Saron) Castrum Regium, and Belfort. The first neere the Sea vnder the Hills of Saron: the next three, to wit, Indin, Montfort, and Regium, stand more within the Land, and belonged to the Brotherhood and fellowship of the Teutonici, or Dutch Knights, by which they defended themselues, and gaue succour to other Christians at such time as the Saracens possest the best part of the vpper Galilee, the chiefe of which Order was in Ptolomais Acbon. The first fortresse was for beauty and strength called Belfort, seated in the high ground vpon the Riuer Naar, neere the Citie Rama: of which in this Tribe Ios. 19.29. for which the Vulgar reades Horma: making the article a part of the word, and mistaking the vowels: from the siege of this Castle of Belfort, the great Saladine King of Syria and Egypt, was by the Christians Army raised, and with great losse and dishonour repulsed.

Herold. l.2.c.4. (continuationis Bell. ac.

To the East of Belfort, is the strong City of Alab (or Achlab) which Saint Hierome calleth Chalab, one of those that defended themselues against Asser, as Roob (or Rechob) not farre thence did.

Towards the South from Roob they place Gabala (which Herod surnamed the Ascalonite rebuilt) making it of the Territory of Chabol, Quod Syrorum lingua dispicere significat (saith Weisshenburg) so called, because Hiram of Tyre was ill pleased with those twenty Cities, seated hereabout, which Salomon presented vnto him in recompence of those prouisions sent him for the building of the Temple. Others think this Chabol (or Cabul) containing a circuit of those twenty Cities giuen to Hiram, to haue beene without the compasse of the holy Land: though bordering Asher on the North side: as it is said, 1 Reg. 9. 11. That they were in Regione limitis: that is, in limite Regionis, in the border of the Countrey: for it was not lawfull, say they, to giue to strangers any part of the possessions allotted to the Israelites: howsoeuer, that after Hiram had refused them, they were peopled by the Israelites, it appeares, 2 Chron. 8.14. And it seemes they were conquered by Dauid from the Syri Rechabes, whose City Roob, or Rechob, was in these parts.

2 Sam. 10.6.

Almost of equall distance from the Castle of Thoron, they place the Cities of Giscala, and Gadara, of which Gadara is rather to be placed ouer Iordan: Giscala was made famous by Iohn the sonne of Leui, who from a meane estate gathering together foure hundred Theeues, greatly troubled all the vpper Galilee: at such time as the Romans attempted the conquest of Iudæa: by whose practice Iosephus, who then commanded in the vpper Galilee, was greatly indangered: whereof himselfe hath written at large, in his second Booke of those Warres. This Iohn betraying in all hee could the City of Giscala (whereof he was native) to the Roman State: and finding a resistance in the City, gaue opportunity during the contention, to the Tyrians and Gadarins, to surprize it: who at the same time forst it, and burnt it to the ground: but being by Iosephus authority rebuilt, it was afterward rendred to Titus by composition. They finde also the Cities of Cana Maior, and Cades, (or Cadesa) of the first was that Syro-phœnician, whose Daughter Christ deliuered of the vnclean Spirit. Neere the other, they say, it was that Ionathas Machabæus ouerthrew the Army of Demetrius.

Cap. 26.

There are besides those forenamed Cities within the Tribe of Asser, diuers others: as on the south border, and neere the Sea, Mesall or Misheal: within the Land Besara, Beelbadagon, and Bethamec, standing on the south border betweene Asher and Zabulon: on the North side adioyning to Syro-phœnicia, is the City of Hethalon, or Chethlon, the vtmost of the holy Land that way: vnder which towards the Sea is Chali, and then Enoch supposed to be built by Cain, and named of his sonne Enoch, but without probability, as I haue formerly proued. There are others also besides these, as Ammon or Chammon, of which Ios. 19.28. where also we reade of Nehiel, Rama, Alamelec, and Beton: the Cities of Alcath, or Chelcath, Habdon, and Rechob, and Misheal, which wee haue already mentioned, were by the Asserites giuen to the Leuites. Of others held by the Canaanites, mentioned in Iudges 1. to which one of those wee may adde Bethsamus, Anthad, and others, on which no story dependeth: and therefore I will not pester the description with them.

VIII. Of the Riuers and Mountaines of Asser.

THe Riuers to the North of Asser are Adonis, afterward Canis, to which Ziegler ioyneth Lycus; Ptolomy, Leontis: both which fall into the Sea neere Berytus: which Riuer of Leontis, Montanus drawes neere vnto Zidon: finding his head notwithstanding, where Ptolomy doth, betweene Zidon and Tyre. It hath also a Riuer called fons hortorum Libani, which Adrichome out of Brochard intituleth Eleutherus: for which he also citeth Plinie; and the first of Machabees the 11. Chapter, but neither of those authorities proue Eleutherus to be in Asser: for this Riuer falleth into the Sea at the Ile of Aradus: not farre from Bulanea, witnesse Ptolomie: and therefore Pinetus calleth it Valania, and Postellus Velana: which Riuer boundeth Phœnicia on the North-side: to which Strabo also agreeth: but this principall Riuer of Asser, Arias Montanus calleth Gabatus. Christianus Crot out of the mouth and Papers of Peter Laicstan (which Laicstan in this our age both viewed and described the Holy Land) calleth the maine Riuer Fons hortorum Libani, and one of the streames which runneth into it from the North-side, Naar, and another from the South-west Chabul, of the City adioyning of the same name: for Eleutherus it cannot be. There is also another Riuer described by Adrichome, named Iepthael, which I finde in no other Author, and for which he citeth the nineteenth of Iosua, but the word Ghe which is added there to Iepthael, is not taken for a Riuer, but for a Valley: and for a Valley the Vulgar, the Genevan, and Arius Montanus turne it. There is also found in Asser, the Riuer of Belus, remembred by Iosephus and Tacitus, which is also called Pagidas, saith * Plinie: out of the sands of this Riuer are made the best Glasse, which sometime the Zidonians practised: and now the Venetians at Murana. Arias Montanus makes Belus to be a branch of Chedumim, which it cannot be: for Belus is knowne to flow from out the Lake Cendevia, as all Cosmographers, both Ancient and Moderne, and the later Trauailers into those parts, witnesse. It is true that the Riuer of Chison taketh water from Chedumim: but not in that fashion which Montanus hath described it: neither doth it find the Sea at Ptolomais Acon, according to Montanus: but farther to the South betweene Caiphas and Situminum, witnesse Ziegler, Adrichomius, and Sebrot.

Besides these Riuers there are diuers famous Springs and Fountaines, as that of liuing waters adioyning to Tyre: and [a] Maserephot, or after Saint Hierome, Maserephot maim, whose Well filled by the floud of the Sea adioyning, (they say) the Inhabitants by seething the water make salt thereof, as at Nantwich.

The Mounteaines which bound Asser on the North, are those of Anti-libanus, which with Libanus bound Cœlesyria: two great ledges of Hills, which from the Sea of Phœnicia and Syria, extend themselues farre into the Land East-ward: foure hundreth stadia or furlongs, according to Strabo: for that length he giueth to the Valley of Cœlesyria: which those Mountaines inclose: but Plinie giues them 1500. furlongs in length from the West (where they begin at Theipsophon, or Dei facies, neere Tripolis) to the Mountaines of Arabia beyond Damascus: where Anti-libanus turneth towards the South. These ledges where they begin to part Traconitis and Basan, from the Desert Arabia, are called Hermon: which Moses also nameth Sion, the Phœnicians Syrion, and the Amorites Sanir, neither is this any one Mountaine apart; but a continuation of Hills: which running farther southerly, is in the Scriptures called Galaad or Gilead: the same being still a part of Libanus, as the Prophet Hierem proueth: Galaad tu mihi caput Libani: noting that this Galaad is the highest of those Hills of Libanus. Strabo knowes them by the name of Traconitæ: and Ptolomie by Hippus. Arius Montanus calleth these Mountaines bordering Asser, Libanus, for Anti-libanus, contrary to all other Cosmographers, but he giueth no reason of his opinion.

They take the name of Libanus from their white tops, because according to Tacitus, the highest of them are couered with Snow all the Summer: the Hebrew word Libanos (saith Weissenburg) signifieth whitenesse. Others call them by that name of the Frankincence which those Trees yeeld: because לבונה is also the Greeke word for that Gumme.

Niger out of Aphrodiseus affirmeth, that on Libanus there falleth a kinde of hony dew, which is by the Sunne congealed into hard sugar, which the Inhabitants call Sachar; from whence came the Latine word Saccarum.

The rest of the Mountaines of Asser, are those Hills aboue Tyre, and the Hills of Saron, both exceeding fruitfull: but those are but of a low stature, compared with Libanus: for from Nebo, or the Mountaine of Abarim in Reuben, Moses beheld Libanus threescore miles distant.

§. IIII.

THE TRIBE OF NEPHTALIM.

†. I.

Of the bounds of Nephtalim, and of Heliopolis, and Abila.

THe next Portion of the Land of Canaan bordering Asher, was the vpper Galilee: the greatest part whereof fell to the lot of Nephtalim, the sonne of Iacob by Bilha, the hand-maide of Rachel: who while they abode in Egypt, were increased to the number of 53400. persons, able men to beare armes, numbred at Mount Sinai: all which leauing their bodies in the Deserts, there entred the Holy Land of their sonnes 45400. besides Infants, Women, and Children, vnder twenty yeares of age. The Land of Nephtalim tooke beginning on the North part, from the Fountaines of Iordan, and the Hills of Libanus adioyning, as farre South as the Sea of Galilee, bounded on the West by Asher, and on the East and South-east by Iordan.

On the North-side of Libanus, and adioyning to this Territory of Nephtalim, did the Amorites (or Emorites) also inhabite, in which Tract and vnder Libanus, was the City of Heliopolis: which the heighth of the Mountaines adioyning shadowed from the Sunne, the better part of the day. Postellus calls it Balbec; Niger, Marbech, and Leonclauius; Beallebeca.

Of this name of Heliopolis, there are two great Cities in Egypt: the first called On, by the Hebrewes, and the Chaldean Paraphrast, otherwise Bethsemes, or after the Latines, Solis oppidum, or Domus Solis; The City of the Sunne: into which, saith Vlpian, Seuerus the Roman Emperour sent a Colonie: the other Gestelius nameth Dealmarach: and of this name Stephanus also findeth a City in Thrace, and Glycas in Phrygia.

There is also in the same Valley adioyning to Nephtalim, Chalcis, and Abila. Chalcis, of whom the Region towards Palmyrena hath the name of Chalcidica, ouer which Herod Agrippa, and Bernice the Queene commanded.

Abila also gaue name to the Region adioyning, of which Lysanius the sonne of Herod the elder, became Tetrarch or Gouernour: whereof Ptolomie gaue it the addition of Lysanij, and called it Abila Lysanij. Volaterran names it Aphila, of which he notes that one Diogenes, a famous Sophister, was natiue, who by Volaterran is intituled Aphileus, not Abileus. After that this City of Abila or Aphila, had receiued the Christian Faith, Priscillinus became the Bishop thereof: slaine afterward by our Brittish Maximus at Treuer. For distinction of this Citie (if it be not the same, as it may be thought to be the same) it is to be remembred, that in the Tribe of [a] Manasse, ioyning vpon the bounds of the Tribe of Nephtalim, there is another City of the same name, sauing that it is written with an (E) for an (I) and called Abela, remembred in the 20. Chapter of the second of Samuel. The same Iosephus calls Abelmachea, and Hierome Bethmacha. In the place of Samuel for distinction sake, it is written Abel Beth-Mahaca, (for belike it was the Towne of Mahaca, the wife of Macir, the sonne of Manasse, the Father of Gilead) in the Chronicles it is called Abel-Maim: This City Ioab besieged: because Seba the sonne of Bichri, who rebelled against Dauid, fled thereinto for succour: but a certaine wise woman of the Citie perswading the people to cast Seba his head ouer the wall, Ioab retired his Army. The same Citie was afterward taken by the King of Damascus, Benadad: and after a while by Teglatphalasar.

The word Abel may be expounded, either to signifie bewailing, or a plaine ground; and therefore no maruell that many Townes (with some addition for distinction sake) were thus called: for euen of bewailing, many places tooke name; as Bochim, Iudg. 2. 4.

[a] Also a third in Ephraim called Abel Mechola, and a fourth in Reuben, called Abel-Sittim, also Abel-Misraim, at the Foord of Iordan, and (as it seems) in the same Tribe of Reuben, of all which in that which follows: to which also we may adde Abel-Magnum, the name as some thinke of a City, otherwise called Bethshemes, neere the border of the Philistims, or according to others of the great stone in the border. 1 Sam. 6. 18. Ioseph. ant. l. 7. cap. 10. 2 Sam. 20. 1 King. 15. 2 King. 15.

and so doubtlesse * Abel-Misraim, Gen. 50. 11. and yet Iunius in his notes vpon Num. 33. 49. thinkes that Abel-Sittim was so called, rather by reason of the plaine ground there (to wit, in the Land of Moab,) and so perhaps Abel-Meholah in the Tribe of Ephraim: the Towne of Elisha the Prophet: also Abel-Vinearum of the Ammonites, whither Iephte pursued them.

Of Hazor.

IN the Tribe of Nephtalim, was that famous City of Iabin, in Iosua's time called Asor (or after the Chaldæan Paraphrast, Haszor) by Iosephus, Asora; by Iunius * Chatzor: which Laicstan names Hesron; the Regall City, and Metropolis of Canaan: seated in the West part of Nephtalim, towards Asher. In this City was that great Rendeuous, and assembly of those foure and twenty Kings against Iosua: who being all ouerthrown, slain, and scattered, this their powerfull City was by Iosua taken and burnt to dust. But in processe of time the same being rebuilt by the Canaanites, a second King Iabin, 137. yeares after the death of this first Iabin, inuaded the Israelites: and being ordained of God to punish their Idolatry, he preuailed against them, and held them in a miserable seruitude twenty yeares: till Debora the Propheteesse ouerthrew Sisera, Iabins Leiutenant, and his Army, neere the Mountaine Tabor. This City Salomon restored at such time as hee also reedified Gezar, burnt by Pharao of Egypt, with [a] Megiddo, Bethoron, and other Cities; but about 260. yeares after, it fell into the hands of Teglatphalasar, King of the Assyrians. It is now, saith Adrichomius, called Antiopia: it was one of the principall Cities of Decapolis. There is another Citie of this name in the Territory of Beniamin, seated on the confines of Ascalon, called the new Hazor, [b] saith Hierome.

* Of two other Cities of this name in Iuda, see chap. 9. §. 1. Of a fourth in Beniamin, see that which follows in this place: of a fift in this Tribe of Nephtalim, called Hen-Chatsor we reade, Ios. 19. 27. to which we may adde Chatsor-Hezan, in the vttermost North East of Manasse, ouer Iordan. Of Cæsarea Philippi.

THere was also on the border, and within the Territory of Nephtalim, that renowned City of Lais, or Lajisch, as Iunius writes it, or Leschem; which City the children of Dan (being straitned in their Territory vnder Iuda) inuaded and mastered; and gaue it the name of their owne parent Dan: and by that name it is written in Genesis the foureteenth; at which place Abraham surprized Chedorlaomer and his confederates, and followed his victory as farre as Sobah, formerly remembred in the diuision of Syria, otherwise called Sophena. And after the possession of the Danites, it had the ioynt name of Leschem-Dan. Weissenburg writes it Lacis, the Genena Laisa, Iosephus, Dana; Beniamin, Balina; Breidenbach, Belena: but the now Inhabitants know it by the name of Belina to this day: witnesse Neubrigensis, Tyrius, Volaterranus, Brochard the Monke, and Postellus: who also taketh this City to be the same, which in Mathew the 15. verse 39. in the Vulgar is called Magedan, for which the Greeke Text hath Magdala in that place, and in Saint Marke speaking of the same story, Dalmanutha. At such time as the children of Dan obtained this place, it seemeth that it was either a free City, of the alliance & confederacy of the Zidonians, or else subiect vnto the Kings thereof; for it is written in the eighteenth of Iudges, And there was none to helpe, because Lais was farre from Zidon: and they had no businesse with other men, for it was aboue thirty English miles from the Mediterran Sea, and from Zidon.

Iudg. 18. 27. Ios. 19. 47. Iudg. 18. Chap. 8. 10. Verse 28.

In after-times when these Regions became subiect to the state of Rome, it had the name of Paneas, from a Fountaine adioyning so called: and therefore Ptolomie calls it Cæsarea Paniæ. Hegesippus calls it Parnium, saith Weissenburg: but hee had read it in a corrupt copy: for in Hegesippus set out by Badius, it is written Paneum without an (R): and at such time as Philip the sonne of the elder Herod, brother to Herod Tetrarch of Galilee, became Gouernour of Traconitis, sometime Basan; this City was by him amplified and fortified; and both to giue memory to his owne name, and to flatter Tiberius Cæsar, he called it * Cæsarea Philippi: and so it became the Metropolis, and head City of Traconitis: and one of the first Cities of Decapolis. And being by Agrippa in the succeeding age greatly adorned: by him in honour of Nero, it was called Neronia, or Neroniada. But as nothing nothing remained with that Emperour, but the memory of his impiety: so in Saint Hieromes time the Citizens remembred their former Paneas, and so recalled it, with the Territory adioyning by the ancient name. Of this City was that woman whom Christ healed of a bloudy issue, by touching the hemme of his Garment with a constant Faith: who afterward, as shee was a woman of great wealth and ability, being mindfull of Gods goodnesse, and no lesse gratefull for the same, as Eusebius and Nicephorus report, caused two Statues to be cast in pure Copper: the one representing Christ, as neere as it could be moulded: the other made like her selfe, kneeling at his feet, and holding vp her hands towards him. These shee mounted vpon two great Bases or Pedestals of the same Mettall, which shee placed by a Fountaine neere her owne house: both which (saith Eusebius) remained in their first perfection, euen to his owne time: which himselfe had seene, who liued in the Raigne of Constantine the Great. But in the yeare after Christ 363. that Monster Iulian Apostata, caused that worthy Monument to be cast downe, and defaced: setting vp the like of his owne in the same place: which Image of his was with fire from Heauen broken into fitters: the head, body, and other parts, sundered and scattered, to the great admiration of the people at that time liuing. The truth of this accident is also confirmed by Sozomenus Salaminius, in his fift booke and twentieth Chapter.

a Iosephus in the booke of the Iewish war. 18. saith, that Philip the Tetrarch cast chaffe into a Fountaine called Phiala, distant 120. stadia North-east from Cæsaria, which chaffe being carried vnder ground was cast vp againe at Panii or Dan, whereby it is coniectured that the first Spring of Iordan is from this Fountaine called Phiala, from whence Ior and Dan receiue their waters.

This City built by the Danites, was neere the ioyning together of those two Riuers, which arising from the springs of Ior and Dan, the two [a] apparant Fountaines of Iordan: in a soyle exceeding fruitfull, and pleasant; for, as it is written, Iudges 18. it is a place which doth want nothing that is in the world. In the fields belonging to this Citie it was that Saint Peter acknowledged Christ to be the Sonne of God: whereupon it was answered, Tues Petrus, & super hanc Petram, &c. After this City receiued the Christian faith, it was honoured with a Bishops seate: and it ranne the same fortune with the rest, for it was after taken and retaken by the Saracens, and Christians: vnder Fulcb the fourth King of Hierusalem, and after the death of Godfrey of Bullion, the King of Damascus wrested it from the Christians; and shortly after by them againe it was recouered. Lastly, now it remaineth with all that part of the World subiected to the Turke.

†. IIII.

Of Capernaum, and the Cities of Decapolis.

AMong the remarkable Cities within this Tribe, Capharnaum is not the least: so often remembred by the Euangelists. This City had the honour of Christs presence three yeares: who for that time was a Citizen thereof, in which he first preached and taught the doctrine of our saluation: according to that notable Prophecy of Esay 9. The people that walked in darknesse, haue seene a great light: they that dwelt in the Land of the shadow of death, vpon them hath the light shined.

Capharnaum was seated on Iordan, euen where it entreth into the Sea of Galilee: in an excellent and rich soyle: of whose destruction Christ himselfe prophecied in these words. And thou Capharnaum which art lifted vp vnto heauen, shalt be brought downe to Hell, &c. which shewed the pride and greatnesse of that City: for it was one of the principall Cities of Decapolis, and the Metropolis of Galilee. And although there were some markes of this Cities magnificence in Saint Hieromes time, as himselfe confesseth; it being then a reasonable Burge or Towne: yet those that haue since, and long since seene it, as Brochard, Breidenbech, and Salinias affirme, that it then consisted but of six poore Fisher-mens houses.

Math. 4. Marke 7. Luke 8. Niger comment. Asiæ 4. f. 503.

The Region of ten principall Cities called Decapolitana or Decapolis, is in this description often mentioned, and in Saint Mathew, Marke and Luke also remembred; but I finde no agreement among the Cosmographers, what proper limits it had: and so Plinie himselfe confesseth; for Marius Niger, speaking from others, bounds it on the North by the mountaine Casius in Cassiotis: and endeth it to the South at Egypt and Arabia; by which description it imbraceth Phœnicia, a part of Cœlesyria, all Palæstina, and Iudæa.

Plinie also makes it large, and for the ten Cities of which it taketh name, hee numbreth foure of them to be situated towards Arabia: to wit, first these three, Damascus, Opotos, Raphana, then Philadelphia (which was first called Amana, saith Stephanus, or as I ghesse Amana rather, because it was the chiefe City of the Ammonites, knowne by the name of Rabbah, before Ptolo. Philadelphus gaue it this later and new name.) Then Scythopolis, sometime sometime Nisa, built (as is said) by Bacchus, in memory of his Nurse, who died therein, anciently knowne by the name of Bethsan; for the first he setteth Gadara (not that Gadara in Cœlesyria, which was also called Antioch and Seleucia:) but it is Gadara in Basan, which Plinie in this place meaneth, seated on an high hill, neere the Riuer of Hieromaix. This Riuer Ortelius takes to be the Riuer Iaboc: which boundeth Gad and Manasseh ouer Iordan: but he mistaketh it; for Hieromaix falleth into the Sea of Galilee, betweene Hippos and Gerasa, whereas Iaboc entreth the same Sea betweene Ephron and Phanuel. For the seuenth he nameth * Hippos, or Hippion, a City so called of a Colonie of Horsemen there garrisond by Herod, on the East-side of the Galilean Sea, described hereafter in the Tribe of Manasse ouer Iordan. For the eighth Pella, which is also called Butis, and Berenice, seated in the South border of the Region ouer Iordan, called Perea. For the ninth Gelasa, which Iosephus takes to be Gerasa: and Gerasa is found in Cœlesyrea by Iosephus, Hegesippus, and Stephanus: but by Ptolomie (whom I rather follow) in Phœnicia. The tenth and last, Plinie nameth Canatha, and so doth Suetonius and Stephanus, which Volaterran calls Gamala, but Hegesippus rightly Camala, a City in the Region of Basan ouer Iordan, so called, because those two Hills on which it is seated, haue the shape of a Camell. But the collection of these ten Cities, whereof this Region tooke name, is better gathered out of Brochard, Breidenbach, and Saligniac, which makes them to be these; Cæsarea Philippi, and Asor, before remembred, Cedes Nephtalim, Sephet, Corazin, Capharnaum, Bethsaida, Iotapata, Tiberias, and Scythopolis, or Bethsan. For all other Authours disagree herein, and giue no reason for their opinion. One place of the Euangelist Saint Mathew makes it manifest, that this Region called Decapolitana, was all that Tract betweene Zidon, and the Sea of Galilee. For thus it is written: And he departed againe from the coasts of Tyrus and Zidon, and came vnto the Sea of Galilee, through the middest of the coasts of Decapolis: so that it was bounded by Damascus and Libanus on the North: by the Phœnician Sea, betweene Zidon and Ptolomais on the West: by the Hills of Gelbo and Bethsan on the South: and by the Mountaines Tracones, otherwise Hermon, Sanir, and Galaad, on the East: which is from East to West the whole breadth of the Holy Land: and from the North to the South, neere the same distance, which may be each way forty English miles.

* Plinie hath Hippon Diem, for which Volaterran reades Hippidam, Ortelius takes them for two Cities.

†. V.
Of Hamath.

BVt to looke backe againe towards Libanus, there is seated neere the foot thereof the City of * Hammath or Chammath, of which (as they say) the Countrey adioyning taketh name: the same which Iosephus calleth Amathitis, and Amathensis: [a] Iacobus Zeigler, Iturea. Iturea Regio tenet borealia tribus Nephthali, per montem Libanum vsq; Trachones. The Countrey of Iturea, saith hee, containeth the North parts of the Tribe of Nephtali, along the Mount Libanus to Trachones. But herein following Strabo, who calls Trachonitis Iturea, hee mistakes the seate of this Region: and so doth Mercator. For indeed were Iturea (which Hegesippus calls Perea, and G. Tyrius, Baccar) the same with Traconitis, yet Traconitis it selfe is farre more to the East than Hammath in Nephtalim: for Traconitis lyeth betweene Cæsaria Philippi, and the Mountaines Trachones: which the Hebrewes call Gilead: and this Hammath or Chammath is seated vnder Cæsarea, towards the Sea West-ward. And it seemeth that this mistaking grew by confounding Emath or Hamath the great in Cœlesyria, beyond the Mountaines Trachones, which [b] Hierome vpon Amos calls Antiochia, with Hammath or Hamath the lesser in Phœnicia, and Nephtalim, which hee calleth Epiphania: for this Hammath, or in our Translation Hamath, (and not that which is commonly called Emath, which 2 Chron. 8. 3. is set farre from the North border of Canaan in Syria Soba) is remembred in Numbers 34. verse 8. and Numbers 13. ver. 22. and in Ezekiel 47. 16. In the first of which places it bordereth the Land of promise, these being the words: From Mount Hor you shall point (that is, direct or draw a line) vntill it come to Hamath: In b So Hierom in his Comment on Amos, c. 6. v. 2. where there is mention of Hamath the great, as it seemes for distinction from the other in Nephthalim, though Matt. Beroaldus reiecting Hieroms, rather follow the opinion of Zeigler aboue mentioned, as indeed it cannot easily bee iustified, that either one or other of these is either Antiochia or Epiphania, howbeit that the same City which Iosua 19. 35. is called Chammath, and placed in Nephthalim, was also called Chamath (whence the word Hamath and Emath, were framed) it may bee gathered partly because the other Hamath, 2 Chron. 8. 3. for distinction is called Chamath Tseba, as this (as it may seeme by Ios. 21. 32.) was Chamath Dor.

* The Septuagint write it, Ammath, Hierome Emath, Iosephus Amath: Ios. c. 19. v. 35. Chammath, c. 21. v. 32. Chammath-Dor, in the first of Chron. 6. 76. Chammon, 2 King. 14 8. Chammath-Iehuda, as Iunius reades it, whereas also for further distinction there is added [in Israel] to note that it was of old belonging to Iuda, though seated in Israel, that is, in the Kingdome of the ten Tribes, the other Chamith, being in Syria Soba. a Zeigler. in Neptal.

and Chamath Iuda, as we haue noted, 2 Reg. 14. Secondly, because Num. 34. 8. and also Ezekiel 47. 16. Chamath in the North side of the holy Land, is placed too neere the West corner, to be that Chamath Ioſua: for in the line which ſhould make the North border which begins at the great Sea, they make Moſes to name neuer a place Eastward along all the breadth of the holy Land, vntill we come to Hermon (for ſo they expound Mount Hor, Num. 34. 7.) and beyond Hermon Eastward in this North ſide, they make him to name diuers Townes, firſt Chamath, then Tſedad, then Ziphron, and laſtly, Chatſar-henan, a thing moſt vnlikely: ſeeing Iſrael had little or nothing Eastward beyond Hermon. Therefore we muſt needs expound Hor to bee one of the Hills neere Sidon, and to thoſe Townes, as they are named to be in order on the North ſide of Aſher, Nephthalim, and Manaſſes: and in like manner thoſe in Ezekiel: firſt, Checlon, then Chamath, and ſo in order, Berotha, Sibraim, Tſedad, Chauran, Chatſar henan. Of which Ioſ. 19. 35. d Which Rehob, or Rethob, in Ioſua 19. 28. is placed in Aſher towards Zidon, in the confines of Nephthalim.

the ſecond place thus: So they went vp, and ſearched out the Land from the Wilderneſſe of Sin, vnto Rehob to goe to Hamath: Then in Exekiel, The West part alſo ſhall bee the great Sea from the border, till a man come ouer against Hamath: that is, the coaſt of the Sea ſhall bee the West border from the Southermoſt part of the holy Land, till you come directly ouer againſt Hamath Northward: from whence if a line bee drawne to the Sea, it will touch the walls of Zidon: which is [e] the Northweſt corner of the holy Land. Now that this Hamath or Hammath, which Moſes alſo made the confine of the holy Land, is that of Nephthalim, both the reference which it hath to the West Sea, and the City of [d] Rehob adioyning

prooue it: the other Hamath or Emath (being farre remoued and beyond the forenamed mountaines, which incloſe all thoſe Lands which Iſrael euer had poſſeſſion of) is that Emath, which is alſo called Iturea, witneſſe [e] Stella and Laicſtan; and not that in Nephtalim, where [f] Ionathas Macchabæus attended the Army of Demetrius, who fled from him, and remoued by night.

f Ioſeph. Ant. 13. 8.

For though Traconitis be comprehended within Iturea (and therefore it is ſaid to bee finimitu Galilea Gentium) yet it hath beginning ouer the mountaines Traconis, and ſo it ſtretcheth into the plaines of the Territory of Iturea; whence Philip the brother of Herod was Tetrarch or Preſident both of Iturea and Trachonitis: both which are ouer Iordan towards the East. But Chemath in Nephtalim, is on the Weſt ſide of Iordan towards the Mediterran Sea.

* That it doth properly belõg to Arabia, the name of Ietur Iſmaels ſonne, whoſe iſſue ſettled in the Arabians, may in part giue witneſſe. Alſo the place of the 1 Chro. 5. 19. confirmes it where Ietur is named among the Hagarens, againſt whom the Rubenites & Gadites made war, and whoſe countrie they poſſeſt in the time of Ieroboam, as their fore-fathers had done in the time of Saul after his conqueſt of the Amalekites, Chro. 1. cap. 5. ver. 10. where the countrie is placed at the East of Gilead.

The Countrey Iturea was ſo called of Iethur one of the ſonnes of Iſmael, it is placed in the bounds of Cœleſyria and Arabia * the Deſart.

The people Iturai were valiant and warlike men, and excellent Archers: Of whom Virgil:

Iturœos Taxi torquentur in arcus.

Of Eugh the Iturœans bowes were made.

This City Chamath or Hamath in Nephtalim ſeemes to haue beene as ancient as the other in Iturea, both built by Amatheus the eleuenth ſon of Canaan. Whether in the time of Dauid, this, or the other had Tohu for King, it is not certaine, for Hamath or Emath beyond the Mountaines, and Hammath in Nephtalim, were both neighbours to Damaſcus: of whoſe ſubiugation Tohu reioyced, becauſe Hadadeſer whom the Damaſceni came to helpe, was his enemy. This Tohu fearing the ſtrength and proſperity of Dauid, hearing of his approach towards his Territory, bought his peace with many rich preſents, and with many ancient veſſels of gold, ſiluer, and braſſe.

But it ſeemeth that Dauid in ſuch great ſucceſſe would not haue had peace with Tohu, if he had beene King of any place in Nephtalim, and therefore it is probable that he ruled in Tſoba: which City Salomon after his Fathers death made himſelfe Maſter of, as a part of the lands (* in the larger and conditionall promiſe) allotted by God to the children of Iſrael.

* Of the larger promiſe expreſt, Deut. 1. 7. where Euphrates is named for one of the bounds; ſee cap. 7. §. 2. Hieron. de Locis Hebr.

But this Hammath of Nephtalim, in the end, and after diuers mutations and changes both of name and fortune, being, as it hath beene ſaid, poſſeſſed by Antiochus Epiphanes, it was called Epiphania.

While Saint Hierome liued, it remained a City well peopled, knowne to the Syrians by the name Amathe. and to the Greekes by Epiphania.

Of Reblatha and Rama, and diuers other Townes.

IN the border of Hamath or Emath towards Iordan ſtandeth the Citie Reblatha, or Ribla, watered from the fountaine Daphnis: which falleth into the lake of Merom. Hereunto was Zedekias brought prisoner, after his surprize in the fields of Iericho: and deliuered to Nabuchodonosor: who to be auenged of Zedekia's infidelity, beyond the proportion of piety, first caused the Princes his children to be slaine in his presence: and to the end that this miserable spectacle might be the last that euer he should behold in this world, and so the most remembred, he commanded both his eyes presently to be thrust out: and binding him in Iron chaines, he was led a slaue to Babylon, in which estate hee ended his life. Of which seldome-exempled calamity, though not in expresse words, Hieremie the Prophet fore-told him in Hierusalem not long before: But Ezechiel thus directly, speaking in the person of God, I will bring him to Babel to the Land of the Chaldæans, yet shall he not see it, though he shall die therein.

was

Hierem. 52. 11. &c. Ezek. 21. 32.

There are besides these before remembered, many other strong Cities in Nephthalim, as that which is called [a] Cedes: there are two other of the same name, one in [b] Isachar, another in Iuda, of which Ios. 15. 23. and therefore to distinguish it, it is knowne by the addition of [c] Nephtalim, as Iudg. 4. It is seated on a high hill, whence Ios. 20. 7. Kedesh in Galilæa in monte Nephtali: Iosephus calls it Cedesis, and in Saint Hieromes time it was called Cidissus. Belforest greatly mistakes this Cedes, and confounds it with Cades in the Desart of Pharan.

[a] Or Kadesh, Ios. 19. 37. & 10. 7. & 21. 32. item Iud. 4. 6.
[b] 1 Chron. 6. 72. which Ios. 19. 20. is called Kishion.
[c] Sometime Kedesh in Galilea, 1 Chron. 6. 76. Ios. 12. 22. 2 Reg. 15. 29.

After the King thereof among other of the Canaanites perished by the hand of Iosua, it was made a City of refuge, and giuen to the Leuites. Herein was Barac borne; who ouerthrew the Armie of the second Iabin of Hazor, at the Mount Tabor. It was sometime possest by Teglatphalasser, when he wasted all Nephtalim: afterward by the Romans, and numbred for one of the ten Cities of the Decapolitan Region: When it had imbraced the Christian faith, it was honoured with a Bishops seate, but in time it fell with the rest into the power of the Saracens and Turkes, and by them it was demolished.

() See in Beniamin, and in Ephraim.

From Cedes some foure Italian miles towards the South-west, standeth Sephet, otherwise Zephet, which was also one of the ten Decapolitan Cities: a place exceeding strong, and for many yeares the inexpugnable Fortresse of the Christians, and afterward of the Saracens; for from hence they conquered all the neighbour Cities of those regions, both In-land and Maritimate neere it. Touching Rama of Nephtalim, seated North-ward neere Sephet: this is to be noted that there are () diuers places of this name in Palæstine, all situate on Hills: and therefore called Rama (Rama Hebræis excelsum; Ramath with the Hebrewes is high.) Also that from this Rama Ios. 19. 36. they reade Arama, making the article (which it hath in the Hebrew, as being a name of diuers Townes) to be a part of the word: whence casting away the aspiration, they read Arema. From Sephet towards the West they place * Bethsemes, of which Ios. 19. 38. which defended it selfe against Nephtalim, Iud. 1. 33. but paid them tribute. On the other side of Sephet towards the East was Bethanath, who also kept their Citie from the Nephtalims.

* Other Cities there were of this name, (which is an much as domus solis) as that in Iuda, 2 Kin. 14. 15. where Ioash King of the ten tribes ouercame Amasia of Iuda, of which also I vnderstand the place, Ios. 21. 16. & 1 Sam. 6. 14. & 2. Chron. 29. 18. A third as it seemes was in Dan: 1 Kin. 4. 9. which Ios. 19. 41. is written Hirsbemes which is as much as Ciuitas solis. Iud. 1. 31.

Adioyning to which standeth Carthan [d] or Kiriathaim a Citie of the Leuites, not farre from the Mountaine out of which the springs of Capharnaum arise, called Mons Christi: a place by our Sauiour often frequented: as also then when calling his Disciples together, he made choise of twelue, which he called and ordained to be his Apostles or Messengers: of which place or the acts therein done, there is often mention in the [e] Euangilists.

[d] So it appears by comparing of the places. Ios. 21. 32. and 1 Chr. 6. 76. Adrichomius both here and elsewhere deceiued by the double name, makes two of one: although I deny not but that there was another Kiriathaim in Reuben, of which Ios. 13. 19.
[e] Marke 3. Matth. 10. Acts 1. Matth. 5. 6. 7.

Adioyning to these are Magdalel, a place of strength, [f] and Mesaleth, of which we reade that it was forced by Bacchides in the time of the [g] Macchabees: also (according to Adrichomius) one of the two Berothaes of Nephtalim. For Adrichomius maketh two of this name in this Tribe, [h] one neere Chamath in the North border, of which Ezek. 47. 6. another (vpon a weake coniecture out of Ioseph. ant. l. 5. c. 2.) he therefore placeth in this tract neere the waters of Merom; because the Kings that ioyned with Iabin against Iosua, which incamped at the waters of Merom, Ios. 11. 5. are by Iosephus said to haue incamped at the Citie Beroth in Galilee, not farre from Cedesa superiour, which is also in Galilee: all which may be true of that Beroth of which Ezek. seeing it is in that Galilee which is called the vpper Galilee or Galilee of the Gentiles. The same Adrichomius placeth the Region of Berim neere Abela (of which Abela or Abel-beth Mahacah we haue spoken alreadie) this he doth vpon a coniecture touching the place 2 Sam. 20. 14. where some reade Abel & Beth-mahacah, & omnia loca Berim: but the better reading is, & omnes Berim, that is, with all the Berai: for Shebah being of Beniamin (in which Tribe also there is a Citie called Beroth or Beeroth) drew the men of that Citie after him.

To the North of Beroth of Nephtalim standeth Sebarim vnder Libanus, remembred by Ezek.

Ezek.47. and Aroseth gentium, neere the waters of Merom or Samochonitis, the Citie of Sisara Lieutenant of the Army of the second Iabin: from whence not farre off towards the Sea of Galilee, is Edrai, or Edrehi, a strong Citie: besides many others, whereof I finde no particular storie of importance: as Ser in Iosua c.19.v.35. called Triddim-Tzer, and named for the first of their fenced Cities: whence they make two Cities, Asseddim & Ser. Then Adama, which they call Edama: also Hion which they call Ahion, of which in the Bookes of Kings. Then the strong Citie of Cinnereth after called Gennezareth, whence we reade of the Land and Lake of Gennezareth, the same Lake which is also called the Sea of Tiberius. In the body of the Land they place Galgala to the South border: of which * *Mac.*1.9.2. also diuers others named, *Ios.*19. as Vcuca or Chukkok Horem and Azanoth-tabor (which they place towards the East parts) and out of the same place of Iosua, Ierzon, Lakkum Iepnael, Heleb, and [k] Raccath, which two last they place neere Cæsarea Philippi: To these they adde out of Iosua, Nekeb, and Adami: for which two Iunius readeth Fossa Adamei, making it no Towne but a Ditch cast by some of Adameth, as it seemes; or at least the custodie of which March or Limit belonging to the Towne. To these out of *Num.*34.10. they adde Sephana, which 1 *Sam.*30.21. seemes to be called Sipmoth. As for Tichon and Helon, whereof the former they fetch out of *Ezek.*47.16. and the later out of Iosua 19.33. it may appeare by Iunius his Translation, that neither are to be taken for Cities: for the former hee readeth Mediana, and for the later Quercetum. The Citie of [l] Nephthalim which they make the native place of Tobie, and Naasson neere vnto it, they fetch out of the Vulgar Translation, *Tob.*7.7. but in the Greeke Text there is no signe, neither of the one nor of the other.

* This place of the Macchab. warrants no Galgala or Gi'gal in Nephthali, but may well be understood of Gi'gal in Beniamin or in Manasse.

k This Reccath or Racath Iunius thinkes that it is the same with Kartban (one of these being made of the other by Transposition of letters) of which Kartban wee haue noted already, that it is also called Kiria-thaym.

l In the place, 1 *Reg.*4. it is, which also they bring to prooue that there was a Citie called Nepthalim, as it is euident by the following Verses: the Tribe of Nephthalim is meant, and not any Citie of that name.

§. V.

THE TRIBE OF ZABVLON.

OF Zabulon or Zebulon, another of the sonnes of Iacob by Lea, there were mustered at Mount Sinai, 57400. able men, besides women, children, and aged vnable persons: all which dying in the Desarts, there entred the Holy Land of their issues 65000. fit to beare armes: who inhabited that part of Canaan, from Asher to the Riuer Chison Southward, and from the Sea of Galilee to the Mediterran, East and West.

The Cities within this Tribe which border Asher, are Sicaminum on the Sea shore; of which *Ioseph.Ant.*13.c.19. Debbaset of * which *Ios.*19.11. Iekonam or Iokneham (whose King was [a] slaine by Iosua, and the Citie was giuen to the Leuites:) and Gaba after called the Citie of Horsemen, of a Regiment there garrisond by Herod. Then the City which beareth the name of Zabulon, or the Citie of men, exceeding ancient and magnificent, [b] burnt to the ground by Cestius, Lieutenant of the Romane Armie. Adrichomius makes it the birth-Citie of [c] Elon Iudge of Israel, because he is called Zabulonita: not marking that in the same place, he is said to be buried at Aialon.

To the East of this City of Zabulon is Cateth, of which *Ios.*19.15. on the border of Asher: and beyond it the lesser [d] Cana of Galilee, where Christ conuerted Water into Wine: the native Citie of Nathaniel, and as it is thought, of Simon Zelotes. Beyond it begin the Mountaines of Zabulon: and then the Citie of Cethron (in Zeigler, Ghiltron) which defended it selfe against Zabulon. Then Bersabe which standeth in the partition of the vpper and nether Galilee, fortified by Iosephus against the Romanes. Not farre from hence standeth Shimron of Meron, whose King was slaine by Iosua.

Then Damna or Dimna, a Citie of the Leuites: then Nea or rather Neba, of which *Ios.*19.13. Then Dothan or Dothain, where Ioseph found his brethren feeding their flockes: the same wherein Elizæus besieged by the Syrians, strooke them all blinde.

Beyond it towards the East they imagine [e] Amthar or Amathar: then Remmon of the Leuites. The last of the Cities on the north border of Zabulon is Bethsaida, one of the ten Cities of Decapolis, situate on the Galilean Sea, and watered by the springs of Capharnaum, the native Citie of the Apostles, Peter, Andrew, and Philip. Herein Christ did manie miracles, but these people being no lesse incredulous than the Capharnaims, and others, d The greater Cana is in the Tribe of *Asser. Ios.*22.2. Nathaniel is said to bee of Cana in Galilee. Of Simon it may be doubted: for Angelus Gazinius readeth *Mat.*10.4. Simon Cananites, which word (*Luc.*6.) hee thinketh to be expounded by Zelotes.

e The Hebrew Hammethoar, (for which the Vulgar hath Amthar, *Ios.*19.13.) Patables expounds quæ gyrat; Iunius ioynes it with the word going before it, & reades Kimmonemo Methoaris, *Mat.*8.11. Marke.1.6. Luke 4.10.

thers, receiued the same Curse of threatened Miseries, as, Woe bee vnto thee Bethsaida, &c.

Alongst the West border of Galilee, towards the South from Bethsaida, was the strong Castle of Magdalum, the habitation of Marie Magdalen, not long since standing.

And beyond it the strong and high seated Citie of Iotapata: fortified by Iosephus in the Roman Warre: but in the end after a long siege surprised by Vespasian, who slaughtered many thousand of the Citizens, and held 1200. prisoners, whereof Iosephus the Historian was one.

The last and greatest of the Cities on that * Sea, and the Lake of Genezareth within Zabulon, was that of Tiberias, from whence afterward the Galilean Sea also changed name, and was called the Sea of the Citie Tiberias, so named in the honour of Tiberius Cæsar; it was one of the ten Cities, and the Metropolis of the Region Decapolitan, and the greatest and last of the lower Galilee. From hence our Sauiour called Matthew, from the toll or custome house, to be an Apostle, and neere vnto it raised the daughter of Iairus from death: it was built (as Iosephus reports) by Herod the Tetrarch, the brother of Philip, in the beginning of the raigne of Tiberius Cæsar, in the most fruitfull part of Galilee; but in a ground full of Sepulchers: Quum iuxta nostras leges (saith hee) ad septem dies impurus habeatur, qui in talibus locis habitet; whereas by our law hee should be seuen daies held as vncleane, who inhabited in such a place: by which words, and by the whole place of Iosephus it appeares, that this Tiberias is not (as some haue thought) the same as the old Cinnereth, which was seated, not in Zabulon, but in Nephtalim.

* The names of the chiefe Cities seated about this Sea, or lake, thorow which Iordan runneth, where Capernaum, Taberias, Bethsaida, Gadara, Tarichea, and they adde Cinereth, which in foretimes gaue name to the Lake and Countrie. Matth. 9. Luc. 5. Iose. Ant. 18.3. Ioseph. 10.15. Adrich. in Zab.

Neere vnto this Tiberias, at Emaus, there were hot baths, where Vespasian the Emperour encamped against Tiberias. More into the Land toward the South-west is Bethulia, seated on a very high Hill, and of great strength, famous by the storie of Holofernes and Iudith, such as it is. Neere which standeth Bethleem of Zabulon: and adioyning vnto it Capharath, fortified by Iosephus against the Romans: and Iapha an exceeding strong place, afterward forced by Titus: who in the entrance, and afterward in furie slew 15000. of the Citizens; and carried away aboue two thousand prisoners.

Iose. in vit. sua. Iosep. 2. Bel. 25.

On the South side are the Cities of Cartha of the Leuites, and Gabara, of which Iosephus in his owne life, then Iasie according to Adrichomius (of which Ios. 19.12.) for hee thinkes that it is not that Iapha of which wee spake but now out of Iosephus. Iideala, of which Ios. 19.15. Hierome calls it Iadela: vnder it Westward, Legio, (afterward a Bishops seate) and the Citie Belma, in ancient times exceeding strong, remembred Iudith 7.3. otherwise Chelma. Betweene Legio and Nazeret is the Citie Saffa or Saffra, the birth-Citie of Zebedaus, Alphæus, Iames and Iohn: Then Sephoris, or Sephora, according to Iosephus: Sephorum according to Brochard: which afterward, saith Hegesippus and Hierome, was called Diocæsarea; the Citie of Ioachim and Anna, the Parents of the Virgin Mary; it was called by Herod the Tetrarch, and by him, as Iosephus speakes, made the head and defence of Galilee: in another place he saith, Vrbium Galilææarum maxima Sephoris & Tiberias. This Sephoris greatly vexed Vespasian ere he wanne it. Herod Antipas when he made it the Regall seat of the nether Galilee, and surrounded it with a strong wall, called it Autocratorida, which is as much to say as Imperiall, saith Iosephus; and it is now but a Castle called Zaphet.

Iosua 21.35. otherwise Risoth Thabor, as Iunius thinkes vpon Ios. 19.12. whence 1 Chro. 6.77. it is called Thabor.

Iohan. de Monteuille, c. 4. & 20.

To the South-west of this Sephoris or Diocæsarea was that blessed place of Nazareth, the Citie of Mary the Mother of Christ; in which hee himselfe was conceiued; it standeth betweene Mount Tabor, and the Mediterran Sea. In this Citie hee abode chiefly foure and twenty yeares, and was therefore called a Nazarite, as the Christians afterward were for many years. It was erected into an Archbishoprick in the following age. Neere vnto it are the Cities Baria (afterward well defended against the Turkes) and Nahalal, of which Ios. 19.15. and Iud. 1.30. where it is called Nahalal: and Ios. 21.35. where it is a Citie of the Leuites, neere the Sea; adioyning to the Riuer of Chison is Sarid, noted in Iosua for the vttermost of Zabulon.

Iosep. ant. 18.3. & in vita sua.

In this Territorie of Zabulon there are diuers small Mountaines: but Tabor is the most renowned, by the Aparition of Moses and Elias: and by the Transfiguration of Christ in the presence of Peter, Iames, and Iohn: vnto whom Moses and Elias appeared; in memorie whereof on the top of the Mountaine, the Empresse Helen built a sumptuous Chappell.

The chiefe Riuer of Zabulon is Chison, which rising out of Tabor, runneth with one streame Eastward to the Sea of Galilee, and with another streame Westward into the great Sea. This Riuer of Chison where it riseth, and so farre as it runneth Southward, is called Chedumim or Cadumim: and for mine owne opinion, I take it to be the same which Ptolomie calleth Chorseus: though others distinguish them, and set Chorseus by Caesaria Palestinæ. There is a second Torrent or Brooke that riseth in the Hills of Bethulia, and falleth into the Sea of Galilee by Magdalum: and the third is a branch of a riuer rising out of the Fountaines of Capharnaum, which falleth also into the same Sea, and neere Magdalum; which Torrent they call Dotham, from the name of the Citie, from which it passeth Eastward to Bethsaida, and so ioyning with Iordanis parum, which runneth from the Valley of Iephthael, which Iosua reckoneth in the bounds of Zabulon, it endeth in the Sea of Galilee.

§. VI.

THE TRIBE OF ISACHAR.

THe next adioyning Territory to Zabulon, to the South and Southwest, was Isachar, who inhabited a part of the nether Galilee, within Iordan: of whom there were increased in Egypt, as appeared by their musters at Mount Sinai, 54400. able and warlike men, who leauing their bodies with the rest in the Deserts, there entred the Holy Land, 64300.

Tarichea in Sueton.

The first Citie of this Tribe neere the Sea of Galilee, was Tarichea, distant from Tiberias eight English miles, or somewhat more; a City wherein the Iewes (by the practice of a certaine mutinous vpstart, Iohn the sonne of Leui) tooke armes against Iosephus the Historian, then Gouernour of both Galilees. This Citie was first taken by Cassius, and 3000. Iewes carried thence captiue; and afterward with great difficultie by Vespasian, who entred it by the Sea side, hauing first beaten the Iewes in a sea-fight vpon the Lake or Sea of Galilee; he put to the sword all sorts of people, and of all ages: sauing that his furie being quenched with the Riuers of bloud running through euery street, he reserued the remainder for slaues and bond-men.

Next to Tarichea is placed Cession, or Cisthion, of the Leuites, and then Isachar, remembred in the first of Kings c. 4. v. 17. then Abes or Ebets, Ios. 19. 20. and Remeth; of which Ios. 19. 21. otherwise Ramoth, 1 Chron. 6. 73. or Iarmuth, Ios. 21. 29. this also was a City of the Leuites, from whose Territorie the Mountaines of Gilboe take beginning: and range themselues to the Mediterran sea, and towards the West as farre as the Citie of Iezreel, between which and Ramoth, are the Cities of Bethpheses, or Bethpasses, according to Zeigler; and Enadda, or Hen chadda, neere which Saul slew himselfe: vnder those, Aphec or Apheca, which Adrichomius placeth in Isachar: betweene which and Suna, hee saith, that the Philistims incamped against Israel, & afterward against Saul: a Land thirstie of bloud, for herein also, saith he, the Syrians with two and thirty Reguli assisting Benhadad, incountered Achab: and were ouerthrowne and slaughtered: to whom the King of Israel made a most memorable answer, when Benhadad vaunted before the victory: which was, Tell Benhadad, Let not him that girdeth his harneis, boast himselfe as he that putteth it off: meaning, that glorie followed after victorie, but ought not to precede it. In the yeere following, in the fields, as they say, adioyning to this Citie, was the same vaine-glorious Syrian vtterly broken and discomfited by Achab: and 100000. footmen of the Aramites or Syrians slaine: before which ouerthrow the seruants and Counsailors of Benhadad (in derision of the God of Israel) told him, That the Gods of Israel were Gods of the Mountaines: and therefore if they fought with them in the plaines, they should ouercome them.

Vnder Aphec towards the Sea they set the Citie of Esdrelon; in the plaines of Galilee, called also the great field of Esdrelon, and Maggedo: in the border whereof are the ruines of Aphec to be seene, saith Brochard, and Breidenbach. After these are the Cities of Casaloth, of which, 1 Machab. 9. 2. Anem or Hen-Gannim of the Leuites, and Seasima or Shahatsima, the West border of Isachar; of which Ios. 19. 22. From hence ranging the Sea coast, there is found the Castle of Pilgrims: a strong Castle inuironed with the Sea, sometime the store-house and Magasine of the Christians, and built by the Earle of *S. At the foot of this Mountaine to the North ſtandeth Caiphas, built, as they ſay, by Caiphas the high Prieſt. It is alſo knowne by the name of Porſina and Porphyria, ſometime a Suffragane Biſhops ſeate. Returning againe from the Sea-coaſt towards Tiberias by the bankes of Chiſon, there are found the City of Hapharaim or Aphraim, and the Caſtles of Mezra, and Saba: of which Brochard and Breidenbach: and then Naim on the Riuer Chiſon: a beautifull Citie while it ſtood, in the Gates whereof Chriſt raiſed from death the widowes onely ſonne. Beyond it ſtands Anaharath and Rabbith, named Ioſ. c. 19. v. 19. 20. Then Dabarath, as it is named, Ioſ. 21. 28. or Debratha, as it is named, 1 Chron. 6. 71. This Citie (which ſtretcheth it ſelfe ouer Chiſon) was a Citie of refuge belonging to the Leuites.

Next to Daberath is Arbela ſituate, neere the Caues of thoſe two Theeues which ſo greatly moleſted Galilee in Herods time. It ioyneth on one ſide to the Mountaine of Iſachar or Hermon, and on the other to the Valley of Ieſrael: which valley continueth it ſelfe from Bethſan or Scythopolis, the Eaſt border of Iſachar, euen to the Mediterran Sea; two parts whereof are incloſed by the Mountaines of Gilboe on the South, and by Hermon, and the Riuer Chiſon on the North. In theſe * plaines Gideon ouerthrew the Madianites, and herein, they thinke, Saul fought againſt the Philiſtims: Achab againſt the Syrians, and the Tartars againſt the Saracens.

THE HALFE OF THE TRIBE OF MANASSE.

†. I.

Of the bounds of this halfe Tribe: and of Scythopolis, Salem, Therſa, and others.

THe next Tribe which ioyneth it ſelfe to Iſachar towards the South, is the halfe of Manaſſe, on the Weſt ſide of Iordan. Manaſſes was the firſt begotten of Ioſeph, the eleuenth ſonne of Iacob. His mother was an Egyptian, the daughter of Putiphar, Prieſt and Prince of Heliopolis: which Manaſſes, with his brother Ephraim, the grand-children of Iacob, were by adoption numbred amongſt the ſonnes of Iacob, and made vp the number of the twelue Patriarkes.

Of Manaſſe there were increaſed in Egypt, as they were numbred at Mount Sinai, 32200. able men: all which being conſumed in the Deſarts, there entred of their iſſues, 52700. bearing armes. The Territory which fell on this one halfe of Manaſſe, was bounded by Iordan, on the Eaſt, and Doſa vpon the Mediterran Sea on the Weſt, Ieſrael on the North, and Machmata is the South border.

The firſt and principall Citie which ſtood in this Territorie was Bethſan, ſometime Nyſa, ſaith Plinie, built by Liber Pater, in honour of his Nurſe there buried, of the ſame name, which Solinus confirmes. Afterward when the Scythians inuaded Aſia the leſſe, and pierc't into the South, to the vttermoſt of Cœloſyria, they built this Citie a-new, and very magnificent: and it had thereupon the name of Scythopolis, or the Citie of Scythians giuen by the Greekes. Plinie. lib. 5. c. 18.

Theſe barbarous Northren people conſtrained the Iewes to fight againſt their owne Nation

Nation and kindred, by whose hands when they had obtained victory, they themselues set on the Iewes which serued them, and slew them all. Stephanus makes it the vtmost towards the South of Coelesyria and Strabo ioynes it to Galilee. It is seated betweene Iordan and the Hills of Gilboe; in ultima montes arrabitene, saith Zeigler. But I finde it in the East part of the Valley of Iesrael neere Iordan: after that, Iordan strengtheneth it selfe again into a River, leauing the Sea or Lake Genezareth. Notwithstanding, Mantanus describes it farre to the West, and towards the Mediterran Sea, neere Endor, contrarie to Stella, Quaresmius, Mariborus, and all other the best Authors. This Citie was the greatest of all those of Decapolis: but the children of Manasse could not expell the Inhabitants thereof: and therefore called it Sanè an enemie, or Beth-san, the house of an enemie.

Iudg.1. Ios.17. de Bell. fact.

Ouer the walls of this Bethsan the Philistims hung the body of Saul, and his sonnes slaine at Gilboe. It had, while the Christian religion flourished in those parts, an Archbishop, who had nine other Bishops of his Dioceese, numbred by Tyrius, in his 14. Booke and 22. Chapter: but the same was afterward translated to Nazareth. The later trauailers in those parts affirme, that there is daily taken out among the rubble and the ruines of that Citie, goodly pillars and other pieces of excellent Marble, which witnesse the stately buildings, and magnificence which it had in elder times, but it is now a poore and desolate Village.

Hierō. in Epist. ad Euagr. & in Loc. Hebr.

From Bethsan keeping the way by Iordan, they finde an ancient Citie called Salem, which Citie the ancient Rabbines, saith Hierome, doe not finde to be the same with Hierusalem: there being in the time of Hierome and since, a towne of that name, neere Scythopolis before remembred, which if the place of Scripture, Gen. 13. 18. doe not confirme, where the Vulgar readeth transiuit & in Salem vrbem Sichemorum (for which others reade venit incolumis ad Ciuitatem Sechemam, making the word Shalem not to be a proper name, but an adiective) yet the place Iohn 3. 13. where it is said, that Iohn was baptizing in Ænon neere Salem, may somewhat strengthen this opinion, and yet it is not vnlikely that this Salem of which S. Iohn speaketh, is but contracted of Shahalim, of which in the Tribe of Beniamin, 1 Sam. 9. 4. This word Iunius maketh to bee the plurall of Shuhal: of which we reade, 1 Sam. 13. 17. for as for that which is added out of Canticles 6. 12. of Shulammitis, as if it had beene as much as a Woman of this Saleim, neere Ænon, it hath no probability.

This City Bezek by the place, Iud. 1. 3. seemeth to haue beene in Iuda.

Ios. ant. 6. c. 5. 1 Sam. c. 11.

Not farre from thence where they place Salem, they find Bezech the City of Adonibezec, Iosephus calls it Bala: here it was that Saul assembled the strength of Israel and Iuda, to the number of 330000. when he meant to relieue Iabesh Gilead, against Naash the Ammonite: who would giue them no other conditions of peace, than to suffer their right eyes to be thrust out. Neere Bezech is the City of Bethbera or rather Beth-bara, of which Iudg. 7. 24. in the storie of Gideon: and then Ephra or Hophra, wherein Gideon inhabited: in the border whereof stood an Altar consecrated to Baal, which hee pulled downe and defaced; and neere it that stone, on which Abimelech the Bastard slew his 70. brothers: a Heathenish cruelty, practised by the Turke to this day; and not farre hence, betweene the Village of Asophon and Iordan, Ptolomeus Lathurus ouerthrew Alexander King of the Iewes, and slaughtered, as Iosephus numbreth them, 3000. but according to Timagenes 50000. after which victory, as Ptolomie past by the Villages of the Iewes, he slew all their women, and caused the young children to be sod in great Caldrons, that the rest of the Iewes might thereby thinke that the Egyptians were growne to be men-eaters, and strike them with the greater terror.

Ios. l. 13. c. 21. ant.

* This Ant. Iunius vpon 1 Chron. 6. 70. makes to bee the same with Tahanac, of which Ios. 21. 25. Hierome names it from Ano the Confederate of Abraham. Gen. 14. 13. Iosua 12. 17. 1 King. 14.

Towards the West and on the border of Isachar, they place the Cities of * Aner of the Leuites, and Abel-Mehola, which Iunius, Iudg. 7. 22. placeth in Ephraim, it was the habitation of Helisæus the Prophet, numbred among those places, 1 Reg. 4. 12. which were giuen in charge to Baana by Salomon, to whose charge also Tahanac belonging, a place of great strength, which at the first resisted Iosua, though their King was afterward hanged, and their Citie giuen to the Leuites.

In the body of this Territory of Manasse, but somewhat neerer Iordan than to the Mediterran Sea, were three great Cities, to wit, Thersa, whose King was one of those that Iosua slew; which the Kings of Israel vsed for their Regall seate, till such time as Samaria was built. From hence the wife of Ieroboam went to Achia to enquire of her sons health: who knowing her, though she were disguised, told her of her sonnes death.

The second was Thebes neere Samaria, of which name there are both in Egypt, and Greece, Greece, of great fame, in the assault of the Towne: where into the Citizens retired, the Bastard Abimelec was mortally wounded by a mighty stone, throwne by a Woman ouer the Wall, who despairing of his bodily recouerie, commaunded his Page to slay him outright, because it should not be said that he perished by the stroke of a Woman. But others set this Citie in Ephraim. Iudg. 9. v. 54.

The third is Acrabata, of which the Territory adioyning is called Acrabatene, (one of the ten Toparchies or Gouernments in Iudea, for which Hierome, 1. Macc. 5. reades Arabathena: but in the Greeke it is Acrabatene: Iudea edita in Agrabat. This Citie had one of the largest Territories of all Palestine belonging vnto the Gouernour thereof. Iosephus remembreth it often, as in his second Booke of the Iewes Warres, cap. 13. 18. & elsewhere. Hier. Mar. 1. c. 5.

The difference betweene a Tetrarchie and a Toparchie, was, that the first was taken for a Prouince, and the other for a City with some lesser Territory adioyning: and a Tetrarch is the same with Praeses in Latine, and Gouernour in English, being commonly the fourth part of a Kingdome: and thereof so called. Plinie nameth seuenteen Tetrarchies in Syria: the Holy Land had foure, and so hath the Kingdome of Ireland to this day, Lemster, Vlster, Connath, and Mounster. Plin. l. 5. Euseb. in Chron.

To the South-west of Acrabata they place the Cities of Balaam or Bilham, & Gethremmon of the Leuites: but Iunius out of Ios. 21. 25. and 1. Chron. 6. 70. gathers that these two are but one: and that Ibleham, Ios. 16. 11. is another name of the same Citie.

Then is Iezrael a Regall Citie, set at the foot of the Mountaines of Gilboe, towards the South-west: here in Iezabel by a false accusation caused Naboth to be stoned, to the end she might possesse his Vineyard adioyning to the Citie, which Naboth refused to sell, because it was his inheritance from his Father. Ioram also was cast vnburied into the same field: for which his Mother Iezabel murthered Naboth. 2. King. cap. 9.

Toward the Sea from Iezrael is the Citie which they call Gaber: in whose ascent as Ahaziah King of Iuda fled from Iehu, whom he had slaine Ioram, he was wounded with the shot of an arrow, of which wound he died at Maggeddo adioyning. The Scripture calls this Citie of Gaber, Gur. 2. King. 9. 27.

Then Adadremmon, neere vnto which the good King Iosias was slaine by Necho, King of Egypt, in a War vnaduisedly vndertaken. For Necho marched towards Assyria against the King thereof; by the commandement of God: whom Iosias thought to resist in his passage. It was afterward called Maximianopolis.

A neighbour City to Adadremmon was Maggeddo, often remembred in the Scriptures; whose King was slaine among the rest by Iosua: yet they defended their Citie for a long time against Manasse. The Riuer which passeth by the Towne, may perhaps be the same which Ptolomie calleth Chorseus: and not that of which we haue spoken in Zabulon. For because this name is not found in the Scriptures, many of those that haue described the Holy Land, delineate no such Riuer. Moore onely sets it downe in his Geographie of the twelue tribes: but the Riuer which passeth by Maggeddo, he vnderstandeth to bee but a branch, falling thereinto. Laiesian and Sebrot make a great confluence of waters in this place, agreeable to this Scripture in the fifth of Iudges: Then fought the Kings of Canaan in Tanach by the waters of Maggeddo. But these Authors, and with them Stella, giue it no other name than the Torrent so called. Iud. 1. c. 5. Ios. 12. 21.

But seeing that ancient Cosmographers stretch out the bounds of Phœnicia, euen to Sebaste or Samaria; and Strabo farre beyond it on the Sea-coast: And Iosephus calls Cesaria Palestina a Citie of Phœnicia, yea Laurentius Gyrinus extendeth Phœnicia as farre as Gaza: seeing also Ptolomie sets downe Chorseus for the partition of Phœnicia and Iudea, this Riuer running East and West parallel with Samaria: it is very probable that this Torrent called Maggeddo, after the name of the Citie, which it watereth, is the same which Ptolomie in his fourth Table of Asia, calleth Chorseus. The later trauailers of the holy Land call Maggeddo Subimbre at this day. Strab. l. 16. Ioseph. l. 3. c. 2. Nigra.

†. II.

Of Cesaria Palestina, and some other Townes.

FRom Maggeddo toward the West, and neere the Mediterran Sea, was that glorious Citie of Cesaria Palestina: first, the Tower of Straton: the same which Plinie calls

Apollonia;

Apollonia, though Ptolomy sets Apollonia elsewhere, and toward Egypt, but wonne to his City and Joppe, to which Vespasian gaue the name of Flauia Colonia. It was by Herod re-built, who therein laboured to exceed all the workes in that part of the world. For besides the edifices which he reared within the Walls, of cost and polisht marbles, the Theater and Amphitheater, from whence he might looke ouer the Seas farre away, with the high and stately Towers and Castles: hee forced a Harborough of great capacitie, being in former times but an open Bay: and the winde blowing from the Sea, the Merchants haunting that Port, had no other hope, but in the strength of their Cables and Anchors. This worke he performed with such charge and labour as the like of that hath not been found in any Kingdome, nor in any age: which, because the Marble stones were fetcht from farre, and the waight of the stones was such as it exceedeth the beliefe, I haue added Iosephus owne words of this worke, which are these: Ioseph. l.15.c.13. Hæc locorum in altum vtilitatem correcturus, circulum portus circumduxit, quantum putaret magnas si receptui sufficere. & in viginti vlnarum profundum, prægrandia saxa demisit: quorum plerique pedum quinquaginta longitudinis, latitudinis verò octodecim, altitudine nouem pedalis: fuerunt quædam etiam maiora, minora alia: To mend this inconuenience of place (saith Iosephus) hee compast in a Bay wherein a great fleete might well ride: and let downe great stones twentie fathome deepe: whereof some were fifty foot long, eighteen foot broad, and nine foot thicke: some bigger, and some lesser. To this he added an arme or cawsie of two hundred foot long, to breake the waues: the rest hee strengthened with a stone wall, with diuers stately Towers thereon builded: of which the most magnificent he called Drusus, after the name of Drusus the sonne in law of Cæsar: in whose honour he intituled the Citie it selfe, Cæsaria of Palæstine: all which he performed in twelue yeeres time. It was the first of the Easterne Cities that receiued a Bishop, afterward erected into an Archbishopricke, commanding twentie others vnder it, saith Tyrius. l.4.c.12.bell. sacr.

S. Hierome nameth Theophilus, Eusebius, Acacius, Euzoius, and Galasius to haue beene Bishops thereof. In this Citie was Cornelius the Centurion baptized by Saint Peter: and herein dwelt Philip the Apostle: S. Paul was herein two yeeres prisoner, vnder the President Fælix, vnto the time and gouernment of Porcius Festus: by whom making his appeale, he was sent to Cæsar. Here, when Herod Agrippa was passing on to celebrate the Quinquennalia, taking delight to be called a god by his flatterers, hee was stricken with an Angell vnto death, saith Iosephus.

To the North of Cæsaria standeth Dora, or Naphoth Dor, as some reade, Ios. 11.2. so called (saith Adrichomius) because it ioyneth to the Sea, whose King was slaine by Iosua. But Iunius for in Naphoth Dor, reades in tractibus Dor: and so the Vulgar, in regionibus Dor, although 1 Reg. 4.11. for the like speech in the Hebrew it readeth omnis Nephath Dor: The Septuagint in the place of Iosua call it Nephith-Dor, and in the other of the Kings, Nepha-Dor: but the true name by other places (as Ios. 12.23. Iudg. 1.27.) may seeme to be Dor. It was a strong and powerfull Citie, and the fourth in account of those twelue Principalities or Sitarchies, which Salomon erected. Iunius vpon Macchab. 15.11.40 place this betweene the Hill Carmel, and the mouth of the Riuer Cherseus: for so some name the Riuer Chorseus, of which we haue spoken already.

Into this Citie, for the strength thereof, Tryphon fled from Antiochus the son of Demetrius, where hee was by the same Antiochus besieged with 12000. foot-men, and 8000. Horse: the same perfidious villain that receiued 200. talents for the ransome of Ionathan Macchabæus (whom he had taken by treacherie) and then slew him: and after him slew his owne Master, vsurping for a while the kingdome of Syria. It had also a Bishops seate of the Dioceese of Cæsaria. 1.Macc.1.13.15.

From Cæsaria towards the South, they place the Cities of Capharnaum, Gabe, and Galgal: for besides that Capharnaum famous in the Euangelists, they finde in these parts neere to the West Sea, another of the same name. Of Gabe Hierome in locis Hebraicis. The famous Galgal or Gilgal, was in Beniamin: but this Gilgal, they say, it was whose King was slaine by Iosua. Gul.Tyr.de Bell.sacr.l.10. c.6.

Then Antipatris, so called of Herode, in honour of his Father: but in the time of the Macchabees it was called Caphar salama: in the fields whereof Iudas Macchabæus ouerthrew a part of the Armie of Nicanor, Lieutenant to Demetrius: an armie drawn into Iudea by a traiterous Iew, called Alcimus: who contended for the Priest-hood, first vnder Bacchides, and then vnder Nicanor. To this was S. Paul carried prisoner from Hierusalem, conducted Mac.17.v.31.

conducted by 470. Souldiers, to defend him from the furie of the Iewes. In after-times the Armie of Godfrey of Bulion attempted it in vaine: yet was it taken by Baldwine. It was honoured in those dayes with a Bishops seate, but it is now a poore Village called Cæsur, saith Brochard. Neere vnto this Citie the Prophet Ionas was three daies preserued in the body of a Whale.

Into the Land, from Antipatris and Cæsaria, standeth Narbata, whereof the Territory taketh name: which Cestius the Romane wasted with fire and sword, because the Iewes which dwelt at Cæsaria fled thence, and carried with them the Bookes of Moses. Neere vnto it is the Mountaine of Abdia, the Steward of King Achab: wherein hee hid an hundreth Prophets, and fedde them, after which hee himselfe is said to haue obtained from God the Spirit of Prophesie also.

Chap. VIII.

Of the Kingdome of Phœnicia.

§. I.

The bounds and chiefe Cities, and Founders, and Name, of this Kingdome: and of the invention of Letters ascribed to them.

BEcause these fiue Tribes, of Asser, Nephtalim, Zabulon, Issachar, and the halfe of Manasse, possest the better part of that ancient Kingdome of Phœnicia, to wit, of so much as lay to the South part of Anti-libanus: I haue therefore gathered a briefe of those Kings which haue gouerned therein: at least so many of them as time (which deuoureth all things) hath left to posteritie: and that the rest haue perished, it is not strange; seeing so many volumes of excellent learning in so long a race and reuolution, and in so many changes of Estates and Conquest of Heathen Princes, haue beene torne, cast away, or otherwise consumed.

The limits of this Kingdome, as touching the South parts, are very vncertaine: but all Cosmographers doe in effect agree, that it takes beginning from the North, where that part of Syria, which is called Casiotis, ends: most of them bounding it by Orthosia, to the North of Tripolis. Ptolomie makes it a little larger, as reaching from the Riuer Eleutherus, that falls into the Sea at the Iland of Aradus, somewhat to the North of Orthosia, and stretching from thence alongst the coast of the Mediterran sea, as farre as the Riuer of Chorseus, which seemes to bee that which the Iewes call the Torrent or Riuer of Magedda. Plinie extends it farther, and comprehends Ioppe within it: Coruinus and Budæus, Ioppe and Gaza. Phœnicia apud priscos appellata (saith Budæus) quæ nunc Palæstina Syriæ dicitur; It was called Phœnicia of old (saith he) which now is called Palæstina of Syria. Ptol. 4. Tab. Asiæ. Plin. lib. 5. c. 19.

Strabo comprehends in this Countrey of Phœnicia, all the Sea side of Iudæa, and Palæstina, euen vnto Pelusium, the first Port of Egypt. On the contrary Diodorus Siculus foldeth it vp in Cœlesyria, which hee boundeth not. But for my selfe I take a middle course, and like best of Ptolomies description, who was seldome deceiued in his owne Art. It had in it these famous Maritimate Cities (besides all those of the Ilands) to wit, Aradus, Orthosia, Tripolis, Botrys, Byblus, Berytus, Sidon, Tyre, Ptolomais (or Acon) Dora, and Cæsaria Palestinæ: and by reason of the many Ports and goodly Sea-townes, it anciently commanded the Trades of the Easterne world: and they were absolute Kings of the Mediterran Sea. Strab. l. 16. Buda. de Ass. l. 4.

The ancient Regall Seate of those Princes was Zidon, built by Zidon the first sonne of Canaan: and the people then subiect to that people were called Zidonians: the same state continuing euen vnto Iosua's time. For till then it is probable that there was but one King of all that Region; afterward called Phœnicia: which Procopius also confirmeth in his second Booke of Vandall Warres. But in processe of time the Citie of Tyre adioyning became the more magnificent: yet according to the Prophet, it was but a Daughter of Zidon, and by them first built and peopled. Esay 23.

But after the death of Moses, and while Iosua yet gouerned Israel, Agenor an Egyptian of Thebes, or a Phœnician bred in Egypt, came thence with his sons of Cadmus, Phœnix, Cyrus, and Cilix, (say Cedrenus & Curtius) and built and possest the Cities of Tyre and Zidon: to wit, the new Tyrus, and brought into Phœnicia (so called after the name of his second sonne) the vse of letters: which also Cadmus in his pursuite after his sister Europa, taught the Græcians. For Taurus King of Crete, when he surprised Tyre, had stollen her thence: of which the Poets deuised the fable of Iupiters transformation into a Bull, by whom that stealth was also supposed to be made. Pomponius Sabinus makes Belus the first King of Phœnicia, and findes Cadmus his successour, whom hee calleth his grandchilde: and it seemeth that Belus was the Father of Agenor, and not Neptune: because the successors of Dido held that name alwayes in reuerence, making it a part of their owne, as Asdruball, Hannibal: which memorie Virgil also toucheth in these Verses: F. 17.

Impleuitq́; mero pateram: quam Belus & omnes
A Belo soliti.

The Queene anon commands the waighty bowle
(Waightie with precious stones and massie gold)
To flow with wine. This Belus vs'd of old,
And all of Belus Line.

Whether this Belus were Father or Grand-father to Agenor, the matter is not great. But it seemes to me by comparing of times, that Belus was Ancestor to these Phœnicians, and preceded Agenor. For were Belus, or Iupiter Belus, the sonne of Neptune by Lybia, the Daughter of Epaphus, or were he the Sonne of Thelegonus, according to Eusebius; yet it is agreed that Cecrops then ruled in Attica: and in the end of Cecrops time, saith S. Augustine, Moses left Egypt: Agenors successor liuing at once with Iosua. Now that Agenor returned about the same time into the Territory of Zidon, I cannot doubt: neither doe I denie, but that he gaue that Region the name of Phœnicia, in honour of his Sonne. But in stead of the building of Tyre and Zidon, it is probable that hee repaired and fortified both: and therefore was called a founder, as Semiramis and Nebuchodonosor were of Babylon.

For be it true that Agenor was of the same Nation, and brought vp in Egypt: where he learnt the vse of letters (Egypt flourishing in all kinde of learning in Moses time) or were he by Nation an Egyptian, yet it is very likely that either he came to saue his owne Territory; or otherwise to defend the coast of Canaan, from the Israelites: who were by Moses led out of Egypt, to the great losse and dishonour of that Nation: and by Iosua conducted ouer Iordan, to conquer and possesse the Canaanites Land. For though the Egyptians, by reason of the losse which they receiued by the hand of God, in the Red Sea, and by the ten plagues cast on them before that, and by the slaughter of so many of the Male children at the same time, could not hinder the Hebrews from inuading Canaan by Land: which also they knew had so many powerfull Nations to defend it: the Deserts inter-jacent, and the strong Edomites, Moabites, Emorites & Ammonites their borderers: yet Egypt hauing such Vessels, or Ships, or Gallies, as were then in vse: did not in all probability neglect to Garrison the Sea coast, or assist Agenor with such forces, as they had to spare; and which they might performe with the greater facilitie, in that the Philistims which held the shores of Canaan, next adioyning vnto them, were their Friends and Confederates.

Now as it appeareth by the course of the storie, those Cities of Phœnicia, which Agenor was said to haue built (that is, to haue fortified and defended against Iosua, and against the Tribes after him, as Zidon, Sor, or Tyre, by Iosua called the strong Citie, Accho afterward Ptolomais, Aczib and Dor) were all that Phœnicia had in those dayes. c. 19. v. 29.

That the Kings of Phœnicia were mighty, especally by Sea, it appeares, first by their defence against Israel: secondly by this, that Dauid and Salomon could not master them: but were glad of their alliance: thirdly, that one of their Cities, though they were then but Reguli, defended it selfe 13. yeeres against a King of Kings, Nabuchodonosor: and that Alexander the great (who being made victorious by the prouidence of God, seemed vnresistable) spent more time in the recouery of Tyre, than in the conquest of all the Cities in Asia.

Other

Other opinions there are, as that of Berosus out of Iosephus, who conceiues that Tyre was founded by Tyrus the sonne of Iaphet. And for the Region it selfe, though Calisthenes deriue it, ab arbore dactylorum; and the Greekes from the word Phonos, of slaughter, because the Phœnicians slew all that came on their coasts, yet for my selfe I take it that Phœnix the sonne of Agenor gaue it that name. But that either Agenor in Phœnicia, or Cadmus his sonne in Greece, were the Inuentors of Letters, it is ridiculous: and therefore the dispute vnnecessary.

The Ethiopians affirme that Atlas, Orion, Orpheus, Linus, Hercules, Prometheus, Cadmus, and others, had from them the first light of all those Arts, Sciences, and ciuill Policies, which they afterward profest, and taught others: and that Pythagoras himselfe was instructed by the Lybians: to wit, from the South and Superiour Egyptians: from whom those which inhabited neerer the out-let of Nilus, as they say, borrowed their Diuinitie and Philosophie: and from them the Greekes, then barbarous, receiued Ciuilitie. Againe, the Phœnicians challenge this inuention of Letters and of Learning: acknowledging nothing from the Egyptians at all; neither doe they allow that Agenor and his sonnes were Affricans; whence Lucan.

Mansuram rudibus vocem signare figuris.

Phœnicians first (if fame may credit haue)
In rude Characters dar'd our words to graue.

And that Cadmus was the sonne of Agenor, and was a Phœnician, and not an Egyptian, it appeareth by that answer made by Zeno; when hee in a kinde of reproach was called a stranger and not a Phœnician:

Si patria est Phœnix, quid tum? nam Cadmus & ipse Athen. 1. Dipnos.
Phœnix; tui debet Græcia docta libros.

If a Phœnician borne I am, what then?
Cadmus was so: to whom Greece owes
The Bookes of learned men.

Out of doubt the Phœnicians were very ancient: and from the Records and Chronicles of Tyre, Iosephus the Historian confirmes a great part of his Antiquities. The Thracians againe subscribe to none of these reports: but affirme constantly, that the great Zamolxis flourished among them: when Atlas liued in Mauritania: Nilus and Vulcan in Egypt: and Ochus in Phœnicia. Yea, some of the French doe not blush to maintaine, that the ancient Gaules taught the Greekes the vse of Letters, and other Sciences. And doe not we know that our Bardes and Druides are as ancient as those Gaules, and that they sent their sonnes hither to be by them instructed in all kinde of learning? Iosephus contra Appionem.

Lastly, whereas others bestow this inuention on Moses, the same hath no probabilitie at all, for he liued at such time as Learning and Arts flourished most, both in Egypt, and Assyria, and hee himselfe was brought vp in all the learning of the Egyptians, from his infancie.

But true it is, that letters were inuented by those excellent Spirits of the first age, and before the generall floud: either by Seth or Enos, or by whom else God knowes; from whom all wisedome and vnderstanding hath proceeded. And as the same infinite God is present with all his Creatures, so hath he giuen the same inuention to diuers Nations: whereof the one hath not had commerce with the other; as well in this as in many other knowledges: for euen in Mexico, when it was first discouered, there was found written Bookes after the manner of those Hierogliphicks, anciently vsed by the Egyptians, and other Nations: and so had those Americans a kinde of Heraldrie; and their Princes differing in Armes and Scutchions, like vnto those vsed by the Kings and Nobilitie of other Nations, Iura naturalia communia, & generalia, &c. Naturall Lawes are common and generall. Iuristen.

§. II.
Of the Kings of Tyre.

BVt whatsoeuer remaineth of the storie and Kings of Phœnicia, the bookes of Zenon Sarboniathe, Manaseas, and others of that Nation, being no where found, the same is to bee gathered out of the Scriptures, Iosephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus.

Agenor lined at once with Iosua, to whom succeeded Phœnix, of whom that part of Canaan, and so farre towards the North as Aradus, tooke the name of Phœnicia: what King succeeded Phœnix it doth not appeare: but at such time as the Græcians besieged Troy, Phasis gouerned Phœnicia.

In Hieremies time, and while Iehoiakim ruled in Iuda, the Tyrians had a King apart: for Hieremie speaketh of the Kings of Zidon, of Tyre, of Edom, &c. as of seuerall Kings. Chap. 27. v. 3.

In Xerxes time, and when he prepared that incredible Armie wherewith hee inuaded Greece, Tetramnestus ruled that part of Phœnicia, about Tyre, and Zidon: who commanded, as some writers affirme, Xerxes fleete, or rather, as I suppose, those 300. Gallies, which himselfe brought to his aide: for at this time it seemeth, that the Phœnicians were Tributaries to the Persian: for being broken into Reguli, and pettie Kings in Hieremies time, they were subiected by Nabuchodonozor; of whose conquests in the Chapter before remembred, Hieremie prophecied.

Tennes, though not immediately, succeeded Tetramnestus, remembred by D. Siculus in his 14. Booke.

Strato, his successor, and King of Zidon, Alexander Macedon threw out, because of his dependancie vpon Darius, and that his Predecessors had serued the East Empire against the Grecians. But diuers Kings, of whom there is no memorie, came betweene Tennes and Strato. For there were consumed 130. yeeres and somewhat more betweene Xerxes and Alexander Macedon. And this man was by Alexander esteemed the more vnworthy of restitution, because (saith Curtius) hee rather submitted himselfe by the instigation of his Subiects (who foresaw their vtter ruine by resistance) than that he had any disposition thereunto, or bare any good affection towards the Macedonians. l. 4.

Of this Strato, Athenæus out of Theopompus reporteth, that hee was a man of ill liuing, and most voluptuous; also that hee appointed certaine games and prizes for Women-dancers, and singers, whom hee to this end chiefly inuited, and assembled: that hauing beheld the most beautifull and liuely among them, he might recouer them for his owne vse and delights. Of the strange accident about the death of one Strato King of these coasts, S. Hierome and others make mention: who hauing heard that the Persians were neere him with an Armie too waighty for his strength, & finding that he was to hope for little grace, because of his falling away from that Empire, and his adhering to the Egyptians; he determining to kill himselfe, but fainting in the execution, his wife being present, wrested the sword out of his hand and slew him: which done, shee also therewith pierced her owne body, and died. Athen. l. 12. c. 13. Hieron. l. 1. com. Ionin.

After Alexander was possest of Zidon, and the other Strato driuen thence, He gaue the Kingdome to Hephestion, to dispose of: who hauing receiued great entertainment of one of the Citizens, in whose house he lodged, offered to recompence him therewith; and willingly offered to establish him therein: but this Citizen no lesse vertuous than rich, besired Hephestion that this Honour might be inferred on some one of the bloud and race of their ancient Kings: and presented vnto him Balonymus, whom Curtius calls Abdolominus, Iustine Abdolomius, and Plutarch Alcimus: who at the very houre that he was called to this regall Estate, was with his owne hands working in his Garden, setting hearbs and rootes, for his reliefe and sustenance: though otherwise a wise man and exceeding iust.

These were the ancient Kings of Zidon: whose estate being afterward changed into Popular or Aristocraticall: and by times and turnes subiected to the Emperours of the East: there remaineth no farther memorie of them, than that which is formerly deliuered in the Tribe of Asser.

The Kings of Tyre, who they were before Samuels time, it doth not appeare: Iosephus the Historian, as is said, had many things wherewith hee garnished his Antiquities from the Tyrian Chronicles: and out of Iosephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus, there may begin the deſcent of ſome twenty Kings of the Tyrians, but theſe Authors, though they both pretend to write out of Menander Epheſius, doe in no ſort agree in the times of their raignes, nor in other particulars. Abibalus is the firſt King of the Tyrians that Ioſephus and Theophilus remember: whom Theophilus calls Abimelus: the ſame perchaunce that the ſonne of Sirach mentioneth in his fourtie and ſixth Chapter, ſpeaking of the Princes of the Tyrians. cap. 46.

To this Abibalus, Suron ſucceeded, if he be not one and the ſame with Abibalus. Dauid (ſaith Euſebius out of Eupolemus) conſtrained this Suron to pay him Tribute, of whom alſo Dauid complaineth, Pſal. 83. Prep. Euang. l. 9. c. 4.

Hiram ſucceeded Suron, whom Ioſephus calls Irom, and Theophilus ſometime Hierombalus, ſometime Hieromus, but Tatian and Zonaras, Chiram. Hee entred into a league with Dauid, and ſent him Cedars, with Maſons and Carpenters, to performe his buildings in Hieruſalem, after he had beaten thence the Iebuſites. The ſame was he that ſo greatly aſſiſted Salomon: whom he not onely furniſhed with Cedars, and other Materials towards the raiſing of the Temple, and with great ſummes of money, but alſo he ioyned with him in his enterprize of the Eaſt India, and of Ophir: and furniſhed Salomon with Mariners and Pilots: the Tyrians being of all Nations the moſt excellent Nauigators: and lent him 120. talents of gold. Of this Hiram, there is not onely mention in diuers places of Scripture, but in Ioſephus in his Antiquities the 7. and 8. chap. 2. & 3. in Theophilus his 3^d booke, in Tatianus his Oration againſt the Greekes: and in Zonaras, Tome the firſt. This Prince ſeemed to be very mighty and magnificent, hee deſpiſed the 20. Townes which Salomon offered him: he defended himſelfe againſt that victorious King Dauid: and gaue his daughter in marriage to Salomon, called the Zidonian: for whoſe ſake he was contented to worſhip Aſteroth, the Idoll of the Phœnicians. Hiram liued 53. yeeres. 2 Sam. 5. &c. 2 Sam. c. 5. 2 Kin. c. 1. 9. 10. 1 Chron. 14. 2 Chron. 2. 8. 9. 1 King. 11.

Baleaſtartus, whom Theoph. Antiochenus calleth Bazorus, ſucceeded Hiram, King of Tyre and Zidon, and reigned 7. yeeres according to Ioſephus. Theoph. 17. yeeres.

Abdaſhartus the eldeſt ſonne of Baleaſtartus, gouerned 9. yeeres, and liued but 20. yeeres according to Ioſephus: but after Theophilus hee reigned 12. yeere, and liued 54. who being ſlaine by the foure ſonnes of his owne Nurſe, the eldeſt of them held the Kingdome 12. yeeres.

Aſtartus brother to Abdaſtartus, recouered the Kingdome from this Vſurper, and reigned 12. yeares.

Aſtarimis, or Atharimus, after Theophilus, a third brother followed Aſtartus, and ruled 9. yeeres, and liued in all 54. Ioſeph. 54. Theoph. 58.

Phelles the fourth ſonne of Baleaſtartus, and brother to the three former Kings, ſlew Aſtarimus, and reigned 8. moneths, liued 50. yeeres. Theoph.

Ithobalus (or Iuthobalus, in Theophilus) ſonne to the third brother Aſtarimus, who was the chiefe Prieſt of the Goddeſſe Aſtarte, which was a dignity next vnto the King, reuenged the death of his father, and ſlaughtered his Vncle Phelles: and reigned 32. yeeres, the ſame which in the firſt of Kings, chap. 16. is called Ethbaal, whoſe daughter Iezabel, Achab married. Ioſeph. 32. Theoph. 32.

Badezor or Bazor the ſonne of Ithobalus or Ethbaal, brother to Iezabel, ſucceeded his Father, and reigned 6. yeeres, and liued in all 45. 1 King. 16. 31. Ioſeph. 6. yeeres Theoph. 26.

Mettinus ſucceeded Badezor, and reigned but 9. yeeres (ſaith Ioſephus) he had two ſons, Pygmalion and Barca, and two daughters Eliſa and Anna. Ioſeph. 9. Theoph. 29.

Pygmalion reigned after Mettinus his Father 40. yeeres, and liued 56. In the ſeuenth yeere of whoſe reigne, Eliſa ſailed into Affrica, and built Carthage, 143. yeeres and 8. moneths after the Temple of Salomon: which by our accompt was 289. yeeres after Troy taken, and 143. before Rome: and therefore that fiction by Virgil of Æneas and Dido muſt be farre out of ſquare. For Pygmalion couetous of Sicheus his riches, who had married his ſiſter Eliſa, ſlew him traiterouſly as he accompanied him in hunting: or if we beleeue Iuſtine and Virgil, at the Altar: whereupon Eliſa fearing to be deſpoiled of her husbands treaſure, fled by Sea into Affrica, as aforeſaid: whom when Pygmalion prepared to purſue, he was by his mothers teares, and by threats from the Oracle arreſted. Barca accompanied his ſiſter, and aſſiſted her, in the erection of Carthage: and from him ſprang that noble Family of the Barcæ in Affrica, of which race deſcended many famous Captaines, and the great Hanniball. Seruius interprets this name of Dido by Virago, becauſe of her man-like acts: others from Iedidia, a ſurname of Salomon. Iuſtin. l. 18. Virgil. l. 1.

Eluleus

Eluleus succeeded Pygmalion: and reigned 36. yeeres: the same that ouerthrew the fleet of Salmanassar, in the Port of Tyre: notwithstanding which, he continued his siege before it on the Land side fiue yeeres, but in vaine.

After Eluleus, Ethobales gouerned the Tyrians, who vaunted himselfe to bee as wise as Daniel: and that hee knew all secrets (saith Ezekiel) of whom the Prophet writeth at large in his 28. Chapter: out of whom it was gathered, that this Prince dyed, or was slaine in that long siege of Nabuchodonosor: who surrounded and attempted Tyre, 13. yeeres together, ere he preuailed.

Baal followed Ethobales, and reigned 10. yeeres a tributary, perchance, to Nabuchodonosor: for after his death, it was gouerned by diuers Iudges, succeeding each other: First, by Ecnibalus, then by Chelbis, Abarus the Priest, Mittonus, and Geraſtus, who held it among them some 7. years, and odde months: after whom Balatorus commanded therein as a King for one yeere: after him Merbalus sent from Babylon 4. yeeres: after him Iromus sent thence also, 20. yeeres. In the 17. of whose reigne Cyrus began to gouerne Persia.

§. III.

Of Bozeus his conceit, that the Edumæans inhabiting along the Red Sea, were the Progenitors of the Tyrians, and that the Tyrians from them receiued and brought into Phœnicia the knowledge of the true God.

OF the great mutations of this Kingdome and State of the Tyrians, mixed with a discourse of diuers other Nations, there is one Bozius that hath written a Tract at large, intituled de ruinis Gentium. And although the great, and many alterations found in this and other Cities, yea, in all things vnder heauen, haue proceeded from his ordinance who onely is vnchangeable, and the same for euer; yet whereas the said Bozius, inforcing heere-hence, that the prosperity and ruine of the Tyrians, were fruites of their embracing or forsaking the true Religion, to proue this his assertion, supposeth the Tyrians to haue beene Edumæans, descended from Esau, Iacobs brother: first, it can hardly be beleeued that Tyre, when it flourished most in her ancient glory, was in any sort truly deuout and religious. But to this end (besides the proofe which the Scriptures giue of Hirams good affection when Salomon built the Temple) hee brings many coniecturall arguments; whereof the strongest is their petigree and descent: it being likely in his opinion, that the posterity of Esau receiued from him by Tradition the Religion of Abraham and Isaac. That the Tyrians were Edumæans, he endeuours to shew, partly by weake reasons, painefully strained from some affinity of names, which are arguments of more delight than waight: partly by authority. For Strabo, Herodotus, Pliny, and others witnesse, that the Tyrians came from the red Sea, in which there were three Ilands, called Tyrus, Aradus, and Sidon: which very names (as he thinketh) were afterwards giuen to the Cities of Phœnicia. Considering therefore that all the coast of the Red Sea, was (in his opinion) vnder the Edumæans: as Elah and Esiongaber; or vnder the Amalekites, who descended of Amalec the Nephew of Esau, whose chiefe City was Madian, so called of Madian the sonne of Abraham by Cethura, whose posterity did people it: the consequence appeares good (as he takes it) that the Tyrians originally were Edomites: differing little or nothing in Religion from the children of Israel. Hereunto hee addes, that Cadmus and his Companions brought not into Greece the worship of Astartis, the Idoll of the Sidonians. That the Parents of Thales and Pherecydes being Phœnicians, themselues differed much in their Phylosophy from the Idolatrous customes of the Greekes. That in Teman, a Towne of the Edumæans, was an Vniuersity, wherein as may appeare by Eliphas the Temanite, who disputed with Iob, Religion was sincerely taught.

Boz. de ruin. Gent. l. 5. c. 7.

Such is the discourse of Bozius, who labouring to proue one Paradoxe by another, deserues in both very little credit. For neither doth it follow, that if the Tyrians were Edumæans, they were then of the true Religion, or well affected to God and his people: neither is it true that they were Edumæans at all. In what Religion Esau brought vp his children, it is no where found written, but that himselfe was a prophane man, and disauowed by God, the Scriptures in plaine termes expresse. That his posterity were Idolaters, is directly proued in the 25. Chapter of the second booke of Chronicles. That the Edomites were perpetuall enemies to the House of Israel, saue onely when David & some of his race, Kings of Iuda, held them in subiection, who knowes not? or who is ignorant rant of Dauids vnfriendly behauiour amongst them, when first they were subdued? Surely it was not any argument of Kindred or Alliance, betweene Tyrus and Mount Seir, that Hiram held such good correspondence with Dauid: euen then when Ioab slew all the males of Edom: neither was it for their deuotion to God, and good affection to Israel, that the Edomites were so ill intreated. It seemeth that the piety and ancient wisedome of Eliphaz the Themanite was then forgotten, and the Edumeans punished, for being such as Dauid in his owne dayes found them. Although indeed the Citie of Teman whence Eliphaz came to reason with Iob, is not that in Edumea, but another of the same name, lying East from the Sea of Galilee, and adioyning to Hus, the country of Iob: and to such the Citie of Bildad the Suhite, as both such Chorographers who best know those parts, doe plainly shew, and the holy Text makes manifest. For Iob is said to haue exceeded in riches; and Salomon in wisedome, all the people of the East; not the inhabitants of Mount Seir, which lay due South from Palestina. True it is that Eliphaz the sonne of Esau had a sonne called Teman: but that Fathers were wont in those dayes to take name of their sonnes, I no where finde. And Ismael also had a son called Thema: of whom it is not vnlike that Theman in the East had the name: for as much as in the 7. Chap. of the booke of Iudges, the Midianites, Amalekites, and all they of the East are called Ismaelites. And he that well considers how great and strong a Nation Amalec was, which durst giue battaile to the Host of Israel, wherein were 600000. able men, will hardly beleeue that such a people were descended from one of Esau his grand-children. For how powerfull and numberlesse must the forces of all Edom haue beene: if one Tribe of them, yea, one Family of a Tribe had beene so great? surely Mount Seir and all the Regions adioyning could not haue held them. But we no where finde that Edom had to doe with Amalec: or assisted the Amalekites: when Saul went to roote them out. For Amalec is no where in Scripture named as a Tribe of Edom: but a Nation of it selfe, if distinct from the Ismaelites. The like may be said of Midian, that the Founder thereof being son to Abraham by Cethura, doubtlesse was no Edomite. And thus much in generall for all the Seigniory of the Red-sea coast, which Bozius imagines the Edumeans to haue held: if the Edomites in after-times held some places, as Elan and Esiongaber on the Red Sea shore, yet in Moses time, which was long after the building of Tyre, they held them not. For Moses himselfe saith, that Israel did compasse all the borders of Edom: within which limits had Midian stood, Moses must needs haue known it: because he had soiourned long in that Country: and there had left his wife and children, when he went into Egypt.

But coniecturall Arguments, how probable soeuer, are needlesse in so manifest a case. For in the 83. Psal. Edom, Amalec, and Tyre, are named as distinct Nations: yea the Tyrians and Sidonians being one people, as all good Authours shew, and Bozius himselfe confesseth, were Canaanites, as appeares, Gen. c. 10. v. 15. & 19. appointed by God to haue beene destroyed, and their Lands giuen to the children of Asser, Ios. 19. because they were Idolaters, and of the cursed seed of Canaan, not Cousins to Israel, nor professors of the same Religion. For though Hiram said, Blessed bee God that hath sent King Dauid a wise sonne: wee cannot inferre that he was of Dauids Religion. The Turke hath said as much of Christian Princes, his confederates. Certaine it is, that the Sidonians then worshipped Astaroth; and drew Salomon also to the same Idolatry.

Whereas Hiram ayded Salomon in building the Temple, hee did it for his owne ends, receiuing therefore of Salomon great prouision of Corne, and Oyle, and the offer of 20. Townes and Villages in Galilee. And if we rightly consider things, it will appeare that Hiram in all points, dealt Merchant-like with Salomon. Hee allowed him Timber, with which Libanus was, and yet is ouer-pestered, being otherwise apt to yeeld silkes: as the Andarine silkes which come from thence, and other good commodities. For Corne and Oyle, which he wanted, he gaue that which he could well spare to Salomon. Also Gold for Land: wherein Salomon was the wiser; who hauing got the gold first, gaue to Hiram the worst Villages that he had: with which the Tyrian was ill pleased. But it was a necessary pollicy which inforced Tyrus to hold league with Israel. For Dauid had subdued Moab, Ammon, Edom, the Aramites, and a great part of Arabia, euen to Euphrates: thorough which Countries the Tyrians were wont to carry and re-carrie their Wares on Camels, to their fleets on the Red Sea, and backe againe to Tyrus: so that Salomon being Lord of all the Countries through which they were to passe, could haue cut off their Trade.

But

But the Israelites were no Sea-men, and therefore glad to share with the Tyrians in their aduentures. Yet Salomon as Lord of the Sea-townes, which his Father had taken from the Philistims, might haue greatly distressed the Tyrians, & perhaps haue brought them euen into subiection. Which Hiram knowing; was glad (and no meruaile) that Salomon rather meant as a man of peace to employ his Fathers treasure, in magnificent workes, than in pursuing the conquest of all Syria. Therefore he willingly ayded him, and sent him cunning workmen, to encrease his delight in goodly buildings, imageries, and instruments of pleasure.

As these passages betweene Salomon and Hiram, are no strong Arguments of pietie in the Tyrians: so those other proofes which Bozius frames negatiuely vpon particular examples are very weak. For what the Religion of Cadmus was, I thinke, no man knowes. It seemes to me, that hauing more cunning than the Greekes, and being very ambitious, he would faine haue purchased diuine honours: which his Daughters, Nephewes, and others of his house obtained, but his owne many misfortunes beguiled him of such hopes, if he had any. Thales and Pherecydes are but single examples: Euery saluage Nation hath some wisedome excelleth the Vulgar, euen of ciuill people. Neither did the morall wisedome of these men expresse any true knowledge of the true God. Only they made no good mention of the gods of Greece: whom being newly come thither, they knew not. It is no good argument to say, that Cadmus and Thales being Tyrians, are not knowne to haue taught Idolatry, therefore the Tyrians were not Idolaters. But this is of force, That Carthage, Vtica, Leptis, Cadiz, and all Colonies of the Tyrians (of which I thinke, the Ilands before mentioned in the Red Sea to haue beene, for they traded in all Seas) were Idolaters, euen from their first beginnings: therefore, the Tyrians who planted them, and to whom they had reference, were so likewise.

This their Idolatry from Salomons time onwards is acknowledged by Bozius, who would haue vs thinke them to haue beene formerly a strange kinde of deuout Edomites. In which fancie he is so peremptory, that he styleth men of contrary opinion, Impios politicos, as if it were impiety to thinke that God (who euen among the Heathen, which haue not knowne his name, doth fauour Vertue and hate Vice) hath often rewarded morall honesty, with temporall happinesse. Doubtlesse, this doctrine of Bozius would better haue agreed with Iulian the Apostata, than with Cyril. For if the Assyrians, Greeks, Romanes, and all those Nations of the Gentiles, did then prosper most, when they drew neerest vnto the true Religion: what may bee said of the foule Idolatry which grew in Rome, as fast as Rome it selfe grew: and was enlarged with some new superstition, almost vpon euery new victory? How few great battailes did the Romanes win, in which they vowed not either a Temple to some new god, or some new honour to one of their old gods? yea, what one Nation, saue onely that of the Iewes, was subdued by them, whose gods they did not afterward entertaine in their City? Onely the true God, which was the God of the Iewes, they reiected, vpbraiding the Iewes with him, as if he were vnworthy of the Romane Maiesty: shall we hereupon enforce the lewd and fooliish conclusion which Heathen writers vsed against the Christians in the Primitiue Church: That such Idolatry had caused the Citie of Rome to flourish, and that the decay of those abominations did also bring with it the decay of the Empire? It might well be thought so, if prosperitie were a signe or effect of true Religion. Such is the blinde zeale of Bozius, who writing against those whom he falsely termes impious, giues strength to such as are impious indeed. But such indiscretion is vsually found among men of his humour; who hauing once either fooliishly embraced the dreames of others, or vainely fashioned in their owne braines any strange Chimera's of Diuinity, condemne all such in the pride of their zeale, as Atheists and Infidels, that are not transported with the like intemperate ignorance. Great pitie it is, that such mad dogges are oftentimes incouraged by those, who hauing the command of many tongues, when they themselues cannot touch a man in open and generous opposition, will wound him secretly by the malicious vertue of an Hypocrite.

CHAP.

Chap. IX.

Of the Tribe of Ephraim, and of the Kings of the ten Tribes, whose head was Ephraim.

§. 1.

Of the memorable places in the Tribe of Ephraim.

HAuing now past ouer Phœnicia, wee come to the next Territorie adioyning: which is that of Ephraim: sometime taken per excellentiam for the whole Kingdome of the ten Tribes. Ephraim was the second sonne of Ioseph, whose issues when they left Egypt were in number 45000. all which dying in the Deserts, (Iosua excepted) there entred the Holy Land of their children growne to be able men 32500. who sate downe on the West side of Iordan, betweene Manasse, and Beniamin: who bounded Ephraim by the North and South; as Iordan, and the Mediterran Sea, did by the East and West. Psal. 59. 78. 108. Par. 25.

The first and chiefe Citie which Ephraim had, was Samaria, the Metropolis of the Kingdome of Israel, built by Amri or Homri King thereof, and seated on the toppe of the Mountaine Somron, which ouerlooketh all the bottome, and as farre as the Sea-coast. It was afterward called Sebaste, or Augusta, in honour of August. Cæsar. This Citie is often remembred in the Scriptures: and magnificent it was in the first building; for as Brochard obserueth, the ruines which yet remaine, and which Brochard found greater than those of Hierusalem, tell those that behold them, what it was when it stood vpright: for to this day there are found great store of goodly Marble pillars, with other hewne and carued stone in great abundance, among the rubble.

It was beaten to the ground by the sonnes of Hircanus the high Priest: restored and built by the first Herod the son of Antipater: who to flatter Cæsar called it Sebaste. Herein were the Prophets Helisæus, and Abdias buried: and so was Iohn Baptist. It now hath nothing but a few Cottages filled with Grecian Monkes.

Neere Samaria towards the South, is the Hill of Bethel, and a towne of that name: on the top of which Mountaine, Ieroboam erected one of his golden Calues, to be worshipped: with which he seduced the Israelites.

In sight of this Mountaine of Bethel, was that ancient Citie of Sichem; after the restauration called Neapolis, now Peloſa, and Napolasa: It was destroyed by Simeon and Leui, in reuenge of the rauishment of their sister Dina: and after that by Abimelec euened with the soyle. Ieroboam raised it vp againe: and the Damascens a third time cast it downe. Sichar. Iob. 4. 5. Maburthan. Ioseph. 11. ant. 1

Vnder Sichem toward the Sea standeth Pharaton or Pirhathon, on the Mountaine Amalec, the Citie of Abdon Iudge of Israel. And vnder it Bethoron of the Leuites, built as it is said by Sara, the daughter of Ephraim. Neere to this Citie Iudas Macchabæus ouerthrew Saron and Lysias, Lieutenants to Antiochus. This Citie had Salomon formerly repaired and fortified. Iudg. 12. 15. 2. King. 13.

Betweene Bethoron and the Sea, standeth Samir, of which Ios. 10. and Saron whose King was slaine by Iosua: it is also mentioned Acts 9. 35. and of this Saron the Valley taketh name, which beginning at Cæsarea Palæstina, extendeth it selfe alongst the coast as farre as Ioppe, saith Adrichome: though indeed the name Saron is not particularly giuen to this Valley, but to euery fruitfull plaine Region; for not onely this Valley is so called, to wit, betweene Cæsarea and Ioppe, but that also betweene the Mountaine Tabor and the Sea of Galilee: for so S. Hierome vpon the fiue and thirtieth Chapter of Esay, interprets the word Saron: and so doth the same Father in his Commentaries vpon Abdias, read Saron for Assaron: vnderstanding thereby a Plaine neere Lidda: which Lidda in his time was called Diospolis, or the City of Iupiter, one of the Toparchies of Iudæa, the fift in dignitie (or the third after Pliny) where Saint Peter (non sua, sed Christi virtute) cured Æneas. Niger calls all that Region from Anti-libanus to Ioppe, Sarona. This Ioppe Ios. c. 12. 18. Act. 6. Luc. 23. Niger. com. 4. Asiæ fol. 503. 14 was burnt to the ground by the Romanes, those Ravens and spoylers of all Estates, disturbers of Common-weales, vsurpers of other Princes Kingdomes; who with no other respect led than to amplifie their own glory, troubled the whole world: and themselues, after murthering one another, became a prey to the most sauage and barbarous Nations.

In Diospolis (saith Will. of Tyre) was S. George beheaded, and buried: in whose honour and memory Iustinian the Emperour caused a faire Church to bee built ouer his Tombe; these bee Tyrius his words: Relicta à dextris locis maritimis Antepatride, & Ioppe, per late patentem planitiem Elutheriam pertranseuntes, Liddam quæ est Diospolis, vbi & egregij Martyris Georgij vsque hodie Sepulchrum ostenditur, peruenerunt, eius Ecclesiam quam ad honorem eiusdem Martyris pius & orthodoxus Princeps Romanorum, Augustus Iustinianus multo studio & deuotione prompta edificari præceperat, &c. They hauing left (saith he) on the right hand, the Sea Townes Antipatris, and Ioppe, passing ouer the great open plaine of Elutheria, came to Lidda, which is Diospolis: where the sumptuous Tombe of the famous Martyr S. George is at this day shewed; whose Church, when the Godly and Orthodox Prince of the Romanes, High and Mighty Iustinian had commanded to be built, with great earnestnesse and present deuotion, &c. Thus farre Tyrius: by whose testimonie, wee may coniecture that this S. George was not that Arrian Bishop of Alexandria; but rather some better Christian: for this of Alexandria was slaine there in an vprore of the people, and his ashes cast into the Sea, as Ammianus Marcellinus reports. And yet also it may be, that this Georgius was a better Christian, than he is commonly thought: for his words of the Temple of Genius, How long shall this Sepulchre stand? occasioned the vprore of the people against him: as fearing lest he would giue attempt to ouerthrow that beautifull Temple. This also Marcellinus reports; who though he say that this Georgius was also deadly hated of the Christians, who else might haue rescued him: yet he addeth, that his ashes, with the ashes of two others, were therefore cast into the Sea, lest if their Reliques had beene gathered vp, Churches should bee built for them, as for others. But for my part, I rather thinke that it was not Georgius, whose name liues in the right honourable Order of our Knights of the Garter, but rather another, whom Tyrius aboue cited, witnesseth to haue beene buried at Lidda or Diospolis. The same also is confirmed by Vitriac. Saint Hierome affirmes that it was sometime called Tigrida, and while the Christians inhabited the Holy Land, it had a Bishop Suffragan.

Of this Saint George see more aboue in this 2 booke. C.7.§.3.† 5.

Salig. Tom.6. c.4.

Neere to Lidda or Diospolis standeth Ramatha of the Leuites, or Aramathia: afterward Rama, and Ramula, the natiue Citie of Ioseph, which buried the body of Christ. There are many places which beare this name of Rama; one they set in the Tribe of Iuda neere Thecua in the way of Hebron; another in Nephtalim, not far from Sephet; a third in Zabulon, which they say, adioyneth to Sepheris; a fourth, which they make the same with Silo; and a fift, which is this Rama, in the Hils of Ephraim, called Rama-Sophim, where Samuel liued, and wherein he is buried.

See in the Tribe of Benamin. cap.12.§1.

1.Sam. 25.v.1.

From hence to the North alongst the coast are Helon, or Aialon of the Leuites, of which 1. Chron. 6. Apollonia, of which Iosephus in his Antiquities, and in the war of the Iewes. Also Balsalisa (for which Iunius, 2. Reg. 4, 42. reades planities Shalissæ) they place hereabout in this Tribe of Ephraim; but Iunius vpon 1. Sam. 6. where we reade of the Land of Shalisha, findeth it in Beniamin.

Ant.13.21. de Bell.Iud.2.6.

On the other side of the Mountaines of Ephraim standeth Gosna, one of the Toparchies or Cities of gouernment, the second in dignity, of which the Country about it taketh name.

Then Thamnath-sarah, or according to the Hebrew, Thimnath-Serach: one also of the ten Toparchies or Præsidencies of Iudæa, which they call Thamnitica; a goodly City and strong, seated on one of the high Hils of Ephraim; on the North of the hill called Gaas, which City and Territory, Israel gaue vnto their Leader Iosua; who also amplified it with buildings, neere which he was buried. His Sepulchre remained in S. Hieromes time, and ouer it the Sunne engrauen, in memory of that greatest of wonders which God wrought in Iosua's time.

Iudg. 2.9. It is called Thimnath Chores. Ios.9.50.

In the places adioyning standeth Adarsa, or Adasa; where Iudas Maccabeus with 3000. Iewes ouerthrew the Army of Nicanor, Lieutenant of Syria; neere to Gasar or Gezer which Iosua tooke, and hung their King; a Citie of the Leuites. It was afterward taken by Pharaoh of Egypt; the people all slaine, and the Citie razed; Salomon re-built it.

To

To the East of this place is the Frontier City of Iesleti, of which Ios. 16. 3. otherwise Pelethi, whence Dauid had part of his Prætorian Souldiers, vnder the charge of Benaia. Then that high and famous Mountaine and City of Silo, whereon the Arke of God was kept so many yeeres, till the Philistims got it.

To this they ioyne the City of Machmas, or Michmas: in which Ionathas Maccabæus inhabited, a place often remembred in the Scriptures. It standeth in the common way from Samaria towards Hierusalem: and is now called Byra.

See in Beniamin. Macca. 1. 9. v. vlt.

Then the Village of Naioth where Saul prophecied; and neere it Ephron, one of those Cities which Abyah recouered from Ieroboam; after the great ouerthrow giuen him.

1 Kin. c. 4. and see Rama in Beniamin.

Then Kimbtsaim, of the Leuites, of which Iosua 21. 22. which Iunius thinks to be the same with Iokmeham, of which 1 Chro. 6. 28. As for Absaloms Baalasor, which they finde hereabout, Iunius reades it in the Plaine of Chatzor; and findes it in the Tribe of Iuda; as Ios. 15. we reade of two Chatzors in that Tribe; one neere Kedesh, v. 23. and the other the same as Chetzron, v. 25.

In this Tribe also they finde the City of Mello; whose Citizens, they say, ioyned with the Sichemites in making the Bastard Abimelec King: adding that for the building thereof with other Cities, Salomon raised a Tribute vpon the people. But it seemes that Mello or Millo is a common name of a strong Fort or Cittadell: and so Iunius for domus Millo, reades incolæ munitionis, and for Salomo ædificabit Millo, hee reades ædificabat munitionem, and so the Septuagint reade τὸ ὄρυγμα in that place. And without doubt the Millo which Salomon built, cannot be that of Sichem, but another in Hierusalem.

Iud. 9. ver. 6. & 20. 1 Reg. 11. 27. Vatablus expounds Millo in this place, locum publicum necessarium ciuibus Ierosolymitanis atque Israelitis. 2 King. 15. 29. Ios 17. v. 15. 16.

The other Cities of marke in Ephraim, are Taphuach, whose King was slaine by Iosua; and Ianoach or Ianoah spoyled by Teglatphalassar; Pekah then gouerning Israel; with diuers others, but of no great fame. The Mountaines of Ephraim sometime signifie the greatest part of the Land of the sonnes of Ioseph, on the West of Iordan: seuerall parts whereof are the Hill of Samron or Samaria, 1 Reg. 16. 24. * the Hill of Gahas, Iudg. 2. 9. the Hill of Tsalmon or Salmon, Iudg. 9. 48. the Hills of the Region of Tsuph or Tsophim, Iudg. 9. 5. where Rama-Tsophim stood, which was the City of Samuel.

* Also the Hill of Phinees, where Eleazar the high Priest the son of Aaron, was buried, Ios. 24. 33. And the two tops of Hills, Gerizzim where the blessings, & Hebal where the cursings were to be read to the people: of which Deut. 11. & 27. & Ios. 8.

The great plenty of fruitfull Vines vpon the sides of the Mountaines, was the occasion that Iacob in the Spirit of Prophecie, Gen. 49. 22. compared Iosephs two branches, Ephraim and Manasse, to the branches of a fruitfull Vine planted by the Well side, and spreading her [a] Daughter-branches along the Wall: which Allegory also Ezekiel, c. 22. in his lamentation for Ephraim (that is, for the ten Tribes, whose head was Ephraim) prosequutes: as also in his Lamentation for Iuda, he followeth the other Allegory of Iacobs blessing, 49. 9. comparing Iuda to a Lyon. Vpon the top of one of the highest of these Hills of Ephraim, which ouer-looketh all the plaines on both sides of Iordan, they finde the Castle called Dok: which they make to be the same with Dagon, of which Iosephus 1. Bell. Iudg. c. 2. in which Castle as it is, 1 Macc. 16. Ptolomie most traiterously, at a banquet, slew Simon Maccabæus his Father in Law.

a It seemeth that Iacob in this prophecie vse rather vseth the word Daughters for branches, thereby the more plainly to signifie Colonies: which in the Hebrew phrase are called Daughters of the Metropolis: as in Iosua and elsewhere often.

Among the Riuers of this Tribe of Ephraim, they name Gaas, remembred in the second of Samuel, c. 23. v. 30. where though Iunius reade Hiddai ex vna vallium Gahasi: yet the Vulgar and Vatablus reade Giddai of the Riuer of Gaas. Also in this Tribe they place the Riuer of Carith, by which the Prophet Elias abode during the great drought: where he was [b] fed with the Rauens: and after that the Riuer was dried vp, hee trauailed (by the Spirit of God guided) towards Sidon: where he was relieued by the poore Widow of Zarepta, whose dead sonne he reuiued, and increased her pittance of Meale and Oyle: whereby she sustained her life.

§. II.

Of the Kings of the ten Tribes from Ieroboam to Achab.

OF the first Kings of Israel, I omit in this place to speake: and reserue it to the Catalogue of the Kings of Iuda: of whom hereafter.

Touching the acts of the Kings of the ten Tribes, but briefly, beginning after the diuision from Iuda and Beniamin, now it followeth to speake. The first of these Kings Ieroboam, the sonne of Nebat, an Ephrathite of Zereda, who being a man of strength & courage, was by Salomon made ouerseer of the buildings of the Munitions in Hierusalem, for as much as belonged to the charge of the Tribes of Ephraim & Manasse: & so many of them as wrought in those works. During which time as he went from Hierusalem, he encountred the Prophet Ahijah: who made him know that he was by God destinied to be King of Israel, and to command tenne of the twelue Tribes. After this, fearing that those things might come to Salomons knowledge, he fled into Egypt to Shishak, whom Eusebius calleth Osochores, whose Daughter hee married: the Predecessor of which Shishak (if not the same) did likewise entertaine Adad the Edumæan, when he was carried young into Egypt from the furie of Dauid, and his Captaine Ioab; which Adad, the King of Egypt married to his Wiues sister Taphnes; vsing both him and Ieroboam as instruments to shake the Kingdome of Iudæa; that himselfe might the easilier spoile it, as hee did: for in the fift yeare of Reboboam, Shishak sackt the Citie of Hierusalem, and carried thence all the treasure of Dauid and Salomon, and all the spoyles which Dauid tooke from Adadezer of Soba, with the presents of Tohu, King of Hamath, which were of an inestimable value.

1 Kings 14.

This Ieroboam after the death of Salomon became Lord of the tenne Tribes: and though he were permitted by God to gouerne the Israelites, and from a meane man exalted to that state: yet preferring the policies of the world before the seruice and honour of God (as fearing that if the Tribes vnder his rule should repaire to Hierusalem to doe their vsuall Sacrifices, they might be drawne from him by degrees) he erected two golden Calues, one in Dan, and another in Bethel, for the people to worship (an imitation of the Egyptian Apis, saith S. Ambrose, or rather of Aarons Calfe in Horeb:) further he made election of his Priests out of the basest and vnlearned people. This King made his chiefe seate and Palace at Sichem: Hee despised the warning of the Iudæan Propher, whom Iosephus calleth Adon, and Glycas Ioel: his hand there-after withered, and was againe restored: but continuing in his Idolatrie; and hardned vpon occasion that the Prophet returning was slaine by a Lyon, Ahijah makes him know, that God purposed to roote out his posterity.

Ambrose vpon the 1. Chap. of the Epistle to the Romanes.

1 King. 11. 12. 13. 14. 15. Chron. 13.

Hee was afterward ouerthrowne by Abia King of Iuda, and died after hee had gouerned two and twenty yeeres; whom Nadab his son succeeded: who in the second yeere of his raigne, together with all the race of Ieroboam, was slaine, and rooted out by Baasha, who raigned in his stead: so Nadab liued King but two yeeres.

Baasha the sonne of Ahijah, the third King after the partition, made warre with Asa King of Iuda: he seated himselfe in Therza: and fortified Rama against Iuda, to restraine their excursions. Hereupon Asa entertained Benhadad of Damascus against him, who inuaded Nepthalim, and destroyed many places therein: the meane while Asa carried away the materials, with which Baasha intended to fortifie Rama; but being an Idolater, he was threatned by Iehu the Prophet, that it should befall his race, as it did to Ieroboam: which afterward came to passe: He ruled foure and twenty yeeres, and died.

1 Kings 15. & 16.

To Baasha succeeded Ela his sonne, who at a feast at his Palace of Therza, was in his cups slaine by Zambris, after he had raigned two yeeres: and in him the prophecie of Iehu was fulfilled.

Zambris succeeded Ela, and assumed the name of a King seuen dayes; But Ambris in reuenge of the Kings Murther, set vpon Zambris, or Zimri; and inclosed him in Therza, and forc't him to burne himselfe.

1 Kings 16.

Ambris or Homri succeeded Ela, and transferred the Regall seate from Therza to Samaria: which hee bought of Shemer, built, and fortified it. This Ambris was also an Idolater, no lesse impious than the rest: and therefore subiected to Tabremmon, King of Syria; the Father of Benadad according to Eusebius, Nicephorus, and Zonaras: but how this should stand, I doe not well conceiue; seeing Benadad the sonne of Tabremmon was inuited by Asa King of Iuda, to assaile Baasha King of Israel, the Father of Ela who forewent Ambris. This Ambris raigned twelue yeeres, sixe in Therza, and sixe in Samaria, and left two children, Achab and Athalia.

§. III.

Of Achab and his Successors, with the captiuitie of the ten Tribes.

ACHAB or Ahab succeeded Omri, who not onely vp-held the Idolatrie of Ieroboam borrowed of the Egyptians: but he married Iesabel the Zidonian: and as Ieroboam followed the Religion of his Egyptian Wife: so did Achab of his Zidonian:

nian: and erected an Altar and a Groue to Baal in Samaria. Hee suffered Iezabel to kill the Prophets of the most high God. God sent famine on the Land of Israel. Achab met Elias: Elias preuailed in the triall of the Sacrifice, and killeth the false Prophets; and afterward flyeth for feare of Iezabel.

Benadad, not long after besieged Samaria: and taken by Achab, was by him set at liberty: for which the Prophet (whom Glycas calleth Micheas) reproueth him: afterward he caused Naboth by a false accusation to be stoned. Then ioyning with Iosaphat in the warre for the recouery of Ramoth, he was slaine, as Micheas had foretold him.

Hee had three sonnes named in the Scripture, Ochozias, Ioram, and Ioas: besides seuentie other sonnes by sundry wiues and concubines.

Ochozias succeeded his father Achab. The Moabites fell from his obedience: he bruised himselfe by a fall: and sent for counsaile to Beel-zebub the God of Acharon. Eliah the Prophet meeteth the messenger on the way: and misliking that Ochozias sought helpe from that dead Idoll, asked the messenger, If there were not a God in Israel? Ochozias sendeth two Captaines, and with each fifty souldiers to bring Eliah vnto him, both which with their Attendants were consumed with fire. The third Captaine besought mercy at Eliahs hands, and he spared him, and went with him to the King, anowing it to the King that he must then die; which came to passe in the second yeare of his raigne. Beelzebub was the same with Belus, and Plato, saith Vigiere vpon Liui. 2 Kings 1.

Ioram, the brother of Ochozias by Iezabel, succeeded: Hee allured Iosaphat King of Iuda, and the King of Edom to assist him against the Moabites, who refused to pay him the tribute of 20000. sheepe. The three Kings wanted water, for themselues and their Horses, in the Desarts. The Prophet Elisha causeth the ditches to flow. The Moabites are ouerthrown: their King flyeth to Kirharaseth, and being besieged, according to some Expositors, burnt his sonne on the walls as a Sacrifice, whereat the three Kings, moued with compassion, returned and left Moab, wasting and spoiling that Region. Others, as it seemes with better reason, vnderstand the Text to speake of the sonne of the King of Edom, whom they suppose in this irruption to haue beene taken prisoner by the Moabites, and that the King of Moab shewed him ore the walls, threatning, vnlesse the siege were dissolued, that he would offer him in sacrifice to his gods. Whereupon the King of Edom besought those of Iuda and Israel to breake off the siege for the safety of his sonne: which when the other kings refused to yeeld vnto, & that Moab according to his former threatning had burnt the King of Edoms sonne vpon the rampire, that all the assailants might discerne it, the king of Edom being by this sad spectacle inraged, forsooke the party of the other kings, for want of whose assistance the siege was broken vp. 2 Kings 3.

After this the King of Aram sent to Ioram, to heale Naaman the Captaine of his Armie of the Leprosie. The answer of Ioram was; Am I God to kill, and to giue life, that hee doth send to heale a man from his Leptosie? adding, that the Aramite sought but matter of quarrell against him. Elisha hearing thereof, willed the King to send Naaman to him; promising that hee should know that there was a Prophet in Israel; and so Naaman was healed by washing himselfe seuen times in Iordan. Elisha refused the gifts of Naaman; but his seruant Gehazi accepted a part thereof: from whence the sellers of spirituall gifts are called Gehazites, as the buyers are Simonians of Simon Magus. 2 Kings 5.

Afterward Benhadad king of Aram or Damascus, hauing heard that this Prophet did discouer to the king of Israel whatsoeuer the Aramite consulted in his secretest councell, sent a troupe of horse to take Elisha: all whom Elisha strooke blinde, and brought them captiues into Samaria: Ioram then asked leaue of the Prophet to slay them, Elisha forbad him to harme them: but caused them to be fed and sent backe to their own Prince in safetie.

The king of Aram notwithstanding these benefits, did againe attempt Samaria, and brought the Citizens to extreame famine. Ioram imputeth the cause thereof to the Prophet Elisha. Elisha by prayer caused a noise of Chariots and armour to sound in the ayre, whereby the Aramites affrighted, fled away, and left the siege. An act of great admiration, as the same is written in the second of Kings. After this, when Azael obtained the kingdome of Syria by the death of his Master, Ioram entring vpon his frontier, tooke Ramoth Gilead: in which war he receiued diuers wounds, and returned to Iezreel to be cured. But whilest he lay there, Iehu (who commanding the armie of Ioram in Gilead, was anointed king by one of the children of the Prophets sent by Elisha) surprised 2 Kings 7.

and slew both him and all that belonged vnto him, rooting out the whole posteritie of Abab.

Iehu who reighned after Ieboram, destroyed not onely the race of his fore-goers, but also their religion; for which he receiued a promise from God, That his seed should occupie the Throne vnto the fourth generation. Yet hee vpheld the Idolatry of Ieroboam, for which he was plagued with grieuous warre, wherein hee was beaten by Hazael the Aramite, who spoiled all the Countries to the East of Iordan: in which warre hee was slaine, saith Cedrenus: whereof the Scriptures are silent. Iehu reigned 28. yeeres.

Pag. 86.

Ioachaz or Iehoahaz the sonne of Iehu succeeded his father, whom Azael and his son Benhadad often inuaded, and in the end subiected, leauing him onely 50. horse, 20. chariots, and 10000. foot; and as it is written in the Scriptures, he made them like dust beaten into powder. Ioachaz reigned 17. yeares.

2 King. 13.

After Ioachaz Ioas his sonne gouerned Israel, who when hee repaired to Elisha the Prophet as hee lay on his death-bed, the Prophet promised him three victories ouer the Aramites: and first commanded him to lay his hand on his bowe, and Elisha couered the Kings hands with his, and bad him open the window westward (which was toward Damascus) and then shoot an arrow thence out. Hee againe willed him to beate the ground with his arrowes, who smote it thrice and ceased: The Prophet then told him, that hee should haue smitten fiue or sixe times, and then he should haue had so many victories ouer the Aramites as he gaue strokes. And so it succeeded with Ioas, who ouerthrew the Aramites in three battels, and recouered the Cities and Territorie from Benhadad the sonne of Azael, which his Father Ioachaz had lost. He also ouerthrew Amazia King of Iuda, who prouoked him to make the warre, whereupon he entred Hierusalem, and sacked it with the Temple. This Ioas raigned sixteene yeeres and died; in whose time also the Prophet Elisha exchanged this life for a better.

2 King. 14.

Ieroboam the third from Iehu, followed Ioas his father, an Idolater as his predecessors; but he recouered all the rest of the lands belonging to Israel, from Hamath which is neere Libanus, to the dead Sea, and raigned one and forty yeeres.

Zacharias the fift and last of the house of Iehu, slaine by Shallum his vassall, who raigned in his stead, gouerned six moneths. Shallum held the kingdome but one moneth, being slaughtered by Menahem of the Gadites.

Menahem who tooke reuenge of Shallum, vsed great crueltie to those that did not acknowledge him: ripping the bellies of those that were with childe. This Menahem being inuaded by Phul, bought his peace with ten thousand talents of siluer, which hee exacted by a Tribute of fifty shekels from euery man of wealth in Israel. Menahem gouerned twenty yeeres.

2 King. 16. 19.

Pekahiah or Phaceia, or after Zonaras, Phacesia succeeded, and after hee had ruled two yeeres he was slaine by Phaca or Pekah the Commander of his army, who raigned in his place. In this Pekahs time, Phulassar or Tiglat-Phylassar inuaded the kingdome of Israel, and wan Iian, Abel-bethmaaca, Ianoach, Kedesh, Hasor, and Gilead, with all the Cities of Galilee, carrying them captiues into Assyria: he was drawne in by Achas king of Iudea, against Pekah and Rezin, the last of the Adades. For Achas being wasted by Pekah of Israel, and by Rezin of Damascus, did a third time borrow the Church riches, & therewith ingaged the Assyrian, who first suppressed that Monarchy of Syria and Damascus, and then of Israel: and this inuiting of the great Assyrian, was the vtter ruine of both States, of Israel and of Iudea. Pekah reigned twenty yeeres.

2 King. 15. 29.

Then Hoshea or Osea, who slew Pekah, became the vassall of Salmanassar; but hoping to shake off the Assyrian yoke, he sought aide from So, or Sua, or Sebicus King of Egypt: which being knowne to the Assyrian, he cast him into prison, besieged Samaria, and mastred it: carried the ten idolatrous Tribes into Niniue in Assyria, and into Rages in Media, and into other Easterne Regions, and there dispersed them: and replanted Samaria with diuers Nations, and chiefly with the Cuthe (inhabiting about Cutha a riuer in Persia, or rather in Arabia Deserta) and with the people Catanei bounding vpon Syria, and with those of Sepharuaim (a people of Sephar in Mesopotamia vpon Euphrates, of whose conquest Senacherib vaunteth) also with those of Aua, which were of the ancient Auins, who inhabited the Land of the Philistims in Abrahams time, dwelling neere vnto Gaza, whom the Caphtorims rooted out: and at this time they were of Arabia the Desart, called Hauei, willing to returne to their ancient seates. To these he added those of Chamath or Itureas, the ancient enemies of the Israelites, and sometime the Vassalls of the Adads of Damascus, which so often afflicted them. And thus did this Assyrian aduise himselfe better than the Romanes did. For after Titus and Vespasian had wasted the Cities of Iudæa, and Hierusalem, they carried the people away captiue: but left no others in their places, but a very few simple labourers, besides their owne thin Garrisons, which soone decayed: and thereby they gaue that dangerous entrance to the Arabians and Saracens, who neuer could be driuen thence againe to this day.

or

And this transmigration, plantation, and displantation, happened in the yeare of the world 3292. the sixth yeare of Ezekiah King of Iuda: and the ninth of Hosea the last King of Israel.

§. I.

Of Dan, whereof Ioppe, Gath, Accaron, Azotus, and other Townes.

NOw following the coast of the Mediterran Sea, that portion of Land assigned to the Tribe of Dan, ioyneth to Ephraim, whereof I spake last: of which family there were numbred at Mount Sinai 62700. fighting men, all which leauing their bodies with the rest in the Deserts, there entred the Holy Land of their sonnes 66400. bearing armes. The first famous Citie in this Tribe on the Sea-coast was Ioppe, or Iapho, as in the 19. of Iosua: one of the most ancientest of the World, and the most famous of others on that coast, because it was the Port of Hierusalem. From hence Ionas imbarked himselfe when he fled from the seruice of God, towards Tharsis in Cilicia. In the time of the Machabees this Citie receiued many changes: and while Iudas Machabæus gouerned the Iewes, the Syrians that were Garrisond in Ioppe, hauing their fleete in the Port, inuited 200. principall Citizens aboord them, and cast them all into the Sea: which Iudas reuenged by firing their fleet, and putting the companies which sought to escape, to the sword. V. 46. 2. Mac. 12.

It was twice taken by the Romanes, and by Cestius the Lieutenant vtterly burnt and ruinted. But in the yeere of Christ, 1250. Lodowick the French King gaue it new Walls and Towers: It is now the Turkes, and called Iaffa. There are certaine Rockes in that Port, whereunto it is reported, that Andromeda was fastned with chaines: & from thence deliuered from the Sea-monster by Perseus. This Fable (for so I take it) is confirmed by Iosephus, Solinus, and Plinie. Marcus Scaurus during his office of Edileship, shewed the bones of this Monster to the people of Rome. S. Hierome vpon Ionas speakes of it indifferently.

The next vnto Ioppe was Iamnia, where Iudas Macchabaus burnt the rest of the Syrian fleet: the fire and flame whereof was seene at Hierusalem 240. furlongs off. It had sometime a Bishops seate, saith Will. of Tyre; But there is no signe of it at this time, that such a place there was.

After Iamnia is the Citie of Geth or Gath, sometime Anthedon, saith Volatteran. And so Montanus seemes to vnderstand it. For he sets it next to Egypt, of all the Philistim Cities, and in the place of Anthedon. But Volatteran giues neither reason nor authority for his opinion; for Ptolomie sets Anthedon farre to the South of Ioppe: And Geth was the first and not the last (beginning from the North) of all the great Cities of the Philistims: and about sixteene miles from Ioppe; where S. Hierome in his time found a great Village of the same name. It was sometime the Habitation and Seminarie of the Anakims: strong and Giant-like-men, whom Iosua could not expell, nor the Danites after him: nor any of the Israelites, till Dauids time: who slew Goliath, as his Captaines did diuers others, not much inferiour in strength and stature vnto Goliath.

Hieron. in Michæam.

Roboam the sonne of Salomon rebuilt Geth: Ozias the sonne of Amazia destroyed it againe. It was also laid waste by Azael King of Syria. Fulke the fourth King of Hierusalem, built a Castle in the same place out of the old ruines. Whether this Geth was the same that Will. of Tyre in the holy Warre calls Ibijlin, I much doubt: the error growing by taking Geth for Anthedon.

L. 21. c. 18.

Not farre from Geth or Gath standeth Bethsemes, or the house of the Sunne. In the fields adioyning to this City (as is thought) was the Arke of God brought by a yoke of two Kine, turned loose by the Philistims: and the Bethsemites presuming to looke therein, there were slain of the Elders 70. and of the people 50000. by the ordinance of God. After which slaughter & the great lamentation of the people: it was called the great * Abel, saith S. Hierome. Benedictus Theologus findes three other Cities of this name; one in [a] Nephtalim: another in Iuda: and another in Issachar. Hierom findes a fifth in Beniamin.

Sa. 1. c. 6. v. 18.

* Or rather not the Citie it selfe but the great stone in the field, vpon which stone the Philistims set the Arke, the change being easie from Eben or Aben, which signifieth a stone, to Abel, which signifieth mourning.

Keeping the Sea-Coast, the strong Citie of Accaron offereth it selfe, sometime one of the fiue Satrapies, or Gouernments of the Philistims. S. Hierome makes it the same with Cæsaria Palæstinæ. Plinie confounds it with Apollonia: It was one of those that defended it selfe against the Danites & Idumæans. It worshipped Beel-zebub the god of Hornets or Flies. To which Idoll it was that Ahaziah King of Israel, sent to enquire of his health: whose messengers Elias meeting by the way, caused them to returne, with a sorrowfull answer to their Master. This City is remembred in many places of Scripture.

2 King. 1. but was besieged by Psammetichus, the Father of Pharao Neco for 29. yeeres together, whence Ier. 25. v. 20. speakes of the residue of Asdod, to wit, the greatest part hauing perished in this siege.

Christianus Schrot placeth Azotus next to Geth, and then Accaron or Ekron. This Azotus or Asdod was also an habitation of the Anakims, whom Iosua [b] failed to destroy, though he once possest their Citie. Herein stood a sumptuous Temple, dedicated to the [c] Idoll Dagon: the same Idoll which fell twice to the ground of it selfe, after the Ark of God was by the Philistims carried into their Temple: and in the second fall, it was vtterly broken and defaced. Neere it was that famous [d] Iudas Macchabeus slaine by Bacchides and Alcimus, the Lieutenants of Demetrius. Afterward it was taken by Ionathas: and the rest of the Citizens being put to the sword, all that fled into the Temple of Dagon, were with their Idoll therein consumed with fire: neere which also hee ouerthrew Apollonius.

Gabinius the Romane re-built it. It had a Bishops seate while Christianity flourished in those parts. But in S. Hieromes time it was yet a faire Village. And this was the last of the Sea-Townes within the Tribe of Dan.

The Cities which are within the Land Eastward from Azotus, and beyond the Fountaine of Æthiopia, wherein Philip the Apostle baptized the Eunuch, are Tsorah, or Sarxa, and Esthaol, and between them Castra Danis neere Hebron: though this place where Sampson was borne, may seeme by the words, Iud. 18. 12. to bee in the Tribe of Iudah, Iudah, as the other also were bordering Townes betweene Dan and Iuda.

After these within the bounds of Iuda, but belonging to the Danites, they finde Gedor, or as it is 1. Mac. 15. Cedron, which Cendebæus the Lieutenant of Antiochus fortified against the Iewes, and neere which himselfe was by the Maccabees ouerthrowne. 1 Mac. 15. 38.

Then Modin the Natiue Citie of the Maccabees: and wherein they were buried, on whose Sepulchre the seuen Marble Pillars, which were erected of that heighth, as they serued for a marke to the Sea-men, remained many hundreds of yeeres after their first setting vp, as Brochard and Breidenbach witnesse.

There are besides these the Citie of Cariathiarim, that is, the Citie of the woods: seated in the border of Iuda, Beniamin, and Dan, wherein the Arke of God remained twenty yeeres in the house of Aminadab: till such time as Dauid carried it thence to Hierusalem. Of this place (as they say) was Zacharias the sonne of Barachias, or Ioiada, who was slaine betweene the Temple and the Altar: also Vrias whom Ioachim King of Hierusalem slaughtered as we finde in Ieremie. Many other places which they place in this Tribe, rather as I take it vpon presumption than warrant, I omit: as that of Caspin taken with great slaughter by Iudas Machabæus: and Lechis, whose King was slaine by Iosua, in which also Amaziah was slaine: The same with Senacherib tooke, Ezekias raigning in Iuda. Alias Cariathbaal & Baaloth or Baalphatefim. 1 Sam. 7. 1. & 2 Sam. 6. 2. 2 Chron. 24. 22. Of other Cities belonging to this Tribe, see in Iosua C. 19. from the Verse 41. where also it is added that the Danites portion was too little for their number of Families: and therefore that they inuaded Lesbem, and inhabited it: which City after amplified by Philip the brother of Herod Antipas, was called Cæsarea Philippi, as before, and made the Metropolis of Ituræa, and Trachonitis: of which coasts this Philip was Tetrach: but of this Citie see more in Nephtalim. In this Tribe there are no Mountaines of fame.

It hath two Riuers or Torrents: the Norther-most riseth out of the Mountaines of Iuda: and passing by Modin, falleth into the Sea by Sachrona. The other hath the name of Sorek or Sored, whose bankes are plentifull of Vines which haue no seeds or stones: The wine they yeeld is red, of excellent colour, taste, and sauour, &c. In this Valley of Sorek, so called from the Riuer, inhabited Dalila whom Sampson loued. Hieron in Esai. & Michæam 1. Broch. Breid. Iud. 16. 4.

§. II.

THE TRIBE OF SIMEON.

THe Tribe of Simeon takes vp the rest of the Sea-coast of Canaan, to the border of Egypt: who being the second sonne of Iacob by Lea, there were increased of that Familie while they abode in Egypt, as they were numbred at Mount Sinai, 59300. able men, all which ending their liues in the Desarts, there entred the Land of Promise of their issues 22200. bearing armes, who were * in part mixed with Iuda, and in part seuered, inhabiting a small Territorie on the Sea-coast, belonging to Edumea, of which the first Citie adioyning to Dan, was Ascalon.

* And therefore no maruel that diuers places named, Ios. 15. in the large portiō of Iuda be reckoned in this Tribe: see Ios. 19. v. 1. & 9. where thus much is expressly noted.

The Reguli or pettie Kings thereof were called Ascalonitæ: of which Volaterran out of Xanthus, in the Historie of the Lydians, reports, that Tantalus and Ascalus were the sons of Hymenæus: and that Ascalus being imployed by Ciamus King of the Lydians, with an Armie in Syria, falling in loue with a young Woman of that Countrie, built this Citie, and called it after his owne name: The same hath Nicolaus in his Historie, saith Volaterran. Volat. Geog. l. 11. fol. 344.

Diodorus Siculus in his third booke remembreth a Lake neere Ascalon, wherein there hath beene a Temple dedicated to Derceto, the Goddesse of the Syrians; hauing the face of a Woman, and the body of a Fish: who, as I haue said before, in the story of Ninus, was the Mother of Semiramis, fained to be cast into this Lake, and fedde and releeued by Doues. And therefore was the Doue worshipped both in Babylonia and Syria, of which Tibullus the Poet:

Alba Palæstino sancta Columba Syro.

The white Doue is for holy held, in Syria Palæstine.

It was one of the chiefest and strongest Cities of the Philistims. It bred many learned men men (saith Volaterran) as Antiochus, Sosus, Cygnus, Dorotheus the Historian, and Artemidorus, who wrote the storie of Bithynia.

Vol. vt supra.

In Ascalon, as some say, was that wicked Herod borne, that seeking after our Sauiour, caused all the Male-children of two yeares old and vnder to bee slaine. In the Christian times it had a Bishop, and after that, when it was by the Sarazens defaced, Richard King of England, while he made Warre in the Holy Land, gaue it a new wall and many buildings: Eius muros cum Saladinus diruisset, Richardus Anglorum Rex instaurauit, saith Adrichomeus.

Adrich. in Trib. Simeon.

In Dauids time it was one of the most renowned Cities of the Philistims: for hee nameth Gath and Ascalon onely, when he lamenteth the death of Saul and Ionathan: not speaking of the other three. Tell it not in Gath, nor publish it not in the streetes of Ascalon: It is now called Scalone. Gabinius restored it as he did Azotus and Gaza.

2 Sam. 1.

Next to Ascalon stood Gaza or Gazera, which the Hebrewes call Hazza, the Syrians Azan: of Azonus (as they say) the sonne of Hercules. Other prophane writers affirme, that it was built by Iupiter. Pomp. Mela giues the building thereof to Cambyses the Persian; because belike hee rebuilt it, and Gaza in the Persian tongue is as much to say as Treasure. This Gaza was the first of the fiue Satrapies of the Philistims: and the South bound of the Land of Canaan towards Egypt. But this Citie was farre more ancient than Cambyses, as it is prooued by many Scriptures. It was once taken by Caleb: but the strength of the Anakims put him from it. At such time as Alexander Macedon inuaded the Empire of Persia, it receiued a Garrison for Darius: in despight whereof it was by the Macedonians after a long siege demolished, and was called Gaza of the Desert.

Alexander Ianneus King of the Iewes surprized it: and slew fiue hundred Senators in the Temple of Apollo, which fled thither for Sanctuarie: but this Gaza was not set vp in the same place againe, to wit, on the foundations which Alexander Macedon had ouerturned, but somewhat neerer the Sea side: though the other was but two mile off. It was a Towne of great account in the time of the Macchabees, and gaue many wounds to the Iewes till it was forst by Simon: of which hee made so great account, as that hee purposed to reside therein himselfe, and in his absence left Iohn his sonne and Successor to bee Gouernour. In Brochard his time it was still a goodly Citie, and knowne by the name of Gazara.

At the very out-let of the Riuer of Besor, standeth Maioma the Port of Gaza: to which the priuiledge of a Citie was giuen by the great Constantine, and the place called Constance after the name of the Emperours Sonne. But Iulian the Apostata soone after fauouring the Gazeans, made it subiect vnto them, and commanded it to bee called Gaza maritima.

Ios. 13. ant. 19. 21. 14. &c.

Then Raphia, where Philopater ouerthrew the great Antiochus: and beyond it Rhinocura, whose Torrent is knowne in the Scriptures by the name of the Torpent of Egypt, till the Septuagint conuerted it Rinocura: to difference it, Es. 27. 12. giuing the name of the Citie to the Torrent that watereth it. Plinie calls it Rhinocolura; and Iosephus, Rhinocorura: Epiphanius reports it as a Tradition, that at this place the world was diuided by lot, betweene the three Sonnes of Noah.

Iunius cals it Vallis Egypti, the name of the streame seems to be Sihor. See in Asser, Chap. 7. §. 3. 7. 8. in the margent a Epiph. tom. 2. in refut. Manich. & in Anacorato. Gen. 10. 19.

Within the Land and vpon the Riuer of Besor they place Gerar: which the Scripture placeth between Kadesh & Shur, Gen. 20. 1. That it was neere to the Wilderness of Beersheba, it appeares Gen. 20. 31. and therefore no maruell that as elsewhere Beersheba, so sometime Gerar, bee made the South bound of Cannaan. It was of old a distinct Kingdome from the Philistim Satrapies, the Kings by one common name were called Abimelechs; S. Hierome saith that afterward it was called Regio salutaris, the healthy Country: so that it was no maruell that Abraham and Isaac liued much in those parts. Of King Asas conquest of the Cities about Gerar, see 2. Chron. 14. 14.

1 Sam. 30.

More within the Land was Siceleg or Tsiglak, which was burnt by the Amalekites, when Dauid in his flying from Saul to the Philistims had left his carriages there, but Dauid followed them ouer the Riuer of Besor, and put them to the slaughter, and recouered the prey.

Ios. 10. 11. 12.

Next Debir sometime Cariath-Sepher, the Citie of Letters, the Vniuersitie, as they say, of Academie of old Palestine. In Saint Hieromes time it seemes it had the name of

Daema:

Daema: Ioſua 15.49. it is called Vrbs Sanna: from the name, as it ſeemes, of ſome of the Anakims, as Hebron was called Vrbs Arbahi. For euen hence alſo were theſe Giants expelled. It was taken chiefly by Othoniel, incouraged by Calebs promiſe of his Daughter in marriage: but that Ioſua and the Hoaſt of Iſrael were at the ſurpriſe, it appeares Ioſ. 10. 39. This Citie Ioſ. 21.15. is named among thoſe which out of Simeon and Iuda were giuen to the Leuites. And hence it ſeemes they attribute it to this Tribe. Ioſ. 11. v. 21.

Beſides theſe, there are many others in the Tribe of Simeon, but of leſſe fame, as Haiin, of which Ioſ. 19.7. which alſo Ioſ. 21.16. is reckoned for one of the Cities of the Leuites, giuen out of the portion of Iuda and Simeon (for which Iunius thinkes Haſham is named 1 Chron. 6.59. though * in the place of Ioſua theſe two are diſtinguiſhed) alſo Tholad ſo named 1 Chron. 4.29. for which Ioſua 19.4 wee haue Eltholad. Chatzar-Suſa ſo named Ioſua 19.5. for which Ioſua 15. wee haue Chatzar-Gadda, both names agreeing in ſignification: for Gadda is Turma, and Suſa Equitatus. * And alſo 1 Chron. 4.32.

In the ſame places of Ioſua and of the Chronicles Chorma is named, which they thinke to be the ſame with that of which Num. 14.45. to which the Amalekites and Canaanites purſued the Iſraelites: But that Chorma cannot be in Simeon, nor within the Mountaines of Edumæa. For Iſrael fled not that way: but backe againe to the Campe, which lay to the South of Edumæa, in the Deſart. Deut. 1.

The ſame places alſo name Beerſheba in this Tribe: ſo called of the Oath betweene Abraham and Abimelec: neere vnto which Hagar wandred with her ſonne Iſmael. It was alſo called the Citie of Iſaac, becauſe hee dwelt long there. While the Chriſtians held the Holy Land, they laboured much to ſtrengthen this place, ſtanding on the border of the Arabian Deſart, and in the South bound of Canaan. It hath now the name of Gibelin. The other Cities of Simeon which are named in the places of Ioſua, and of the Chronicles aboue noted, becauſe they helpe vs nothing in ſtorie, I omit them. In the time of Ezekia King of Iuda, certaine of this Tribe being ſtrengthened in their owne Territories, paſſed to * Gedor, as it is, 1 Chron. 4.39. (the ſame place which Ioſ. 15.36. is called Gedera and Gederothaima) which at that time was inhabited by the iſſue of Cham: where they ſeated themſelues: as alſo fiue hundred others of this Tribe, deſtroyed the Reliques of Amales in the Mountaines of Edom, and dwelt in their places. Gen. 21.31. * As it ſeemes in the Land of Iuda. See in the firſt Paragraph of this Chapter in the Cities of Dan. Iud. 16.3.

The Mountaines within this Tribe are few, and that of Sampſon the chiefeſt: vnto which he carried the Gate-poſt of Gaza. The Riuers are Beſor, and the Torrent of Egypt called Shichar, as is noted in Aſſer.

§. III.

THE TRIBE OF IVDA.

OF Iuda the fourth ſonne of Iacob by Lea, there were multiplied in Egypt 74600. all which (Caleb excepted) periſhed in the Deſarts. And of their ſonnes there entred the Land of Canaan 76500. bearing armes: Agreeable to the greatneſſe of this number was the greateſt Territorie giuen, called afterward Iudea: within the bounds whereof were the portions allotted to Dan and Simeon included. And many Cities named in thoſe Tribes, did firſt, as they ſay, belong vnto the Children of Iuda: who had a kinde of Soueraignetie ouer them: as Succoth, Cariathiarim, Lachis, Bethſemes, Tſiglag, Beerſheba, and others. The multitude of people within this ſmall Prouince (if it be meated by that ground giuen to this Tribe onely) were incredible, if the witneſſe of the Scriptures had not warranted the report. For when Dauid numbred the people, they were found fiue hundred thouſand fighting men.

The Cities of Iuda were many. But I will remember the chiefeſt of them: beginning with Arad, or Horma, which ſtandeth in the entrance of Iudea from Idumæa: whoſe King firſt ſurprized the Iſraelites as they paſſed by the border of Canaan towards Moab, and tooke from them ſome ſpoyles, and many priſoners: who being afterward ouerthrowne by the Iſraelites, the ſonnes of Keni, the Kinſmen of Moſes, obtained a poſſeſſion in that Territorie: who before the comming of the Iſraelites, dwelt betweene Madian and Amalek. Num. 21. v. 3. Ioſ. 12. v. 14. Iud. 1. v. 16.

Following this Frontier towards Idumæa and the South, Aſcenſus Scorpionis, or Acrabim is placed: the next to Arad: ſo called becauſe of Scorpions, which are ſaid to bee in Num. 34. 4. Deut. 8. 15.

that

that place: from which name of Acrabbim, Hierome thinkes that the name of the Toparchie called Acrabathena was denominated: of which we haue ſpoken in Manaſſes. On the South ſide alſo of Iudea they place the Cities of Iagur, Dimona, Adada, Cedes, Aſbna, Iethnam, and Aſor or Chatſor, moſt of them Frontier Townes.

And then Ziph: of which there are two places ſo called: one beſides this in the body of Iuda, of which the Deſart and Forreſt adioyning tooke name: where Dauid hid himſelfe from Saul. After theſe are the Cities of Eſron, Adar, Karkah, and Aſcemona, or Hatſmon, of no great fame.

Turning now from Idumæa towards the North, wee finde the Cities of Danna, Shemah, Amam, the other Aſor, or Chatſor, Behaloth, and the two Sochoes: of all which ſee Ioſ. 15. alſo Carioth by Ioſua, c. 15. v. 25. called Kerioth: whence Iudas the Traitor was called Iſ-carioth, as it were a man of Carioth. Then Hetham the abode of Sampſon which Reboboam reedified. Beyond theſe towards the North border, and towards Eleutheropolis, is the Citie of Iethar, or Iathir, belonging to the Leuites. In Saint Hieromes time it was called Iethira: and inhabited altogether with Chriſtians: neere vnto this Citie was that remarkable battaile fought betweene Aſa King of Iuda, and Zara King of the Arabians, who brought into the field a Million of fighting men: and was notwithſtanding beaten and put to flight: Aſa following the victory as farre as Gerar, which at the ſame time he recouered.

Not farre from Iether, ſtandeth Iarmuth, whoſe King was ſlaine by Ioſua, and the City ouerturned. Next vnto it is Mareſa the natiue City of the Prophet Michæa: Betweene it and Odolla, Iudas Macchabæus ouerthrew Gorgias, and ſent thence ten thouſand Dragmas of ſiluer to be offered for Sacrifice.

Odolla or Hadullam it ſelfe was an ancient and magnificent Citie, taken by Ioſua, and the King thereof ſlaine. Ionathas Macchabæus beautified it greatly. Then Ceila or Keila afterward Echela, where Dauid ſometime hid himſelfe: and which afterward hee deliuered from the aſſaults of the Philiſtims: neere which the Prophet Abacuc was buried: whoſe monument remained, and was ſeene by S. Hierome.

Neere it is Hebron, ſometime called the Citie of Arbah, for which the Vulgar hath Ciriatharbe: the reaſon of this name they giue, as if it ſignified the Citie of foure: becauſe the foure Patriarchs, Adam, Abraham, Iſaac, and Iacob, were therein buried, but of Adam it is but ſuppoſed: and it is plaine by the places, Ioſua 14. 14. and 15. 13. and 20. 11. that Arbah here doth not ſignifie foure, but that it was the name of the Father of the Giants called Anakim, whoſe ſonne as it ſeemes Anak was: and Achiman, Sheſhai, and Talmai (whom Caleb expelled, Ioſ. 15.) were the ſonnes of Anak, Num. 13. 23. The name of Anak ſignifieth Torquem, a chaine worne for ornament; and it ſeemes that this Anak inriched by the ſpoyles which himſelfe and his Father got, wore a chaine of gold, and ſo got this name: and leauing the cuſtome to his poſteritie, left alſo the name: ſo that in Latine the name of Anakim may not amiſſe be expounded by Torquati.

The Citie Hebron was one of the ancienteſt Cities of Canaan, built ſeuen yeeres before Tſoan or Tanis in Egypt: and it was the head and chiefe Citie of the Anakims, whom Caleb expelled: to whom it was in part giuen, to wit, the Villages adioyning, and the reſt to the Leuites. It had a Biſhop in the Chriſtian times, and a magnificent Temple built by Helen the Mother of Conſtantine.

Not farre hence they finde Eleutheropolis, or the free Citie, remembred often by Saint Hierome. Then Eglon whoſe King Dabir aſſociated with the other foure Kings of the Amorites, to wit, of Hieruſalem, Hebron, Iarmuth, and Lachis, beſieging the Gibeonites, were by Ioſua vtterly ouerthrowne. From hence the next City of fame was Emaus, afterward Nicopolis, one of the Cities of Gouernment or Præſidencies of Iudæa. In ſight of this Citie Iudas Maccabæus (after hee had formerly beaten both Apollonius and Seron) gaue a third ouerthrow to Gorgias Lieutenant to Antiochus.

In the yeere 130. it was ouerturned by an earth-quake, ſaith Euſebius. In the Chriſtian times it had a Biſhops ſeate of the Dioceſſe of Cæſaria of Paleſtine.

From Emaus toward the Weſt Sea there are the Cities of Nahama, Bethdagon, and Gader or Gedera, or Gederothaima, of which and of Gederoth, * Ioſ. 15. v. 36. and 41. Then Azecha, to which Ioſua followed the ſlaughter of the fiue Kings before named, a Citie of great ſtrength in the Valley of [a] Terebinth, or Turpentine, as the Vulgar readeth, 1. Sam. 17. 2. whence (as it ſeemes) they ſeate it neere vnto Soco, and vnto Lebna of the Leuites.

Leuites. It reuolted from the subiection of the Iewes, while Ioram the sonne of Iosaphat ruled in Hierusalem: And next vnto this standeth Bnceda, which Iosua vtterly dispeopled.

On the other side of Emaus towards the East standeth Bethsur, otherwise Bethsora, and Bethsor: one of the strongest and most sought for places in all Iuda. It is seated on a high Hill; and therefore called Bethsur (the house on the Rocke, or of strength.) It was fortified by Roboam, and afterward by Iudas Macchabæus. Lysias forc't it, and Antiochus Eupator by famine: Ionathas regained it: and it was by Simon exceedingly fortified against the Syrian Kings. Ioseph. ant. 13. 9 1 Macc. 1. 6.

Bethleem is the next vnto it within sixe miles of Hierusalem, otherwise Lehem: sometime Ephrata, which name, they say, it had of Calebs wife, when as it is so called by Moses before Caleb was famous in those parts, Gen. 38. 16. Of this Citie was Abessan, or Ibzan, Iudge of Israel, after Iephtah, famous for the thirty sonnes and thirty daughters begotten by him. Elimelec was also a Bethlemite, who with his wife Naomi sojourned in Moab during the famine of Iuda in the time of the Iudges, with whom Ruth the daughter in law of Naomi returned to Bethleem: and married Booz, of whom Obed, of whom Ishai, of whom Dauid. It had also the honour to bee the native City of our Sauiour Iesus Christ; and therefore shall the memorie thereof neuer end. Gen. 53. 48. Ruth. 1.

In Zabulon of Galilee there was also a City of the same name: and therefore was this of our Sauiour called Bethleem Iuda. Hieron in com. super. Mat. c. 2. Math. 2. 1.

From Bethleem some foure or fiue mile standeth Thecua, the City of Amas the Prophet: and to this place adioyning is the City of Bethzacaria, in the way betweene Bethsura and Hierusalem: on whose Hils adioyning, the glorious guilt shields of Antiochus shined like lamps of fire in the eyes of the Iewes. The City of * Bezek was also neere vnto Bethleem, which Adoni-Bezec commanded; who had during his raigne tortur'd 70 Kings, by cutting off the ioynts of their Fingers and Toes; and made them gather bread vnder his Table: but at length the same end befell himselfe by the sonnes of Iuda, after they had taken him prisoner. Amos 1. v. 1. 1 Mac. 6. 32. Ioseph. ant. 12. c. 14. 1 Mac. 6. v. 36. * See in Manass. C. 7. §. 7. †. 1. Iud. 1. v. 6. & 7.

The rest of the Cities in this part (most of them of no great estimation) we may passe by vntill wee come to the magnificent Castle of Herodium, which Herod erected on a Hill, mounting thereunto with 200 Marble steps, exceeding beautifull and strong. And towards the Dead Sea, and adioyning to the Desart of Iaruel, betweene it and Tekoa, is that Elinadus stanidus, where, in the time of Iehosaphat, the Iewes stood and look't on the Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites, massacring one another, when they had purposed to ioyne against Iuda: neere which place is the Valley of blessing, where the Iewes the fourth day after, solemnly came and blessed God for so strange a deliverance. Iosc. 14. ant. 22. 2 Chron. 20. v. 16. & 26.

Now the Cities of Iuda which border the Dead Sea, are these; Aduran beautified by Roboam: and Tsohar, which the Vulgar calleth * Segor: so called because Lot in his prayer so fit veged that it was but a little one: whence it was called Tsohar, which signifieth a little one: when as the old name was Belah, as it is Gen. 14. 2. In the Romanes times it had a Garrison, and was called (as they say) Pannier: in Hieromes time Balexona. Then Engaddi or Hengaddi, first Asasontamar: neere vnto which are the Gardens of Balsamum, the best that the world had called Opobalsamum: the most part of all which Trees Cleopatra Queene of Egypt sent for out of Iudæa, and Herod who either feared or loued Anthony her husband, caused them to be rooted vp and presented vnto her: which shee replanted neere Heliopolis in Egypt. This City was first taken by Chedorlaomer, and the Amorites thence expelled. It was one of the most remarkable Cities of Iudæa; and one of the Presidencies thereof. 2 Chron. 11. * Some call it Bal-salisa and Vitula orsternans. See in Gad. c. 10. §. 5. post principium in Haroher. Gen. 19. 20. Hieron. in Osee Hebr. Chatsatson-thamar. 2 Chron. 20. 2. Gen. 14. 7.

The rest of the Cities are many in the In-land, and among them Iesrael: not that which was the Citie of Naboth, of which already; but another of the same name, the Citie of Achinoan, the wife of Dauid, the mother of that Ammon, whom Absalom slew: also as some thinke the Citie of Amasa, Absaloms Lieutenant, and the commander of his Armies. But this seemeth to be an error grounded vpon the neerenesse of the words, Israel and Iesrael: and because the 2 Sam. 17. 25. Amasaes father is called a Israelite, who first of the Chronicler, is called an Ismaelite: indeed the Hebrew Orthographie sheweth that Amasaes Father is not said to be of the Citie Iesrael, but an Israelite in Religion, though otherwise an Ismaelite. 1 Reg. 21. 2 Sam. 17. 25.

In this Tribe there were many high Hills and Mountaines, as those of Engaddi vpon the the Dead Sea: and the Mountaines of Iuda, which begin to rise by Emaus, and end neere Taphna, and these part Iuda from Dan and Simeon. Of others which stand single, there is that of Hebron, at the foot whereof was that Oake of Mambre, where the three Angels appeared to Abraham; which S. Hierome calleth a Fir-tree, and saith, that it stood till the time of Constantine the younger. There is also that Mountaine, called Collis Achillæ, on the South of Ziph: on the top whereof the great Herod, inclosing the old Castle, erected by Ionathas Macchabæus, and called Massada, garnished it with 27. high and strong Towers: and therein left Armour and furniture for an hundred thousand men; being as it seemeth a place vnaccessible, and of incomparable strength.

Hieron. in loc. Heb. & quæst. Hebr. Ioseph. 14. Ant. c. 20.

In the Valley afterward called the Dead Sea, or the lake Asphaltitis, this Countrie had foure Cities, Adama, Sodom, Seboim, and Gomorra, destroyed with fire from Heauen for their vnnaturall sinnes.

§. IIII.

THE TRIBE OF REVBEN and his Borderers.

†. I.

The Seates and bounds of Midian, Moab, and Ammon, part whereof the Reubenites wanne from Sehon King of Hesbon.

ON the other side of the Dead Sea, Reuben the eldest of Iacobs sonnes inhabited: of whose children there were numbred at Mount Sinai 46000. who dying with the rest in the Desarts, there remained to possesse the Land promised 43700. bearing armes. But before we speake of these or the rest that inhabited the East side of Iordan, something of their borderers: to wit, Midian, Moab, and Ammon, whose land in our writers are confusedly described, and not easily distinguished. And first wee are to remember, that out of Abrahams kindred came mighty Families: as by Isaac and Iacob the Nation called Israel, and afterward Iewes: by Esau or Edom the Idumæans: by Ismael the eldest sonne of Abraham, the Ismaelites: and by Keturah his last wife the Midianites. And againe by Lot, Abrahams brothers sonne, those two valiant Nations of the Moabites and Ammonites; all which being but strangers in the Land of Canaan (formerly possest by the Canaanites, and by the Families of them descended) these issues and alliance of Abraham, all but Iacob, whose children were bred in Egypt, inhabited the frontier places adioyning.

Esau and his sonnes held Idumæa, which bounded Canaan on the South, Ismael tooke from the South-east part of the Dead Sea; stretching his possession ouer all Arabia Petræa, and a part of Arabia the Desart, as farre as the Riuer of Tigris, from Sur to Hauilah.

Moab tooke the rest of the coast of the dead Sea, leauing a part to Midian, and passing ouer Arnon, inhabited the plaines betweene Iordan and the Hills of Abarim or Arnon, as farre North as Essebon, or Chesbon.

Ammon sate downe on the North-east side of Arnon, and possest the Tract from Rabba afterward Philadelphia, both within thu Mountains of Gilhead, and without them as far forth as Aroer, though in Moses time he had nothing left him in all that Valley: for the Amorites had thrust him ouer the Riuer of Iaboc, as they had done Moab ouer Arnon. As these Nations compassed sundry parts of Canaan, so the border betweene the Riuer of Iaboc and Damascus was held by the Amorites themselues, with other mixt Nations: all which Territorie on the East side of Iordan, and on the East side of the Dead Sea, was granted by Moses to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and halfe Manasse; whereof that part which Moab had, was first possest by the Emims a Nation of Giants weakened & broken by Chedorlahomer, after repulsed by the Moabites, as before remembred. That which the Ammonites held, was the Territorie and ancient possession of the Zamzummims or Zuræi, who were also beaten at the same time by Chedorlahomer, Amraphel, and the rest: and by them an easie way of conquest was prepared for the Ammonites.

Num. 21. v. 24.

Gen. 14.

Now where it is written that Arnon was the border of Moab, the same is to be vnderstood according to the time when Moses wrote. For then had Sehon or his Ancestor beaten beaten the Moabites out of the plaine Countries, betweene Aburim and Iordan, and driuen them from Heſbon ouer Arnon; and this happened not long before Moſes arriuall vpon that border, when Vaheb gouerned the Moabites. For hee that ruled Moab when Moſes paſt Arnon, was not the ſonne of Vaheb, but his name was Balac the ſonne of Zippor. And it may be that thoſe Kings were electiue, as the Edumæans anciently were.

Now all that part of Moab, betweene Arnon and Iordan, as farre North as Eſſebon, was inhabited by Reuben. And when Iſrael arriued there out of Egypt, it was in the poſſeſſion of Sehon, of the race of Canaan by Amoreus: and therefore did Iephtah the Iudge of Iſrael iuſtly defend the regaining of thoſe Countries againſt the claime of the Ammonites: becauſe (as he alleaged) Moſes found them in the poſſeſſion of the Amorites, and not in the hands of Moab or Ammon: who (ſaith Iephtah) had 300. yeares time to recouer them, and did not: whence he inferreth, that they ought not to claime them now. Iudg. 11.

And leſt any ſhould maruell why the Ammonites in Iephtahs time ſhould make claime to theſe Countries: whereas Moſes in the place Numb. 21. v. 26. rather accounts them to haue beene the ancient poſſeſſion of the Moabites, than of the Ammonites: it is to be noted that Deut. 3. 11. when it is ſaid that the Iron bed of Og was to be ſeene at Rabbath, the chiefe Citie of the Ammonites, it is alſo ſignified, that much of the Land of Og, which the Iſraelites poſſeſſed, was by him or his Anceſſors got from the Ammonites, as much of Sehons was from the Moabites.

And as the Canaanite Nations were ſeated ſo confuſedly together, that it was hard to diſtinguiſh them: ſo alſo were the ſonnes of Moab and Ammon, Midian, Amalek, and Iſmael. Yet the reaſon ſeemeth plaine enough why Ammon commanded in chiefe, in Iephtahs time; for ſometime the one Nation, ſometime the other of all thoſe borderers acquired the Soueraignetie: and againe, that one part of the Land which Gad held, namely within the mountaines of Galaad, or Gilhead, and as farre South as Arroer, belonged to the Ammonites. And therefore taking aduantage of the time, they then ſought to recouer it againe. Yet at ſuch time as Moſes ouerthrew Sehon at Iahaz, the Ammonites had loſt to the Amorites, all that part of their poſſeſſion which lay about Arroer, and betweene it and Iabot: Sehon and Og, two Kings of the Amorites hauing diſplanted both Moab & Ammon of all within the Mountaines. For it is written in the one and twentieth of Numb. v. 24. that Iſrael conquered the Land of Sehon from Arnon vnto Iabot, euen vnto the children of Ammon; ſo as at this time the River of Iabot was the South bound of Ammon, within the Mountaines, when as anciently they had alſo poſſeſſions ouer Iabot, which at length the Gadites poſſeſt, as in the 13. chapter of Ioſua. verſ. 25. it appeares. Ioſ. 13. ver. 25. Iunius notes that the one halfe of the Land of Hammon, which in this place of Ioſua is ſaid to haue beene giuen to the Gadites, was taken firſt from the Ammonites by Sehon: but the place Deut. 2. 11. proues that aſwell Og, as Sehon, had gotten Lands out of the hands of the Ammonites.

†. II.

Of the memorable places of the Reubenites.

THe chiefe Cities belonging to Reuben were theſe, Kedemoth, for which the Vulgar, without any ſhew of warrant, readeth Iethſon. The Vulgar or Hierome followed the Septuagint, thoſe two verſes 36. and 37. in Ioſ. 21. being wanting in the old Hebrew Copies, and the Septuagint reade Kedſan for Kedmoth, which Kedſon by writing ſlipt into Iethſon. Ioſ. 21. 37.

This City which they gaue to the Leuites, imparts her name to the Deſart adioyning: from whence Moſes ſent his Embaſſage to Sehon. In the ſame place of Ioſua where this Kedemoth is mentioned, the Vulgar for Beſer & villa eius, reades Boſor in ſolitudine Miſor, without any ground from the Hebrew: whence Adrichomius makes a Towne called Miſor, in the border betweene Reuben and Gad. Farther from Kedemoth neere the Dead Sea, (for the Countrie betweene being Mountainous hath few Cities) they place two Townes of note, Laſa or Leſhaſh, of which Geneſis 10. verſe 19. The Greekes call it Calirhoe: neere which there is a Hill, from whence there floweth Springs both of hot and cold, bitter and ſweet water; all which ſoone after their riſing, being ioyned in one ſtreame, doe make a very wholeſome Bath, eſpecially for all contraction of ſinewes: to which Herod the elder, when hee was deſperate of all other helpe, repaired, but in vaine. Others ſay that theſe Springs ariſe out of the hills of Macharus, in this Tribe. The like fountaines are found in the Pyrenyes: and in Peru, called the Baths of the Inga's or Kings. The other towne is Macharus, the next betweene Laſa and Iordan: of all that part of the world the ſtrongeſt In-land Citie and Caſtle, ſtanding vpon a Mountaine Deut. 2. 26. It was a marginall note out of Deut. 3. where the 70. kept the word Miſor, ſignifying a plaine, which after crept into the Text. Ioſep. 17. ant. c. 9. & Hierom. in quæſt. Heb. in Gen. Acoſta. l. 3. Ioſep. ant. 13. c. 24. & 14 ant. c. 10. & alibi. Ioſep. bell. Iud. l. 7. c. 25.

euery way vnaccessible. It was first fortified by Alexander Iannæus, who made it a frontier against the Arabians: but it was demolished by Gabinius, in the war with Aristobulus, saith Iosephus. It was thither (saith Iosephus) that Herod sent Iohn Baptist, and wherein he was slaine: his armie soone after being vtterly ouerthrowne by Aretas King of Arabia, and himselfe after this murther neuer prospering. Not farre from Macherus was Bosor or Bozra, a towne of refuge, and belonging to the Leuites, and neere it Liuias vpon Iordan, which Herod built in honour of Liuia the mother of Tiberius Cæsar.

Deut 4.43. Ios. 20.8. Euseb in Chron. Hier. in loc. hebr.

To the North of Liuias is Setim, or Sittim: where the children of Israel embraced the daughters of Midian or Moab: and where Phineas pierced the body of Zimri and Cosbi, with his speare, bringing due vengeance vpon them, when they were in the midst of their sinne: and from hence Iosua sent the Discouerers to view Ierico, staying here vntill hee went ouer Iordan. As for the Torrent Setim, which in this place Adrichomius dreames of, reading Ioel 3.18. irrigabit torrentem Setim: The vulgar hath torrentem spinarum: and Iunius, vallem Cedrorum: expounding it not for any particular place in Canaan: but for the Church, in which the iust being placed, grow as the Cedars, Psal. 92.13.

Num. 25.1. Ios. 3.1.

The plaine Countrie hereabout, by Moses called The plaines of Moab, where he expounded the Book of Deuteronomie to the people a little before his death, is in the beginning of the same book precisely bounded by Moses. On the South it had the great Desert of Paran, where they had long wandred. On the East it had Chatseroth, & Dizahab (of which two the former is that Gazorus, of which Ptolomie in Palestina, the later was a Tract belonging to the Nabathæi in Arabia Petræa, where was * Mezahab, of which, Gen. 36.39.) by the Geographers called Medaua and Medaba. On the West it had Iordan, and on the North it had Laban (in Iunius Edition, by the fault of the Print, Lamban, Deuteron. 1.1.) the same which the Geographers call Libias: and some confound it with Liuias, of which euen now we spake.

Deut. 34.1.

* The same as it seems which Num. 21.30. is called Medeba, whence we reade of the plaines of Medeba Ios. 13.v. 9.16. of which also wee reade in the wars of Dauid against Hanun the Ammonite, 1 Chron. 19.7. Also, 1 Macc. 9.36. Esai. 16.2. See before c. 5. §. 7.

Also on the same North side towards the confines of Cœlesyria, it had Theophel: whereabout sometime Pella of Cœlesyria stood: which was in the region of Decapolis, and as Stephanus saith, was sometime called Butis. It is also noted in Moses to bee ouer against or neere vnto Suph, for which the Vulgar hath the Red Sea, as also Num. 21.14. it translateth the word Suphah in like manner: whereas in this place of Deuteronomie there is no addition of any word in the Hebrew to signifie the Sea: and yet the Scripture, when this word is so to be taken, vseth the addition of Mare, thereby to distinguish it from the region of Suph or Suphah: which doubtlesse was about these plaines of Moab towards the dead Sea: where the Countrie being full of reedes, was therefore thus called: as also the red Sea was called Mare Suph, for like reason.

Iob. 1.28. Iud. 7.24. Iosep. ant. 4.7.

The place in these large plaines of Moab, where Moses made those diuine exhortations, some say was Bethabara where Iohn baptized, which in the Storie of Gideon is called Beth-bara. Iosephus sayes it was where after the Citie Abila stood, neere Iordan, in a place set with Palme trees: which sure was the same as Abel-sittim in the Plaines of Moab, Numb. 33.49. (that some call Abel-sathaim and Bel-sathim) which is reckoned by Moses in that place of Numbers for the 42. and last place of the Israelites incamping in the time of Moses: This place is also called Sittim; which word if we should interpret, wee should rather bring it from Cedars, than from Thornes, with Adrichomius and others. It was the wood of which the Arke of the Tabernacle was made.

Num. 25.1. Exod. 25.10.

Toward the East of these plaines of Moab, they place the Cities, Nebo, Baal-Meon, Sibma and Hesbon the chiefe City of Sehon, and Elhahel, & Kiriathaima the seate of the Giants Emim. Of the two first of these Moses seemes to giue a note that the names were to be changed: because they tasted of the Moabites * Idolatrie. For Nebo (in stead of which Iunius, Es. 46.1. reades Deus vaticinus) was the name of their Idoll-Oracle, and Baal-meon is the habitation of Baal. Of the same Idoll was the Hill Nebo in these parts denominated: from whose top, which the common Translators call Phasgah, Moses before his death saw all the Land of Canaan beyond Iordan. In which storie Iunius doth not take Phasgah or Pisgah, for any proper name: but for an appellatiue, signifying a Hill: and so also Vatablus in some places; as Num. 21.20. where hee noteth that some call Pisgah that top which looketh to Iericho, and Hair as it looketh to Moab, which opinion may be somewhat strengthened by the name of a Citie of Reuben mentioned Ios. 13.20. called Ashdoth-Pisga, which is as much as decursus Pisgæ: to wit, where the waters did rutne downe from Pisga. In the same place of Iosua there is also named Beth-peor, as belon-belonging to Reuben: so called from the Hill Peor: from whence also Baal the Idoll was called Baal-Peor, which they say was the same as Priapus: the chiefe place of whose worship seemes to haue beene Bamoth-Baal, of which also *Ios.*13. in the Cities of Reuben: for which *Num.*22.41. they reade, the high places of Baal (for so the word signifieth) to which place Balaak first brought Balaam to curse the Israelites.

What name they vsed for Nebo it doth not appeare: but Baal-meon it seemes they named sometime Bayth, as *Es.*15.2. and sometime Beth-meon 23., *Esai.*48.

†. III.

Of diuers places bordering Reuben belonging to Midian, Moab or Edom.

10 THere were besides these diuers places of note ouer Arnon, which adioyned to Reuben: amongst which they place Gallim, the Citie of Phalti: to whom Saul gaue his Daughter Michol from Dauid: but Iunius thinkes this Towne to be in Beniamin: gathering so much out of Esay 10. verse 29. where it is named among the Cities of Beniamin. With better reason perhaps out of *Numb.*21.*v.*19. wee may say that Mathana and Nahaliel were in those confines of Reuben: through which places the Israelites past after they had left the Well called Beer: Then Deblathaim which the Prophet Hieremie threatneth with the rest of the Cities of Moab. *1 Sam.*25.*v.*xlt. *Hierem.*48.

Madian also is found in these parts, the chiefe Citie of the Madianites in Moab: but not that Midian or Madian by the Red Sea; wherein Iethro inhabited. For of the Madianites 20 there were two Nations, of which these of Moab became Idolaters, and receiued an exceeding ouerthrow by a Regiment of twelue thousand Israelites, sent by Moses out of the plaines of Moab: at such time as Israel began to accompanie their Daughters: their fiue Kings with Balaam the Soothsayer were then slaine: and their Regall Citie with the rest destroyed. The other Madianites ouer whom Iethro was Prince, or Priest, forgat not the God of Abraham their Ancestor; but relieued & assisted the Israelites in their painfull trauailes through the Deserts: and were in all that passage their guides. In the South border of Moab adioyning to Edom, and sometime reckoned as the chiefe City of Edom, there is that Petra which in the Scriptures is called Selah, which is as much as rupes or petra. It was also called Iocthеel, as appeares by the place 2 *Reg.*14. It was built (saith Iosephus) by 30 Retem, one of those fiue Kings of the Madianites, slaine as before is said: after whom it was called Retem: Now they say it is called Crac and Mozera. The Soldans of Egypt, for the exceeding strength thereof, kept therein all their treasures of Egypt and Arabia: of which it is the first and strongest Citie: the same perhaps which Plinie and Strabo call Nabathea, whence also the Prouince adioyning tooke name: which name seemes to haue beene taken at first from Nabaioth the sonne of Abraham by Kethura. For Nabathea is no where vnderstood for all Arabia Petræa, (at least where it is not mis-understood) but it is that Prouince which neighboureth Iudæa. For Pharan inhabited by Ismael, whose people Ptolomie calleth Pharanites, in stead of Ismaelites, and all those Territories of the Cusites, Madianites, Amalekites, Ismaelites, Edomites, or Idumæans, the Lands of Moab, Ammon, Hus, Sin, and of Og, King of Basan, were parts of Arabia Petræa: though it bee also true, that some part of Arabia the Desert belonged to the Amalekites, and Ismaelites: all which Nations the Scriptures in the first of Chronicles the fift calls Hagarens of Hagar. *Es.*16.1. *2 Reg.*14.7. *Lib.*4. *Ant.*7. *1 Chron.*5.*v.*19. & 20.

This Citie Petra, Scaurus besieged with the Roman Army, & finding the place in shew impregnable, he was content by the perswasion of Antipater, to take a composition of monie, and to quit it. Yet Amasias king of Iuda (after he had slaughtered 10000. of the Arabians in the valley called Salinarum) wan also this City. S. Hierome findes Ruth the Moabite to be naturall of this City. In the meane time when the Christians held the Kingdome of Hierusalem, it had a Latine Bishop, hauing before been vnder the Greeke Church. It is seated not far from Hor where Aaron died, & on the other side towards the North is the riuer of 50 Zared or Zered, by which Moses incamped in the 38. Station. Adrichomius describeth the waters of Memrim, or rather Nemrim, in his Map of Reuben, not far hence, and betweene Zared and Arnon: and so hee doth the Valley of Saue: but the waters of Nimra, or Beth-Nimra (for which it seemes Adrichomius writ Nemrim) refresh the plaines of Moab: and the confluence of those waters of Nimra are in the Tribe of Gad. Saue also cânot be found in this place, that is, to the South of Arnon, and vnder Midian. For after Abraham returned from the pursuit of the Assyrian and Persian Princes, the King of Sodom met him in the Valley of Saue, or Saueh, which is the Kings Dale, where Absalom set vp his Monument, as it seemes, not farre from Hierusalem. And at the same time Melchizedec King of Salem *Guil.Tyr.*20. bell. sanct. *Numb.*21. *Deut.*2.13. *Num.*32.3. *Ios.*13.27. *Esa.*15.8.

also incountred him. But Abraham coming from the North, and Melchizedec inhabiting, either neere Bethsan otherwise Scythopolis in the halfe Tribe of Manasse, or in Hierusalem (both places lying to the West of Iordan) could not incounter each other in Arabia: and therefore Saue, which was also called the Kings Dale, could not be in these parts.

Of the Dead Sea.

NOw because the Sea of Sodom or the Dead Sea, called also the Lake of Asphaltitis, and the salt Sea (in distinction from the Sea of Tyberias which was fresh water) also the Sea of the Wilderneſſe, or rather the Sea * of the plaines, is often remembred in the Scriptures, and in this ſtorie also, therefore I thinke it not impertinent, to ſpeake ſomewhat thereof. For it is like vnto the Caſpian Sea, which hath no out-let or disburthening. The length of this Lake Ioſephus makes 180. furlongs (which make 22. miles and a halfe of ours) and about 150. in breadth, which makes 18. of our miles and ſomewhat more. Plinie makes it a great deale leſſe. But thoſe that haue of late yeares ſeene this Sea, did account it (ſaith [a] Weiſſenburg) eight Dutch miles (which is two and thirtie of ours) in length: and two and a halfe of theirs (which is ten of ours) in breadth. Of this Lake or Sea, Tacitus maketh this report: Lacus eſt in immenſo ambitu, ſpetie maris, ſapore corruptior, grauitate odoris accolis peſtifer: neq; vento impellitur, neq; piſces aut ſuitas aquis volucres patitur, incertum vnde ſuperiecta vt ſolido ferantur, periti imperitiq; nandi perinde attollantur, &c. That it is very great, and (as it were) a Sea of a corrupt taſte: of ſmell infectious, and peſtilent to the borderers: it is neither moued nor raiſed by the winde, nor indureth fiſh to liue in it, or fowle to ſwimme in it. Thoſe things that are caſt into it, and the vnskilfull of ſwimming, aſwell as the skilfull, are borne vp by this water. At one time of the yeare it caſteth vp Bitumen: the Art of gathering which, Experience (the finder of other things) hath also taught. It is vſed in the trimming of ſhips, and the like buſineſſes.

And then of the Land, he ſpeaketh in this ſort: "The fields not farre from this Lake "which were ſometime fruitfull and adorned with great Cities, were burnt with light-"ning; of which the ruines remaine, the ground looking with a ſad face, as hauing loſt "her fruitfulneſſe; for whatſoeuer doth either grow or is ſet thereon, be it fruits or flow-"ers, when they come to ripeneſſe, haue nothing within them, but moulder into aſhes: Thus farre Tacitus. And it is found by experience, that thoſe Pomegranates and other Apples or Oranges, which doe ſtill grow on the bankes of this curſed Lake, doe looke faire, and are of good colour on the out-ſide, but being cut haue nothing but duſt within. Of the Bitumen which this Lake caſteth vp, it was by the Greekes called Aſphaltis. Veſpaſian deſirous to be ſatisfied of theſe reports, went of purpoſe to ſee this Lake, and cauſed certaine Captiues to be caſt into it, who were not onely vnskilfull in ſwimming, but had their hands alſo bound behinde them, yet notwithſtanding they were carried on the face of the waters, and could not ſinke.

*. So Iunius reades for the Hebrew Araboth euery where, and ſo alſo the editiõ of Vatablus, Deutr. 3. 17. though Deutr. 4. 44. it hath mare ſolitudinis, as alſo 2 Reg. 14. 25. the reaſon of this name ſeemes to be, becauſe it ioynes to the plaines of Moab which are called Harboth Moab, Deutr. 34. 1. as alſo we haue Ceſuloth in Harbath, that is in the plaines, to wit, of Zabulon, 1 Macch. 9. 2. whence Adrichomius imagines a City in Zabulon called Araba.

†. V.
Of the Kings of Moab, much of whoſe Countrie within Arnon Reuben poſſeſt.

OF the Kings of Moab, whoſe Countrie (within Arnon) Reuben poſſeſt (though not taken from Moab but from Sehon the Amorite) few are known. Iunius in the 21. of Numbers, verſ. 14. names Vaheb, which ſeemes to be the Anceſtor or Predeceſſor of Balac, the ſonne of Zippor, which Balac ſent for Balaam to curſe Iſrael. For fearing to contend with Moſes by armes by the examples of Sehon and Og, hee hoped by the helpe of Balaams curſings or inchantments, to take from them all ſtrength and courage, and to caſt on them ſome peſtilent diſeaſes. And though Balaam at the firſt, moued by the ſpirit of God, bleſt Iſrael contrary to the hope and deſire of Moab: yet being deſirous in ſome ſort to ſatisfie him, and to doe him ſeruice, he aduiſed Moab to ſend Madianitiſh Women among the Iſraelites: hoping by them, as by fit inſtruments of miſchiefe, to draw them to the Idolatrie of the Heathen; but in the end hee receiued the reward of his falling from God, and of his euill counſaile, and was ſlaine among the reſt of the Princes of Midian.

Num. 21. 22. 23. 24. Ioſ. 24.

After theſe times the Kings of the Moabites are not named: ſauing that wee finde in the firſt of Chronicles the fourth, that Iokim, and the men of Chozeba, and Ioaſh, and Sareph, Sareph, all being of the issue of Iuda, sometime had the Dominion in Moab: but as it is written in the same Verse, These also are ancient things: to wit, as some expound it, the particulars of these mens Gouernments are no where extant or remaining: or as others, hec prius fuere, these Families of Iuda were once thus famous: but now their posteritie choose rather to abide in Babylon, and be Clay-workers to the King there. V. 22.

Then we finde Eglon King of Moab, who with the helpe of Ammon, and Amalec ma- Iudg. 3. stered Israel, and commanded them eighteene yeares: which Eglon, Ehud slew in his owne house, and afterward 1000. of his Nation. What name the King of Moab had vnto whom Dauid fled fearing Saul, it doth not appeare: or whether it were the same against 1 Sam. 22.
whom Saul made Warre, it is not manifest, for neither are named. But in respect that this Moabite was an enemy to Saul, he receiued Dauid, and relieued him; knowing that 1 Sam. 14.
Saul sought his life.

After this, Dauid himselfe entred the Region of Moab, but not likely in the same Kings 2 Sam. 8.

ning that hee would reduce them to such an abiection, and appoint them for base seruices: And that he would tread downe the Idumæans.

The next King after Dauids time, of the Moabites, whose name liueth, was Mesha: who falling from Iuda, (perhaps in remembrance of the seueritie of Dauid) fastened himselfe to the Kings of Israel, and paid tribute to Ahab 100000. Lambes, and 200000. Rams, 2 Reg. 3 with the wooll: who reuolting againe from Israel after the death of Ahab, was inuaded by Iehoram: with whom ioyned the Kings of Iuda and Idumæa: and being by these three kings prest and broken, hee fled to Kir-hareseth, as is else-where shewed. There is also mention made of the Moabites without the Kings name: when that Nation, assisted by the Ammonites and Idumæans, inuaded Iehoshaphat: and by reason of some priuate quarrels among themselues, the Moabites and Ammonites set vpon the Idumæans, and slaughtered them: and then one against another; so as Iehoshaphat had a notorious victorie ouer them all, without either bloud or wound. 2 Chron. 20.
Also in the time of Hieremie the Prophet, there was a King of Moab which is not named, which was after Mesha of Hierem. 27.
Moab many descents: for Mesha liued with Iehoram, and this Moabite in Zedekias time, fourteene Kings of Iuda comming betweene, who wasted three hundred and odde yeares.

§. V.

Of the memorable places of the Gadites, and the bordering places of Ammon.

THe Territory adioyning to Reuben, is that of Gad: whereof all that part which ioyned to the Mountaines, was sometime in the possession of the Ammonites, as farre to the South as Aroer. Of the children of Gad the seuenth son of Ia- Gen. 30.

the Deserts, 45550. and of their sonnes there entred the Land promised, 45000. bearing armes: from the halfe Tribe of Manasse the Riuer of Iabec diuided them: from Reuben the Cities of Hesbon, Elhele, and Aphec. Ios. 13.

The chiefe Citie of Gad was Aroer: which they make to be the same with Ar, or Rab- Esai. 15.
bath Moab, the great or commanding Moab. But the learned Iunius attending diligentlie Deut. 2. to those words of Moses, Deut. 2. 36. Ab Aroër quæ est in ripa fluminis Arnon, & Ciuitate ipsa quæ est in flumine; where the Citie in the Riuer is distinguished from the Citie vpon the banke of the Riuer, (as also in like manner Ios. c. 12. v. 2. and c. 13. v. 9.) thinketh that Haroher which doubtlesse belonged to the Gadites (as Numb. 32. 34. it is said that they built it) was indeed seated neere Har of the Moabites, but diuers from it. For that Har was neuer possest by Moses, it is plaine Deuteronomie 2. 9. where God forbidding Moses to touch it, saith, hee hath giuen Har for an inheritance to the sonnes of Lot. Now that this Citie, which in diuers places is said to be within and in the middle of the Riuer of Arnon (and so distinguished from Haroher, which is said in the same places to bee on the banke of Arnon) is Har of the Moabites, the same Iunius prooueth out of Numb. 21. 15. where Arnon is said to bee diuided into diuers streames, where or among which Har is seated: And the same is confirmed by the place of Ios. 13. 25. where Haroher is said to bee seated before Rabbah: which Rabbah as it seemes, cannot bee the Rabbah of the Ammonites (for they seate not Haroher neere it; nor in sight of it) and therefore by Rabbath here wee must vnderstand Rabbah of Moab, which they make to be Ar or Har: and so wee must needs distinguish it from Haroher. And as for * Har (which also gaue the name to the coast adioyning) it seemes it continued in the possession of the Moabites after they had once expelled the Giant-like people called Emims, first weakened by Chedorlaomer and his Associates: but Haroher by the interchange of times suffered many ancient changes, as being wonne from the Moabites by Sehon, and from him by the Israelites, and from them, as it seemes in the story of Iephtha, by the Ammonites: and from the Ammonites againe by the Israelites vnder the conduct of Iephtha. In S. Hieromes time the greatest part of this Citie perished by an earthquake, as also Zoar, in which Lot saued himselfe, in the destruction of Sodom, seated not farre hence: which they say was therefore called Vitula Consternans, because as a wanton tumbling Heifer, she was thrice ouerthrowne with earth-quakes: for which cause also Hierome seemes to thinke that this Zoar was called Salissa, or Bal-salissa, as if Baal had beene a remainder of the old name Balah, or Belah, (of which Gen. 14.2.) and Salisha, which hath a signification of the ternarie number, had alluded to the three earth-quakes.

* Deut. 2.9. Out of which place the words, Num. 21.28. are to be expounded not that the citie of Hor, but the coast adioyning was wasted by Sehon.
Gen. 14.5.
Iudg. 11.35.
Hier. in epitap. Paul. & in quæst. & loc. Hebr. See Iunius his annotations vpon 1 Sam. 9.2. where hee makes Shalisha a plaine Countrie in Beniamin, and the same with Baalshalisha, 2. Reg. 4.42. where he expounds Bal or Baal to be as much as planities. Esa. 15. Hier. 48. Esa. 15.21.
Iudg. 8.11.

Brochard takes Haroher to be Petra, but erroneously, as before it is noted; seeing that Petra was in the South border of Moab, adioyning to Edom, whereas Haroher is in the North-East border. Betweene Haroher and Iordan they seate Dibon, which is attributed to the Gadites, because they are said to haue built it, Numbers 32.34. though Iosua 13. verse 17. it is said that Moses gaue it to the Reubenites. Of this Citie among the rest of Moab, both Esay and Hieremy prophecied, that it should perish, and the Lakes about it runne with the bloud of the Inhabitants. It was a great Village neere Arnon in Saint Hieromes time.

Keeping the bankes of Arnon, one of the next Cities of fame to Aroer, was Bethnimrah, of which Esay prophecieth, That the waters thereof should be dried vp: and all the vale of Moab withered. Not farre from Bethnimrah in this Tribe Adrichomius placeth Iogbeha, and Nobach or Nobe: of both which wee reade in the storie of Gideon: and that Iogbeha was in Gad, built by the Gadites, it appeares, Numb. 32.35. and therefore Nobach also must needs be in these parts; but whether in Gad or Manasse it is not certaine: only that it was anciently called Kenath, Moses witnesseth. Nobach also (saith hee) went and tooke Kenath with her Townes, and called it Nobach of his owne name, where because the verses precedent speake of the Manassites, and because it is not likely that Moses would haue seuered this seate of the Gadites from the rest, of which he spake before, v. 34.35.36. therefore it may seeme that this * Nobach was in that part of Manasse, which was in the East of Iordan: though Adrichomius place it in Gad. For whereas he supposeth it to bee the same with Nob, which Saul destroyed, of this we shall speake [a] in the Tribe of Beniamin. And as for that Karkor where Zebach and Salmũnah rested themselues in their flight from Gideon, to which place Gideon marched through this Nobach and Iogbeha, though some place in it Gad, and make it the same with Kir-chares, of which Esay 15, and 2 Reg. 3.25. yet there can be no certainty that it was in Gad: and if it be the same with Kir-chares, it is certaine that it was a principall Citie held still by the Moabites, and not in the Tribe of Gad.

Num. 32.35.

* Num. 21.30. It is called Nophach, and placed in the border of the kingdome of Sehon, towards Basan, and therefore it is not altogether vnprobable that it was in Gad.
a Chap. 12. §. 1.
Iudg. 8.10.
Num. 32.34. 35.

In the body of this Tribe of Gad they place Hataroth: of which name the Scripture witnesseth that two Cities were builded by the Gadites; the former simply called Hataroth, the later Hatroth-Sophan: for which later the Vulgar makes two Cities, Roth and Shophan: the name Hataroth, is as much as Corona.

In the Valley of the Kingdome of Sehon, together with Bethnimrah, of which we haue spoken, Iosua cap. 13. v. 27. nameth Beth-haram and Succoth: the former, Numb. 32.36. (where it is called Beth-haram) together with Bethnimra, is said to haue been built by the Gadites, which (perhaps the rather, because in Iosua it is called Beth-Haram,) some take to be Betaramptha, (of which [b] Iosephus) after by Herod called Iulias. But whether this Betaramptha were corrupted from Beth-Haram, or from Beth-Aramatha (of which Aramatha there is mention in [c] Iosephus) or from Beth-Remphan (of which Remphan, an Idoll of those Countries, wee reade, Acts 7.43. and to which Iunius referres the name of the Citie Rephan, 1 Macchab. 37.) of this question it were hard to resolue. But touching Iulius (according to Iosephus sometime Bataramptha) the same Iosephus placeth in the Region of Perea, beyond Iordan, which Regio Perea, as the Greeke word signifieth, is no no more than Regio vlterior, the Countrie beyond the Riuer; and therefore they which labour to set downe the bounds of this Perea, take more paines than needs. Foureteene Villages this Iulias had belonging vnto it, according to Iosephus. Hee makes it to haue beene built by Herod Antipas, and named Iulias, in honour of the adoption of Liuia Augustus his Wife, into the Iulian family: by which adoption she was called Iulia. Another Iulias, hee saith was built by Philip the brother of Herod, in the lower Gaulanitis, which, he saith, is the same as Bethsaida. Ant. 20. 11. Iosep. Ant. 18. 3. & Bel. Iudg. 2. 8.

Vpon the Sea of Galilee neere to Iulias in Perea, (that is, in the Region ouer Iordan) they finde Vetezobra, as it is called in Iosephus, for Beth-ezob, which is as much as domus hissopi. Of a noble woman of this Citie, which for safegard in the time of Warre with the Romans, came with many others into Hierusalem, and was there besieged. Iosephus in the place noted, reports a lamentable History; how for hunger shee ate her owne childe, with other tragicall accidents hereupon ensuing. Iosep. de Bell. Iudg. l. 7. 4. 8.

Of Succoth (which we said Ios. 13. is placed with Ben-haran, in the Valley of the Kingdome of Sehon) it is plaine by the story of Gidion that it is neere vnto Iordan: where it is said, that as he was past Iordan with his three hundreth, wearie in the pursuite of Zebah and Salmunnah, hee requested reliefe of the men of Succoth: who denying him, and that with contempt, in Gidions returne were by him tortured, as it seemes vnder a threshing Carre of Tribulum, betweene which and their flesh he put Thornes to teare their flesh as they were prest and trod vnder the Tribulum, and after which sort also Dauid vsed some of the Ammonites, though not with Thornes, but with Iron teeth of the Tribulum. As for the name of Succoth, which signifieth such Tabernacles as were made in haste, either for Men or Cattell, Moses, Gen. 33. 17. witnesseth that the originall of the name was from such harbours, which Iacob in his returne from Mesopotamia built in that place: as also the place beyond the Red Sea, where the children of Israel, as they came from Rameses in Egypt, had their first Station, was vpon like reason called Succoth: because there they set vp their first Tabernacles or Tents: which they vsed after for forty yeares in the Wildernesse. In remembrance whereof, the Feast of Succoth, or Tabernacles was instituted. Iudg. 8. 5. 2 Sam. 12. 31. Exod. 12. 37. Leuit. 23. 43.

Other foure Cities of Gad are named, Ios. 21. 38. Ramoth in Gilead, Machanaïm, Chesbon, and Iahzer, all of them by the Gadites giuen to the Leuites; of which Iahzer, as Chesbon or Hesbon was a chiefe City of Sehon, whence Num. 32. 1. his Countrie is called the Land of Iahzer. It was taken by Moses, hauing first sent spies to view it. In the first of the Chronicles it is made part of Gilead. In later times (as it may bee gathered by the prophecie of Esay, touching Moab) it was possessed by the Moabites: to which place of Esay, also Hieremie in a like prophecie alludes. It was at length regained (but as it seemes from the Ammonites) by Iudas Macchabeus: as it is 1 Macc. 5. 8. where Iunius out of Iosephus, reades Iahzer, though the Greeke hath Gazer. For Gazer or Gezer (as he gathereth out of Iosua 16. 3. & 8. and Iudg. 1, 29.) was farre from these Countries of Sehon, seated in the West border of Ephraim, not possessed by the Israelites, vntill Salomons time, for whom the King of Egypt wanne it from the Canaanite, and gaue it him as a Dowrie with his Daughter. Num. 32. 32. 1 Chro. 27. 31. Esay 6. 8. Hieron. 48. 32.

Of Chesbon it may be maruelled that in the place of Iosua, and 1 Chron. 6. 81. it should be said to haue beene giuen to the Leuites by the Gadites, seeing Iosua 13. v. 17. it is reckoned for a principall Citie of the Reubenites: Adrichomius and such as little trouble themselues with such scruples, finding Casbon, 1 Macc. 5. 36. among the Cities of Gilead, taken by Iudas Maccabeus, makes two Cities of one: as if this Casbon had beene the Chesbon of Gad; and that of Reuben distinct from it: but the better reconciliation is, that it being a bordering Citie, betweene Gad and Reuben, was common to both, and that the Gadites gaue their part to the Leuites, for so also it seemes that in like reason Dibon is said in one place built by the Gadites, and in another giuen to Reuben, as before is noted. Of Machanaïm, which word signifieth a double Armie, wee reade Gen. 32. 2. that it was therefore so called, because the Angels of God in that place met Iacob in manner of another Host or company, to ioyne with his for his defence: as also Luke 2. 13. wee reade of a multitude of the Host of Heauen, which appeared to the sheepeheards, at the time of our Sauiours birth: and so vnto the godly King Oswald of Northumberland, when hee was soone after to ioyne battaile with the Pagan Penda of middle-England, Beda reports, that the like comfort appeared: whence the field where the

Battaile was fought in the North-parts of England, is called Heauen-field. In this Citie of Machanaym Dauid abode during the rebellion of Absalom: and the same for the strength thereof Abner chose for the seate of Ishboseth, during the warre betweene Dauid and the house of Saul.

Of the fourth Towne which was Ramoth in Gilead, wee reade often in the Scripture, for the recouering of which King Achab lost his life. Iunius thinkes that Ramatha Mitspa, of which Iosua 13.26. was this Ramoth in Gilead. Concerning the place where Laban and Iacob sware one to the another, as it was called Gilead, which is as much as a witnessing heape, because of the heape of Stones which Laban and his sonnes left for a monument; so also that it was called Mitspah, which signifieth ouer-looking (because there they called God to ouer-see and be witnesse to their couenant) it is plaine by the place, *Gen.*31.49. that in these parts there was not onely a Towne, but likewise a Region called Mitspa, it appeares, Ios. 11.3. where we reade of the Chiuuites vnder Hermon, in the Countrie of Mitspa, * the Towne of Mitspa, as it seemes both by this place, and in the eight verse following, being not in the Hill Countrie, but in the Valley. But seeing that Iephta the Iudge of Israel, who after he came home from Tob, (whither his brethren had driuen him) dwelt in this Towne of Mitspa, who doubtlesse was of the Tribe of Manasse, and thence at first expelled by his brethren, it may seeme that they doe not well which place this Towne of Mitspa rather in Gad, than in Manasse. By Iudas Macchabeus this Towne of Mitspa, (whether in Gad or in Manasse) was vtterly spoiled and burnt, and the males of it slaine: for it was then possest of the Ammonites.

* Of other townes of this name, see in the Tribe of Beniamin.

1 *Macc.*5.35.

Betweene Succoth (of which wee haue spoken) and the Riuer Iaboc was that Peniel or Pennel, which name signifieth Locum faciei Dei; A place where the face of God was seene: so called for memory of the Angels appearing to Iacob, and wrestling with him there: the churlishnesse of which Citie, in refusing to relieue Gideon, was the cause that in his returne he ouerthrew their Towre, and slew the chiefe Aldermen thereof. To these places of the Gadites, then adde Rogelim, the Citie of that great and faithfull subiect Barzillai, as it seemes, not farre from Mahanaima, where hee sustained King Dauid, during Absaloms rebellion. To these they adde the Towne of Gaddi, Arnon, and Alimis, of which Gaddi, being in Hebrew no more than Gaddim, is ignorantly made a name of a place. Arnon also no where appeares to be the name of a Towne, but still of a Riuer. Alimis Adrichomius frames of ἐν Ἀλέμοις, 1 *Mac.*5.26. so that the name should rather bee Alema; but Iunius out of Iosephus reades Malla, for this in Alimis: and vnderstanding Malla to bee put for Millo, and to bee as much as Munitio, (as wee haue shewed touching the Millo of the Sechemites) hee takes this Malla, to bee Mitspa Moabitarum, of which 1 Sam. 22.3. As for that Mageth which Adrichomius findes in this Tribe of Gad, it is that Mahacath, which Moses notes to be as farre as the furthest of Manasses, out of the bounds of this Tribe. So also Dathema, of which 1 *Mac.*5.10. (which Iunius takes to be [a] Rithma, of which *Num.*33.18. a place of strength in the Territory of the Ammonites) and in like manner Minnith, and Abel vinearum, though by some they bee attributed to the Gadites, or to their borders, yet they are found farther off. For of the two last wee reade in Iephta's pursuit of the Ammonites: seated as it seemes by that place of the booke of Iudges, the former of them in the South border, and the other of them in the East border, both farre remoued from the Gadites. But the chiefe City of the Ammonites was neerer, and not farre from the borders of Gad. It is called in the Scriptures sometime Rabbath, as *Deut.*3.11. but more often Rabba. It is supposed to bee that * Philadelphia which Ptolomie findes in Cœlosyria. Hierome and Calistus in Arabia. It was conquered by Og from the Ammonites: but as it seemes neuer possest by the Israelites, after the ouerthrow of Og, but left to the Ammonites: whereupon at length it became the Regall seate of the Ammonites, but of old it was the possession of the Zamzummims: which is much to say, as men for all manner of craft and wickednesse infamous. The same were also called Raphaim, of whom was Og, which recouered much of that which the Ammonites had got from his Ancestors; who hauing beene first beaten by the Assyrians, and their assistants (as the Emims in Moab, and the Horims in Seir had beene) were afterward the easier conquered by the Ammonites, as the Emims were by Moab, and the Horims by the Idumæans. Yet did the races of Emoreus, of whom these Giants were descended, contend with the Conquerours for their ancient inheritance: and as Sehon of Hesbon had dispossest Moab, so had Og of Basan the Ammonites, and betweene them recouered the best part

Deut. 3.14. Ios. 12.5.

[a] The letters D. & R. in the Hebrew are very like, so that one is oft mistaken for another, and sometime without mistaking one is put for another: as for Rodanim, 1 *Chr.*7. we haue Dodanim.Gen. 10.4.

* Other names of this Citie according to Stephanus were Ammana and Astarte: but in this latter perhaps he mistooke, which might seeme to be the same Astaroth one of the chiefe Cities of Og, of which in that which remaineth to be spoken of Manasses. Adrichomius sayes, it was also called Vrbs aquarum, because of the part of all the Valley, betweene the Mountaines and Iordan. For this Og was also master of Rabba or Philadelphia: And in the possession of the one or of the other of these two, Moses and Israel found all those Cities and Countries which were giuen to Reuben, Gad, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse. So that though it were 450. yeares since that these Zamzummins or Raphaims were expelled, yet they did not forget their ancient inheritance: but hauing these two Kings of one kinred, and both valiant and vndertaking men, to wit, Og and Sehon, both Amorites, they recouered againe much of their lost possessions, and thrust the sonnes of Lot ouer the Mountaines, and into the Desarts. And as the Kings or Captaines of Persia and Assyria, (remembred in the 14. of Genesis) made way for Ammon, Moab, and Edom, so by that great conquest which Moses had ouer those two Amorites, Og and Sehon, did the Moabites and Ammonites take opportunitie to looke backe againe into those plaines; and when the Reubenites, Gadites, and Manassites forsooke the worship of the liuing God, and became sloathfull and licentious, they taking the aduantage inuaded them, and cast them out of their possessions: and were sometime their masters, sometime their tributaries, as they pleased or displeased God: and according to the wisedome and vertue of their Commanders.

In this Citie of Rabba, was the Iron bed of Og found, nine cubites of length, and foure of breadth. The Citie was taken in Dauids time, and the Inhabitants slaine with great seuerity, and by diuers torments. At the first assault thereof Vrias was shot to death, hauing beene by direction from Dauid appointed to be imployed in the leading of an assault, where he could not escape: wherein also many of the best of the Armie perished: and wherein Dauid so displeased God, as his affaires had ill successe afterward, euen to his dying day. From hence had Dauid the weighty and rich crowne of Gold, which the Kings of Ammon ware: or which, as some expound it, was vsed to be put on the head of their Idoll, waighing a talent, which is 60. pound waight after the common talent. In the time of Christians it had a Metropolitan Bishop, and vnder him twelue others.

The Mountaines which are described within this Tribe, and that of Manasse, with a part of Reuben, are those that Ptolomie calleth the hils of Hippus, a City of Cœlosyria: and Strabo * Trachones: the same which continue from neere Damascus vnto the Desarts of Moab: and receiue diuers names, as commonly mountaines doe, which neighbour and bound diuers Countries: for from the South part, as farre Northwards as Asteroth, the chiefe City of Og, they are called Galaad or Gilead; from thence Northward they are knowne by the name of Hermon, for so Moses calleth them: The Sidonians name them Shirion, but the Amorites Shenir; others Seir: of which name all those hills also were called, which part Iudæa and Idumæa: and lastly, they are called Libanus, for so the Prophet Hieremie makes them all one, calling the high mountaines of Galaad, the head of Libanus. These Mountaines are very fruitfull, and full of good pastures, and haue many trees which yeeld Balsamum, and many other medicinable drugs. The Riuers of this Tribe are the waters of Nimrah, and Dibon, and the Riuer Iaboc: Others doe also fancie another Riuer, which rising out of the Rockes of Arnon, falleth into Iordan.

riuer Iabocs winding about it, but in the place 2 Sam. v. 27. whence he gathers this opinion Iunius reades intercepi ab vrbe aquam, if wee must reade with others, cepit vrbem aquarum, yet it cannot be taken of Rabba it selfe, but of some Fort adioyning. Gen. 14.

§. VI.

Of the Ammonites, part of whose Territories the Gadites wanne from Og the King of Basan.

THis Tribe of Gad possest halfe the Countrie of the Ammonites, who together with the Moabites, held that part of Arabia Petrea called Nabathea, as well within as without the Mountaines of Gilead; though at this time when the Gadites wanne it, it was in the possession of Sehon and Og, Amorites: and therefore Moses did not expell the Ammonites, but the Amorites, who had thrust the issues of Iut ouer the mountaines Trachones or Gilead, as before. After the death of Othoniel the first Iudge of Israel, the Ammonites ioyned with the Moabites against the Hebrewes, and so continued long. Iephte Iudge of Israel had a great conquest ouer one of the Kings of Ammon, but his name is omitted. In the time of Samuel they were at peace with them againe.

Iud. 10.

Afterward wee finde that cruell King of the Ammonites, called Nahas: who besieging Iabes Galaad, gaue them no other conditions but the pulling out of their right eyes. The reason why he tendred so hard a composition, was (besides this desire to bring shame shame vpon Israel) because those Gileadites vsing to carry a Target on their left armes, which could not but shadow their left eyes, should by losing their right, be vtterly disabled to defend themselues: but Saul came to their rescue, and deliuered them from that danger. This Nahas, as it may seem, became the confederate of Dauid, hauing friended him in Sauls time, though Iosephus thinkes that this Nahas was slaine in the battaile, when Saul raised the siege of Iabes, who affirmeth that there were three Kings of the Moabites of that name.

Hanun succeeded Nahas: to whom when Dauid sent to congratulate his establishmene, and to confirme the former friendship which he had with his Father, hee most contemptuously and proudly cut off the Ambassadours garments to the knees, and shaued the halfe of their beards. But afterward notwithstanding the aydes receiued from the Arabians subiect to Adadezer, and from the Reguli of Rehob, and Maacah, and from Istob, yet all those Arabians, together with the Ammonites, were ouer-turned: their chiefe Citie of Rabba, after Philadelphia, was taken; the Crowne which weighed a talent of gold was set on Dauids head; all such as were prisoners, Dauid executed with strange seuerity; for with Sawes and Harrowes he tare them in pieces, and cast the rest into Lime-kils.

Istob, that is, the men of Thob: Thob is a small Territorie vnder Aram hils. Rehob is another betweene Hazor & Sidon, in the North bound of Canaan, Num.13. 22. of which see in the Tribe of Asser.

Iosaphat gouerning Iuda, they assisted the Moabites their neighbours against him, and perished together. Osias made them Tributaries, and they were againe by Iotham inforc't to continue that Tribute, and to increase it, to wit, a hundreth talents of siluer, ten thousand measures of Wheat, and ten thousand of Barley: which the Ammonites continued two yeares.

The fift King of the Ammonites, of whose name we reade, was Baalis, the confederate of Zedechia: after whose taking by Nabuchodonosor, Baalis sent Ismael of the bloud of the Kings of Iuda, to slay Gedaliah, who serued Nabuchodonosor.

§. VII.
Of the other halfe of Manasse.

THe rest of the Land of Gilead, and of the Kingdome of Og in Basan, with the Land of Hus, and Argob, or Trachonitis (wherein also were part of the small Territories of * Batania, Gaulonitis, Gessuri, Machati, and Auranitis) was giuen to the halfe Tribe of Manasse ouer Iordan, of which those three later Prouinces defended themselues against them, for many ages. But Batania Ptolomie setteth farther off, and to the North-East, as a skirt of Arabia the Desart: and all those other Prouinces before mened with Petraea, and Ituraea, he nameth but as part of Cœlosyria; as farre South as Rabba or Philadelphia: likewise all the rest which belonged to Gad, and Reuben, sauing the Land neere the Dead Sea, he makes a part of Arabia Petraea: for many of these small Kingdomes take not much more ground than the Countie of Kent.

* Another territory adioyning to Manasse, whose limits were confounded with some of these, was that Thisbitis, the Country of Elias, as it is 1 Kin. 16.1. & of Tobias, Tob. 1.2. I lay on the East to the Tribe of Nepht. on the right hand of it, as in Tob. 1.2. and was possest by Colonies of the Israelites in the time of Saul after his victory ouer the Amalekites & Ismaelites in those parts, as it is gathered out of 1 Chron. 5.10. whence it appeares, that it was part of Ituraa, of which chap. 7. §. 4. †. 5. and 6.

Basan, or after the Septuagint, Basanitis, stretcheth it selfe from the Riuer of Iaboc to the [a] Machati and Gessuri: and from the Mountaines to Iordan, a Region exceeding fertile; by reason whereof it abounded in all sorts of Cattell. It had also the goodliest Woods of all that part of the world: especially of Oakes, which beare mast (of which the Prophet Zacharias; Howle, O yee Oakes of Bashan) and by reason hereof they bred so many Swine, as [b] 2000. in one Herd were carried headlong into the Sea, by the vncleane spirits which Christ had cast out of one of the Gadarens. It had in it threescore Cities walled and defenced: all which, after Og and his sonnes were slaine, Iair, descended of Manasse, conquered, and called the Countrie after his owne name, Auoth Iair, or the Cities of Iair.

The principall Cities of this halfe Tribe (for I will omit the rest) are these; Pella sometimes [c] Butis; otherwise Berenice; by Seleucus King of Syria, it is said to haue beene called Pella, after the name of that Pella in Macedon: in which both Philip the Father, and his Sonne Alexander the Great were borne. It was taken, and in part demolished by Alexander Iannæus King of the Iewes: because it refused to obey the Iewes lawes: but it was repaired by Pompey, and annexed to the Gouernment of Syria. It is now but a Village, saith Niger. Carnaim by the Riuer of Iaboc, taken by [d] Iudas Maccabæus: where hee Iabes Gilead, or Iabesus, was another of the Cities of this halfe Tribe, which being besieged by Nahas [h] King of the Ammonites, was deliuered by Saul, as is [i] elsewhere mentioned. In memory whereof these Citizens [k] recouered, embalmed, and buried the bodies of Saul and his sonnes: which hung despightfully ouer the walls of Bethsan or Scythopolis. [l] Gaddara or Gadara, is next to be named, seated by Plinie on a Hill neere the Riuer Hieromiace, which Riuer Ortelius seemes to thinke to be Iaboc. At the foote of the Hill there spring forth also hot baths, as at Machærus. Alexander Iannæus after ten moneths siege wan it, and subuerted it. Pompey restored it: and Gabinius [m] made it one of the fiue Courts of Iustice in Palestine. Hierusalem being the first, Gadara the second, Emath or Amathus the third, Hierico, and Sephora in Galilee, the fourth and fift. The Citizens impatiently bearing the tyranny of Herod, surnamed Ascalonita, accused him to Iulius Cæsar of many crimes: but perceiuing that they could not preuaile, and that Herod was highly fauoured of Cæsar, fearing the terrible [n] reuenge of Herod, they slew themselues: some by strangling, others by leaping ouer high Towers, others by drowning themselues.

To the East of Gadara they place Sebei, [o] in which, Iosephus ant. 5. 13. saith, Iephtha was buried: whence others reading with the Vulgar, Iud. 12. 7. Sepultus est in Ciuitate sua Gilehad, (for in vna Ciuitatum Gilehad) imagine Gilehad to be the name of a Citie, and to be the same with Sebei. In like manner following the Vulgar, 1 Macc. 5. 26. where it readeth Casphor for Chesbon; the same Adrichomius imagineth it to be ampla & firma Gileaditarum Ciuitas: so of one City Hesbon or Chesbon, which they call Essebon, the chiefe Citie of Sehon, in the Tribe of Reuben, hee imagineth two more: this Casphor in Manasses, and a Citie in Gad which he calleth Casbon, of which we haue admonished the Reader heretofore. Of Gamala (so called, because the Hill on which it stood, was in fashion like the back of a Cammell) which Iosephus placeth not farre from Gadara, in the lower Gaulanitis ouer against Tarichea, which is on the West side of the Sea or Lake of Tiberias, see this Iosephus in the fourth booke of the Iewish warre: where hee describes the place by nature to be almost inuincible: and in the storie of the siege, shewes how Vespasian with much danger of his owne person, entring it, was at first repulsed, with other very memorable accidents: and how at length after the cõming of Titus when it was taken, many leaping downe the rockes with their wiues and children, to the number of fiue thousand, thus perished: besides foure thousand slaine by the Romans: so that none escaped, saue onely two women that hid themselues.

cap. 1. & 3.

About foure miles West from Gadara, and as much East from Tiberias (which is on the other side of the Lake) Iosephus placeth Hippus or Hippene, whence Ptolomie giues the names to the hils that compasse the plaines in which it standeth: so that it may seeme to haue beene of no small note. It is seated farre from the hill Countrie: on the East of the Lake, as also Plinie noteth lib. 5. cap. 15. It was restored by Pompey: after by Augustus added to Herods Tetrarchie: It was wasted by the Iewes, in the beginning of their rebellion: when by many massacres of their Nation, they were inraged against their borderers.

In vita sua.
Ioseph. de Bel. Iud. l. 2. c. 19.

The next Citie of note, but of more ancient fame, is Edrehi or Edrai, wherein Og King of Basan chiefly abode, when Moses and Israel inuaded him: and neere vnto this his Regall Citie, it was that he lost the battaile and his life. It stood in S. Hieromes time: and had the name of Adar or Adara. Not farre from these townes neere Iordan, in this valley, stood Gerasa or Gergesa, inhabited by the Gergesites, descended of the fift son of Canaan. Of these Gergesites we reade Mat. 8. 28. that Christ comming from the other side of the Lake of Tiberias, landed in their coasts: where casting the Diuels out of the possessed, hee permitted them to enter into the heard of Hogges: in which storie, for Gergesites or Gergesins, S. Luke and S. Marke haue Gadarens: not as if these were all one (for Geryesa or Gerasa is a distinct Towne in these parts from Gadera) but the bounds being confounded, and the Cities neighbours, either might well be named in this story. This Citie receiued many changes and calamities: of which Iosephus hath often mention. For besides other aduentures, it was taken by L. Annius Lieutenant to Vespasian: and 1000. of the ablest young men put to the sword, and the Citie burnt. In the yeare 1120. it was rebuilt by Baldwine King of Damascus: and in the same yeare recouered by Baldwine de Burgo King of Hierusalem: and by him vtterly razed. Neere vnto Gerasa is the village of Magedan, or after the Syriake Magedu, or after the Greeke Magdala, where the Pharisees and Sadducees desired of our Sauiour a signe from heauen: the same place or some adioyning to it, which S. Marke calleth Dalmanutha. By the circumstances of which storie it appeares that this coast lay betweene the Lake of Tiberias and the Countrie of Decapolis. Brochard makes both these places to be one; and findes it to bee Phiale, the fountaine of Iordan according to Iosephus: but this Phiale is too farre from the Sea of Galilee, and from Bethsaida, to bee either Magdala or Dalmanutha. For as it appeares by the storie, not farre hence towards the North was the Desart of Bethsaida, where Christ filled 5000. people with the fiue Barley loaues and two Fishes.

Marke 8. Brocb. itin. 2. Of this Phiale see in Nepth. C. 7. §. 4. †. 3. Matt. 14. Marke 6. Luke 9. Iohn 6.

On the North of this Bethsaida they place Iulias, not that which was built by Herod, but the other by Philip, which boundeth the Region Trachonitis towards the South. It was somtime a Village, and not long after the birth of Christ it was compassed with a wall by Philip the Tetrarch of Iturea and Trachonitis: and after the name of Iulia, the wife of Tiberias, called Iulias, as hath beene further spoken in the Tribe of Gad: where it was noted that Iosephus makes this Iulias, to be the same as Bethsaida. Vpon the East side of the same Lake of Tiberias stands Corozaim, or Corazim, of which Christ in Matthew; Woe be vnto thee Corazim.

Iosep. 18. ant. 3. & alibi.

But the principall Citie of all these in ancient time was Asteroth: sometime peopled with the Giants Raphaim: and therefore the Countrie adioyning called the Land of Giants, of whose race was Og, King of Basan. In Genesis this Citie is called Asteroth of Carnaim, whence 1 Mac. 5. 26. it is called simply Carnaim, as Ios. 13. 21. it is called Asteroth without the addition of Carnaim. The word Carnaim signifieth a paire of Hornes, which agree well with the name of their Idoll Asteroth, which was the Image of a sheepe, as it is elsewhere noted, that Astaroth in Deuteronomie signifieth sheepe. Others from the ambiguitie of the Hebrew take Karnaim, to haue beene the name of the people which inhabited this Citie: and expound it heroes * radiantes. For of old the Raphai which inhabited this Citie (Gen. 14. 5.) were Giant-like men, as appeares by comparing the words Deut. 3. 11. Og ex residuo gigantum, with the words, Ios. 13. 12. Og ex reliquijs Raphaeorum: but if the Karnaim (or Carnaym) were these Raphai, the word would not haue beene in the duall number: neither would Moses in the place of Genesis haue said the Raphei in Asteroth of the Karnaim, but either the Raphai in Asteroth of the Raphai, or some other way fittest for perspicuitie: for this naming of both thus in the same clause, distinguisheth one from the other.

Gen. 14. 5.

See chap. 7. §. 3. †. 2.

* Because Horne when it is polished shineth: hence it is that the Verbe of this Nown is somtime Lucere: as it were cornum esse: whereupon the Vulgar, Exod. 34. 19. reading cornutam corneam, or lucidam faciem, gaue occasion to the fabulous painters to paint Moses with Hornes.

Not farre from Asteroth Adrichomius out of Brochard and Breidenbachius placeth Cedar, in the way out of Syria into Galilee, foure miles from Corazin. This Citie (saith he) is remembred in the Canticles, and in the booke of Iudith, and there are that of this Citie vnderstand Dauid in his 120. Psalme: and here the Sepulchre of Iob is yet to bee seene, saith Breidenbach.

Iudith 1. 8. 1 Cant. 5.

Now concerning the Texts which he citeth, it is so that the Greeke hath Galaad in stead of the word Cedar, which the Vulgar doth vse in that place of Iudith, and ioyneth Carmel and Galilee. The Canticles and the 120. Psalme doe rather proue that Cedar was not hereabout, than any way helpe Adrichomius. For that they speake of Scenita Cedareni, it is apparant, and as euident by the place in the Canticles, that they were decolores, much more than any vnder the Climates of the Land of Canaan: whence Iunius out of Lampridius and Plinie placeth them in Arabia Petrea, farre from these parts. Touching the Sepulchre of Iob, it is certaine that the Arabians and Saracens (holding those places) faine many things to abuse the Christians, and to get money. Further, it may well be affirmed, that many (if not all) the historicall circumstances of Iob are so obscure, that we should rather by finding his Countrie seeke to get some knowledge of him, than by any presumptions founded vpon him, inferre what his Countrie was, and build vnto him a Citie by coniecture.

with Athanasius, Hippolitus, Irenæus, Eusebius Emissenus, Apollinaris, Eustathius, and other, cited by S. Hierome in his 126. Epistle to Euagrius, take him for the same.

The Land of Hutz or Hus wherein Iob dwelt is from the Greeke Οὐς, which the Septuagint vse for the word Hutz, translated by the Vulgar sometime Hus, as Iob 1. v. 1. sometime Ausitis, as Hierem. 25. 20. This Land is placed by Iunius between Palestina and Cœlosyria, besides Chamatha (or Hamath) vnder Palmyrene in the Countrie called by Ptolomie Trachonitis or Bathanea, the bounds of which Countries are confounded with Basan in this halfe Tribe of Manasses. And that this Land of Hus was thus seated, it may in part be gathered out of the place of Ieremie the 25. 20. where hee reckons the Husites among the promiscuous borderers of the Israelites, whom hee therefore calleth promiscuous or miscellaneam turbam, because their bounds were not onely ioyned but confounded, and their Seigniories mingled one with the other, but of this place the words of Hieremy, Lamentations 4. 21. speaking of the same Prophecie, of which he speaketh in the fiue and twentieth Chapter, must needs bee expounded: as Iunius reades them, distinguishing the Land of Hus from Edom: O filia Edomi, ô qua habitas in terra Hutzi, O Daughter of Edom, O thou which dwellest in the Land of Hus. Now because the Vulgar doth not so distinguish, but readeth, Filia Edom qua habitas in terra Hus; Daughter of Edom which dwellest in the Land of Hus: Hence, as it seemes, some of the learned haue thought that Iob was an Edomite, as wee haue said, and King of Edom, which if they vnderstand by it Idumæa or Edom, so called in Moses time, they are greatly mistaken, making this Land of Hus to be in Idumæa. For it is very probable that Esau when hee first parted from Iacob, did not seate himselfe in Edom or Seir, which lyeth on the South border of Iudea, but inhabited Seir farre to the East of Iordan, and held a part of those Mountaines, otherwise called Galaad, and Hermon, which by corruption the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites Shenir, for Seir; and from this his habitation did Esau incounter Iacob when he returned out of Mesopotamia, who passed by the very border of Esau his abiding. It is true that at such time as Moses wandered in the Desarts, that the posterity of Esau inhabited Seir to the South of Iudea: for it is like that the Amorites who had beaten both Ammon and Moab, did also driue the Edomites out of those parts, who thence-forward seated themselues to the South of Iudea, bordering the Desart Paran, and stretched their habitations ouer the Desarts as farre as Hor where Aaron died.

Now for this Hus which gaue the name to a part of the Land of Trachonitis, whether it were Hus the sonne of Aram, as Iunius thinkes in his note vpon Gen. 10. 23. or rather Hus the sonne of Nachor, Abrahams brother, the question is doubtfull. For my part I rather encline to thinke, that it was Hus the sonne of Nachor: partly because these Families of Aram seeme long before to haue beene lost: and partly because in Iob 6. 32. 2. Elihu the fourth of Iobs friends, which seemes to be of Iobs owne Country, is called a Buzite, of Buz the brother of Hus, the son of Nachor: as also Hieremie 25. in the same continuation (though some other Nations named betweene) where Hus is spoken of, there Buz is also named. Neither doth it hinder our coniecture, that in the place of Iob 32. Elihu the Buzite is said to be of the Family of Ram: (which Iunius expounds to be as much as of the Familie of Aram) for that by this Aram we are not to vnderstand Aram the sonne of Sem, Iunius himselfe maketh it plaine, both in his annotation vpon the beginning of his booke, where he saith that one of Iobs friends (which must needs be this Elihu) was of the posterity of Nachor (as also in this place hee confesseth so much expresly,) and in as much as hee readeth not è familiâ Aram, or Ram, but è familia Syriæ; like as elsewhere Laban who sprung of Nachor is called a Syrian.

As for the other three of Iobs friends (of whom by this note of Elihu his being of the Syrian Family, or of the Family of Nachor) it is implyed that they were of other kindreds; as also by the Septuagints addition, that this Elihu was of the Land of Hus, or Ausitis, it is implyed that they thought onely Elihu to haue beene of Iobs owne Countrie.

Franciscus Brochard the Monke, in his description of the holy Land in the iourney from Acon Eastward, findeth Suetha, and Theman on the East of the Sea of Galilee: both very neere to the Land of Hus: whereof the one may seeme to haue denominated Bildad the Shuhite; the other Eliphaz the Themanite; two of the three friends of Iob, of the which Iob 2. 11. But Iunius thinks that the Shuhites were inhabitants of Arabia the Desart, descended of Shuach the sonne of Abraham and Ketura: of whom Gen. 25. 2. perhaps, saith he, the same whom Plinie calls Sucei. So also he thinketh the Themanites of whom

For o and u are often changed one into the other: whence they vsed Ausitis for Ousitis, &c. Hence also by Iunius and others it is called Usanitis, and so as it seemes they read it in the Septuagint. Iun. in Gen. 10. 23.

Deut. 3. 9.

Whence the Septuagint call him ex regione Ausitide.

See Sixtus Senensis.

Eliphaz was, to haue beene of Arabia the Deſart: and Eliphaz himſelfe to haue beene of the poſteritie of Theman the ſonne of Eliphaz, which was the ſonne of Eſau. And ſo alſo Nahamah, whence Tſophar the third of Iobs friends (which in this place of Iob c.2. v.11. are mentioned) is by the ſame learned expoſitor, thought either to be named of Thimnah by tranſpoſition of letters (which Thimnah, Gen. 36.40. is named among the ſonnes of Eſau that gaue denomination to the places where they were ſeated) or elſe to be the ſame Nahamah, which Ioſ. 15.41. is reckoned for a Citie of Iuda in the border, as hee thinkes of Edom. And yet I deny not but that neere the Land of Hus, in Baſan, as it ſeemes, in the Tribe of Manaſſes, there is a Region which (at leaſt) in later times was called Suith, or of ſome like name. For this is euident by the Hiſtorie of Willielmus Tyrius, which reports of a Fort in this Region of Suita or Suites (as he calls it diuerſly) of exceeding great ſtrength and vſe for the retaining of the whole Countrie: which, in the time of Balduine the ſecond King of Hieruſalem, was with great digging through rockes recouered by the Chriſtians; hauing not long before beene loſt to the great diſaduantage of the Countrie, while it was in the hands of the Saracens. The ſituation of this Fort is by Tyrius deſcribed to be ſixteene miles from the Citie Tiberias, on the East of Iordan: by Adrichomius foure miles North-ward from the place where Iordan enters the Lake Tiberias at Corazin.

De Bell. Sacr. l. 22. c. 15. & 21.

Other Cities of this part of Manaſſes named in the Scripture are theſe: Golan, Beheſthera, Mitſpa of Gilead, and Kenath, which after the comming of the Iſraelites was called Nobach. Of Nobach or Kenath, and Mitſpa of Gilead, we haue ſpoken by occaſion among the Cities of Gad: The two other were giuen to the Leuites, and Golan made one of the Cities of refuge: from which Golan we haue both Gaulanitis ſuperior and inferior, oft in Ioſephus. Beheſthera is accounted the chiefe Citie of Baſan by ſome, but the writers corrupting the name into Bozra, it is confounded with Betſer or Bozra of Reuben, and with Bozra of Edom. Argob is oft named for a Region in this Tract, and hence Hierome hath Arga, a name of a Citie placed by ſome about the waters of Merom (as they are called by Ioſua) which make the Lake Samachonitis, as Ioſephus calls it. This lake being as it were in the midſt betweene Cæſaria Philippi and Tiberias, through which as through the Lake of Tiberias, Iordan runneth, boundeth part of this halfe Tribe on the Weſt. When the ſnow of Libanus melteth, it is very large, ſaith Brochard: otherwiſe more contract, leauing the mariſh ground on both ſides, for Lyons and other wilde beaſts, which harbour in the ſhrubs that plentifully grow there.

Ioſ. 21.27. Deut. 4.43.

Adioyning to this Lake in this Countrey of Manaſſes, Ioſephus names two places of ſtrength, fortified by himſelfe in the beginning of the Iewes rebellion: Seleucia the one and Sogane the other. In the North ſide of this halfe Tribe of Manaſſe, and in the North-east, the Scripture nameth diuers bordering places toward Damaſcus, as Tſedad, Chauran, and Chatſar-Henan, lying in a line drawne from the Weſt; of which three Cities we reade Ezek. 47.15. with which alſo agrees the place Numb. 34.8. where for Chauram, betweene Tſedad, and Chatſar-Henan, Ziphron is named. From this Chauram is the name of Auranitis Regio, in Ioſephus and Tyrius, whoſe bounds (as alſo the bounds of Geſſur and Mabathath or Macati, which were likewiſe borderers to Manaſſes toward the North-east) are vnknowne: onely that Geſſur was of might, it appeares in that Dauid married Maacha the Daughter of Thalmay King of Geſſur: by whom he had the moſt beautifull, but wicked, and vnfortunate Abſalon.

The Hiſtorie of the Syrians, the chiefe borderers of the Iſraelites that dwelt on the East of Iordan.

§. I.

Of the Citie of Damaſcus, and the diuers fortunes thereof.

DAmaſcus of all other in this border, and of that part of the world, was the moſt famous, excelling in Beautie, Antiquitie, and Riches, and was therefore called the Citie of ioy or gladneſſe; and the Houſe of pleaſure; and is not onely remembred in many places of Scripture, but by the beſt Hiſtorians and Coſmographers. The Hebrewes, ſaith Ioſephus, thinke it to haue beene built by Hus the ſonne of Aram: of which opinion S. Hie-

Ioſeph. 1.14.

Saint Hierome vpon Esay seemeth to bee: though in his Hebrew questions hee affirmeth that it was founded by Damascus, the sonne of Eliezer Abrahams Steward; a thing very vnlikely, seeing the Citie was formerly knowne by that name, as appeares by Abrahams calling this his Steward Eliezer of Damasco. Dauid was the first that subiected it to the Kingdome of Iuda, after the ouerthrow of Adadezer their King, but in Salomons time, Rezon recouered it againe, though hee adde no title at all or right to that principalitie: but Danid hauing ouerthrowne Hadadezer king of Sophena (otherwise Syria Soba or Zobah) Razon or Rezon with the remainder of that broken Armie, inuaded Damascena, and possest Damascus it selfe, and became an enemie to Salomon all his life. In Esai. 17. Gen. 15. 2. 1 Reg. 11. v. 40.

The next King of Damascus was Adad the Edomite, who flying into Egypt from Danid and Ioab, when they slew all the males in Edom, was there entertained, and marryed Taphnes the King of Egypts Wiues sister: of whom Taphnes in Egypt was so called. This Adad returning againe, became an enemie to Salomon all his life, and (as some writers affirme) inuaded Damascus, and thrust Rezon thence-out. In the line of Adad that Kingdome continued nine descents (as hereafter may be shewed in the catalogue of those Kings of Syria) to whom the Assyrians and then the Græcians succeeded. This Citie was exceeding strong, compassed with waters from the riuers of Abanah, and Parphar: whereof one of them prophane writers call Chrysorrhoas, the golden riuer. Iunius takes it for Adonis. The countrey adioyning is very fruitfull of excellent Wines and Wheats, and all manner of excellent fruits. It had in it a very strong Castle, built as it seems by the Florentines, after it became Christian: the Lillies being found cut in many Marbles in that Citadell. Against this Citie the Prophets, Amos, Esay, Hieremie and Zacharias, prophecied that it should be taken, burnt, demolished, and made a heape of stones. In the time of the last Rezon, and tenth King of the Damascens, Teglatphalassar inuited by Achaz King of Iuda, carried away the naturals of Damascus into the East: leauing of his owne Nation to inhabit it. After that it was vtterly ruined by the Babylonians, saith Hierome vpon Esai: which thing was performed by Salmanaser, according to Iunius in his note vpon that place, fiue yeares after the Prophecie. In time it was restored by the Macedonians, and the Ptolomies; but long after, when Syria fell into the hands of the Romans, it was taken by Metellus and Lollius. In the time of the Christians it had an Archbishop: Saint Hierome liuing, as hee affirmeth vpon the Acts, it was the Metropolis of the Sarazens: being taken by Haomar their King from the Romans, in the yeare of our redemption 636. And in the yeare 1147. Conrad the third, Emperour of Rome, Lewis King of France, Baldwine the third King of Hierusalem, Henry Duke of Austria, brother to Conrad, Frederick Barbarossa afterward Emperour, Theodorick Earle of Flaunders, and other Princes assembled at Ptolomais Acon, on the sea coast, determined to recouer Damascus: but being betrayed by the Syrians, they failed of the enterprize. 1 Reg. 11. 2 Reg. 5. *Herold. 6. In the yeare 1262. Halon the Tartar incompast it, and hauing formerly taken the King, brought him vnder the walls, and threatned extreame torture vnto him, except the Citizens tendred the place: but they refusing it, the King was torne asunder before them, and in fine the Citie taken, Agab the sonne of Halon was by his father made King thereof. Herold. Bell. Sac. 4. 6. 14.

In the yeare 1400. Tamberlaine Emperour of the Parthians, inuaded that region, and besieged the Citie with an Armie of 1200000. (if the number be not mistaken.) He entred it, and put all to the sword, filling the ditch with his prisoners; those that retired into the Castle, which seemed a place impregnable, hee ouertopped with another Castle adioyning: hee forbare the demolishing of the Citie in respect of the beauty of the Church, garnished with 40. gates or sumptuous porches. It had within it 9000. Lanternes of gold and siluer: but while he inuaded Egypt, they againe surprized Damascus. Lastly, in his return after three moneths siege, he forc't it: the Mahometans prostrating themselues with their Priests, desired mercie: But Tamberlaine commanding them to enter the Church, hee burnt them and it, to the number of 30000. and did so demolish it, as those that came afterwards to see their houses, knew them not by the foundations. And as a Trophey of his victorie, hee raised three Towers with great Art, builded with the heads of those whom hee had slaughtered. After this, it was restored and repossest by the Soldane of Egypt, with a garrison of Mammalukes: And in the yeare 1517. Selimus Emperour of the Turkes wrested it out of the hands of the Egyptians: Herold. l. 6. 2. 4.

in whose possession it now remaineth inhabited with Mahometans and Christians of all neighbouring nations.

§. II.

Of the first Kings of Damascus, and of the growing up of their power.

NOw be it that Damascus were founded by Hus the sonne of Aram, or by Damascus the sonne of Eliezer Abrahams steward, we finde no relation of their Kings, or Common-wealth till Dauids time. For it stood without the bounds of Canaan: and therefore neglected by Moses, Iosua, and the Iudges, as impertinent to that Storie: But were it so that it had some regali, or petty Kings ouer it, as all the Cities of those parts had, yet none of them became famous for ought that is left to writing, till such time as Dauid ouerthrew Adadezer Prince of Sophena or Syria Zoba: the same Nation which Plinie calleth Nubæi, inhabiting betweene Batania and Euphrates. Now the better to vnderstand the storie of those Syrian Princes, whom soone after the Kings of Damascus made their vassals, the reader may informe himselfe, That on the North-east parts of the holy Land, there were three chiefe principalities, whereof the Kings or Commanders greatly vexed or disturbed the State or Common-wealth of Israel, namely Damascus or Aram, Sophena or Syria Zoba, and Chamath, or Chamath-Zoba, of which these were the Princes in Dauids and Salomons times: Razon or Rezon of Damascus, Adadezer of Syria Zoba, and Tohu of Chamath. But it seemeth that Damascus was one of the Cities subiect to Adadezer when Dauid inuaded him, though when Saul made warre against Zoba, Damascus was not named. And as Iosephus affirmeth, the leader of those succours, which were leuied and sent to Hadad-Hezer from Damascus, had the name of Adad: who was in that battaile slaine with 22000. Aramites of Damascus: whereof, as of the ouerthrow of Adadezer, Rezon, the Commander of his Armie, taking aduantage, made himselfe King of Damascus: Adadezer and Adad of Damascus being both slaine. About the same time Tohu King of Chamath or Iturea, hearing that his neighbour and enemy Adadezer was vtterly ouerthrowne, sendeth for peace to Dauid, and presenteth him with rich gifts, but in dolo, saith S. Hierome; it was craftily done of him. Now to the North of the Holy Land, and to the West of Damascus, the Tyrians and Zidonians inhabited: but they for the most part were in league and peace with the Iudæans and Israelites. But to returne to the Kings of Syria, I meane of Syria, as it is taken in the Scriptures, containing Damascena, Soba or Zoba, and Chamath, or Iturea, to which I may adde Geshur, because it is so accounted in the second of Sam. 15. as ioyning in the Territorie to Damascus (for Syria at large is farre greater, of which Palestina it selfe is but a Prouince, as I haue noted in the beginning of this Tract:) It is not agreed among the Historians of former times, nor of our later writers, who was the first of those Adads of Syria Zoba, and Damascus.

Some account Rezon, others Adad of Idumæa: of whom it is written in the first of Kings, that Dauid hauing inuaded that Region, and left Ioab there to destroy all the male children thereof: Adad of the Kings seed, fled into Egypt; and was there married to Taphnes the Queenes sister, as before; who hearing of Dauids death, and of the death of his Captaine Ioab (whom indeed all the bordering Nations feared) he turned againe, and as Bunting thinketh, this Adad did expell Rezon out of Damascus; and was the first of the Syrian Kings. To mee it seemeth otherwise. For as I take it, Adadezer the sonne of Rehob, whom Saul inuaded, was the founder of that Principalitie: and the first of Adads, who forsaking his Fathers name, as hee grew powerfull, tooke vpon him the style of Adad, the great god of the Assyrians, saith Macrobius, which signified Oneneſſe or Vnitie, I also finde a Gode called Adada in the same part of Syria: of which, whether these Princes tooke the name, or gaue it, I am ignorant. For Adad-ezer, Ben-adad, Eli-adad were the same in name, with the differences of Ezer, Ben, and Eli, adioyned. And that Adadezer was of greatest power, it appeareth first, because it is against him, that Dauid vndertooke the warre: secondly, because hee leuied 22000. Aramites out of the Territory of Damascus: as out of his proper Dominions: for had the Damascens had a King apart, it is probable that the Scriptures would haue giuen vs his name: thirdly, because Syria Zoba, of the most of which Adadezer was King, was an exceeding large Territory, and contained all the Desart as far as to Euphrates, according to Plinie: and and the greatest part of Arabia Petræa, according to Niger. Whosoeuer was the first, whether Adadezer, or Adad of Idumæa, Rezon was the second: who was an enemie to Israel all the dayes of Salomon. Besides the euill that Adad did, the euill that Hadad did, seemeth to be referred to Hadad of Idumæa, lately returned out of Egypt: to wit, 23. yeares after he was carried thither. 1 Reg.11.

The third king of Damascus, and of Zobah both, was Hezion; to Hezion succeeded Tabrimmum, or Tabremmum; to him Benhadad, as is proued in the first of Kings: For Asa King of Iuda the son of Abiam, the son of Roboam, the son of Salomon, being vexed & inuaded by Baasha, the successour of Nadab, the son of Ieroboam, sent to Benhadad the son of Tabrimmon, the son of Hezion, King of Aram, that dwelt at Damascus, to inuade Israel (while Baasha sought to fortifie Rama against Asa: thereby to block him vp, that he should not enter into any of the Territories of Israel) who according to the desire of Asa, hauing receiued his presents, willingly inuaded the Countrie of Nepthalim, and took diuers Cities, and spoyles thence: Asa in the meane while carrying away all the Materials, which Baasha had brought to fortifie Rama withall, and conuerted them to his owne vse. 1 King.15.18. 1 Reg.15.v.18.

This Benhadads Father Tabremmon was in league with Asa: and so was his Father Hezion: for Asa requireth the continuance of that friendship from Benhadad, his sonne: though it seemeth that the gold and siluer sent him out of the Temple, was the most forcible argument. And that this Tabremmon inuaded Israel, before the enterprize of his sonne Benhadad, it is coniectured. For Benhadad when he was prisoner with Achab, spake as followeth: The Cities which my Father tooke from thy Father, I will restore: and thou shalt make streetes or keepers of the borders, for thee in Damascus: as my father did in Samaria. And herein there ariseth a great doubt (if the argument it selfe were of much importance) because Tabremmon was Father indeed to Benhadad which inuaded Baasha, at the request of Asa; But this Benhadad that twice entred vpon Achab, and was the second time taken prisoner, was rather the sonne of Benhadad, the first of that name, the confederate of Asa and Abiam, as before, than the sonne of Tabremmon. For betweene the inuasion of Benhadad the first, in Baasha's time, and the siege of Samaria, and the ouerthrow of Benhadad by Achab, there past 49. yeares, as may be gathered out of the raignes of the Kings of Israel. So that if we allow 30. yeares of age to Benhadad, when he inuaded Baasha, and after that 49. yeares ere he was taken by Achab, which make eighty lacking one, it is vnlikely that Benhadad at such an age should make warre. Besides all this, the first Benhadad came with no such pompe; but the second Benhadad vaunteth, that hee was followed with 32. Kings: and therefore I resolue, that Benhadad the sonne of Tabremmon inuaded Baasha and Omri; and Benhadad the second inuaded Achab, at whose hands this Benhadad receiued two notorious ouerthrowes: the first at Samaria, by a sally of 700. Israelites: the second at Aphec, where, with the like number in effect the Israelites slaughtered 100000. of the Aramites; besides 27000. which were crusht by the fall of the wall of Aphec. And this Benhadad, Achab againe setteth at liberty: to whom he rendreth those townes that his father had taken from the Predecessour of Achab, but being returned, he refused to render Ramoth Gilead, a frontier Towne, and of great importance. Now three yeares after (for so long the league lasted) Ramoth not being deliuered, Achab inuaded Gilead, and besieged the City, being assisted by Iosaphat. The Aramites came to succour and fight: in which Achab is wounded, and dyeth that night. After this, Benhadad sendeth the commander of his forces called Naaman, to Ioram the son of Achab to be healed of the leprosie, and though Elizeus had healed him, yet hee picketh quarrell against Ioram: and when Ioram by Elizeus his intelligence, had escaped his plot, he sent men, and Chariots to take the Prophet, as is afore said. After, Benhadad besieged Samaria again, and being terrified thence from heauen, he departeth home, and sickneth, and sendeth Azael with great gifts to Elizeus, to know his estate if he might liue. Azael returning, smothereth him. Zonaras and Cedrenus call this Benhadad Adar, and the sonne of Adar: Amos and Hieremie mention the towres of Benhadad. Iosephus writeth that Benhadad and his successour Azael were worshipped for gods by the Syrians to his time, for the sumptuous Temples which they built in Damascus. The Syrians also boasted much of their antiquity, ignorant, saith he, that scarce yet 1100. yeares are compleate since their warres with the Israelites. 1 Reg.20. 1 Reg.22. 3227. 3232. 2 Reg.5. 2 Reg.6. 2 Reg.6. 2 Reg.7. 3234. Hazael or Azael, the first King of the race of the Adads of Damascus, was annointed by Elisha, or Elizeus, when he was sent by Benhadad to the Prophet, to know whether Ben- hadad should recouer his present sickneſſe: He waged warre with Ioram; who receiued diuers wounds at the encounter at Ramoth in Gilead: from whence returning to be cured at Iesreel, he and the King of Iuda, Ahaziah or Ochozias, are slaine by Iehu, as before is said. After the death of Ioram, Azael continued the warre against Iehu, and wasted Gilead, and all those portions of Gad, Reuben, and Manasse ouer Iordan. He then inuaded Iuda, and tooke Gath; but by gifts from Ioas he was auerted from attempting Hierusalem: for he presented him all the hallowed things which Iehosaphat, Iehoram, and Ahaziah his fathers, Kings of Iuda had dedicated; and which hee himselfe had dedicated, and all the gold which was found in the treasuries of the Lord, and in the Kings house. This was the second time that the Temple was spoyled to please the Adads of Damascus. For Asa did present Benhadad with those treasures, when hee inuited him to warre vpon Baasha King of Israel. And notwithstanding this composition betweene Ioas and Azael, yet a part of his Army spoyled the other Prouinces of Iudæa, and slaughtered many principall persons. Lastly, Azael vexed Ioahas the sonne of Iehu, and brought him to that extremitie, as he left him but fifty horsemen, ten Chariots, & ten thousand fooot-men of all his people.

§. III.

Of the later Kings, and decay and ouerthrow of their power.

AFter Hazael, Benhadad the second, or rather the third of that name, the sonne of Hazael, reigned in Damascus: who fought against Israel, with ill successe: for Ioas King of Israel, the sonne of the vnhappy Ioachaz, as he was foretold by Elisha the Prophet, beat Benhadad in three seuerall battels: and hee lost all those Cities to Israel, which his Father Hazael had taken violently from Ioachaz.

2 Reg. 13. Ioseph. ant. c. 9.
Ieseph. Ant. l. 7. c. 6.

After this Benhadad the sonne of Hazael, there succeeded three others by the same name, of whom the Stories are lost, onely Nicholaus Damascenus cited by Iosephus, makes mention of them: and in one of these Kings times it was that Ieroboam the second, the sonne of Ioas recouered Damascus it selfe, to Iudah, saith the Geneua, but better in Iunius, vtque recuperabat Damascum, & Chamatham Iehudæ pro Israele; that is, And how hee recouered for Israel, Damascus and Chamatha of Iudea; for these Cities sometimes conquered by Dauid, did of right belong to the Tribe of Iuda.

1 Reg. 14. 28.

And it is likely that this conquest vpon the Adads was performed: the first of these three Adads then liuing, of whom there is no Story. For when as Iehoas the King of the ten Tribes had thrice ouercome the Syrians in the time of Benhadad the sonne of Hazael, and had recouered the Cities which Hazael had won from Israel; and so left his Kingdome to his sonne Ieroboam the second, it seemeth that this Ieroboam without delay, and hauing nothing else left for him to enterprize, instantly followed his fathers good fortune, and inuaded Damascus.

Razin, or Rezin, after Iosephus Rases, after Zonaras Raason, the 10. Adad, making league with Pekah, or Phacee King of Israel, against Achaz King of Iuda; both carry away a great number of prisoners. After this they both besiege Achaz in Hierusalem: but in vain. Then Adad alone inuadeth Elath, and hearing out the Iewes, maketh it a Colonie of Syrians. Wherefore Achab brought Teglatphalassar against Raizin, who tooke him, and beheaded him, and won Damascus: with whom ended the line of the Adads and the Kingdome of Damascus: the Assyrians becomming masters both of that and Israel. These Adads as they raigned in order are thus reckoned.

2 King. 16. 5, 6. Esay 7. Ioseph. Ant. l. 9. c. 11.

1. Adadezer the sonne of Rehob.
2. Rezin the sonne of Eliadad, or Razin.
3. Hezion.
4. Tabremmon.
5. Benhadad, who inuaded Baasha.
6. Benhadad the second, taken prisoner by Achab.
7. Hazael, whom Elisha foretold, with teares, of his aduancement; the same who ouerthrew Ioram King of Israel at Ramoth Gilead. And that there was a second Hazael which preceded Benhadad the third, it is not improbable, because that Hazael which tooke Geth, and compounded the warre with Ioas, made the Expedition thirty yeeres, and perchance more, more, after the first Hazael which stifled his master Benhadad, and had slaine Ioram the sonne of Achab King of Israel. For Ioas began to raigne in the 7. yeare of Iehu King of Israel; and after he had raigned 23. yeares, the Temple was not yet repaired, after which (and how long we know not) it is said that Hazael took Geth, and turned his face towards Ierusalem. It is also some proofe that Hazael that tooke Geth, was not the same with Hazael that murthered Benhadad, because he could not at that time bee of good yeares, being as it seemeth, the second person in the kingdome, and Commander of Benhadads men of warre. To this Hazael (be he the first or second) succeeded

8. Benhadad the third, whom Ioash King of Israel thrice ouerthrew.

9. Resin or Rezin the last, who ioyned with Pekah King of Israel, against Iuda, at which time Achaz King of Iuda waged for his defence Teglatphalasser.

Now between Benhadad the third, and Rezin the last, Nicolaus Damascenus findes three other Kings of the Adads, which make twelue in all.

For the rest of the Princes of Syria, which were but reguli, as those of Emath, and Gessur, we finde that Tohu was King of Emath or Camath in Dauids time, to whom hee sent his sonne Ioram with presents, after Dauids victory against Adadezer. Also Senacherib speaketh of a King of Emath, but names him not. 2 Sam. 8. 9. Esai. 37.

§. IIII.

Of other lesser Kingdomes of the Syrians, which being brought vnder the Assyrians, neuer recouered themselues againe.

OF Gessur we finde two Kings named; to wit, Talmai, and his Father Ammihur, to Talmai, whose daughter Dauid married, it was that Absalon fled, who was his maternall grandfather. Of the Kings of Sephena or Syria, Soba or Cœlosyria there are two named, Rehob or Rechob the Father of Adadezer, and Adadezer himselfe, and it is plaine that after his death the seat of the Kings of Soba was transferred to Damascus, a Citie better fitting their greatnesse. After Rezin became Lord of both Principalities. And the race of these Kings of Syria, (which became so potent, and ioyned Soba, Damascus, Emath, and the Desart of Arabia with other Prouinces into one, vnder Rezin the second of the Adads) as it began with Dauid, so it ended at once with the Kingdome of Israel. For Ahaz King of Iuda waged the Assyrian Teglatphalassar against Pekah King of Israel, and against Rezin the last King of Damascus: which Teglath first inuaded Damascena, and the region of Soba, and tooke Damascus it selfe, and did put to death Rezin the last, carrying the Inhabitants captiue. This was the second time that the Assyrians attempted Israel. For first, Phul Belochus entred the borders thereof (Menahem gouerning Israel) who stopt the enterprise of Phul with a thousand talents of siluer: for this Phul Belochus, whose pedigree wee will examine hereafter, being scarce warme as yet in his seate at Babylon, which hee, with the helpe of his companion Arbaces, had wrested from Sardanapalus: hauing besides this King of Syria in his way, who seemed to bee a great and strong Prince, was content to take the composition of a thousand talents of the King of Israel for that present time. But his sonne Teglath following the purpose of his father Belochus, and finding so excellent an occasion, as the warre begun betweene Israel and Iudah, Pekah commanding in the one, and Achaz in the other, his neighbour Rezin being also wrapt in that warre, and wasted in strength thereby, did willingly accept the offer of Achaz King of Iuda, his impresta and entertainment. So, first attempting Damascus, which lay in his path towards Israel, hee carried it (as is before remembred) and then with great ease possest himselfe of the Cities of Nephthalim; leading with him a great part of the people captiue. And his sonne Salmanasser, whom Ptolomie calleth Nabonasser, after the reuolt of Hosea, forced Samaria, and rent that Kingdome asunder. So as the line and race of Ninus in Sardanapalus, whom Belochus supplanted; the race and Monarchie of the Syrian Adads in Rezin, whom Teglath slaughtered, the Kingdome of Israel in Hosea, whom Salmanasser ouerturned, happened neere about a time: that of Ninus in the dayes of Belochus, and the other two in the dayes of Teglatphalasser, and Salmanasser his sonne. For Sardanapalus perished, Osia ruling Iuda; and the other two Kingdomes were dissolued, Achaz yet liuing.

Lastly the Kingdome of Iuda it selfe, being attempted by Sennacherib, the sonne of Salmanasser in vaine, and preserued for the time by God miraculously, was at length vtterly vtterly ouerturned. Hierusalem and the Temple burnt 132. yeares after the captiuitie of Israel and Samaria: the destruction of Israel being in the ninth yeare of Hosea: that of Iuda in the eleuenth of Zedechia. Now the Emperours of Assyria and Babylon held also the Kingdome of Syria, from the eight yeare of Salmanassar, to the last of Baltassar, whom Herodotus calleth Labynitus: in all about 200. yeares. After these the Persians from Cyras to Darius their last King, held Syria about 200. yeares. 3603. 3811.

Then Alexander Macedon tooke this among other Prouinces of the Persian Empire, and his successors the Seleucidæ raigned therein, till it became subiect vnto the power of the Romanes, from whom it was wrested long after by the Saracens, and remaineth now in possession of the Turke, as shall bee shewed in due place. Thus much of the Nations bordering vpon the Israelites, with whom they had most to doe both in warre and peace, being the onely people, whose History in those ancient times carried an assured face of truth.

CHAP. XII.

OF THE TRIBE OF BENIAMIN, and of Hierusalem.

§. I.

Of diuers memorable places in the Tribe of Beniamin, whereof Hiericho, Gilgal, Mitspa, Bethel, Rama, Gobah and Gibha.

OF the Tribe of Beniamin, the twelfeth and youngest sonne of Iacob, whom hee had by Rachel, there were mustered at Mount Sinai 35000. able bodyes: all which perishing in the Desarts, there entred the Holy Land of their issues. 45600. fit to beare Armes: and these had their Territorie on this side Iordan, betweene Iuda and Ephraim: The Cities within this Tribe neerest Iordan, are Lod, Haded, and Ono: of which, Lod and Ono were built by Shemed a Beniamite: they were all three re-inhabited with Beniamites, after the returne out of Captiuity, as is mentioned, Nehem. 11. 35. and Esd. 2. 35. where Adrichomius reading Lod, Hadid, Ono, makes besides Hadid in Nehemia, a Citie called Lodhadid: This Hadid or Chadid was rebuilt by Simon Machabæus. 1 Chron. 8. 12. Macc. 12. 38.

Samarim or Tsemaraim, named of Tsemary, one of the sons of Canaan, was another of their Cities: and further into the Land standeth Iericho, one of the Toparchies and the last of Iuda, seated in a most fruitfull valley, adorned with many palme trees: and therefore elsewhere called the City of Palmes. From the time of Iosua, who vtterly destroyed it, it lay waste vntill the time of Achad: in whose dayes Ehiel of Bethel laid the new foundation of it, in the losse of Abiram his eldest sonne, and built the gates of it in the losse of his youngest sonne Segub: according to the curse of Iosua: in which and other respects, Hos. 12. 14. calleth Iosua a Prophet. In after-times it was destroyed by Vespasian, and rebuilt by Adrian. 1 Reg. 17. 36. Ios. 6. 29.

To the Southeast of Iericho stood * Halmon of the Leuites, of which Ios. 21. 18. To the South Betharaba, of which Ios. c. 15. and c. 18. Then that Gilgal of which there is so much mention in the Scripture, where Iosua first ate of the fruites of the land, circumcised all those borne in the Desarts, and celebrated the Passeouer. * 1 Chron. 6. 60. This Halmon is called Halemeth, whence they make a new Citie Almath, as if this Tribe had giuen fiue Cities to the Leuites.

The reason of the name, or rather a memorable application of the Etymologie of this name (for it seemes by the place, Deut. 11. 30. that the name was knowne before the coming of the Israelites into Canaan) is noted Ios. 5. 9. Ob deuolutionem probri Ægyptiaci, because their fore-skinnes (the people being there circumcised) were tumbled downe the Hill: which from thence was called Collis præputiorum. This Gilgal was also called Geliloth, as appeares by comparing the places, Ios. 15. 7. and 18. 17. for it was in the borders of Iordan, of which Ios. 22. 13. and Geliloth signifieth borders. It stood (though in some distance) directly Eastward, ouer against the two * Hils Garizim and Hebal: vpon the one of Deut. 11. 30.

of which the blessings, and on the other the cursings were to be read to the people, both being the mountaines of Ephraim. Further, for the situation of this Gilgal, it is to be noted, that both it, and Mitspa of Beniamin (of which also wee reade oft in the Scripture) were seated about the midst of the length of the Land of Canaan: for which reason [a] Samuel chose these two places, to either of which he came yearely to giue iudgement to the Israelites; of which two, Gilgal, (as is said) was neere Iordan on the East side of this Tribe; and Mitspa neere the West Sea, towards the land of the Philistims.

[a] 1 Sam. 7. 15.

The third place, which is named with these two, whither also Samuel vsed yearely to come, is [b] Bethel: which also was seated in this Tribe of Beniamin. But to returne to Gilgal which was the first place where the Arke resided, after they past ouer Iordan (from whence it was carried to Silo, and thence to Kiriath-iearim, and at length to Hierusalem) here in Gilgal it was that Iosua pitched vp the twelue stones, which were taken out of the channell of Iordan, when it was drie, that the Israelites might passe ouer it: by which Storie, as it is set downe Ios. 4. it appeares, that the same day that they passed ouer Iordan, they lodged at Gilgal. At the same Gilgal, to omit many other memorable things, it was that Samuel hewed Agag the King of the Amalekites in peeces. And as for Mitspa, whither Samuel came yearely to giue iudgement, there also were often the greatest meetings held: as that for the reuenge of the Leuites wife against Gibba, and the Beniamites, Iud. 20. 1. and another against the Philistims, 1 Sam. 7. 12. Thither also Iudas Maccabæus gathered the Iewes, (when Hierusalem was possest by the Heathen) as it is 1 Macc. 3. 47. in which place this reason of their meeting is added; Quia locus Orationi fuerat Mitspa antea Israeli. Touching this Mitspa, to auoide confusion, it is to be remembred, that the Scriptures mention foure places of this name: Mitspa of Iuda, of which Ios. 15. 38. [c] Mitspa of Gilead, of which we haue spoken already in the Tribe of Gad. Mitspa of the Moabites, where Dauid for a while held himselfe, commending his Parents to the King of Moab, 1 Sam. 22. 3. and lastly, this chiefe Mitspa of the Beniamites. And as in this place the chiefe meetings were held both before Hierusalem was recouered from the Iebusites, and also in the time of the Macchabees (as we haue said) when Hierusalem was held by the wicked vnder Antiochus, so also in the time of Hieremie, after the destruction of the Temple by the Chaldees, Gedaliah whom Nabuchodonosor left in Iewrie, as Gouernour ouer those that were left in the land, held his abiding in this place: vntill (to the great hurt of the Iewes) hee was slaine by the treason of Ismael, one of the royall bloud of Iuda, as it is Hierem. 41.

[b] Iunius in this place, for Bethel reades Domum Dei sortis, and interpretes it, Kireath-iearim, where the Arke abode. For (saith he) by the Law, Exo. 23. 17. the greatest meetings in their annuall feasts were to bee, where the Arke was, but this place doth not speake of festiuall, but of iudiciall meetings: and besides the Priests did vse to bring the Arke to their great meetings whersoeuer they were, as appears 1 Sam. 12. v. 11. & c. 14. v. 18. neither is it easie to expound Bethel other wise than for the Citie Bethel, though Iunius also take it for the place where the Arke was, 1 Sam. 10. 3.

[c] It was no other than this Mitspa of Gilead, of which Ios. 11. 8. as appeares by that which is added Versus orientem, for Iosua notes the three quarters, North, West, and East, to which hee followed the Canaanites, though Adrichomius and others out of this place imagine a Mitspa or Maspha (as they write in) in the Tribe of Asser. 1 Sam. 7. 11. Ios. 16. 1.

Neere vnto this Mitspa, the Scripture mentioneth Beth-car, after called Aben-Hezer, that is, the Stone of helpe: where Samuel pitched vp the Pillar or Stone, for a Trophy against the Philistims.

Touching Bethel which (as it seemes) was the third place where Samuel held his chiefe meetings for the ministring of Iustice, that it was anciently called Luz, and how it was taken by the issue of Ioseph (though it belonged to the portion of Beniamin, as it is Iehos. 18. 13. and Ios. 16. 1.) and how another Citie called Luz [d] neere adioyning to it, was built by the man of the Citie which shewed the entrance to the Spies, as it is Iudg. 1. and of the occasion of the name from Iacobs vision: and how Ieroboam, by erecting one of his calues here, of Bethel (which signifieth the house of God) made it [e] Beth-auen, that is, the house of Vanitie, Hos. 4. 15. and 10. 5. as also other memorable things of this place, they are so well knowne, out of the Histories of the Scripture, that wee may well passe them ouer.

[d] Borrowing the name of the neighbour-Citie (as the custome of the Kingdomes of Iuda and Israel beyond that and Bethel, Ios. 18. 12, 13.)

The Territorie of Bethel, which at the first belonged to the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes, from the time of the great victorie of Abia against Ieroboam (of which 2 Chron. 13.) was taken from them, and adioyned to the Kingdome of Iuda: and so it continued, as appeares by the Storie of Iosias, which performed the Prophecies against the altar of Bethel, 2 Reg. 23. whence those coasts 1 Macc. 11. 34. are called Apherema, which Greeke word signifies as much as, Nothing taken away, to wit, from the tenne Tribes. It was one of the three Seignories or Præfectures which Demetrius in his Epistle mentioneth, as added by him to the Diuision of the Iewes, out of the Samaritan Countrey. A part of it, as appeares 1 Chron. 13. 19. was Hephraim, which Ios. 18. 23. is called Hophram, belonging to this Tribe of Beniamin.

Not farre from this Bethel, in this Tribe, we finde three other Cities often mentioned in the Scriptures, Rama, Gidha, and Gebah. Of the name Rama, [b] it is noted already, in the description of Ephraim, that there were many townes so called, because of their high situation. But whereas they finde out Rama in the Tribe of Iuda (as it seemes because Mat. 2. it appeares that it bordered Bethlehem) and also out of Brochard and Breidenbach make Silo to haue beene called Rama, and finde yet another Rama in Zabulon; these three haue no warrant in the Scripture. Of Rama in the Tribe of Asser, as it seemes, wee haue testimonie, Ios. 19.29. and of another in Nephthalim, Ios. 19.36. of a third Rama, where Samuel dwelt in Mount Ephraim, 1 Sam. 25.1. which more often is called [c] Ramatha, and 1 Sam. 1.1. Ramathaim Tsophim: for which the Septuagint haue Aramathaim-sophim, taking the Article affixed in the beginning, for a part of the word, whence they thinke Ioseph of Arimathaa, Mat. 27.57. was denominated.

Of a fourth Rama we reade 2 Reg. 8.29. which is Rameth in Gilead. The first, which is most often mentioned, is Rama of Beniamin, seated as wee said, neere Bethel the vttermost South-border of the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes: for which cause Baasha in the time of Asa King of Iuda, fortified it, to hinder those that did flie from him to Asa. Of this Rama or Ramatha, I should rather thinke Ioseph was, that buried Christ: because it was neerer to Hierusalem, and after the captiuity belonged to Iudæa, as it appeares, Esd. 2.26. where in that it is ioyned with Gebah, it is plaine that hee speaketh of that Rama with whose stones (after Baasha had ceased to build it) Asa (as it is 1 Reg. 25.22.) built Gebah adioyning to it: both being in Beniamin. And as Rama was the South-border of the ten Tribes, so was Gebah the North-border of the Kingdome of Iuda: whence 2 Reg. 23.8. wee reade that Iosiah through all his Kingdome, euen from Gebah, which was the North-border, to Beer-sheba which was the South-border, destroyed the places of Idolatry.

The third Citie Gibha, which was the Citie of Saul (the wickednesse of which Citie in the time of the Iudges had almost vtterly rooted out this Tribe) Adrichomius confounds with Gebah, making one of two (as they are euidently distinguished, Esai. 10.27.) of which word [d] Gibha, in another forme Gibbath, hee imagineth Gibbaath another Citie in this Tribe, making two of one. The vicinitie of this Citie also to Rama of Beniamin, appeares Iud. 19.13. where the Leuite with his wife, not able to reach to Rama, took vp his lodging at Gibha. By that place of 1 Sam. 22.6. it seemes that there was in this Gibha some Tower or Citadell called Rama: where Iunius readeth in excelso, for in Rama: but it may be that the name of the Kings Palace in this City, was Rama: as it seemes that in Rama of Samuel, the name of the chiefe place where Samuel with the Colledge of Prophets abode, was Naioth. The great Citie of Hai ouerthrowne by Ios. which Ios. 7.2. is placed neere Beth-auen vpon the East of Bethel, was in this Tribe, as is proued Nehe. 7.10. 30. though it be not named by Iosua c. 18, for it was burned by him and laid desolate, as it is Ios. 8. 28. In solitudinem in tumulum perpetuum. Another City of chiefe note is reckoned Ios. 18.25. In this Tribe was Gibbon, the chiefe Citie of the Heuites: whose cunning to binde the Israelites by oath to saue their liues, is set downe Ios. 9. whence they were reckoned among the * Nethinæi or Proselites, and were bound to certaine publique seruices in the house of God: which oath of sauing these Gibeonites, broken in part after by Saul, was by God punished by a famine, 2 Sam. 21.1. This Gibeon or Gibbon with Almon and Iebab (of both which wee haue spoken) and with Hanathoth the natall place of Hieremie the Prophet, were said Ios. 21.28. to be giuen to the Leuites by the Beniamites. Neere to this Hanathoth was Nob, as appeares 1 Reg. 2.26. where Abiathar the Priest, which was of Nob before it was destroyed by Saul, is sent to his grounds at Hanathoth: It is reckoned in the Tribe of Beniamin, Nehem. 9.31. and though in the time of Saul the residing place of the Arke was at Kiriath-iearim: yet by the lamentable tragidie of bloudshed, which Saul raised in this place (as it is set downe 1 Sam. 21. and 22.) in the iudgement of Iunius, it is proued that the Tabernacle was there for a time.

Michmas also in this Tribe Nehem. 9.31. was a place of fame, of which Esai. 10.28. where also he nameth Gallim, and Migron in this Tribe. In Michmas Saul had his Campe, 1 Sam. 13.2. (when he left Gibha to Ionathan) and there also was Ionathan Maccabæus his abode, 1 Macc. 9.73. Of Gischala in Galilee Iosephus makes often mention, but of any here in Beniamin, which they make the natall place of S. Paul, whence (they say) when it was taken by the Romans, he sailed with his parents to Tharsis, of this I finde no good warrant. Other places of lesse importance I omit, and come to the Citie of Hierusalem, and the Princes

[b] See 1.9.§.1.

[c] Of this Ramatha I vnderstand the place 1 Macc. 11.34. where it is named for one of the 3. Præfectures which Demetrius yeelds to the Iews out of the country of Samaria: this lying toward the East to Iericho, and Lydda toward the West, and Apherema (of which euen now we spake) lying in the middest betweene the two other.

A sixt Rama it seemes there was in the Tribe of Simeon toward the South, which Ios. 19.8. is called Rama of the South, and otherwise Baalath-beer, [d] Gibha in construction, that is, Gouerning a genetiue case is Gibbath: whence the Vulgar out of the Septuagint reade Ios. 24.33. Gabbath Phinees: for which Iunius hath Collis Phincasi (for this word is oft times an Appellatiue signifying a Hil) but Adrichomius taking occasion of this, builds his City Gabaath vpon this Text, and placeth it in Beniamin, whereas the words adioyned, note that this Hil was in the mountains of Ephraim.

* The word Nethinim, or Nethinæi, is as much as dati (as it were Θεοδοτοι) or as Iunius expounds it, deditij: it is vsed in Chron. 2. and in Esdras and Nehemias often.

Princes and Gouernours of this City: A great part whereof was in the Tribe of Benjamin whence Ios. 18. 28. it is named among the Cities of Beniamin.

§. II.

Of diuers memorable things concerning Hierusalem.

AT what time Hierusalem was built (which afterward became the Princesse of all Cities) it doth not appeare. Some there are who imagine that Melchisedec was the founder thereof in Abrahams time. But * according to others, that Citie out of which Melchisedec incountred Abraham (in his returne from the ouerthrow of the Assyrian and Persian Kings or Captaines, when Lot was made prisoner) standeth by the riuer of Iordan, in the halfe Tribe of Manasse bordering Zabulon, which was also called Salem, and by the Greekes Solima. * See in the hither halfe of Manasse.

Hierusalem (whensoeuer or by whomsoeuer built) was a principall Citie in Iosua his time: yet not so renowned as Hazor the Metropolis (in those dayes and before) of all the Canaanites. Adonizedek (whom Iosua slew) was then King of Hierusalem. That it was belonging to the Iebusites it is manifest: for how long soeuer they held it before Moses time, they were Masters and Lords thereof almost 400. yeares after him: euen till Dauid wanne it: and therefore in all likelihood, it was by the Iebusei (the children of Iebuseus the sonne of Canaan) built; after whom it was called Iebus. And so much did that Nation relye on the strength of the place, as when Dauid attempted it, they bragged that their lame, and blinde, and impotent people should defend it. 2 Sam. 5. v. 6.

Dauid, after he had by Gods assistance possest it, and turned out the Iebusites, gaue it an exceeding great increase of circuit: strengthened it with a Citadell or Castle: and beautified it with many Palaces, and other buildings: changing the name from Iebussalem, the City of the Iebusites, to Hierusalem, which the Greekes call Hierosolyma. After Dauids time Salomon amplified, beautified, and strengthened it exceedingly. For besides the worke of the Temple, which was no lesse admirable than renowned among all Nations, the Palaces, gates, and walls, could not any where in the world be exampled: and besides, that it had 150000. Inhabitants, the women and children not accounted. The ditch had 60. foot depth, cut out of the very rocke: and 250. foot of breadth: whereof the like hath seldome beene heard of, either since or before. Ios. cont. Ap. l. 1. Strab. geog. l. 16.

After the death of Salomon, and that the Kingdome of the Iewes was cut asunder, Shishac King of Egypt, and his predecessor, hauing bred vp for that purpose, Adad the Idumæan, and Ieroboam, Salomons seruant; and both married to Egyptians: the State by the one disturbed, by the other broken: Shishac first inuaded the Territory of Iuda, entred Hierusalem, and sackt it, and became Master not onely of the riches of Salomon, but of all those spoyles which Dauid had gotten from Adadezer, Tohu, the Ammonites, and other Nations. It was againe sackt, and a part of the wall throwne downe by Ioas King of Israel; while Amasia the twelfth King thereof gouerned Iuda. 2 chron. 12. 2 Kings 14. 2 Kings 16.

Not long after, Achaz the fifteenth King of Iuda impouerished the Temple, and presented Teglatphalassar with the treasures thereof. And Manasses the sonne of Ezekiah, the sonne of Achaz, by the vaunts made by Ezekiah, to the Embassadors of Merodach, lost the remaine, and the very bottome of their treasures. It was againe spoyled by the Babylonians, Ioakim then raigning. But this vngratefull, Idolatrous, and rebellious Nation, taking no warning by these Gods gentle corrections and afflictions, but persisting in all kinde of impietie, filling the City euen to the mouth with innocent bloud, God raised vp that great Babylonian King Nabuchodonosor, as his scourge and reuenger, who making this glorious Citie and Temple with all the Palaces therein, and the Walls and Towers which imbraced them, euen and leuell with the dust, carried away the spoyles with the Princes and people, and crusht them with the heauie yoake of bondage and seruitude full seuenty yeares, insomuch as Sion was not onely become as a torne and plowed vp field, Hierusalem an heape of stones, and rubble, the mountaine of the Temple as a groue, or wood of thornes and briers, but (as Hierome speaketh) euen the birds of the ayre scorned to flie ouer it, or the beasts to tread on that defiled soyle. 1 Chron. 5. 26. 2 Kings 25. 2 Kings 19. 2 Par. 18. Mich. 3. Hier. 25. 26. 29.

Then 70. yeares being expired, according to the prophecie of Daniel, and the Iewes by the grace of Cyrus returned: the Temple was againe built, though with interruption and difficultie Hier. tom. 3. trad. Heb.

difficultie enough: and the Citie meanely inhabited, and without walls or other defences, for some 60. and odde yeares, till Nehemia by the fauour of Artaxerxes rebuilt them. Then againe was the Temple and Citie spoyled by Bagoses, or Vagoses, the Lieutenant of Artaxerxes: after by * Ptolomæus the first; then by Antiochus Epiphanes: and againe by Apollonius his Lieutenant. By Pompey it was taken long after, but not destroyed, nor robbed, though Crassus in his Parthian expedition tooke as much as hee could of that which Pompey spared.

* The first of the Egyptian Kings after Alexander Macedon, who dissembling his Religion came vp to Hierusalem to offer Sacrifice. Ios. 12. ant. 1.

But the damages which it sustained by the violence of sacrilegious Tyrants, were commonly recompenced by the industrie or bountie of good Princes, the voluntarie contribution of the people; and the liberalitie of strangers. Before the captiuity, the people of the land through the exhortation of godly Kings, made many and large offerings to repaire the Temple of Salomon. The wrong done by Ptolomæus Lagi to the second Temple, was requited by the bountie of his sonne Ptolomæus Philadelphus. The mischiefe wrought by Antiochus Epiphanes and his followers, was amended partly by the great offerings which were sent to Hierusalem out of other Nations. Finally all the losses, which either the Citie or Temple had endured, might well seeme forgotten in the raigne of Herod that vsurping and wicked, but magnificent King, who amplified the Citie, new built the Temple, and with many sumptuous workes did so adorne them, that hee left them farre more stately and glorious than they had beene in the dayes of Salomon.

§. III.

Of the destruction of Ierusalem by the Romans.

IN this flourishing estate, it was at the comming of our Sauiour Christ Iesus: and after his death and ascension, it so continued about 40. yeares. But then did Titus the Roman, being stirred vp by God, to be the reuenger of Christ his death, and to punish the Iewes sinfull ingratitude, incompasse it with a Roman armie, and became Lord thereof. He began the siege at such time as the Iewes, from all parts, were come vp to the celebration of the Passeouer: so as the Citie was then filled with many hundreds of thousands of all sorts; and no manner of prouision or store for any such multitudes. An extreame famine, with the ciuill dissension, oppresst them within the walls; a forcible enemie assailed them without. The Idumæans also, who lay in waite for the destruction of the Iewes Kingdome, thrust themselues into the Citie, of purpose to betray it: who also burnt the Temple, when Nabuchodonosor tooke it. And to bee short, there perished of all sorts, from the first besieging to the consummation of the victory, eleuen hundred thousand soules: and the City was so beaten downe and demolished, as those which came afterward to see the desolation thereof, could hardly beleeue that there had beene any such place or habitation. Onely the three Herodian towers (workes most magnificent, and ouer-topping the rest) were spared, as well for lodgings for the Romane garrisons, as that thereby their victorie might bee the more notorious and famous: for by those buildings of strength and State remaining, after-ages might iudge what the rest were; and their honour bee the greater and more shining, that there-ouer became victorious.

Esd. 1. c. 4. v. 45.

After this, such Iewes as were scattered here and there in Iudæa, and other Prouinces, began againe to inhabite some part of the Citie; and by degrees to rebuild it, and strengthen it as they could, being then at peace, and tributaries to the Roman State: but after 65. yeares, when they againe offered to reuolt, and rebell, Ælius Adrianus the Emperour slaughtered many thousands of them, and ouerturned those three Herodian Towers, with all the rest, making it good which Christ himselfe had foretold; That there should not stand one stone vpon another, of that vngratefull Citie. Afterward, when his furie was appeased, and the Prophecie accomplished, he tooke one part without the wall, wherein stood Mount Caluarie, and the Sepulchre of Christ, and excluding of the rest the greatest portion, he againe made it a Citie of great capacitie, and called it after his owne name, Aelia Capitolia. In the gate toward Bethel, hee caused a Sow to bee cut in Marble, and set in the front thereof, which hee did in despight of the Iewes Nation: making an Edict, that they should not from thence-forth euer enter into the City, neither should they dare so much as to behold it from any other high place ouertopping it.

But

But the Christian Religion flourishing in Palæstina, it was inhabited at length, by all Nations, and especially by Christians; and so it continued 500. yeeres. Guil. Tir. Bel. Sa. l. 14. c. 12.

It was afterward in the 636. yeare after Christ, taken by the Egyptian Saracens, who held it 400. and odde yeares. Onuphrius Chro.

In the yeare 1099. it was regained by Godfrey of Bullion, by assault, with an exceeding slaughter of the Saracens; which Godfrey, when he was elected King thereof, refused to be crowned with a Crowne of gold, because Christ, for whom hee fought, was therein crowned with thornes. After this recouery, it remained vnder the successors of Godfrey fourescore and eight yeares: till in the yeare 1197. it was regained by Saladine of Egypt: and lastly, in the yeare 1517. in the time of Selim, the Turkes cast out the Egyptians, who now hold it, and call it Cuzumbaree, or the Holy Citie. Neither was it Ierusalem alone that hath so oftentimes beene beaten downe and made desolate, but all the great Cities of the World haue with their Inhabitants, in seuerall times and ages, suffered the same shipwracke. And it hath beene Gods iust will, to the end others might take warning, if they would, not onely to punish the impiety of men, by famine, by the sword, by fire, and by slaueric; but hee hath reuenged himselfe of the very places they possest; of the walls and buildings, yea, of the soyle and the beasts that fedde thereon. G. Tir. l. 8. c. 5. 18. 19. &c.

For, euen that land, sometime called holy, hath in effect lost all her fertilitie, and fruitfulnesse; witnesse the many hundreds of thousands which it fed in the dayes of the Kings of Iuda and Israel; it being at this time all ouer, in effect, exceeding stony and barraine. It also pleased God, not onely to consume with fire from heauen, the Cities of the Sodomites; but the very soile it selfe hath felt, and doth feele the hand of God to this day. God would not spare the beasts that belonged to Amalek, no not any small number of them to be sacrificed to himselfe: neither was it enough that Achan himselfe was stoned, but that his moueables were also consumed and brought to ashes.

Of the vaine and malicious reports of Heathen writers, touching the antient Iewes.

OF the originall of the Iewes, prophane writers haue conceiued diuersly and iniuriously. Quintilian speakes infamously of them, and of their Leader; who (saith he) gathered together a pernicious Nation. Diodore and Strabo make them Egyptians. Others affirme that while Isis gouerned Egypt, the people were so increased, as Ierosolymus and Iudas led thence a great multitude of that Nation, with whom they planted the neighbour Regions: which might be meant by Moses and Aaron: for the name of Moses was accidentall, because he was taken vp and saued out of the waters.

But Iustine of all other most malicious, doth deriue the Iewes from the Syrian Kings; of whom, Damascus, saith he, was the first: and to him succeeded Abraham, Moses, and Israel. He againe supposeth (somewhat contrary to himselfe) that Israel had ten sonnes, among whom hee diuided the land of Iuda; so called of Iudas his eldest; who had the greatest portion. The youngest of the sonnes of Israel he calleth Ioseph: who being brought vp in Egypt, became learned in magicall Arts, and in the interpretations of Dreames, and signes prodigious; and this Ioseph (saith he) was father to Moses: who with the rest, by reason of their foule diseases, and lest they should infect others, were banished Egypt. Further, he telleth how these men thus banished, when in the Desarts they suffered extreame thirst and famine, and therein found reliefe the seuenth day, for this cause euer after obserued the seuenth day, and kept it Holy; making it a Law among themselues, which afterward became a branch of their Religion. Hee addeth also, that they might not marrie out of their owne Tribes, lest discouering their vncleanenesse, they might also be expelled by other Nations, as they were by the Egyptians. These and the like fables hath Iustine. Iustin. l. 36.

Cornelius Tacitus doth as grossly belie them, in affirming, that in the inmost Oratorie of their Temple, they had the golden head of an Asse, which they adored. But herein Tacitus forgetteth himselfe, hauing in the fift booke of his owne Historie truely confessed of the Iewes, that they worshipped one only God: and thought it most prophane to repre-

Further, he telleth how these men thus banished, when in the Desarts they suffered extreame thirst and famine, and therein found release the seuenth day, for this cause euer after obserued the seuenth day, and kept it Holy; making it a Law among themselues, which afterward became a branch of their Religion. Hee addeth also, that they might not marrie out of their owne Tribes, lest discouering their vncleanenesse, they might also be expelled by other Nations, as they were by the Egyptians. These and the like fables hath Iustine. Iustin. l. 36.

Cornelius Tacitus doth as grossly belie them, in affirming, that in the inmost Oratorie of their Temple, they had the golden head of an Asse, which they adored. But herein Tacitus forgetteth himselfe, hauing in the fift booke of his owne Historie truely confessed of the Iewes, that they worshipped one only God: and thought it most prophane to represent the Deitie by any materiall figure, by the shape of a man, or any other creature: and they had therefore in their Temples, no Image or representation, no not so much as in any Citie by them inhabited. Somewhat like this hath Alexander Polyhistor, in Stephanus, who also makes Iudas with Idumea, the first parents of the Iewes.

Claudius Iolaus drawes them from Indus, whose parents were Spartus and Thebis; whence it came that the Spartans or Lacedæmonians challenged kindred of the Hebrewes: but they did it as descended of Abraham, saith Iosephus. Some of these reports seeme to haue beene gathered out of diuine letters, though wrested and peruerted, according to the custome of the Heathen. For so haue they obscured and altered the Storie of the Creation, of Paradise, of the Floud, and giuen new names to the children of Adam in the first age, to Noah and his sonnes, in the second: and so to Abraham, Isaac, and Iacob, Moses, and the rest of the Fathers, and leaders of the Hebrewes: all which faimings, as touching the Iewes and their originalls, Iosephus against Appion, and Tertullian haue sufficiently answered. For that the Hebrewes were the children of Arphaxad and Heber, no man doubteth: and so Chaldæans originally, taking name either of Heber, the sonne of Sale, or else (saith Montanus) of wandring, as is before remembred. And therefore doth Stephanus, the Greeke Grammarian, deriue the Hebrewes or Iewes, from Arabus, hauing mistaken the name of Abraham; who was the sonne of Heber, in the fifth descent. Their ancient names were first changed by the two grand-children of Abram: for after Iacob, otherwise Israel, the chiefe part were called Israel, another part after Esau or Edom, Edomites; at length the remnant of Iacob, being most of the Tribe of Iuda, honoured the name of Iudas, the sonne of Iacob, and became Iudæans or Iewes: as also for a time in the name of Ephraim the sonne of Ioseph, the chiefe of the Patriarches of the ten Tribes, the rest of the ten Tribes were comprehended: but were first rooted out when the Kingdome of Israel fell. The Iudæans continued their names, though they suffered the same seruitude not long after, vnder Nabuchodonosor.

The gouernement which this Nation vnder-went, was first paternall: which continued till they serued the Egpptians. They were secondly ruled by their Captaines and Leaders, Moses and Iosua, by a policie Diuine. Thirdly, they subiected themselues to Iudges. Fourthly, they desired a King, and had Saul for the first: Of whom and his successours, before we intreat, we are first to speake of their Gouernment vnder Iudges, after the death of Iosua: with somewhat of the things of Fame in other Nations about these times.

In the first attempt which they made, they not only slew tenne thousand, but made Adonibezek prisoner, the greatest and cruellest Commander, both of the Canaanites and Perizites. This tyrants crueltie, as elsewhere hath beene signified, they returned in the same kinde vpon his owne head: and so by the torments which hee now felt in his owne person, (before no otherwise knowne vnto him but by his malicious

The tribes of Iuda and Simeon did also master and possesse during this Inter-regnum (or as some thinke, before the death of Iosua) the Cities of Hebron, Arad, Ekron and Hierusalem, which they burnt, and the Iebusites after reedified. They tooke also the Cities of Hebron, Debir, or Kiriathsepher, and Zephath, afterwards Horma. And although it be not set downe in expresse words that any one person commanded in chiefe ouer the people, as Moses and Iosua did: yet it seemeth that Caleb was of greatest authority among them; and that he, with the aduice of Phinees, directed and ordered their warres. For if any think that they proceeded without a Chiefe, the good successe which followed their vndertakings, witnesseth the contrary. And it was Caleb euen while Iosua gouerned, as appeares, Ios. 15. 13. &c. that propounded the attempt of Debir, to the rest of the Captaines, for the performance of which enterprise, hee promised his Daughter Achsa to wife, which he performed to Othniel, his younger brother after the conquest: whose behauiour in that seruice was such, as (next vnto the ordinance of God) it gaue him the greatest preheminence among them, and may be reckoned the second cause of his preferment and election for the first Iudge soone after. But while those of Iuda made warre with their borderers, from whom they onely recouered the mountainous Countries (for they could worke no more but the Inhabitants of the Valleyes, because they had Chariots of Iron.) The rest of the Tribes sought also to enlarge and establish their owne Territories. In which warre they laboured with variable successe: for as the house of Ioseph recouered Bethel, or Luz, from the Heuites, so did the Amorites recouer from Dan all the plaine Countries, and forced them euen the reliques in the Mountaines. And now the Israelites vnmindfull of Gods benefits, and how often hee had miraculously afore-time defended them, and made them victorious ouer their enemies (the Elders being also consumed, who beeing aduised them in the Inter-regnum) did not onely ioyne themselues in marriage with the Heathen Nations: but (that which was more detestable) they serued the Idols of Baal and Astaroth, with other the dead gods of the Canaanites and Sidonites. And therefore did the Lord (whom they had prouoked with their idolatries) deliuer them into the hands of the Arameis of Mesopotamia: whom Chushan Risharthaim at that time commanded. But after they had felt the smart of Gods displeasure against them eight yeares, it pleased him to haue compassion on his people, and to raise vp Othoniel to bee their Iudge and Leader: who by God assisted, deliuered his brethren from oppression: and inforced the Canaanites to returne into their owne Desarts, and into Mesopotamia againe, after which the Israelites had peace fourtie yeares, during all the time of Othoniels gouernment. This Othoniel is thought by Tostatus to haue beene the younger brother of Caleb, for as much as in the booke of Iudges, hee is twice called Othoniel the sonne of Cenaz, Calebs younger brother. Others doe rather interpret those words [Calebs younger brother] as if they signified the meanest of his kindred: indeed it is not likely, that Calebs Daughter should marrie with her owne Vncle; yet it followes not therefore but Othoniel should haue beene the meanest of the kindred. Wherefore wee may better thinke that hee was the Nephew of Caleb, (as some learned men expound it) and as the very words of Scripture seeme to enforce. For Caleb was the sonne of Iephunneh, and Othoniel the sonne of Cenaz, Calebs younger brother; that is, he was not brother to Caleb, but his younger brothers sonne, to whom it was not onely lawfull, but commendable to marry with his Cousin Germain Calebs daughter.

How long it was from the death of Iosua to the gouernment of Othoniel, it cannot be found: but it seemes to haue beene no short time. For many Warres were made in that space against the people of the Land. Eglon was then taken (as is thought) by the Moabites, and the best Writers are of opinion, that betweene the times of Iosua and Othoniel that cruell Warre brake out betweene the Beniamites and the rest of Israel, for the foule rape to death of the Leuites Wife. For it is written, that in those dayes there was nothing in Israel, but every man did that which was good in his owne eyes. And as Iosua had led the people against the Canaanites during the Inter-regnum, so was hee commanded to bee against Beniamin, euen by the Lord God, whose direction they craued, supposing a Iudge to appoint what should bee done; which sheweth it to haue beene when Iosua was dead, & before the gouernment of Othoniel, especially considering, that all other times wherein they wanted Gouernors, were spent vnder such oppression of strangers, as would haue giuen them no leaue to haue attempted such a ciuill Warre, if their power had beene as great, as it was in the managing of this action, wherein they so weakened the body of their estate, by effusion of bloud, that in many ages they could not bring into the field such numbers as formerly they had mustered against their bordering enemies.

Of the memorable things of this age in other Nations: and of the difficultie in the computation of times.

THere liued in this Age of Othoniel, Pandon or Pandareus, according to Homer, the fift King of Athens; who began to rule in the twentieth yeare of Othoniel, and gouerned fortie yeares. He was Father to Erichthew: his Daughters were Progne and Philomela, so greatly mentioned in fables.

Cadmus also about this time obtained Thebes: of whose Daughter Semele was borne Dionysius, or Liber Pater: vnder whom Linus the Musician liued. In his time also the Cities of Melus, Paphus, and Tharsus were built.

Ida and Dactylus flourished in this age, who are said to haue found out the vse of Iron: but Genesis hath taught vs the contrary, and that Tubalcain long before wrought cunningly both in Iron and Brasse. Not long after this time, Amphion & Zethus gouerned Thebes: whom diuers Chronologers finde in Ebuds time. But S. Augustine making a repetition of those fables, which were deuised among the Greciansand other Nations, during the gouernment of the Iudges, begins with Triptolemus, of whose parentage there is as little agreement. Viues vpon the thirteenth Chapter of S. Augustine de Ciuitate Dei, and the eighteenth booke, hath gathered all the opinions of this mans progenie, where hee that desires his pedigree may finde it. Lactantius and Eusebius make him native of Attica: and the sonne of Eleusius King of Eleusine: which Eleusius by carefull industrie had fed the people of that Territorie in the time of a great famine. This, when vpon the like occasion Triptolemus could not performe, fearing the furie of the people, he fled thence by Sea in a kinde of Galley or long Boat, which carried in her Prow a grauen or carued Serpent; who because hee made exceeding great speed to returne and to relieue his people with Corne, from some neighbour Nation: it was fained by the Poets, that his Coach was carried by Serpents through the ayre.

Whether the times of these Kings which liued together with Othoniel, and after him with the rest of the Iudges and Kings of Israel and Iuda, be precisely set downe, I cannot auow; for the Chronologers, both of the former and latter times, differ in many particulars, to examine all which would require the whole time of a long life: and therefore I desire to be excused, if in these compatisons I erre with others of better iudgement. For whether Eusebius and all that follow him, or his opposites (who make themselues so conuersant with these ancient Kings, and with the very yeare when they began to rule) haue hit the marke of time, of all other the farthest off and most defaced, I cannot but greatly doubt. First, because the Authors themselues, from whom the ancientest Chronologers haue borrowed light, had nothing for the warrant of their owne workes, but coniecture: Secondly, because their owne disagreement and contention in those elder dayes, with that of our owne age among the labourers in times, is such, as no man among them hath yet so edified any mans vnderstanding, saue his owne; but that he is greatly distracted, after what patterne to erect his buildings.

This disagreement is found not onely in the raignes of Heathen Kings & Princes; but euen in the computation of those times which the indisputable authority of holy Scripture hath summed vp, as in that of Abrahams birth; and after in the times of the Iudges and the oppressions of Israel, in the times from the egression to the building of Salomons Temple, in the Persian Empire, the seuentie Weekes, and in what not? Whersoeuer the account of times may suffer examination, the arguments are opposite, and contentions are such, as for ought that I see, men haue sought by so many waies to vncouer the Sunne, that the dayes thereby are made more darke, and the clouds more condensed than before: I can therefore giue no other warrant, than other men haue done in these computations: and therefore that such and such Kings and Kingdomes tooke beginning in this

of that yeere; I auow it to otherwise than as a borrowed knowledge, or at least as a priuate opinion: which I submit to better iudgements. Nam in priscis rebus, veritas non ad unguem quærenda; In ancient things wee are not to require an exact narration of the truth, sayes Diodore.

§. III.

Of Ehuds time, and of Proserpina, Orithya, Tereus, Tantalus, Tityus, Admetus, and fiue others that liued about those times.

AFter the death of Othoniel, when Israel fell backe to their former Idolatrie, God incouraged Moab to inuade and suppresse them: to performe which he ioyned the forces of Ammon, and Amalec vnto his owne, and so (as all kinde of miserie readily findeth out those whom God hath abandoned, or for a time with-drawne his helpe from, thereby to make them feele the difference betweene his grace and his displeasure) these Heathen neighbouring Nations had an easie conquest ouer Israel: whom God himselfe exposed to those perills: within which they were so speedilie folded vp. In this miserable estate they continued full eighteene yeeres vnder Eglon King of the Moabites, and his confederates. Yet, as the mercies of God are infinite, hee turned not his eares from their crying repentance: but raised vp Ehud the sonne of Gera to deliuer them: by which weake man, though maimed in his right hand, yet confident in the iustnesse of his quarrell, and fearing that the Israelites were too few in numbers to contend with the Head of those valiant Nations, hee resolued to attempt vpon the person of Eglon, whom if he could but extinguish, hee assured himselfe of the following victory: especially giuing his Nation no time to reestablish their gouernment, or to choose a King to command and direct them in the Warres. According to which resolution, Ehud went on as an Embassadour to Eglon, loaden with presents from the Israelites, as to appease him, and obtaining priuate accesse vpon the pretence of some secret to be reuealed, he pierc't his body with a Poniard, made of purpose with a double edge: and shutting the doores of his closet vpon him, escaped.

It may seeme that being confident of his good successe, hee had prepared the strength of Israel in readinesse. For suddenly after his returne, he did repasse Iordan, and inuading the Territory of Moab, ouerthrew their Army consisting of 10000. able and strong men: whereof not any one escaped. After which victorie, and that Samgar his Successour had miraculously slaine 600. Philistims with an Oxe goade: the Land and People of Israel liued in peace vnto the end of fourescore yeeres from the death of Othoniel, which terme expired in the Worlds yeere 2691.

In the dayes of Ehud, Naomi with Elimelech her husband, and with her two sonnes, trauailed into Moab, and so the storie of Ruth is to bee referred to this time. About the beginning of the fourescore yeeres which are giuen to Ehud, it was that Orcus King of the Molossians, otherwise Pluto, stole Proserpina, as shee walked to gather flowers in the fields of Hipponium in Sicilia: or (according to Pausanias) by the Riuer Cephisus, which elsewhere he calleth Chemer, if hee meane not two distinct Riuers. This stealth being made knowne to Pyrithous, with whom Hercules and Theseus ioyned themselues, they agreed together to recouer her: but Pluto or Orcus (whom others call Aidonius) had (as they say) a very huge Dogge, which fastened on Pyrithous, and tare him in peeces, and had also worried Theseus, but that Hercules speedily rescued him: and by strength tooke, and mastered the Dogge Cerberus: whereof grew the fable of Hercules his deliuering Theseus out of Hell. But Zezes, as I take it, hath written this story somewhat more according to the truth. For Theseus and Pyrithous, saith hee, attempted to steale Proserpina Daughter to Aidonius, King of the Molossians, who had Ceres to Wife, the mother of Proserpina: Proserpina being a generall name also for all faire women. This purpose of theirs being knowne to Aidonius, Theseus and Pyrithous were both taken; and because Pyrithous was the principall in this conspiracie, and Theseus drawne on by a kinde of affection or inforcement, the one was giuen for food to Aidonius his great Dogge Cerberus, the other held prisoner, till Hercules by the instigation of Eurisheus deliuered him by strong hand. The Molossi which Stephanus writes with a single (S) were a people of Epirus, inhabiting neere the Mountaines of Pindus: of which Mountaines

Pausan. in Att.

Oeta is one of the most famous, where Hercules burnt himselfe. The Riuer of Acheron (which the Poets describe to bee in Hell) riseth out of the same Hills. There is another Nation of the Molossi in Thessalie but these are neighbours to the Cassiopai, saith Plutarch in his Greeke questions.

The rape of Orithya the Daughter of Erictheus, King of Athens, taken away by Boreas of Thrace, is referred to the time of Ehud. The Poets ascribe this rape to the North-winde, because Thrace is situate North from Athens. In his time also Tereus rauished Philomela, of which the fable was deuised of her conuersion into a Nightingale. For Tereus hauing married her sister Progne, conducting Philomela from Athens to see her sister, forced her in her passage, and withall cut out her tongue, that shee might not complaine; perswading Progne his Wife, that Philomela died in the mid-way: all which her brother in lawes mercilesse behauiour towards her, Philomela expressed by her needle vpon cloth, and sent it to Progne. In reuenge whereof Progne caused her onely sonne Itys to bee cut in peeces, and set before Tereus her husband, so drest as it appeared to bee some other ordinary food: of which when hee had eaten his fill, shee caused his head, hands and feet, to bee presented vnto him: and then fled away with such speed towards Athens where her Father Pandion yet liued, as the Poets fained, that shee was turned into a Swallow. The place where it was performed, Strabo findes to bee Daulis in Phocis: and the Tombe of Tereus, Pausanias hath built neere the Rockes Mergi, in the Territorie of Athens. By which, as also by the name Daulis, where these things are supposed to haue beene done (whence also Philomela is called Daulias ales) it appeares that it is true, which Thucydides notes by way of digression in his Peloponnesian Warre, That this Tereus was not King in that which is now called Thracia, or in Odryse, (as the Poets call him Odrysius) but that Phocis a Countrie in Greece not farre from Attica, a Citie whereof is called Daulia, was in Pandions time inhabited by Thracians: of which this Tereus was King: whence Pandion, to haue amitie with his neighbours, made him his sonne in law: as it is good to beleeue, saith Thucydides, that Pandion King of Athens made that alliance with a neighbour King, from whom hee might haue succour, rather than with any Tereus, that should haue held the Kingdome of Odryse, which was greatly distant from thence. The occasion that the Poets chose a Swallow for Progne to be turned into, may seeme to haue beene partly because, as Pausanias sayes; Daulide nec nidificant, nec habitant in tota circumregione Hirundines; as if a Swallow, remembring the wrong that was there done to her, and her sister, did for euer after hate that place.

Neere this time Melampus (who is said to haue vnderstood the voyces of Birds and Beasts) flourished, being also esteemed for an excellent Physician. Hee restored to their former health the Daughters of Pratus King of the Argiues, who (as the Poets please) were made mad by Iuno: and thinking themselues to be Kine, fled into the Woods, fearing to bee constrained to the Plough: for in those Countries where the ground was light, they did vse often to plough with Kine.

In the seuen and fortieth yeare of Ehud, Tros began to raigne in Dardania, and gaue it his owne name; about which time Phemone the chiefe Priest of Apollo in Delpos, deuised the Heroicall Verse.

Of the same date was Tantalus, King of Lydia: whom Eusebius makes King of Phrygia: and also of that part of which the people were anciently Maones. Of Tantalus was deuised the fable that some Poets haue applied to the passion of loue: and some to the couetous that dare not inioy his riches. Eusebius calls this Tantalus the sonne of Iupiter, by the Nymph Pleta: Diaconus and Didymus in Zezes, giue him another Mother. He was said to be the son of Iupiter: as some will haue it; because hee had that Planet in his ascendent, betokening wisedome and riches. It is said that when he made a feast to the Gods, hauing nothing more precious: he caused his owne sonne to be slaine and drest to the banquet: of whom Ceres ate part of one of the shoulders: whereby was signified that those men which seek after Diuine knowledge, preferre nothing on earth before it: no not the care of their owne children, of all else the most deerest. And where it was deuised, that hee had alwayes Water and Fruit offered to his lips, and yet suffered the torment of hunger and thirst, it was meant thereby, that though he abounded (by reason of his riches) in all delicacie of the world, yet his minde being otherwise and to higher desires transported, he enioyed no pleasure at all by the rest. Of whom Ouid:

Euseb. prep. Euan. l. 2. Zezer hist. 10. Chil. 5.

Querit

Quærit aquas in aquis, & poma fugacia captat
Tantalus, hoc illi garrula lingua dedit.
Here Tantalus in water seekes for water, and doth misse
The fleeting fruit he catcheth at: His long tongue brought him this.

This punishment, they say, was inflicted vpon him, for that he discouered the secrets of the gods: that is, because he taught wisedome and vertue to mortall men: which storie Cornelius Gallus hath elegantly expresst in Verse. Others expound this fable otherwise, and say, That Tantalus, though hee excelled in riches, yet being thirstie of more abundance, was neuer satisfied. Of whom Horace against couetousnesse:

Tantalus à labijs sitiens fugientia captat
Flumina; quid rides? mutato nomine de te Fabula narratur.

The thirsting Tantalus doth catch at streames that from him flee.
Why laugh'st thou? the name but chang'd, the tale is told of thee.

Others conceiue where it is fained of Tantalus, that he gaue the Nectar and Ambrosia of the gods to vaine and vnworthy men, that hee was therefore by them in that sort punished. Of which Natalis out of Pindarus:

Immortalitatem quod furatus,
Cœtaneis conuiuis
Nectar Ambrosiamque dedit.

Because that stealing immortalitie,
He did both Nectar and Ambrosia giue
To guests of his owne age, to make them liue.

Whereby it was meant, that the secrets of Diuinitie ought not to be imparted to the vnpure Vulgar. For as the cleanest meates in a foule stomacke, are therein corrupted, so the most high and reserued mysteries are often peruerted by an vncleane and defiled minde.

To you it is giuen (saith Christ in Marke) to know the mysterie of the Kingdome of God, but vnto them that are without, all things bee done in parables. So is it said of him, that hee expounded all things to his Disciples apart. And therefore doth Gregorie Nazianzene inferre vpon a place of S. Paul: Quod si Paulo licuisset efferica, quorum ipsi cognitionem cœlum tertium & vsq; ad illud progressio suppeditauit, fortasse de Deo, nobis aliquid amplius constaret; If Paul might haue vttered the things, the knowledge whereof the third heauens, and his going thither did bring vnto him, peraduenture wee might know somewhat more of God. Marke 4. 11. Marke 4. 34. Greg. in Orat. de vesta vatione disp. de Deo. 2 Cor. 12.

Pythagoras, saith Reuelin, thought it not the part of a wise man, Asino lyram exponere, aut mysteria, quæ ita reciperet, vt Sus tubam, & fidem graculus, & vnguenta Scarabæus: quare silentium indixit discipulis, ne vulgo diuinorum arcana patefacerent, quæ meditando facilius, quàm loquendo apprehendantur; To set an Asse to a harpe, or to learne mysteries: which hee would handle as a Swine doth a Trumpet, or a Iay a viall, or Scarabies and vncleane flies soueraigne ointment. Wherefore hee commanded silence to his disciples, that they should not disclose diuine mysteries to the common sort, which are easier learnt by meditation than by babbling. And therefore did the Egyptians communicate their mysteries among their Priests in certaine Hieroglyphick letters, to the end that their secrets might bee hidden from the Vulgar: and that they might bestow the more time in the contemplation of their couered meanings.

But to proceed with the contemporaries of Aod, or Ehud, with him it is also said, that Tityus liued whom Apollo slew, because hee sought to force his Mother Latona. Euphorion hath it thus, that Tityus was the sonne of Elara, the Daughter of Orchomenus; which Elara being beloued of Iupiter, to auoid Iuno's reuenge, he hid Elara in the earth, where she was deliuered of Tityus: whose Mother dying, and himselfe therein nourished, he was therefore called the sonne of the earth. Pausanius speaking of the graue of this Gyant, affirmes that his body occupied the third part of a furlong. But Tibullus hath a louder lie of his stature out of Homer:

Por-

Hom. Od. 11.

Porrectusque nouem Tityus per iugera terræ,
Assidnas atræ visere possit aues.

Nine furlongs stretcht lyes Tityus, who for his wicked deeds,
The hungry birds with his renewing liuer daily feeds.

This Strabo doth thus expound; that Apollo killing this cruell and wicked Tyrant of Panopea, a Citie in Phocis, it was fained by the Poets to the terrour of others, that he was still eaten in Hell by birds, and yet still liued, and had his flesh renewed.

Admetus King of Thessalie liued also in this Age, whom it is said that Apollo first serued as a Herd-man, and afterward for his excellent wit was by him aduanced; but hauing slaine Hyacinthus, he crost the Hellespont, and fled into Phrygia: where together with Neptune, he was entertained by Laomedon, and got his bread by working in bricke, for building of the walls of Troy, not by making the bricks leape into their places by playing on his Harpe: according to him in Ouid, which saith:

Ilion aspicies, firmataque turribus altis.
Mœnia, Apollineæ structa canore lyræ.

Strong Ilion thou shalt see with walls and towers high,
Built with the harpe of wise Apollo's Harmonie.

Thus the Poets: but others, that hee laboured with his hands, as hired in this worke. And that he also laboured at the building of the Labyrinth in Greece, all the Megarians witnesse, saith Pausanias.

Paus. in Att.

In these daies also of Ehud, or (as some finde it) in the dayes of Deborah, liued Perseus, the sonne of Iupiter and Danae, by whose Souldiers (as they sailed out of Peloponnesus, to seeke their aduenture on Africa side) Medusa, the Daughter and Successor of Phorcus, being weakely accompanied as she hunted, neere the Lake Triton, was surprised and slaine: whose beauty, when Perseus beheld, he caused her head to be imbalmed, and carried into Greece: the beauty whereof was such and so much admired, and the beholders so astonished which beheld it, as thereof grew the fiction, that all that looked on Medusa's head, were turned into stones.

Triton a Lake of Africa, which Plinie calleth Pallantias. Didym. in pereg. Hist.

Cecrops, the second of that name, and 7. King of Athens, and Acrisius the 13. or after Eusebius, the 14. King of the Argiues, began also their raignes, as it is said, in the time of this Iudge: of which the first ruled 40. yeares, and the second 31. yeares. Also Bellerophon liued in this age, being the sonne of Glaucus, the sonne of Sisyphus: who inticed by Antea or Sthenobœa, the wife of Prætus of the Argiues, to accompany her, but refusing it, she accused him to her husband that he offered to force her: whereupon Prætus sent Bellerophon into Lycia, about some affaires of weight, betweene him and his sonne in law Iobates: giuing secret order to Iobates to dispatch him: but Iobates thinking it dishonourable to lay violent hands on him, imployed him against Chimera, a Monster, vomiting or breathing fire. Now the gods (as the report is) pittying his innocency, sent him the winged Horse Pegasus, sprung vp of the bloud of Medusa, formerly slaine by the souldiers of Perseus in Africa, to transport him, a horse that none other could master or bridle but Minerua: vpon which beast Bellerophon ouer-came Chimera: and performed the other seruices giuen him in charge: which done, as hee returned toward Lycia, the Lycians lay in ambush to haue slaine him: but being victorious also ouer all those, he arriued to Iobates in safetie: whom Iobates for his eminent vertues honoured, first with one of his Daughters: and afterward with his Kingdome: after which hee grew so insolent, as hee attempted to flye vp to heauen vpon his Pegasus: whose pride Iupiter disdaining, caused one of his stinging flyes so to vexe Pegasus, as he cast off Bellerophon from his back, into the Valley of Cilicia, where he died blinde; of which burthen Pegasus being discharged (as the fable goeth) flew backe to heauen: and being fed in Iupiters owne stable, Aurora beg'd him of Iupiter to ride on before the Sunne. This tale is diuersly expounded, as first by some, That it pleaseth God to relieue men in their innocent and vndeserued aduersitie, and to cast downe those which are too high minded: according to that which is said of Bellerophon: that when he was exposed to extreame hazzard, or rather certaine death, hee found both deliuerance and honour: but waxing ouer-proud proud and presumptuous in his glorious fortunes, hee was againe throwne downe into the extremitie of sorrow, and cruel during miserie. Secondly by others, That vnder the name of Chimera, was meant a cruell Pyrat of the Lycians, whose ship had in her prow, a Lyon, a Goate in the mid-ship, and a Dragon in the sterne, of which three beasts this Monster Chimera was said to be compounded, whom Bellerophon pursued with a kinde of Galley, of such swiftnesse, that it was called the flying Horse: to whom the invention of stayles, the wings of a ship, are also attributed. Many other expositions are made of this tale by other Authors: but it is not vnlikely, that Chimera was the name of a ship, for so Virgil calleth one of the greatest ships of Æneas. Plutarke in clarit mulier. Lib. 5. Æneid.

Ion also, from whom the Athenians (being ignorant of the antiquitie of their parent Iauan) deriue their name of Iones, is said to haue beene about Ehuds time. Homer calls them Ionees, which hath a neere resemblance to the word Iauan. Perhaps it might bee so that Ion himselfe tooke name from Iauan: it being a custome obseruable in the Histories of all times, to reuiue the ancient name of a fore-father, in some the principall of his issue. Homer in hym. ad Apoll.

The inuasion of India by Liber-Pater, is by some reported as done in this age: but S. Augustine makes him farre more ancient, placing him betweene the comming out of Egypt, and the death of Iosua. Lib. 18. c. 12. de ciuit. l. 18. c. 15.

About the end of the 80. yeares, ascribed to Ehud, and Samgar, Pelops flourished: who gaue name to Peloponnesus in Greece, now called Morea.

§. III.

Of Debora and her Contemporaries.

After Israel had liued in peace and plenty to the end of these 80. yeares, they againe began to forget the giuer of all goodnesse, and many of those being worne out, which were witnesses of the former miserie, and of Gods deliuerance by Ehud, and after him by Samgar, the rest began to returne to their former neglect of Gods commandements. For as Plentie and Peace are the parents of idle securitie, so is security as fruitfull in begetting and bringing forth both danger and subuersion: of which all estates in the world haue tasted by interchange of times. Therefore when their sinnes were againe ripe for punishment, Iabin King of Hazor, after the death of Ehud, inuaded the Territorie of Israel, and hauing in his seruice 900. iron Chariots, besides the rest of his forces, he held them in subiection twenty yeares, till it pleased God to raise vp Deborah, the Prophetesse, who incouraged Barac to leuie a force out of Nepthalim, and Zabulon, to incounter the Canaanites. That the men of Nepthalim were more forward than the rest in this action, it may seeme to haue proceeded partly from the authoritie that Barac had among them, being of the same Tribe; and partly from their feeling of the common grieuance, which in them was more sensible, than in others, because Hazor and Harosheth the chiefe holds of Iabin, were in Nepthalim. So in the dayes of Iepthe the Gileadites tooke the greatest care, because the Ammonites with whom the Warre was, pressed most vpon them, as being their borderers. Now as it pleased God by the left hand of Ehud to deliuer Israel from the Moabites: and by the counsaile and courage of a woman, to free them from the yoke of Canaan, and to kill the valiant Sisera by Iael the Kenites wife: so was it his will at other times, to worke the like great things by the weakest meanes. For the mighty Assyrian Nabuchodonosor, who was a King of Kings, and resistlesse, he ouerthrew by his owne imaginations, the causers of his bruitish melancholy: and changed his matchlesse pride into the base humility of a Beast. And to approue that hee is the Lord of all power, hee sometime punisheth by inuisible strength, as when he slaughtered the Armie of Senacherib by his Angell, or as hee did the Egyptians in Moses time: sometime by dead bodies, as when he drowned Pharao by the waues of the Sea; and the Canaanites by haile-stones in the time of Iosua: sometimes by the ministerie of men, as when he ouerthrew the foure Kings of the East, Chedorlaomer, and his companions, by the houshold seruants of Abraham. He caused the Moabites and Ammonites to set vpon their owne confederate the Army of the Edomites; and hauing slaine them to kill one another in the fight of Iehosaphat: and of the like to these a volume of examples may be gathered. And to this effect did Deborah the Prophetesse speake vnto Barac in these words: But this iourney that thou takest, shall not bee for thine honour, for 2 Chron. 20. Iudg. 4. 9.

the Lord shall sell Sisera into the hands of a Woman. In which victorie all the strength of the Canaanite Iabin fell to the ground, euen to the last man: in the end of which warre it seemeth that Iabin himselfe also perished, as appeareth by the last Verse of the fourth booke.

After all which, Debora giueth thankes to God, and after the acknowledgement of all his powrfulnesse, and great mercies, she sheweth the weake estate wherein Israel was brought for their idolatrie by the Canaanites, and other bordering Nations, in these words: Iud. 5. v. 8. Or was there a shield or speare seene among forty thousand of Israel? She also sheweth how the Israelites were seuered and amased, some of them confined ouer Iordan, and Verse 17. durst not ioyne themselues to the rest; as those of Reuben in Gilead: that the Asherites kept the Sea coast, and forsooke their habitations towards the Land; and the children of Dan who neighboured the Sea, crept into their ships for safetie, shewing thereby that all were dispersed, and all in effect lost. She then curseth the Inhabitants of Meroz, who dwelling neere the place of the battaile (belike fearing the successe) came not out to assist Israel, and then blesseth Iael the wife of Heber the Kenite, who nailed Sisera in her Tent: shewing thereby her affection of that race to the Israelites. For though the Familie of Heber were inforced in that miserable time of subiection, to hold correspondencie with Iabin the Canaanite, yet when occasion offered them selues, they witnessed their loue and faith to their ancient friends. Lastly, shee derideth the Mother of Sisera who promised her sonne the victorie in her owne hopes: and fancied to her selfe, and described the spoiles both of Garments and Maidens by him gotten. For conclusion, shee directeth her praise and thankes to God onely victorious.

From the beginning of Iabins oppression to the end of that peace, which Debora and Barac purchased vnto Israel, there passed 40. yeares. In which time the Kingdome of Argos, which had continued 544. yeares, was translated to Mycene. The translation of this Kingdome Hiruin out of Pausanias writeth to this effect: After Danaus, Lynceus succeeded in Argos: after whom the children of Abas the sonne of Lynceus diuided the Kingdome: of which Acrisius being eldest held Argos it selfe: Proetus his brother possest Ephyra or Corinth, and Tyrinthus, and other Cities, with all the Territorie towards the Sea, there being many mountaines in Tyrinthos, which witnesse Proetus possession, saith Pausanias. Pau. in Corinthiacis.

Now Acrisius was foretold by an Oracle, that hee should bee slaine by the sonne of his Daughter Danae: whereupon hee caused her to bee inclosed in a Tower, to the end that no man might accompanie her. But the Lady being exceeding faire, it is fained that Iupiter turned himselfe into a golden shower: which falling into her lap, begat her with childe: the meaning whereof was, that some Kings sonne, or other worthy man, corrupted her Keepers with gold, and enioyed her, of whom Perseus was borne: who when he grew to mans estate, either by chance (saith Caesius) or in shewing his grand-father the invention of the discus, or leaden ball, slew him vnwillingly. After this Perseus, to auoide the infamie of Parricide in Argos, changed Kingdomes with his Vncle Proetus: and built Mycene. This imprisonment of Danae, Strabo reporteth otherwise: and that shee was inclosed in a brazen vault, vnder the Kings Hall with her Nurse and Keepers. Vpon this close custodie Horace hath this witie obseruation:

Inclusam Danaen, turris aenea,
Robustaeq; fores, & vigilum canum
Tristes excubiae, munierant satis
Nocturnis ab adulteris:
Si non Acrisium Virginis abditae
Custodem pauidum, Iupiter & Venus
Risissent, fore enim tutum iter & patens,
Conuerso in pretium Deo.
Aurum per medios ire satellites,
Et perrumpere amat saxa, potentius
Ictu fulmineo.

The

The braben Tower with doores close bar'd,
And watchfull bandogs fright full guard, kept fast the maidenhead
Of Danae from secret loue
Till smiling Perseus; and wife Ioue
Beguil'd her Fathers dread.
For chang'd into a golden showre,
The god into her lap did poure
Himselfe, and tooke his pleasure.
Through guardes, and stone walls to breake,
Ioues thunder-bolt is farre more weake,
Then is a golden treasure.

The first Kings of the Argiues were these.

1. Inachus the first King, who began to raigne in the first yeare of Iacob, and the 61. of Isaac, from which time to the end of Sthenelus, Castor mis-reckoneth 400. yeares. This Kingdome before the translation, Eusebius accounteth to haue stood 544. yeares, others but 447. Io was the Daughter of this Inachus: whom the Egyptians called Isis.
2. Phoroneus,
3. Apis,
4. Argus,
5. Piras us,
6. Phorbas,
7. Triopas,
8. Crotopus,
9. Sthenelus,
10. Danaus,
11. Lynceus,
12. Abas,
13. Acrisius,
14. Pelops:

After the translation to Mycenæ, Mar. Scotus findes these Kings:

1. Perseus,
2. Sthenelus,
3. Eurysthens,

Atreus and Thyestes | The sonnes of Pelops by Hippodamia: Atreus by Europe had Agamemnon and Menelaus.

4. Agamemnon,
5. Ægysthus,
6. Oreſtes,
7. Tiſamenus,
8. Penthilus and
9. Cometes;

Of these Kings Mercator and Bunting leaue out the two first, and the last: beginning with Eurysthens: and ending with Penthilus. In Tiſamenus time the Heraclidæ returned into Peloponeſus: of which hereafter.

The Contemporaries of Barac and Debora, were Midas who raigned in Phrygia: and Ilus who built Ilium: with others mentioned in our Chronological table, as contemporaries with Debora.

§ V.

Of Gidion, and of Dædalus, Sphinx, Minos, and others that liued in this age.

Debora and Barac being dead: the Midianites assisted by the Amalekites infested Israel. For when, vnder a Iudge who had held them in the feare of the Lord, they had enioyed any quiet or prosperity: the Iudge was no sooner dead, than they turned to their former impious idolatrie. Therefore now the neighbouring Nations did did so master them in a short time (the hand of God being with-held from their defence) as to saue themselues, they crept into caues of the mountaines, and other the like places

Iud. 6. of hardest accesse: their enemies possessing all the plaines and fruitfull vallies: and in harvest time by themselues, and the multitude of their carrell, destroying all that grew vp: couering the fields as thicke as grasse-hoppers: which multitude lasted seuen yeares.

Iud. 6. v. 5. Then the Lord by his Angell stirred vp Gideon the sonne of Ioash, afterward called Ierubbaal: whose feare and vnwillingnesse, and how it pleased God to hearten him in Iud. c. 6. & 7. his enterprize, it is both largely and precisely set downe in the holy Scriptures: as also how it pleased God by a few select persons, namely 300. out of 32000. men, to make them know that he onely was the Lord of Hosts. Each of these 300. by Gidions appointment carried a trumpet, and light in a pitcher, instruments of more terrour than force, with which hee gaue the great Armie of their enemies an alarum: who hearing so loud a noyse, and seeing (at the cracke of so many pitchers broken) so many lights about them, esteeming the Armie of Israel to be infinite, and strucken with a sodaine feare, they all fled without a stroke striken: and were slaughtered in great numbers: two of their Princes being made prisoners and slaine. In his returne the Ephramites began to quarrell with Gidion, because he made warre without their assistance, being then greedy of glory, the victory being gotten: who (if Gideon had failed and fallen in the enterprise) would no doubt haue held themselues happy by being neglected. But Gideon appeasing them with a milde answer, followed after the enemie, in which pursuite being tyred with trauaile, and weary euen with the slaughtering of his enemies, hee desired reliefe from the inhabitants of Succoth, to the end, that (his men being refreshed) hee might ouer-take the other two Kings of the Midianites: which had saued themselues by flight. For they were foure Princes of the Nations, which had inuaded and wasted Israel: to wit, Oreb and Seeb, which were taken already, and Zebah and Salmunna which fled.

Gideon being denied by them of Succoth, sought the like reliefe from the Inhabitants of Penuel, who in like sort refused to succour him. To both of these places he threatned therefore the reuenge, which in his returne from the prosequution of the other two Princes, he performed: to wit, that he would teare the flesh of those of Succoth with Thornes and Briars, and destroy the Inhabitants and Cittie of Penuel: Now why the people of these two Cities should refuse reliefe to their brethren the Israelites, especially after so great a victorie? if I may presume to make coniecture, it seemes likely, first that those Cities set ouer Iordan, and in the way of all inuasions, to be made by the Moabites, Ammonites and Midianites, into Israel, had either made their owne peace with those nations, and were not spoiled by them: or else they knowing that Zeba and Salmunna were escaped with a great part of their army, might feare their reuenge in the future. Secondly, it may be laid to the condition and dispositions of these men: as it is not rare to finde of the like humour in all ages. For there are multitudes of men, especially of those which follow the warre, that both enuie and maligne others, if they performe any praise-worthy actions, for the honour and safety of their owne Countrey, though themselues may bee assured to beare a part of the smart of contrary successe. And such malicious hearts can rather be contented that their Prince and Countrey should suffer hazzard and want, than that such men as they mislike, should bee the authors or actors of any glory or good to either.

A place in Basan, as it is thought. Iud. 8. 10. Now Gideon, how or where soeuer it were that hee refreshed himselfe and his weary and hungry Souldiers, yet hee followed the opportunity, and pursued his former victory to the vttermost: and finding Zebah and Salmunna in Karkor (suspecting no farther attempt vpon them) he againe surprised them, and slaughtered those 15000. remaining: hauing put to the sword in the former attempt 120000. and withall hee tooke Zebah and Salmunna prisoners: whom because themselues had exequuted Gideons brethren before at Tabor, he caused them both to be slaine: or (as it is written) at their owne request slew them with his owne hands: his Sonne whom he first commanded to doe it, refusing it; and in his returne from the consummation of this mercuilous victory, he tooke reuenge of the Elders of Succoth, and of the Citizens of Penuel: forgiuing no offence committed against him: either by strangers or by his brethren the Israelites. But such mercy as he shewed to others, his owne children found soone after his death, according to that which hath beene said before. The debes of crueltie and mercy are neuer left vnsatisfied: for as he slew the 70. Elders of Succoth, with great and vnusuall torments, so were his owne 70. sonnes all, but one, murthered by his owne bastard Abimelec. The like Analogie is obserued by the Rabbines, in the greatest of the plagues which God brought vpon the Egyptians, who hauing caused the male children of the Hebrewes to bee slaine, others of them to be cast into the River and drowned: God rewarded them euen with the like measure, destroying their owne first borne by his Angell, and drowning Pharaoh and his Army in the read sea. And hereof a world of examples might bee giuen both out of the Scriptures and other Histories.

In the end so much did the people reuerence Gideon in the present for this victorie, and their owne deliuerance, as they offered him the Soueraignetie ouer them, Iudg. 8. 23. and to establish him in the Gouernment; which hee refused, answering; I will not raigne ouer you, neither shall my childe raigne ouer you, but the Lord shall, &c. But hee desired the people that they would bestow on him the golden eare-rings, which euery man had gotten. For the Ismaelites, neighbours, and mixt with the Midianites, vsed to weare them: the waight of all which was a thousand and seuen hundred Shekles of gold, which makes of ours 2380. li. if wee follow the account of the Shekle vulgar. And because he Exod. 28. conuerted that gold into an Ephod, a garment of gold, blew silke, purple, scarlet and Iudg. 8. 28. fine linnen, belonging to the High Priest onely, and set up the same in his owne Citie of Ophra or Ephra, which drew Israel to Idolatrie, the same was the destruction of Gideon and his house.

There was another kinde of Ephod besides this of the High Priests, which the Leuites vsed, and so did Dauid when he danced before the Arke: and Samuel, while hee was yet young, which was made of linnen onely.

Now if any man demand how it was possible for Gideon with 300. men to destroy 120000. of their enemies, and afterward 15000. which remained; wee may remember, that although Gideon with 300. gaue the first alarme, and put the Midianites in rout and disorder: yet all the rest of the Armie came into the slaughter, and pursuite: for it is Iudg. c. 7. v. 23. written; Then the men of Israel being gathered together out of Nepthalie, and out of Aser, and out of Manasse, pursued after the Midianites: for this armie Gideon left in tents behinde him, when he went downe to view the armie of his enemies, who with the noyse of his 300. trumpets came after him to the execution.

There liued with Gideon, Ægeus, the sonne of Pandion, who raigned in Athens: Eurestheus King of Mycena: Atreus and Thyestes the sonnes of Pelops, who bare dominion ouer a great part of Peloponnesus, and after the death of Eurisheus, the Kingdome of Mycena fell into the hand of Atreus. This is that Atreus, who holding his brother in iealousie, as an attempter, both of his wife and Crowne, slew the children of Thyestes, and causing their flesh to be dresst, did therewith feast their father. But this cruelty was not vnreuenged. For both Atreus and his sonne Agamemnon were slaine by a base sonne of Thyestes, yea the grand children, and all the linage of Atreus died by the same sword.

In Gideons time also those things were supposed to haue beene done, which are written of Dedalus and Icarus. Dedalus, they say, hauing slaine his Nephew Atalus, fled to Minos, King of Crete, for succour; where for his excellent workemanship he was greatly esteemed, hauing made for Minos a Labyrinth, like vnto that of Egypt. Afterward he was said to haue framed an artificiall Cowe for Pasiphae the Queene, that shee, being in loue with a faire Bull, might by putting her selfe into the Cowe, satisfie her lust; a thing no lesse vnnaturall than incredible, had not that shamelesse Emperour Domitian exhibited the like beastly spectacle, openly before the people of Rome, in his Amphitheater; of purpose, as may seeme, to verifie the old fable. For so it appeares by those verses of Martial, wherein the flattering Poet magnifieth the abominable shew, as a goodly Pageant, in those vicious times.

Iunctam Pasiphaen Dicteo credite Tauro
Vidimus, acceptis fabula prisca fidem.
Nec semiratur Cæsar, Pompeiana vetustas
Quicquid fama canit, donat arena tibi.

But concerning that which is reported of Pasiphae, Seruius makes a lesse vnhonest con-construction of it, thinking that Dædalus was of her counsaile, and her Pandar for the enticing of a Secretarie of Minos called Taurus, which signifieth a Bull, who begat her with childe; and that she being deliuered of two sonnes, the one resembling Taurus, the other her husband Minos, it was fained that she was deliuered of the Monster Minotaur, halfe a Man and halfe a Bull. But this practice being discouered, and Dædalus appointed to bee slaine, he fled out of Crete to Cocalus King of Sicil: in which passage he made such expedition, as it was fained that he fashioned wings for himselfe and his sonne to transport them. For whereas Minos pursued him with boates which had oares onely, Dædalus framed sailes both for his owne boate, and for his sonnes, by which hee outwent those that had him in chase. Vpon which new inuention, Icarus bearing himselfe ouerbold, was ouerborne and drowned.

It is also written of Dædalus, that he made Images that could moue themselues, and goe, because he caused them with legs, armes, and hands; whereas those that preceded him, could onely present the body & head of those men, whom they cared to counterfait, and yet the workmanship was esteemed very rare. But Plutarch, who had seene some of those that were called the Images of Dædalus, found them exceeding rude.

Herind. Plat. Paus. lib. 9. With Gideon also flourished Linus the Theban, the son of Apollo, and Terpsichore, who instructed Thamaris, Orpheus, and Hercules. He wrote of the Creation, of the Sunne and Moones course, and of the generation of liuing Creatures, but in the end he was slaine by Hercules his scholler with his owne harpe.

Strab. l. 9. Againe, in this age those things spoken of Sphinx and Oedipus, are thought to haue beene performed. This Sphinx being a great robber by sea and land, was by the Corinthians Armie, led by Oedipus, ouercome. But that which was written of her propounding of riddles, to those whom shee mastered, was meant by the rockie and vnaccessible mountaine neere Thebes, which she defended; and by Oedipus disoluing her probleme, his victorie ouer her. She was painted with wings, because exceeding swift, and with the body of a Lyon for her cruelty. But that which Palephatus reports of Sphinx, were more probable, did not the time disproue it, for he calls her an Amazonite, and the wife of Cadmus, who when by her helpe he had cast Draco out of Thebes (neglecting her) hee married the sister of Draco, which Sphinx taking in despightfull part, with her owne troope she held the mountaine by Thebes, from whence she continued a sharpe warre vpon the Thebans, till by Oedipus ouerthrowne. About this time did Minos thrust his brother out of Crete, and held sharpe warre with the Megarians, and Athenians, because his sonne Androgeus was slaine by them. Hee possest himselfe of Megara, by the treason of Scylla, Daughter of Nisus the King. Hee was long Master of the sea, and brought the Athenians to the tribute of deliuering him euery yeare seuen of their sonnes: which tribute Theseus released, as shall be shewed, when I come to the time of the next Iudge Thola. In the end he was slaine at Camerinus or Camicus in Sicilia, by Cocalus the King, while he pursued Dædalus: and was esteemed by some to be the first law-giuer to those Ilands.

Arist. pol. li.

To this time are referred many deeds of Hercules, as the killing of Anteus the Gyant, who was said to haue 60. and odde cubits of length, which though Plutarch doth confirme, reporting that there was such a body found by Sertorius the Roman, in Lybia, where Hercules slew Anteus: yet for my selfe I thinke it but a lowd lye. That Anteus was of great strength, and a cunning wrestler, Eusebius affirmeth: and because hee cast so many men to the ground, he was fained to be the sonne of the earth. Plinie saith, that he inhabited neere the gardens Hesperides in Mauritania. S. Augustine affirmes, that this Hercules was not of Greece, but of Lybia: and the Hydra also which he ouercame, Plato expounded to be a subtle Sophister.

§. VI.

Of the expedition of the Argonautes.

ABout the eleuenth yeare of Gideon, was the famous expedition of the Argonautes: of which many fabulous discourses haue beene written, the summe of which is this.

Pelias the sonne of Neptune, brother by the mothers side to Aeson, who was Iasons father, raigning in Iolchos a town of Thessalie, was warned by the Oracle of Apollo to take heed of him that wore but one shoe. This Pelias afterward sacrificing to Neptune, inuited Iason to him, who comming hastily, lost one shoe in passing ouer a brooke: whereupon Pelias demanded of him what course hee would take (supposing hee were able) against one, of whom an Oracle should aduise him to take heed? to which question when Iason had briefly answered, that he would send him to Cholcos, to fetch the golden Fleece, Pelias immediately commanded him to vndertake that seruice. Therefore Iason prepared for the voyage, hauing a ship built by Argus, the sonne of Phryxus, by the counsell of Pallas: wherein he procured all the braueſt men of Greece to saile with him: as Typhis the Master of the ship, Orpheus the famous Poet, Castor and Pollux the sonnes of Tyndarus, Telamon and Peleus, sonnes of Aeacus, and fathers of Aiax and Achilles, Hercules, Theseus, Zetes and Calais the two winged sonnes of Boreas, Amphiaraus the great Soothsayer, Meleager of Calidon that slew the great wilde Boare: Ascalaphus and Ialmenus or Almenus the sonnes of Mars, who were afterwards at the last warre of Troy, Laërtes the father of Vlysses, Atalanta a warlike virgin, Idas and Lynceus the sonnes of Aphareus, who afterwards in fight with Castor and Pollux slew Castor, and wounded Pollux, but were slaine themselues: Lynceus by Pollux, Idas by Iupiter with lightning.

These and many other went with Iason in the ship Argo: in whose prowe was a table of the Beech of Dodona, which could speake. They arriued first at Lemnos; the women of which Iland, hauing slaine all the males, purposing to lead an Amazonian life, were neuertheleſſe contented to take their pleasure of the Argonautes. Hence they came to the Countrie about Cyzicus: where dwelt a people called Dolianes: ouer whom then raigned one Cyzicus: who entertained them friendly: but it so fell out, that loosing thence by night they were driuen by contrary windes backe into his port, neither knowing that it was the same Hauen, nor being knowne by the Doliones, to bee the same men; but rather taken for some of their bordering enemies: by which meanes they fell to blowes, insomuch that the Argonautes slew the most part of the Doliones, together with their King Cyzicus: which when by day-light they perceiued, with many teares they solemnized his funerall. Then departed they againe and arrived shortly in Mysia, where they left Hercules and Polyphemus the sonne of Elates, who went to seeke Hylas the darling of Hercules, that was rauished by the Nymphes.

Polyphemus built a towne in Mysia, called Cios, wherein hee raigned. Hercules returned to Argos. From Mysia the Argonautes sailed into Bythinia, which then was peopled by the Bebryces, the ancient Inhabitants of the Countrie, ouer whom Amycus the sonne of Neptune was then King. Hee being a strong man, compelled all strangers to fight with him, at whorlebats, in which kinde of fight he had slaine many, and was now himselfe slaine by Pollux. The Bebryces in reuenge of his death flew all vpon Pollux, but his companions rescued him, with great slaughter of the people. They sayled from hence to Salmydessus, a towne in Thrace (somewhat out of their way) wherein Phineus a Soothsayer dwelt, who was blinde and vexed with the Harpyes. The Harpyes were said to bee a kinde of birds, which had the faces of women and foule long clawes, very filthy creatures, which when the table was furnished for Phineus, came flying in, and deuouring or carrying away the greater part of the victuals, did so defile the rest, that they could not be endured. When therefore the Argonautes craued his aduise, and direction for their voyage: You shall doe well (quoth he) first of all to deliuer me from the Harpyes, and then afterwards to aske my counsaile. Whereupon they caused the table to be couered, and meat set on; which was no sooner set downe, than that presently in came the Harpyes, and played their accustomed prancks: when Zetes and Calais the winged young men saw this, they drew their swords, and pursued them through the ayre; some say that both the Harpyes and the young men died of wearinesse in the fight, & pursuit. But Apollonius saith that the Harpyes did couenant with the youths, to doe no more harme to Phineus, and were thereupon dismissed. For this good turn Phineus gaue them informations of the way, and aduertised them withall of the dangerous rockes, called Symplegades, which by force of winds running together, did shut vp the passage: wherefore he willed them to put a Pigeon before them in the passage: & if that passed safe, then to aduenture after her: if not, then by no means to hazard themselues in vain. They did so, & perceiuing that the Pigeon had onely lost a piece of her taile, they obserued the next opening of the rocks, and then rowing with all their might, passed through safe, onely the end of their poope was bruised.

From thence forward, (as the tale goeth) the Symplegades haue ſtood ſtill: for the gods, ſay they, had decreed that after the paſſage of a ſhip, they ſhould be fixed. Thence the Argonautes came to the Mariandyni, a people inhabiting about the mouth of the riuer Parthenius, where Lycus the King entertained them courteouſly. Here Idmon a Sooth-ſayer of their company was ſlaine by a wilde Boare; alſo here Typhis died: and Ancæus vndertooke to ſteare the ſhip. So they paſſed by the riuer Thermodon, and mount Caucaſus, and came to the riuer Phaſis, which runs through the land of Colchos. When they were entred the hauen, Iaſon went to Æetes the King of Colchos, and told him the Commandement of Pelias, and cauſe of his comming, deſiring him to deliuer the golden Fleece, which Æetes, as the Fable goeth, promiſed to doe, if hee alone would yoake together two brazen hooft Bulls, and plowing the ground with them, ſowe Dragons teeth, which Minerua had giuen to him, being part of thoſe which Cadmus did ſowe at Thebes. Theſe Bulls were great and fierce, and breathed out fire: Vulcan had giuen them to Æetes.

Whileſt Iaſon was in a great perplexitie about this taske, Medea the daughter of Æetes fell into a moſt vehement loue of him, ſo farre forth, that being excellent in Magique, ſhe came priuily to him, promiſing her helpe, if he would aſſure her of his marriage. To this Iaſon agreed, and confirmed his promiſe by oath. Then gaue ſhe to him a medicine wherewith ſhe bad him to annoint both his body and his armour, which would preſerue him from their violence: further ſhee told him, that armed men would riſe out of the ground, from the teeth which he ſhould ſowe, and ſet vpon him. To remedy which inconuenience, ſhe bad him throwe ſtones amongſt them as ſoone as they came vp thicke, whereupon they would fall together to blowes, in ſuch wiſe that hee might eaſily ſlay them. Iaſon followed her counſaile, whereto when the euent had anſwered, hee againe demanded the Fleece. But Æetes was ſo farre from approuing ſuch his deſire, that hee deuiſed how to deſtroy the Argonautes, and burne their ſhip; which Medea perceiuing, went to Iaſon, and brought him by night to the Fleece, which hung on an Oake in the groue of Mars, where, they ſay, it was kept by a Dragon, that neuer ſlept. This Dragon was by the Magique of Medea caſt into a ſleepe: ſo taking away the golden Feece, ſhee went with Iaſon into the ſhip Argo; hauing with her, her brother Abſyrtus.

Æetes vnderſtanding the practiſes of Medea, prouided to purſue the ſhip, whom when Medea perceiued to be at hand, ſhe ſlew her brother, and cutting him in pieces, ſhee ſcattered his limbs in diuers places; of which Æetes finding ſome, was faine to ſeeke out the reſt, and ſuffer his daughter to paſſe: the parts of his ſon he buried in a place, which thereupon he called Tomi; the Greeke word ſignifieth Diuiſion. Afterwards he ſent many of his ſubiects to ſeeke the ſhip Argo, threatning that if they brought not backe Medea, they ſhould ſuffer in her ſtead. In the meane while the Argonautes were driuen about the Seas, and were come to the Riuer Eridanus, which is Po in Italie.

Iupiter, offended with the ſlaughter of Abſyrtus, vexed them with a great tempeſt, and carried them they knew not whither; when they came to the Ilands Abſyrtides, there the ſhip Argo (that there might want no incredible thing in this Fable) ſpake to them and ſaid, that the anger of Iupiter ſhould not ceaſe, till they came to Auſonia, and were cleanſed by Circe, from the murther of Abſyrtus. Now they thereupon ſayling betweene the coaſts of Lybia and Gallia, and paſſing through the Sea of Sardinia and alongſt the coaſt of Hetruria, came to the Ile of Æea, wherein Circe dwelt, who cleanſed them. Thence they ſayled by the coaſt of the Syrens, who ſang to allure them into danger: but Orpheus on the other ſide ſang ſo well that he ſtayed them. Onely Butes ſwamme out vnto them, whom Venus rauiſhed, and carryed to Lylibæum in Sicilie to dwell.

Hauing paſt the Syrens, they came betweene Scylla and Charybdis, and the ſtragling rocks which ſeemed to caſt out great ſtore of flames and ſmoake. But Thetis and the Nereides, conueyed them ſafe through at the appointment of Iuno. So they coaſted Sicilie where the beeues of the Sunne were, and touched at Coreyra, the Iland of the Phæaces, where King Alcinous raigned. Meane while, the men of Colchos, that had beene ſent by Æetes in queſt of the ſhip of Argo, hearing no newes of it, and fearing his anger, if they fulfilled not his will, betooke themſelues to new habitations: ſome of them dwelt in the mountaines of Coreyre, others in the Ilands Abſyrtides, and ſome comming to the Pheaces, there found the ship Argo, and demanded Medea of Alcinous: whereto Alcinous made answer, that if shee were not Iasons wife, they should haue her; but if shee were already married, he would not take her from her husband. Arete, the wife of Alcinous, hearing this, married them: wherefore they of Colchos not daring to returne home, stayed with the Pheaces; so the Argonautes departed thence, and after a while came to Crete. In this Iland, Minos raigned, who had a man of brasse giuen to him (as some of the Fablers say) by Vulcan. This man had one veine in his body reaching from the necke to the heele, the end whereof was closed vp with a brazen naile, his name was Talus: his custome was to runne thrice aday about the Iland for the defence of it. When hee saw the ship Argo passe by, hee threw stones at it, but Medea with her Magique destroyed him. Some say that she slew him by potions, which made him mad; others, that promising to make him immortall, shee drew out the naile that stopt his veine, by which meanes all his blood ranne out, and he died; others there are that say he was slaine by Pean, who wounded him with an arrow in the heele. From hence the Argonautes sailed to Aegina, where they were faine to fight for fresh water. And lastly, from Aegina they sailed by Euboea and Locris home to Iolcos, where they arriued, hauing spent foure whole moneths in the expedition.

Some there are that by this iourney of Iason, vnderstand the mysterie of the Philosophers stone, called the golden Fleece, to which also, other super-fine Chymists drawe the twelue labours of Hercules. Suidas thinkes that by the golden Fleece was meant a golden booke of Parchment, which is of sheepe-skin, and therefore called golden, because it was taught therein how other mettals might be transmuted. Others would signifie by Iason, wisedome, and moderation, which ouercommeth all perils: but that which is most probable, is the opinion of Dercilus, that the story of such a passage was true, and that Iason with the rest went indeed to rob Colchos, to which they might arriue by boate. For not farre from Caucasus there are certaine steepe falling torrents which wash downe many graines of gold, as in many other parts of the world; and the people there inhabiting vse to set many fleeces of wooll in those descents of waters, in which the graines of gold remaine, and the water passeth thorow, which Strabo witnesseth to bee true. The many rockes, straits, sands, and currents, in the passage betweene Greece and the bottome of Pontus, are Poetically conuerted into those fiery bulls, the armed men rising out of the ground, the Dragon cast asleepe, and the like. The man of brasse, the Syrens, Scylla and Charybdis, were other hazards and aduentures which they fell into in the Mediterran sea, disguised, as the rest, by Orpheus, vnder Poeticall morals: all which Homer afterward vsed (the man of brasse excepted) in the description of Vlysses his trauailes, on the same Inland-seas.

§. VII.

Of Abimelech, Tholan, and Iair, and of the Lapythæ, and of Theseus, Hyppolytus, &c.

AFter the death of Gideon, Abimelech his base sonne begotten on a Concubine of the Sechemites, remembring what offers had beene made to his father by the people, who desired to make him and his their perpetuall Princes; and as it seemeth, supposing (notwithstanding his fathers religious modesty) that some of his brethren might take on them the Soueraignty, practised with the Inhabitants of Sethem (of which his mother was native) to make election of himselfe, who being easily moued with the glory, to haue a King of their owne, readily condescended: and the better to enable Abimelech, they borrowed 70. pieces of siluer of their Idoll Baalberith, with which treasure he hyred a company of loose and desperate vagabonds, to assist his first detestable enterprise, to wit, the slaughter of his 70. brethren, the sonnes of Gideon, begotten on his wiues, of which he had many; of all which none escaped but Iotham the youngest, who hid himselfe from his present furie: all which he executed on one stone, a cruelty exceeding all that hath beene written of in any age. Such is humane ambition, a monster that neither feareth God (though all-powerfull, and whose reuenges are without date and for euerlasting) neither hath it respect to nature, which laboureth the preseruation of euery being: but it rageth also against her (though garnished with beautie which neuer dieth, and with loue that hath no end). All other passions and affections, by which the soules of men are tormented, are by their contraries often-times resisted or qualified. But ambition, which begetteth euery vice, and is it selfe the childe and darling of Satan, looketh onely towards the ends by it selfe set downe, forgetting nothing (how fearefull and inhumane soeuer) which may serue it: remembring nothing, whatsoeuer iustice, pietie, right or religion can offer and alledge on the contrary. It ascribeth the lamentable effects of like attempts, to the errour or weakenesse of the vndertakers, and rather praiseth the aduenture than feareth the like successe. It was the first sinne that the world had, and began in Angels: for which they were cast into hell, without hope of redemption. It was more ancient than man, and therefore no part of his naturall corruption. The punishment also preceded his creation, yet hath the Diuell which felt the smart thereof, taught him to forget the one as out of date, and to practise the other, as befitting euery age, and mans condition.

Iotham, the youngest of Gidions sonnes, hauing escaped the present perill, sought by his best perswasions to alienate the Sechemites, from the assisting of this merciless tyrant, letting them know, that those which were vertuous, and whom reason and religion had taught the safe and happy estate of moderate subiection, had refused to receiue as vnlawfull, what others had no power to giue, without direction from the King of Kings: who from the beginning (as to his owne peculiar people) had appointed them by whom and how to bee gouerned. This hee taught them by the Oliue, which contented it selfe with its fatnesse, the Figge-tree with its sweetnesse, and the Vine with the good iuyce it had: the Bramble onely, who was most base, cut downe all the rest, and accepted the Soueraigntie. Hee also foretold them by a Propheticall spirit, what should befall them in the end, and how a fire should come out of the Bramble, and consume the Cedars of Libanon.

Now (as it is an easie matter to call those men backe whom rage without right led on) Gaal the sonne of Ebed withdrew the Citizens of Sechem, from the seruice of Abimelech who therefore after some assaults entred the place, and mastered it; and in conclusion fired the towne, wherein their Idoll Baalberith was worshipped, and put all the people of all sorts to the slaughter. Lastly, in the assault of the Castle or Tower of Teber, himselfe was wounded in the head with a stone throwne ouer the wall by a woman; and finding himselfe mortally bruised, he commanded his owne Page to pierce his body, thereby to auoid the dishonour of being slaine by so feeble a hand.

While Abimelech vsurped the Gouernment, the Lapithæ and Centaures made warre against the Thebanes. These Nations were descended of Apollo, and were the first in those parts that deuised to manage horses, to bridle and to sit them: insomuch as when they first came downe from the mountaines of Pindus, into the plaines, those which had neuer seene horsemen before, thought them creatures compounded of men and horses; so did the Mexicans when Ferdinando Cortes the Spaniard first inuaded that Empire.

Palæphatus l. 1. de incredib.

After the death of Abimelech, Thola of Issachar gouerned Israel 23. yeares, and after him Iair the Gileadite 22. yeares, who seemes to be descended of Iair the sonne of Manasse, who in Moses time conquered a great part of Gilead, and called the same after his owne name, Hauoth Iair. For to this Iair there remained thirtie of those Cities, which his ancestor had recouered from the Amorites. Of these Iudges, because there is nothing else written, it is an argument that during all their times, Israel liued without disturbance and in peace.

Deut. 3. 14. Num. 11. 41.

Iudg. 10.

When Iair iudged Israel, Priamus began to raigne in Troy, who at such time as Hercules sacked Ilium, was carried away captiue with his sister Hesione into Greece, and being afterward redeemed for ransome, he rebuilt and greatly strengthened, and adorned Troy, and so farre inlarged his Dominions, as hee became the supreame Lord in effect of all Asia the lesse. He married Hecuba the daughter of Cisseus King of Thrace, and had in all (saith Cicero) fiftie sonnes, whereof seuenteene by Hecuba, of whom Paris was one; who attempting to recouer his aunt Hesione, tooke Helena the wife of Menelaus, the cause of the warre which followed.

In Tusc.

Theseus the tenth King of Athens began likewise to raigne in the beginning of Iair: some writers call him the sonne of Neptune and Æthra: but Plutark in the Storie of his life, finds him begotten by Ægeus, of whom the Grecian sea betweene it and Asia the lesse tooke name. For when Minos had mastered the Athenians, so far as he forc't them to pay him him seuen of their sonnes euery yeare for tribute, whom he inclosed within a Labyrinth, to be deuoured by the monster Minotaur: because belike the sonnes of Taurus, which he begat on Pasiphae the Queene, had the charge of them: among these seuen Theseus thrust himselfe, not doubting by his valour to deliuer the rest, and to free the Countrie of that slauerie occasioned for the death of Androgeus, Minos his sonne.

And hauing possest himselfe of Arrudnes affection, who was Minos daughter, he receiued from her a bottome of thred, by which he conducted himselfe through all the crooked and inextricable turnings of the Labyrinth, made in all like that of the Citie of Crocodiles in Egypt; by meane whereof hauing slaine Minotaur, he found a ready way to returne. But whereas his father Aegeus had giuen order, that if hee came backe with victorie and in safetie, he should vse a white saile in signe thereof, and not that mournefull blacke saile, vnder which they left the port of Athens. This instruction being either forgotten or neglected, Aegeus descrying the Shippe of Theseus with a blacke saile, did cast himselfe ouer the rockes downe into the Sea, afterward called of his name Aegeum.

One of the first famous acts of Theseus, was the killing of Seyron, who kept a passage betweene Megara and the Peloponnesian Isthmos, and threw all whom hee mastered into the Sea, from the high rockes. Afterward he did the like to Cercyon, by wrestling, who vsed by that Art to kill others. Hee also ridde the Countrie of Procrustes, who vsed to bend downe the strong limbes of two trees, and fastened by cordes such as hee tooke, part of them to one, and part to the other bough, and by the springing vp tare them asunder. So did he root out Periphetes and other mischieuous theeues and murtherers. Hee ouerthrew the Armie of the Amazons, who after many victories and vastations, entred the Territorie of Athens. Theseus hauing taken their Queene Hippolita prisoner, begat on her Hippolytus; with whom afterward his mother in law Phaedra, falling in loue, and her refusing to abuse his fathers bed, Phaedra perswaded Theseus that his sonne offred to force her: after which it is fained, that Theseus besought Neptune to reuenge this wrong of his sonnes, by some violent death. Neptune taking a time of aduantage, sent out his Sea-Calues, as Hippolytus passed by the sea shore, and so affrighted his horses, as casting the Coach ouer, hee was (by being intangled therein) torne in pieces. Which miserable and vndeserued destinie, when Phaedra had heard of, she strangled her selfe. After which it is fained, that Diana entreated Aesculapius to set Hippolitus his pieces together, and to restore him to life: which done, because he was chaste, she led him with her into Italie, to accompany her in her hunting, and field sports.

It is probable that Hippolytus, when his Father sought his life, thinking to escape by Sea, was affronted thereat, and did receiue many wounds in forcing his passage and escape; which wounds Aesculapius, to wit, some skilfull Physitian, or Chirurgion healed againe; after which hee passed into Italie, where he liued with Diana, that is, the life of a hunter, in which hee most delighted. But of those ancient prophane Stories, Plutarch saith well, that as Cosmographers in their descriptions of the world, where they finde many vast places whereof they know nothing, fill the same with strange Beasts, Birds, and Fishes; and with Mathematicall lines; so doe the Grecian Historians and Poets imbroder and intermixe the tales of ancient times, with a world of fictions and fabulous discourses. True it is, that Theseus did many great things in imitation of Hercules, whom hee made his patterne, and was the first that gathered the Athenians, from being dispersed in thinne and ragged Villages: in recompence whereof, and for deuising them Lawes to liue vnder, and in order, hee was by the beggerly, mutable, and vngratefull multitude, in the end banished. Some say, per Ostracismum, by the Law of Lottes, or names written on shells, which was a deuice of his owne.

He stole Helen (as they say) when she was fiftie yeares old, from Aphidna, which City Castor and Pollux ouerturned, when they followed after Theseus to recouer their sister. Erasistratus and Pausanias write that Theseus begot her with childe at Argos, where shee erected a Temple to Lucina: but her age makes that tale vnlikely to bee true, and so doth Ouid, Nonumen ex facta fraudium tulit ille petitum, &c. The rape Eusebius findes in the first of Iair, who gouerned Israel 22. yeares, to whom succeeded Iephta or Iepte sixe yeares, to whom Ibzan who ruled seuen yeares, and then Habdon eight yeares: in whose time was the fall of Troy. So, as if Theseus had a childe by her in the first of Iair, (at which which time wee must count her no lesse than fifteene yeares old, for the women did not commonly begin so young as they doe now) shee was then at least two and fiftie yeares old at the destruction of Troy: and when shee was stollen by Paris, eight and thirtie: but herein the Chronologers doe not agree. Yet Eusebius and Bunting with Halicarnasseus doe in effect consent, that the City was entred, and burnt in the first yeare of Demophoon King of Athens, the successor of Munestheus, the successor of Theseus, seuenteene dayes before the Summer Tropique; and that about the eleuenth of September following, the Troians crost the Hellespont into Thrace, and wintered there, and in the next spring that they nauigated into Sicilia, where wintering the second yeare, the next summer they atriued at Laurentum, and builded Lauinium. But Saint Augustine hath otherwise, That when Polyphides gouerned Sicyon, Munestheus, Athens; Tantanes, Assyria; Habdon, Israel; then Aeneas arriued in Italie, transporting with him in twentie ships the remainder of the Troians: but the difference is not great: and hereof more at large in the storie of Troy at hand.

In Sicyonia Phestius the two and twentieth King, raigned eight yeares, beginning by the common account in the time of Thola. His successours, Adrastus, who raigned foure yeares, and Polyphides who raigned thirteene, are accounted to the time of Iair, so is also Munestheus King of Athens, and Atreus, who held a great part of Peloponnesus. In Assyra, during the gouernment of these two peaceable Iudges, Mitreus, and after him Tantanes, raigned. In Egypt Amenophis, the sonne of Ramses, and afterwards Annemenes.

§. VII.

Of the warre of Thebes which was in this age.

IN this age was the warre of Thebes, the most ancient that euer Greeke Poet or Historian wrote of: Wherefore the Roman Poet Lucretius, affirming (as the Epicures in this point held truely against the Peripatetickes) that the world had a beginning, vrgeth them with this obiection.

——— Si nulla fuit genitalis origo
Rerumq. & mundi, semperque aterna fuêre,
Cur supra bellum Thebanum, & funera Troiæ,
Non alias alij quoque res cecinere poetæ?

If all this world had no originall,
But things haue euer beene as now they are:
Before the siege of Thebes or Troyes last fall,
Why did no Poesie some elder warre?

It is true that in these times Greece was very saluage, the inhabitants being often chaced from place to place, by the Captains of greater Tribes: and no man thinking the ground whereon hee dwelt his owne longer than he could hold it by strong hand. Wherefore merchandize and other intercourse they vsed little, neither did they plant many trees, or sowe more corne than was necessary for their sustenance. Money they had little or none, for it is thought that the name of money was not heard in Greece, when Homer did write who measures the valew of gold and brasse by the worth in cattell; saying that the golden armour of Glaucus was worth an hundred Beeues, and the copper armour of Diomedes worth nine.

Robberies by land and sea were common and without shame, and to steale horses or kine was the vsuall exercise of their great men. Their townes were not many, whereof those that were walled were very few, and not great. For Mycena the principall Citie in Peloponnesus was a very little thing, and it may well be thought that the rest were proportionable: briefly, Greece was then in her infancie, and though in some small townes of that halfe Ile of Peloponnesus, the Inhabitants might haue enioyed quietnesse within their narrow bounds; as likewise did the Athenians because their Countrie was so barren, that none did care to take it from them: yet that the land in generall was very rude, it will easily appeare to such as consider, what Thucidides the greatest of their Historians hath written to this effect, in the Preface to his Historie. Wherefore, as in these later times, idle Chroniclers vse when they want good matter, to fill whole books with reports of great frosts, or dry summers, and other such things which no man cares to reade; so did they who spake of Greece in her beginnings, remember onely the great flouds which were in the times of Ogyges and Deucalion: or else rehearse fables of men changed into birds, of strange monsters, of adulterie committed by their gods, and the mighty men which they begat, without writing ought that sauoured of humanitie before the time of the warre of Thebes: the briefe whereof is this.

Oedipus the sonne of Laius King of Thebes, hauing beene cast forth when he was an infant, because an Oracle foretold what euill should come to passe by him, did afterwards in a narrow passage contending for the way, slay his owne father, not knowing either then or long after, who he was. Afterward hee became King of Thebes, by marriage of the Queene Iocasta, called by Homer Epicaste: on whom, not knowing her to bee his mother, hee begat two sonnes, Eteocles and Polynices. But when in processe of time, finding out by good circumstances, who were his parents, hee vnderstood the grieuous murther and incest hee had committed, hee tore out his owne eyes for griefe, and left the Citie. His wife and mother did hang themselues. Some say that Oedipus, hauing his eyes pulled out, was expelled Thebes, bitterly cursing his sonnes, because they suffered their father to bee cast out of the Towne, and ayded him not. Howsoeuer it were, his two Sonnes made this agreement, that the one of them should raigne one yeare, and the other another yeare, and so by course rule interchangeably. But this appointment was ill obserued. For when Polynices had afterā yeares gouernment resigned the Kingdome to his brother: or (according to others) when Eteocles had raigned the first yeare, hee refused to giue ouer the rule to Polynices. Hereupon Polynices fledde vnto Argos, where Adrastus the sonne of Talaus then raigned, vnto whose palace comming by night, he was driuen to seeke lodging in an out-house, on the backeside. Hom. Odyss. 11.

There he met with Tydeus the sonne of Oeneus, who was fled from Calydon: with whom striuing about their lodging, hee fell to blowes. Adrastus hearing the noyse, came forth and tooke vp the quarrell. At which time perceiuing in the shield of Tydeus a Bore, in that of Polynices a Lyon, hee remembred an olde Oracle, by which hee was aduised to giue his two daughters in marriage, to a Lyon and a Bore: and accordingly hee did bestow his daughter Argia vpon Tydeus, and Deipyle vpon Polynices, promising to restore them both to their Countries. To this purpose leuying an Armie, and assembling as many valiant Captaines as hee could draw to follow him, he was desirous among others to carrie Amphiaraus the sonne of Oicleus a great Soothsayer, and a valiant man, along with him. But Amphiaraus, who is said to haue foreseene all things, knowing well that none of the Captaines should escape, saue onely Adrastus, did both vtterly refuse to bee one in that expedition, and perswaded others to stay at home. Polynices therefore dealt with Eriphyle the Wife of Amphiaraus, offering vnto her a very faire bracelet, vpon condition that shee should cause her Husband to assist him. The Soothsayer knowing what should worke his destinie, forbad his Wife to take any gift of Polynices. But the bracelet was in her eye so precious a Iewell, that shee could not refuse it. Therefore whereas a great controuersie, betweene Aamphiaraus and Adrastus, was by way of compromise put vnto the decision of Eriphyle, either of them being bound by solemne oath to stand to her appointment: shee ordered the matter so, as a Woman should that did loue a bracelet better than her Husband. Hee now finding that it was farre more easie to foresee than auoide destinie, sought for such comfort as reuenge might afford him, giuing in charge vnto his sonnes, that when they came to full age, they should kill their mother, and make strong warre vpon the Thebanes.

Now had Adrastus assembled all his forces, of which, the seuen chiefe leaders were, himselfe, Amphiaraus, Capaneus, and Hippomedon (in stead of whom some name Mecisteus) all Argiues, with Polynices the Theban, Tydeus the Ætolian, and Parthenopeus the Arcadian, sonne of Meleager and Atalanta. When the Armie came to the Nemæan Wood, they met a woman whom they desired to helpe them to some water; shee hauing a childe in her armes, laid it downe, and led the Argiues to a spring: but ere shee returned, a Serpent had slaine the childe. This woman was Hypsipyle the daughter of Thoas the Lemnian, whom shee would haue saued when the women of the Ile slew all the the males by conſpiracie, intending to lead an Amazonian life. For ſuch her pietie, the Lemnian wiues did ſell her to Pyrates, and the Pyrates to Lycurgus Lord of the Countrie about Nemæa, whoſe young ſonne Opheltes or Archemorus, ſhe did nurſe, and loſt, as is ſhewed before. When vpon the childes death ſhee hid her ſelfe for feare of her maſter, Amphiaraus told her ſonnes where they ſhould finde her: and the Argiues did both kill the Serpent which had ſlaine the childe, and in memorie of the chance, did inſtitute ſolemne funerall games called Nemæan, wherein Adraſtus wanne the prize with his ſwift horſe Areon, Tydeus with the worlebats, Amphiaraus at running and quoiting, Polynices at wreſtling, Parthenopæus at ſhooting, and one Laodocus in darting. This was the firſt inſtitution of the Nemæan games, which continued after famous in Greece for very many ages. There are, who thinke that they were ordained in honour of one Opheltus a Lacedemonian. Some ſay by Hercules, when he had ſlaine the Nemæan Lyon: but the common opinion agrees with that which is here ſet downe.

From Nemæa the Argiues marching onwards, arriued at Citheron, whence Tydeus was by them ſent Embaſſadour to Thebes, to require of Eteocles the performance of Couenants betweene him and Polynices. This meſſage was nothing agreeable to Eteocles, who was throughly reſolued to hold what he had, as long as he could: which Tydeus perceiuing, and intending partly to get honour, partly to trie what mettle was in the Thebans, he made many challenges, and obtained victorie in all of them; not without much enuie and malice of the people, who laid fiftie men in ambuſh to intercept him at his returne to the Armie; of which fiftie he ſlew all but one, whom hee ſent backe to the Citie as a reporter and witneſſe of his valour. When the Argiues vnderſtood how reſolued Eteocles was, they preſented themſelues before the Citie, and incamped round about it. Thebes is ſaid to haue had at that time ſeuen gates, which belike ſtood not far aſunder, ſeeing that the Argiues (who afterward when they were very farre ſtronger, could ſcarce muſter vp more thouſands than Thebes had gates) did compaſſe the Towne, Adraſtus quartered before the gate Homoloides, Capaneus before the Oggian, Tydeus before Crenis, Amphiaraus at Proëtis, Hippomedon at Anchais, Parthenopæus at Electa, and Polynices at Hyppiſta. In the meane ſeaſon, Eteocles hauing armed his men, and appointed Commanders vnto them, took aduiſe of Tireſias the Soothſayer, who promiſed victory to the Thebans, if Menœcius the ſonne of Creon a principall man of the Citie, would vow himſelfe to be ſlaine in honour of Mars the god of warre. So full of malice and pride is the Diuell, and ſo enuious at his Creators glory, that hee not onely challengeth honour due to God alone, as oblations and ſacrifice with all Diuine worſhip, but commandeth vs to offer our ſelues, and our children vnto him, when hee hath ſufficiently clowded mens vnderſtanding, and bewitched their wils with ignorance and blinde deuotion. And ſuch abominable ſacrifice of men, maides, and children hath he exacted of the Syrians, Carthaginians, Galles, Germans, Cyprians, Egyptians, and of many other, if not of all Nations, when through ignorance or feare they were moſt filled with ſuperſtition. But as they grew more wiſe, ſo did he waxe leſſe impudent in cunning, though not leſſe malicious in deſiring the continuance of ſuch barbarous inhumanitie. For King Diphilus in Cyprus without aduiſe of any Oracle, made the Idoll of that Countrie reſt contented with an Oxe in ſtead of a man. Tiberius forbad humane ſacrifices in Africke, and crucified the Prieſts in the groues where they had practiſed them. Hercules taught the Italians to drowne men of hay in ſtead of the liuing: yet among the ſaluages in the Weſt Indies theſe cruell offerings haue beene practiſed of late ages: which as it is a ſufficient argument that Satans malice is onely couered and hidden by this ſubtiltie among ciuill people: ſo may it ſerue as a probable Coniecture of the barbariſmes then raigning in Greece. For Menœcius, as ſoone as he vnderſtood that his death might purchaſe victorie to his people, beſtowed himſelfe (as hee thought) vpon Mars, killing himſelfe before the gates of the Citie. Then was a battaile fought, wherein the Argiues preuailed ſo farre at the firſt, that Capaneus aduancing ladders to the walls, got vp vpon the rampart: whence, when he fell or was caſt downe, or (as Writers haue it) was ſtricken down by Iupiter with a thunder-bolt, the Argiues fled. Many on each part were ſlaine in this battaile, which cauſed both ſides to deſire that Eteocles and Polynices might trie out the quarrell in ſingle fight: whereto the two brethren according, ſlew each other.

Another battell was fought after their death, wherein the ſonnes of Aſtacus behaued themſelues very valiantly: Iſmarus one of the ſonnes ſlew Hippomedon, which was one of

of the seuen Princes: Parthenopæus being another of the seuen (who was said to haue been so faire, that none would hurt him when his face was bare) was slaine by Amphidicus, or as some say, by Periclymenus the sonne of Neptune: and the valiant Tydeus by Menalippus: yet ere Tydeus died, the head of Menalippus was brought vnto him by Amphiaraus, which he cruelly tore open, and swallowed vp the braines. Vpon which fact, it is said, that Pallas, who had brought from Iupiter such remedie for his wounds, as should haue made him immortall, refused to bestow it vpon him: whereby perhaps was meant that his honour which might haue continued immortall, did perish through the beastly rage that he shewed at his death.

The hoast of the Argiues being wholly discomfited, Adrastus and Amphiaraus fled: of whom Amphiaraus is said to haue beene swallowed quicke into the earth, neere to the riuer Ismenus, together with his Chariot, and so lost out of mens sight, being preuented with aduenture ouerwhelmed with dead carkasses, or drowned in the riuer; and his body neuer found, nor greatly sought for. Adrastus escaped on his good horse Arion, and came to Athens; where sitting at an Altar, called the Altar of Mercie, hee made supplication for their aide to recouer their bodies. For Creon hauing obtained the Gouernment of Thebes after the death of Eteocles, would not suffer the bodies of the Argiues to bee buried: but caused Antigone, the onely daughter then liuing of Oedipus, to bee buried quicke, because shee had sought out and buried the body of her brother Polynices, contrary to Creons Edict. The Athenians condescending to the request of Adrastus, did send foorth an Armie vnder the conduct of Theseus, which tooke Thebes, and restored the bodies of the Argiues to Sepulture: at which time Euadne the Wife of Capaneus, threw her selfe into the funerall fire, and was burnt willingly with her Husband. But it little contented the sonnes of those Captaines which were slaine at Thebes, that any lesse reuenge should be taken of their fathers death, than the ruine of the Citie: wherefore tenne yeare after hauing leuied forces, Aegialeus the sonne of Adrastus, Diomedes of Tydeus, Promachus of Parthenopæus, Sthenelus of Capaneus, Thersander of Polynices, and Euryphylus of Mecisteus, marched thither vnder the conduct of Alcmaon, the son of Amphiaraus: with whom also went his brother Amphilochus. Apollo promised victorie if Alcmaon, were their Captaine, whom afterward by another Oracle hee commanded to kill his owne mother.

When they came to the Citie, they were incountred by Laodamas the son of Eteocles, then King of the Thebanes, (for Creon was onely Tutor to Laodamas) who though he did valiantly in the battaile, and slue Aegialius, yet was hee put to the worst, and driuen to flie, or (according to Apollodorus) slain by Alcmaon. After this disaster the citizens began to desire composition; but in the meane time they conuayed themselues with their wiues & children away from thence by night, and so began to wander vp and downe, till at length they built the Town called Estiæa. The Argiues, when they perceiued that their enemies had quitted the Town, entring into it, sacked it, threw downe the walls, and layd it waste; howbeit it is reported by some, that the Towne was saued by Thirsander, the sonne of Polynices, who causing the Citizens to returne, did there raigne ouer them. That hee saued the City from vtter destruction, it is very likely, for he raigned there, and led the Thebanes to the Warre of Troy, which very shortly after ensued.

§. VIII.

Of Iephta, and how the three hundred yeares which he speaketh of, Iud. 11. v. 28. are to be reconciled with the places, Act. 13. 20. 1 Reg. 6. 1. together with some other things touching Chronologie about these times.

After the death of Iair (neere about whose times these things hapned in Greece, and during whose gouernment, & that of Thola, Israel liued in peace and in order) they reuolted again from the law & seruice of God, and became more wicked and idolatrous than euer. For whereas in the former times they worshipped Baal & Asteroth, they now became followers of all the Heathen nations adioyning, and imbraced the idolls of the Aramites, of the Zidonians, Moabites & Ammonites: with those of the Philistims. And as before it pleased God to correct them by the Aramites, by the Amalekites, and Midianites: so now he scourged them by the * Ammonites, and afterward by the Philistims.

Now among the Israelites, those of Gilead being most oppresst, because they bordered vpon

Iud. 10.
* The persecutiõ of the Ammonites lasted 18. yeares, and ended in the yeare of the World 2820. in which yeare Iephta began, Iud. 11.

vpon the Amonites, they were inforc't to seeke Iephta, whom they had formerly despised and cast from them, because he was base borne; but he (notwithstanding those former iniuries) participating more of godly compassion, than of diuelliſh hatred and reuenge, was content to lead the Gileadites to the Warre, vpon condition that they ſhould eſtabliſh him their Gouernour after victory. And when hee had diſputed with Ammon for the Land, diſproued Ammons right, and fortified the title of Iſrael by many arguments, the ſame preuailing nothing, he began the warre; and being ſtrengthened by God, ouerthrew them: and did not onely beate them out of the plaines, but forc't them ouer the
Iud. 11. 33. mountaines of Arabia, euen to Minnith, and Abel of the vineyards, Cities expreſt heretofore in the deſcription of the holy Land. After which victory it is ſaid, that he performed the vaine vow which he made, to ſacrifice the firſt liuing creature hee incountred, comming out of his houſe to meet him; which happened to be his owne daughter, and onely childe, who with all patience ſubmitted her ſelfe, and onely deſired two moneths time to bewaile her Virginitie on the mountaines of Gilead; becauſe in her the iſſues of her Father ended: but the other opinion, that ſhee was not offered, is more probable,
Bor. in Iud. which Bonfrer and others proue ſufficiently.

After theſe things the children of Iſrael, of the Tribe of Ephraim, either enuious of Iephta's victorie, or otherwiſe making way to their future calamitie, and to the moſt grieuous ſlauery that euer Iſrael ſuffered, quarrelled with Iephta, that they were not called to the Warre, as before time they had conteſted with Gideon. Iephta hereupon inforced to defend himſelfe againſt their fury, in the incounter ſlew of them two and forty thouſand,
Iudg. 12. which ſo weakened the body of the Land, as the Philiſtims had an eaſie conqueſt of them all not long after. Iephta, after he had iudged Iſrael ſixe yeares, died: to whom ſucceeded 2925. Ibzan, who ruled ſeuen yeares: after him Elon was their Iudge tenne yeares: in all 2942. which time Iſrael had peace. Euſebius findes not Elon, whom hee calleth Adon, for in the Septuagint, approued in his time, this Iudge was omitted.

Now before I goe on with the reſt, it ſhall be neceſſary vpon the occaſion of Iephta's account of the times, Iud. 11. 28. (where he ſayes that Iſrael had then poſſeſt the Eaſt ſide of Iordan 300. yeares) to ſpeake ſomewhat of the times of the Iudges, and of the differing opinions among the Diuines & Chronologers: there being found three places of Scriptures touching this point, ſeeming repugnant, or diſagreeing: the firſt is in this diſpute
Iud. 11. 28. betweene Iephta and Ammon, for the right and poſſeſſion of Gilead: the ſecond is that of
Act. 13. 20. Saint Paul, Acts 13. the third is that which is in the firſt of Kings. Iephta here challengeth
1 Kings 6. 1. the poſſeſſion of Gilead for 300. yeares: Saint Paul giueth to the Iudges, as it ſeemes, from the end of Ioſua, to the laſt of Heli, 450. yeares. In the firſt of Kings it is taught, that from the departing of Iſrael out of Egypt, to the foundation of Salomons Temple, there were conſumed 480. yeares. To the firſt Beroaldus findeth Iephta's 300. yeares to be but 265. yeares, to wit, 18. of Ioſua, 40. of Othoniel, 80. of Aod and Samgar, 40. of Debora, 40. of Gideon, 3. of Abimelech, 23. of Thola, and 22. of Iair: But Iephta (ſaith Beroaldus)
Id facit, numero certo pro incerto, propoſito. putteth or propoſeth a certaine number, for an vncertaine: Sic vt dicat annum agi propè trecenteſimum, ex quo nullus litem ea de re mouerit Iſraeli; So hee ſpeaketh (ſaith he) as meaning, that then it was about or wel-nigh the three hundreth yeare, ſince Iſrael poſſeſſed thoſe Countries, no man making queſtion of their right. Codoman on the contrary findes more yeares than Iephta named by 65. to wit, 365. whereof 71. were ſpent in Iſraels captiuity, at ſeuerall times, of which (as Codoman thinketh) Iephta forbare to repeate the whole ſumme or any great part, leſt the Ammonite ſhould haue iuſtly obiected, that 71. of thoſe yeares, the Iſraelites were in captiuity and vaſſals to their neighbour Princes, and therefore knowing that to name three hundred yeares, it was enough for preſcription, hee omitted the reſt.

To iuſtifie this account of 365. yeares, beſides the 71. yeares of captiuity or affliction, to bee added to Beroaldus his 266. hee addeth alſo 28. yeares more, and ſo maketh vp the ſumme of 365. Theſe 28. yeares hee findeth out thus: twenty yeares hee giues to the Seniors betweene Ioſua and Othoniel: and where Beroaldus alloweth eighteene yeares to Ioſua his gouernment, Codoman accounts that his rule laſted 26. according to Ioſephus; whereas Saint Auguſtine and Euſebius giue him 27. Melanchton 32. The trueth is, that this addition of 28. yeares is farre more doubtfull than the other of 71. But though wee admit not of this addition, yet by accounting of ſome part of the yeares of affliction (to wit, 34. yeares of the 71.) if wee adde them to the 266. yeares of of Beroaldus, which reckoneth none of theſe, we haue the iuſt number of 300. yeares. Neither is it ſtrange that Iephta ſhould leaue out more than halfe of theſe yeers of affliction: ſeeing, as it is already ſaid, the Ammonites might except againſt theſe 71. yeares, & ſay, that during theſe yeares, or at leaſt a good part of them, the Iſraelites had no quiet poſſeſſion of the countries in queſtion. Martin Luther is the author of a third opinion, making thoſe 300. yeares remembred by Iephta, to be 306. which odde yeares, ſaith he, Iephta omitteth. But becauſe the yeares of euerie Iudge as they reigned, cannot make vp the number of 306, but do only compound 266. therefore doth Luther adde to this number the whole time which Moſes ſpent in the Deſarts of Arabia Petræa; which forty yeares of Moſes added to the number which Beroaldus findeth of 266. make indeed 306.

But I ſee nothing in the Text to warrant Luthers iudgement herein: for in the diſpute between Iephta & Ammon for the land of Gilead, it is written in the perſon of Ammon, in theſe words: Becauſe Iſrael tooke my Land, when they came vp from Egypt, from Arnon vnto Iabok &c. now therefore reſtore thoſe lands quietly, or in peace. So by this place it is plaine, that the time is not to be accounted from Moſes departure out of Egypt: but from the time that the land was poſſeſt. For it is ſaid, Quia cepit Iſrael terram meam, Behold Iſrael tooke my land: and therfore the beginning of this account is to be referred to the time of the taking: which Iephta's anſwer alſo confirmeth in theſe words: when Iſrael dwelt in Heſhbon, and in her Townes, and in Aroer, and in her Townes, and in all the Cities that are by the coaſt of Arnon. 300 yeeres: why did ye not then recouer them in that ſpace? ſo as this place ſpeakes it directly, that Iſrael had inhabited and dwelt in the Cities of Gilead 300. yeeres: and therefore to account the times from the hopes or intents, that Iſrael had to poſſeſſe it, it ſeemeth ſomewhat ſtrained to me; for we do not vſe to reckon the time of our conqueſts in France, from our Princes intents or purpoſes, but from their victories and poſſeſſions. Iud. 11. 26.

Iunius neuertheleſſe likes the opinion of Luther, & ſayes, that this time of 300. yeers hath reference, and is to take beginning from the firſt of Iephta's narration: when he makes a briefe repetition of Moſes whole iourney: to wit, at the ſixteenth Verſe of the eleuenth Chapter of Iudges, in our tranſlation in theſe words: But when Iſrael came vp from Egypt, &c. and therefore Moſes his 40. yeeres (as he thinkes) are to be accounted, which make the number of 305. yeeres: and not only the time in which Iſrael poſſeſt Gilead, according to the Text & Iephta's own words: of which I leaue the iudgement to others, to whom alſo I leaue to iudge, whether we may not begin the 480. yeeres, from the deliuerance out of Egypt to the Temple, euen from the firſt departure out of Egypt, and yet finde a more probable reconciliation of Saint Pauls and Iephta's account with this reckoning, than any of thoſe that as yet haue beene ſignified. For firſt, touching Iephta's three hundred yeeres of poſſeſſion of the Eaſt ſide of Iordan, it is to be remembred, that for a good while before the Iſraelites poſſeſſed it, Sehon and Og had diſpoſſeſſed Moab and Ammon thereof: ſo that when the Iſraelites had conquered Sehon and Og, the right of poſſeſſion which they had, paſſed to Iſrael; and ſo Iephta might ſay that they had poſſeſſed thoſe Countries 300. yeeres, reckoning 266. yeeres of their own poſſeſſion, and the reſt of the poſſeſſion of the two Kings Sehon and Og, whoſe right the Iſraelites had by the law of conqueſt. Iunius in the 11. of Iudg. annot.

The ſecond place diſputed is this of S. Paul, Act. 13. that from the end of Iosua to the beginning of Samuel, there paſt 450. yeeres. And this place Luther vnderſtandeth alſo beſides the letter (as I find his opinion cited by Funcius Krentzheimius, and Beza) for I haue not read his Commentaries. For he accounteth from the death of Moſes, to the laſt yeere of Heli, but 357. yeeres: and this he doth the better to approue the times from the egreſſion out of Egypt to the building of the Temple, which in the firſt of Kings 6. is ſaid to be 480. yeeres. Reade the 24. of Iosua, and the 2 Iud. 7. Funcl. Chron. fol. 4. Beza in his Annotations vpon the 13. of the Act. v. 20.

Now foraſmuch as S. Paul (as it ſeemes) finds 450. yeers from the death of Iosua to the laſt of Heli, & leaues but thirty yeeres for Saul and Samuel, who gouerned 40. for Dauid who ruled 40. and for Salomon who wore the Crowne three whole yeeres ere the foundation of the Temple was laid, therefore Luther takes it, that there was errour in the Scribe, who wrote out this piece of Scripture of S. Paul: to wit, Then afterward hee gaue vnto them Iudges about 450. yeeres, vntil the time of Samuel the Prophet: the words then afterward, being cleerely referred to the death or after the death Act. 13. 20.

of Iosua, as shall be hereafter proued. But where Saint Luke rehearsing the words of Saint Paul, wrote 350. yeers (saith Luther) the Scribe in the transcription being deceiued by the affinitie of those two Greeke words, wherof the one signifieth 300. & the other 400. wrote Tetracosiois, for Triacosioi, 400. yeeres, for 300. yeeres; and 450. for 350. This he seeketh to strengthen by many arguments: to which opinion Beza in his great annotations adhereth. A contrary iudgement to this hath Codoman: where Luther and Beza begin at Moses death, he takes his account from the death of Iosua, and from thence to the beginning of Samuel he makes 430. yeers: to wit of the Iudges (not reckoning Sampsons yeers) 319. and of yeeres of seruitude and affliction vnder strangers, 111. The reason why he doth not reckon Sampsons twenty yeeres, is because he thinkes that they were part of the 40. yeeres, in which the Philistims are said to haue oppressed Israel. For it is plaine, that during all Sampsons time they were Lords ouer Israel. So then of the Iudges, besides the 111. yeeres of seruitude, Codoman reckoneth (as I haue said) 319. yeeres, which two summes put together make 430. yeeres. And, whereas Saint Paul nameth 450. yeeres, he findes 20. yeeres to make vp Saint Pauls number, to haue beene spent after the death of Iosua by the Seniors, before the Captiuitie of Cushan, or the election of Othoniel: which 20. yeers added to 430. make 450. according to Saint Paul. To approoue this time of the Elders, he citeth two places of Scriptures, namely the 24. of Iosua, and the second of Iudges, in each of which places it is written, that Israel serued the Lord all the dayes of Ioshua, and all the daies of the Elders that ouer-liued Ioshua: so as to these times of the Elders, Codoman giueth 20. yeeres, which make as before 450. according to S. Paul. Neither would it breed any great difficultie in this opinion, if heere also the 20. yeers of the Seniors between Iosua and Othoniel, should be denied. For they which denie these yeeres, and make Othoniels 40. to begin presently vpon the death of Iosua, as in the beginning of this reckoning, they haue 20. yeeres lesse than Codoman, so toward the end of it (when they reckon the yeeres of affliction apart from the yeeres of the Iudges) in the number of Sampsons yeeres, and of the 40. yeeres of the Philistims oppressing the Israelites, they haue 20. yeeres more than Codoman. For they reckon these 40. yeeres of oppression all of them a-part from Sampsons 20. but Codoman, as is said, makes Sampsons 20. to be the one halfe of the 40. of the Philistims oppressions; so that if the 20. yeers of the Seniors, be not allowed to Codoman, then he may reckon (as the letter of the Text seemes to inforce) that the Philistims in any Inter-regnum, before Sampson iudged Israel, vexed the Israelites 40. yeers besides the 20. while Sampson was their Iudge; & so the reckoning will come to 450. yeers between the end of Iosua, and the beginning of Samuel, though we admit not of an Inter-regnum of the Seniors betweene Iosua and Othoniel: For, if the times of their affliction be summed, they make 111. yeeres, to which if we adde the yeeres of the Iudges, which are 339. wee haue the iust summe of 450. And this computation either one way or other, may seeme to be much more probable, than theirs that correct the Text, although we should admit of their correction therof, & read with them 350. for 450. For whereas they conceiue that this time of 350. yeers, is to begin immediately, or soone after the death of Moses: certainly the place of S. Paul doth euidently teach the contrary, though it be receiued for true that there was vitium scripturis in the rest. For these be Saint Pauls words: And about the time of fortie yeeres, God suffered their manners in the wildernesse: And he destroyed seuen Nations in the Land of Canaan, and diuided their Land to them by lot. Then afterward he gaue vnto them Iudges about 450. yeeres, vnto the time of Samuel the Prophet. So as first in the eighteenth verse he speaketh of Moses and of his yeeres spent in the wildernesse, then in the nineteenth verse he commeth vnto the acts of Iosua; which were, that he destroyed seuen Nations in the land of Canaan, and diuided their Land to them by lot. In the twentieth verse it followeth, then afterward he gaue them Iudges about 450. yeeres, &c. and therefore to reckon from the death of Moses, is wide of S. Pauls meaning, so farre as my weake vnderstanding can pierce it. The onely inconuenience of any waight in opinion of Codoman touching this place in the Acts, is, that it seemes irreconcileable with the account, 1. Reg. 6. 11. For if indeed there were spent 450. yeers betweene the end of Iosua and the beginning of Samuel, certainly there must needs be much more than 480. yeeres betweene the beginning of the Israelites iourneying from Egypt, & the foundation of the Temple by Salomon. To this difficultie,

Iud. 13.
Iud. 15. 11.
Ios. 14. 1.

Codoman

Codoman anſwereth, that theſe 480. yeeres, 1 Reg. 6. 1. muſt begin to be reckoned, not in the beginning, but in the ending of their iourneying from Egypt, which he makes to be 25. yeeres after the beginning of Othoniels gouernment; from whence if wee caſt the yeeres of the Iudges, with the yeeres of ſeruitude (which ſummes according to his account, of which we haue already ſpoken, make 397. yeeres) and ſo to theſe yeeres adde the 40. of Samuel, and Saul, and the 40. of Dauid, and the 3. of Salomon, wee ſhall haue the iuſt ſumme of 480. yeeres. Neither is it hard (ſaith hee) that the annus egreſſionis, 1 Reg. 6. 1. ſhould be vnderſtood egreſſionis non incipientis ſed finitæ, the yeere of their comming out of Egypt (for ſo it is in the originall) or the yeere after they came out of Egypt, may well be vnderſtood for the yeere after they were come out thence, that is, after they had ended their wandring from thence. For ſo wee finde that things which were done 40. yeeres after they had ſet foot out of Egypt, are ſaid to haue been done in their going out of Egypt, as Pſal. 114. When Iſrael came out of Egypt, Iordan was driuen backe, & Deut. 4. 45. Theſe are the teſtimonies which Moſes ſpake when they came out of Egypt. And thus farre it ſeemes wee may very well agree with Codoman, for the interpretation of the ab exitu, to be as much as quum exiuiſſent, or ab exitu finito: for if Iunius, Deut. 4. 45. doe well reade quum exiuiſſent, for in exitu, as it ſeemes that herein hee doth well, why may not wee alſo, to auoid contradiction in the Scripture, expound ab exitu to be, poſtquàm exiuiſſent?

The next point to be cleered, is how their iourneying ſhould be ſaid not to haue had end vntill the 25. yeere after the victory of Othoniel. To this Codoman anſwereth, that then it had no end til when all the Tribes had obtained their portions, which happened not vntill this time: at which time the Danites at length ſeated themſelues, as it is declared, Iud. 18. For doubtleſſe to this time the expedition may moſt conueniently be referred. And thus without any great inconuenience to him appearing, doth Codoman reconcile the account of Iephta, and S. Paul, with that in the firſt of Kings, c. 6. Now whereas it is ſaid that the expedition of the Danites was when there was no King in Iſrael: to this Codoman anſwereth, that it is not neceſſary that wee ſhould ſuppoſe that Othoniel liued all thoſe 40. yeeres of reſt, of which Iud. 3. 11. ſo that by the 25. yeere after his victory, either hee might haue beene dead, or at leaſt, as Gideon did, he might haue refuſed all ſoueraignty, and ſo either way it might truly be ſaid that at this time (to wit, the 25. yeere after Othoniels victorie) there was no King in Iſrael. This opinion of Codoman, if it were as conſonant to other Chronologers grounding their opinions on the plaine Text, where it is indiſputable, as it is in it ſelfe round enough and coherent, might perhaps be receiued as good: eſpecially conſidering, that the ſpeeches of S. Paul haue not otherwiſe found any interpretation, maintaining them as abſolutely true, in ſuch manner as they ſound, and are ſet downe. But ſeeing that he wanteth all helpe of authority, we may iuſtly ſuſpect the ſuppoſition wherupon his opinion is grounded; it being ſuch as the conſent of many Authors would hardly ſuffice to make very probable. For who hath told Codoman, that the conqueſt of Laiſh, by the Tribe of Dan, was performed in the fiue and twentieth yeere of Othoniel? Or what other probabilitie hath hee than his owne coniecture, to ſhew that Othoniel did ſo renounce the office of a Iudge after fiue and twenty yeeres, that it might then be truely ſaid there was no King in Iſrael, but euery man did that which was good in his owne eyes?

Iud. 18. 1.

Now concerning the rehearſall of the Law by Moſes, and the ſtopping of Iordan, they might indeed be properly ſaid to haue beene, when Iſrael came out of Egypt; like as we ſay that King Edward the firſt was crowned when hee came out of the holy Land, for ſo all iournies with their accidents commonly take name from the place either whence or whither they tend. But I thinke that hee can finde no ſuch phraſe of ſpeech in Scripture as limitteth a iournie by an accident, or ſaith by conuerting the propoſition, when Iordan was turning back, Iſrael came out of Egypt. Indeed moſt vnproper it were to giue date vnto actions cõmenced long after, from an expedition finiſhed long before, namely to ſay, that King Edward at his arriuall out of Palæſtina, did winne Scotland, or died at Carliſle. How may we then beleeue that enterprize performed ſo many yeeres after the diuiſion of the Land (which followed the conqueſt at the iourneys end) ſhould be ſaid to haue been at the time of the departure out of Egypt? Or who will not think it moſt ſtrange, that the moſt notable account of time, ſeruing as the onely guide for certaine ages in ſacred Chronologie, ſhould not take name and beginning from that illustrious deliuerance out of Egypt, rehearsed often by God himself among the principall of his benefits to Israel, wherof the very day and moneth are recorded in Scripture (as likewise are the yeere and moneth wherein it expired) & the forme of the yeere vpon that occasion changed; but should haue reference to the surprizing of a Town by sixe hundred men, that robbed a Chappell by the way, and stole from thence Idols to be their guides, as not going to worke in Gods name? For this accident wherupon Codoman buildeth, hath either no time giuen to it, or a time far different from that which he supposeth, and is indeed rather by him placed in such a yeere, because it best stood with his interpretation so to haue it, than for any certainety or likelihood of the thing it selfe.

Wherefore we may best agree with such as affirme that the Apostle S. Paul did not herein labour to set downe the course of time exactly (a thing no way concerning his purpose) but onely to shew that God, who had chosen Israel to be his people, deliuered them out of bondage, and ruled them by Iudges and Prophets, vnto the time of Saul, did raise vp out Lord Iesus Christ out of the seede of Dauid the King, in whose succession the Crowne was established, and promise made of a Kingdome that should haue no end. Now in rehearsing briefly thus much which tended as a Preface to the declaration following (wherin hee sheweth Christ to haue bin the true Messias) the Apostle was so farre from labouring to make an exact calculation of times (the History being so well knowne & beleeued of the Iewes to whom he preached) that he spake as it were at large of the 40. yeeres consumed in the wildernesse, whereof no man doubted, saying, that God suffered their manners in the wildernesse about 40. yeeres. In like manner he proceeded, saying, that from the diuision of the Land vnto the daies of Samuel the Prophet, in whose time they required to haue a King, there passed about 450. yeeres. Neither did he stand to tell them, that an hundred and eleuen yeeres of bondage mentioned in this middle while, were by exact computation to be included within the 339. yeeres of the Iudges: for this had beene an impertinent digression from the argument which hee had in hand. Wherefore it is not a worke so needfull as laborious, to search out of this place that which the Apostle did not heere intend to teach, when the summe of 480. yeeres is so expresly and purposely set downe.

Now that the words of S. Paul (if there be no fault in the Copie through errour of some Scribe) are not so curiously to be examined in matter of Chronologie, but must be taken, as hauing reference to the memory & apprehension of the vulgar, it is euident by Act. 13. his ascribing in the same place 40. yeers to the reigne of Saul: wheras it is manifest that those yeeres were diuided between Saul and Samuel, yea, that farre the greater part of them were spent vnder the gouernment of the Prophet, howsoeuer they are here included in the raigne of the King. As for those that with so much cunning forsake the generall opinion, when it fauoureth not such exposition as they bring out of a good minde, to helpe where the need is not ouer-great; I had rather commend their diligence, than follow their example. The words of S. Paul were sufficiently iustified by Beroaldus, as hauing reference to a common opinion among the Scribes in those dayes, that the 111 yeers of seruitude were to be reckoned apart from the 339. yeers ascribed to the Iudges; which account, the Apostle would not in this place stand to contradict, but rather chose to speake as the vulgar, qualifying it with a quasi, where he saith, quasi quadringentis & quinquaginta annis; As it were foure hundred and fifty yeeres. But Codoman being not thus contented, would needs haue it be so indeed, and therfore dis-ioynes the members
1 King. 6 to make the account euen. In so doing he dasheth himselfe against a notable Text, wherupon all Authors haue builded (as well they might and ought) that purposely and precisely doth cast vp the yeeres from the departure out of Egypt, vnto the building of Salomons Temple, not omitting the very Moneth it selfe.

Now (as commonly the first apprehensions are strongest) hauing already giuen faith to his owne interpretation of Saint Paul, he thinketh it more needfull to find some new exposition for that which is of it selfe most plaine, and to examine his owne coniecture vpon a place that is full of controuersie. Thus by expounding, after a strange methode, that which is manifest by that which is obscure, he loseth himself in those waies wherin before him neuer man walked. Surely if one should vrge him to giue reason of these new opinions, he must needs answer, That Othoniel could not gouerne aboue 25. yeers, because then was the taking of Laish, at which time there was no King in Israel; That the

Danites must needs haue taken Laish at that time, becauſe elſe we could not reckon backwards from the foundation of the Temple to any action that might bee termed the comming of Iſrael out of Egypt, without excluding the yeeres of ſeruitude; And that the yeeres of ſeruitude muſt needs be included, for that otherwiſe hee himſelfe ſhould haue ſpent his time vainely, in ſeeking to pleaſure S. Paul with an expoſition. Whether this ground be ſtrong enough to vphold a Paradoxe, I leaue it to the deciſion of the iudicious Reader.

And now to proceed in our ſtorie. To the time of Iephta are referred the death of Hercules, the rape of Helen by Paris, and the prouiſions which her husband Menelaus, reigning then in Sparta, and his brother Agamemnon King of Mycenæ, made for her recouerie. Others refer this rape of Helen to the fourth yeere of Ibzan: from which time, if the warre of Troy (as they ſuppoſe) did not begin till the third of Ailon or Elon, yet the Greeks had ſixe yeeres to prepare themſelues: the rule holding not true in this War, longa preparatio belli celerem affert victoriam; That a long preparation begets a ſpeedy victorie: for the Greekes conſumed tenne yeeres in the attempt: and Troy, as it ſeemes, was entred, ſackt and burnt in the third yeere of Habdon.

Three yeeres after Troy taken, which was in the ſixt yeere of Habdon, Æneas arriued in Italie. Habdon in the eighth yeere of his rule, died, after hee had beene the Father of 40. ſonnes and 30. grand-children. And whereas it is ſuppoſed, that the 40. yeeres of Iſraels oppreſſion by the Philiſtims (of which Iud. 13. v. 1.) tooke beginning from the ninth yeere of Iair, and ended with the laſt of Habdon: I ſee no reaſon for that opinion. For Ephraim had had little cauſe of quarrell againſt Iephta, for not calling them to War ouer Iordan, if the Philiſtims had held them in ſeruitude in their own Territories: and if Ephraim could haue brought 42000. armed men into the field, it is not likely that they were then oppreſt: and had it beene true that they were, who will doubt but that they would rather haue fought againſt the Philiſtims with ſo powerfull an Armie for their owne deliuerance, than againſt their owne brethren the Iſraelites? But Ammon being ouerthrowne, it ſeemed at that time, that they feared no other enemie. And therefore theſe 40. yeeres muſt either bee ſupplied elſewhere, as in the time of Sampſon, and afterward: or elſe they muſt be referred to the inter-regnum betweene the death of Habdon, and the deliuerance of Iſrael by Sampſon, ſuch as it was.

Chap. XIIII.

Of the Warre of Troy.

§. I.

Of the Genealogie of the Kings of Troy, with a note touching the ancient Poets how they haue obſerued Hiſtoricall truth.

THE Warre at Troy with other ſtories hereupon depending (becauſe the ruine of this Citie, by moſt Chronologers is found in the time of Habdon, Iudge of Iſrael, whom in the laſt place I haue mentioned) I rather chooſe here to intreat of in one entire narration, beginning with the lineall deſcent of their Princes, than to break the ſtory into pieces by rehearſing a-part in diuers yeeres, the diuerſity of occurrents.

The Hiſtorie of the ancient Kings of Troy is vncertaine, in regard both of their originall, and of their continuance. It is commonly held that Teucer and Dardanus were the two founders of that Kingdome. This is the opinion of Virgil: which if hee (as Reineccius thinks) tooke from Beroſus, it is the more probable: if Annius borrowed it of him, then it reſts vpon the authority of Virgil, who ſaith thus:

Aeneid. 3.

Creta Iouis magni medio iacet inſula Ponto:
Mons Idæus vbi, & gentis cunabula noſtræ.

Centum Vrbes habitant magnas, vberrima regna:
Maximus vnde Pater (ſi ritè audita recordor)
Teucrus Rhœteas primùm eſt aduectus ad oras:
Optauitque locum regno. Nondum Ilium & arces
Pergamea ſteterant: habitabant vallibus imis.
Hinc Mater cultrix Cybele, Corybantiaque æra, Idæumque nemus.

In the maine Sea the Ile of Creete doth lie:
Whence Ioue was borne, thence is our progenie.
There is mount Ida: there in fruitfull Land
An hundreth great and goodly Cities ſtand.
Thence (if I follow not miſtaken fame)
Teucer the eldeſt of our grand-ſires came
To the Rhœtean ſhores: and reigned there
Ere yet faire Ilion was built, and ere
The Towers of Troy: their dwelling place they ſought
In loweſt vales. Hence Cybels rites were bought:
Hence Corybantian Cymbals did remoue:
And hence the name of our Idæan groue.

Thus it ſeemeth by Virgil, who followed ſurely good authority, that Teucer firſt gaue name to that Countrey, wherein he reigned ere Troy was built by Dardanus: of which Dardanus in the ſame booke he ſpeakes thus:

Eſt locus, Heſperiam Graii cognomine dicunt:
Terra antiqua, potens armis atque vbere glebæ,
OEnotrii coluere viri; nunc fama minores
Italiam dixiſſe, ducis de nomine gentem.
Hæ nobis propriæ ſedes: hinc Dardanus ortus:
Iaſiuſque Pater, genus à quo principe noſtrum.

Heſperia the Græcians call the place:
An ancient fruitfull Land, a warlike race,
OEnotrians held it; now the later progenie
Giues it their Captaines name, and calls it Italie;
This ſeate belongs to vs, hence Dardanus,
Hence came the Author of our ſtock, Iaſius.

Alſo Aemil. l. 2

Atque equidem memini (fama eſt obſcurior annis)
Auruncos ita ferre ſenes, hic ortus vt agris
Dardanus Idæas Phrygiæ penetrauit ad vrbes,
Threiciamque Samum, quæ nunc Samothracia fertur.
Hinc illum Coryti Tyrrhena ab ſede profectum,
Aurea nunc ſolio ſtellantis regia cœli
Accipit, &c.

Some old Aruncans, I remember well,
(Though time haue made the fame obſcure) would tell
Of Dardanus, how borne in Italie:
From hence he into Phrygia did flie.
And leauing Tuſcaine (where he earſt had place)
With Corytus did ſaile to Samothrace;
But now inthronized he ſits on high,
In golden Palace of the ſtarrie skie.

But contrary to this, and ſo many Authors, approuing and confirming it, Reinecius thinkes that theſe names, Troes, Teucri, and Thraces, are deriued from Tiras or Thiras the ſon of Iaphet: and that the Dardanians, Myſians, & Aſcanians, mixt with the Troians, were were Germane Nations, descended from Ashkenaz, the sonne of Gomer: of whom the Countrie, Lake, and riuer of Ascanius in Asia tooke name. That Ashkenaz gaue name to those places and people, it is not vnlikely: neither is it vnlikely, that the Ascanii, Dardani, and many others, did in after-times passe into Europe: that the name of Teucer came of Tiras, the coniecture is somewhat hard. Concerning Teucer, whereas Halicarnassæus makes him an Athenian, I finde none that follow him in the same opinion. Virgil (as is before shewed) reporteth him to be of Crete, whose authoritie is the more to be regarded, because hee had good meanes to finde the truth, which it is probable that hee carefully sought, and in this did follow, seeing it no way concerned Augustus (whom other-whiles hee did flatter) whether Teucer were of Crete or no. Reineccius doth rather embrace the opinion of Diodorus, and others that thinke him a Phrigian, by which report he was the Sonne of Scamander and Ida, Lord of the Country, not founder of the Citie; and his Daughter or Neece Batia was the second wife of Dardanus, founder of Troy. Reineccius further thinkes that Atlas reigned in Samothracia, and gaue his daughter Electra to Corytus, or Coritus: and that these were Parents to Chryse, first wife to Dardanus. Virgil holds otherwise, and the common Tradition of Poets makes Dardanus the sonne of Electra by Iupiter, which Electra was the daughter of Atlas, and wife to Coritus King of Hetruria, to whom she bare Iasius. Annius out of his Berosus findes the name of Camboblascon, to whom he giues the addition of Corytus, as a Title of dignitie, making him Father of Dardanus and Iasius; and further telling vs very particularly of the faction betweene these Brethren, which grew to such heate, that finally Dardanus killed his Brother, and thereupon fled into Samothrace. The obscurity of the historie giues leaue to Annius of saying what he list. I, that loue not to vse such libertie, will forbeare to determine any thing herein. But if Dardanus were the Sonne of Iupiter, it must haue beene of some elder Iupiter than the Father of those that liued about the Warre of Troy. So it is likewise probable that Atlas the Father of Electra was rather an Italian than an African, which also is the opinion of Boccace. For (as hath often been said) there were many Iupiters, and many or almost euery name of Gods; but it was the custome to ascribe to some one the acts of the rest, with all belonging to them. Therfore I will not greatly trouble my self with making any narrow search into these fabulous antiquities, but set down the Pedigree according to the generall fame; allowing to Teucer such Parents as Diodorus giues, because others giue him none, and carrying the line of Dardanus in manner following.

Concerning the beginning and continuance, the Troian Kingdome, with the length of euery Kings reigne, I haue chosen good Authors to be my guides, that in a Historie, whereon depends the most ancient computation of times among the Greekes, I might not follow incertainties; ill cohering with the consent of Writers, and generall passage of things elsewhere done. And first for the destruction of Troy, which was of greater note than any accident befalling that Citie whilest it stood, it is reckoned by Diodorus to be 780. yeeres more ancient than the beginning of the nintie fourth Olympiad. Whereas therefore 372. did passe between the beginning of the Olympiads and the first yeere of the 94. it is manifest that the remainder of 780. yeeres, that is, 408. yeeres went betweene the destruction of Troy, and the first institution of those games by Iphitus, if the authoritie of Diodorus be good proofe, who elsewhere tels vs, that the returne of the Heraclidæ, which was 80. yeeres after the fall of Troy, was 328. yeeres before the first Olympiad. Diod. l. 14. Diod. in Præf.

Hereunto agrees the authoritie of Dionysius Halicarnasseus, who placing the foundation of Rome in the first of the seuenth Olympiad, that is, foure and twentie yeeres after the beginning of those games, accounts it 432. later than the fall of Troy. Solinus in expresse words, makes the institution of the Olympiads by Iphitus, whom he calleth Iphiclus, 480. yeeres later than the destruction of Troy. The summe is easily collected by necessarie inference out of diuers other places in the same booke. Hereunto doth Eusebius reckoning exclusiuely agree: and Eratosthenes, (as he is cited by Clemens Alexandrinus) makes vp out of many particulars, the same totall summe, wanting but one yeere, as reckoning likewise exclusiuely. Dionys. Halic. Antiq. l. 2. Solin. Polihist. c. 2. Euseb. de rap. Euang. l. 10. c. 3. Cle. Alex. Strom. lib. 1.

The other collections of diuers Writers that are cited by Clemens in the same place, doe neither cohere any way, not depend vpon any collaterall Historie, by which they may be verified.

The destruction of Troy being in the yeere before the Olympiads foure hundred and eight: we must seeke the continuance of that from the beginning to the end, out of Eusebius, who leades vs from Derdanus on-wards through the reignes of foure Kings, by the space of two hundred and fiue and twenty yeers, and after of Priamus, with whom also at length it ended. As for the time which passed vnder Laomedon, we are faine to doe, as others haue done before vs, and take it vpon trust from Annius his Authors; beleeuing Manetho so much the rather, for that in his accompt of the former kings reignes & of Priamus, he is found to agree with Eusebius, which may giue vs leaue to thinke that Annius hath not herein corrupted him. But in this point we needs not to be very scrupulous: for seeing that no Historie or accompt of time depends vpon the reigne of the former Kings, but onely vpon the ruine of the Citie vnder Priamus, it may suffice that we are carefull to place that memorable accident in the due yeere.

True it is, that some obiections appearing waightie, may be alleaged in maintenance of different computations, which with the answeres I purposely omit, as not willing to dispute of those yeeres, wherein the Greekes knew no good forme of a yeere; but rather to make narration of the actions which were memorable, and acknowledged by all Writers, whereof this destruction of Troy was one of the most renowned.

The first enterprise that was vndertaken by generall consent of all Greece, was the last warre of Troy, which hath bin famous euen to this day, for the numbers of Princes, and valiant Commanders there assembled: the great battailes fought with variable successe: the long indurance of the siege; the destruction of that great Citie; and the many Colonies planted in sundry Countries, as well by the remainder of the Troians, as by the victorious Greekes after their vnfortunate returne. All which things with innumerable circumstances of especiall note, haue beene deliuered vnto posteritie, by the excellent wits of many writers, especially by the Poems of that great Homer, whose verses haue giuen immortalitie to the action, which might else perhaps haue beene buried in obliuion, among other worthy deedes, done both before and since that time. For it is true which Horace saith,

Vixêre fortes ante Agamemnona
Multi: sed omnes illachrimabiles
Vrgentur, ignotiq; longa
Nocte: carent quia vate sacro.

Many

Many by valour haue deseru'd renowne
Ere Agamemnon: yet lie all oppreſt
Vnder long night, vnwept for, and vnknowne:
For with no ſacred Poet were they bleſt.

Yet ſo it is, that whileſt theſe writetrs haue with ſtrange fables, or (to ſpeake the beſt of them) with Allegories farre ſtrained, gone about to enlarge the commendations of thoſe noble vndertakers: they haue both drawne into ſuſpition that great vertue which they ſought to adorne, & filled after-ages with almoſt as much ignorance of the Hiſtorie, as admiration of the perſons. Wherefore it is expedient that we ſeeke for the knowledge of ſuch actions, in Hiſtories; learning their qualities who did manage them, of Poets, in whoſe workes are both profit and delight: yet ſmall profit to thoſe which are delighted otherwiſe; but ſuch as can interpret their fables, or ſeparate them from the naked truth, ſhall finde matter in Poems, not vnworthy to be regarded of Hiſtorians. For thoſe things excepted which are gathered out of Homer, there is very little, and not without much diſagreement of Authors, written of this great war. All writers conſent with Homer, that the rape of Helen by Paris the ſon of Priamus, was the cauſe of taking armes: but how he was hereunto emboldned, it is doubtfull.

§. II.

Of the Rape of Helen: and ſtrength of both ſides for the warre.

HErodotus fetcheth the cauſe of this rape from very farre; ſaying, That whereas the Phœnicians had rauiſhed Io, and carried her into Egypt, the Greekes to be reuenged on the Barbarians, did firſt rauiſh Europa, whom they brought out of Phœnicia into Creta, and afterward Medea, whom they fetcht from Colchos, denying to reſtore her to her father, till ſuch time as they might be ſatisfied for the rape of Io. By theſe deedes of the Greekes, Paris (as the ſame Herodotus affirmes) was emboldened to doe the like; not fearing ſuch reuenge as enſued. But all this narration ſeemes friuolous. For what had the King of Colchos to doe with the iniurie of the Phœnicians? Or how could the Greekes, as in reuenge of Io, pleade any quarrell againſt him, that neuer had heard the name of Phœnicians? Thucydides a writer of vnqueſtionable ſinceritie, maketh it plain, that the name of Barbarians was not vſed at all in Homers time, which was long after the warre of Troy; and that the Greeks themſelues were not then called all by one name, Hellenes, as afterwards. So that it were vnreaſonable to thinke, that they ſhould haue ſought reuenge vpon all Nations, as barbarous, for the iniurie receiued by one: or that all people elſe ſhould haue eſteemed of the Greeks, as of a people oppoſed to all the world; and that euen then when as the Greekes had not yet one common name among themſelues. Others with more probabilitie ſay, that the rape of Helen was to procure the redeliuery of Heſione, King Priamus his ſiſter, taken formerly by Hercules, and giuen to Telamon. This may haue beene true. For Telamon (as it ſeemes) was a cruell man, ſeeing his owne ſonne Teucer durſt not come in his ſight, after the warre of Troy, but fled into Cyprus, onely becauſe his brother Aiax (which Teucer could not remedie) had ſlaine himſelfe. Yet, were it ſo, that Heſione was ill intreated by Telamon, it was not therefore likely, that Priamus her brother would ſeeke to take her from her husband, with whom ſhe had liued about thirtie yeeres, and to whom ſhee had borne children which were to ſucceed in his Dominion. Whereupon I thinke that Paris had no regard either to the rape of Europa, Medea, or Heſione: but was meerely incited by Venus, that is, by his luſt, to doe that which in thoſe dayes was very common. For not onely Greeks from Barbarians, and Barbarians from Greeks as, Herodotus diſcourſeth; but all people were accuſtomed to ſteale women and cattell, if they could by ſtrong hand or power get them; and hauing ſtollen them, either to ſell them away in ſome farre Countrie, or keepe them to their owne vſe. So did Theſeus, and Pirythous attempt Proſerpina; and ſo did Theſeus (long before Paris) rauiſh Helen. And theſe practices, as it appeares in Thucydides, were ſo common, that none durſt inhabite neere vnto the Sea, for feare of pyracie, which was accounted a trade of life no leſſe lawfull than merchandiſe: wherefore Tyndareus the father of Helen, conſidering the beauty of his daughter, and the rape which Theſeus had made, cauſed all her wooers, who were moſt of the principall men in Greece, to binde themselues by solemne oath, that if she were taken from her husband, they should with all their might helpe to recouer her. This done, he gaue free choyce of a husband to his daughter, who chose Menelaus, brother to Agamemnon. So the cause which drew the Greekes vnto Troy in reuenge of Helens rape, was partly the oath which so many Princes had made vnto her father Tyndareus. Hereunto the great power of Agamemnon was not a little helping; for Agamemnon, besides his great Dominions in Peloponnesus, was Lord of many Ilands: he was also rich in money; and therefore the Arcadians were well contented to follow his pay, whom hee embarked for Troy in his owne ships, which were more than any other of the Greeke Princes brought to that expedition.

Thus did all Greece, either as bound by oath, or led by reputation and power of the two brethren, Agamemnon and Menelaus; or desirous to partake of the profit and honour in that great enterprise; take armes against the Troians. The Greekes Fleet was (by Homers account) 1200. sayle, or thereabouts: but the vessels were not great: for it was not then the manner to build ships with deckes; onely they vsed (as Thucidides saith) small ships, meet for robbing on the Sea; the least of which carried fiftie men, the greatest 120. euery man (except the Captaines) being both a Marriner and a Souldier. By this proportion it appeares that the Grecian army consisted of 100000 men, or thereabout. This was the greatest armie that euer was raised out of Greece: and the greatnesse of this armie doth well declare the strength and power of Troy, which ten whole yeers did stand out against such forces: yet were the Troians which inhabited the Citie, not the tenth part of this number, as Agamemnon said in the second of Homers Ileads; but their followers and aydes were very many and strong. For all Phrygia, Lycia, Misia, and the greatest part of Asia the lesse, tooke part with the Troians. The Amazons also brought them succour. And Rhesus out of Thrace, and Memnon out of Assyria (though some thinke, out of Æthiopia) came to their defence.

§. III.

Of the Grecians iourney, and Embassage to Troy, and of Helenaes being detained in Egypt; and of the Sacrificing of Iphigenia.

Wherefore the Greekes vnwilling to come to triall of armes, if things might be compounded by treaty, sent Menelaus and Vlysses Embassadours to Troy, who demanded Helen & the goods were taken with her out of Menelaus his house. What answer the Troians made hereunto it is vncertaine. Herodotus from the report of the Egyptian Priests, makes it very probable, that Helen was taken from Paris before his returne to Troy. The summe of his discourse is this.

Paris in his returne with Helena, being driuen by foule weather vnto the coast of Egypt, was accused for the rape of Helen by some bondmen of his, that had taken Sanctuary. Proteus then King of Egypt, finding the accusation true by examination, detained Helen, and the goods taken with her, till her husband should require them: dismissing Paris without further punishment, because he was a stranger. Wherefore the Greekes demanding Helen had answer, that she was in Egypt, they thought themselues deluded, and thereupon made the warre, which ended with the ruine of Troy. But when after the Citie taken, they perceiued indeed she had not beene there, they returned home, sending Menelaus to aske his wife of Proteus. Homer and the whole Nation of Poets (except Euripides) vary from this Historie, thinking it a matter more magnificent and more grateful to their Poems, for the retaining of a faire Lady, than that they endured all by force, because it lay not in their power to redeliuer her. Yet in the fourth of his Odysses, Homer speakes of Menelaus his being in Egypt, before he returned home to Sparta; which voyage it were not easily beleeued, that he made for pleasure: and if he were driuen thither by contrary windes, much more may wee thinke that Paris was likely to haue beene driuen thither by foule weather. For Paris immediately vpon the rape committed, was enforced to flye, taking such windes as he could get, and rather enduring any storme, than to commit himselfe to any Hauen in the Greekes seas; whereas Menelaus might haue put into any Port in Greece, and there haue remained with good entertainement, vntill such time as the winde had come about, and serued for his Navigation.

One

One great argument Herodotus brings to confirme the ſaying of the Egyptian Prieſts, which is, that if Helen had beene at Troy, it had beene vtter madneſſe for Priamus to ſee ſo many miſeries befall him, during the warre, and ſo many of his ſonnes ſlaine for the pleaſure of one, who neither was heire to the Kingdome (for Hector was elder) nor equall in vertue to many of the reſt. Beſides, it may ſeeme that Lucian ſpake not more pleaſantly than truely, when he ſaid that Helen, at the warre of Troy, was almoſt as old as Queene Hecuba, conſidering that ſhe had been rauiſhed by Theſeus the companion of Hercules, who tooke Troy when Priamus was very young; and conſidering further, that ſhe was ſiſter to Caſtor and Pollux (ſhe and Pollux being ſaid by ſome to haue beene twins) who ſailed with the Argonautes, hauing Telamon the father of Aiax in their company before the time that Heſione was taken; on whom Telamon begat Aiax, that was a principall Commander in the Troian warre. But whether it were ſo that the Troians could not, or would not reſtore Helen, ſo it was that the Embaſſadours returned ill contented, and not very well intreated; for there wanted not ſome that aduiſed to haue them ſlaine. The Greekes hereupon incenſed, made all haſte towards Troy: at which time Calchas (whom ſome ſay to haue bin a runnagate Troian, though no ſuch thing be found in Homer) filled the Captaines & all the Hoaſte with many troubleſome anſwers & diuinations. For he would haue Agamemnons daughter ſacrificed to appeaſe Diana, whoſe anger, he ſaid, withſtood their paſſage. Whether the young Lady were ſacrificed, or whether (as ſome write) the goddeſſe was contented with a Hinde, it is not needfull here to be diſputed of. Sure it is, that the malice of the diuell, which awaits for all opportunities, is neuer more importunate, than where mens ignorance is moſt. Calchas alſo told the Greekes, that the taking of Troy was impoſsible, till ſome fatall impediments were remoued: and that till ten yeeres were paſt, the towne ſhould hold out againſt them. All which notwithſtanding, the Greeks proceeded in their enterpriſe, vnder the command of Agamemnon, who was accompanied with his brother Menelaus; Achilles the moſt valiant of all the Greekes, his friend Patroclus, and his Tutor Phœnix; Aiax and Teucer, the ſons of Telamon; Idomeneus, and his companion Meriones; Neſtor, and his ſonnes Antilochus, and Thraſymedes; Vlyſſes; Mneſtheus the ſonne of Petreus, Captaine of the Athenians: Diomedes the ſon of Tydeus, a man of ſingular courage; the wiſe and learned Palamedes, Aſcalaphus and Ialmenus, the ſons of Mars, who had ſailed with the Argonautes; Philoctetes alſo the ſonne of Paan, who had the arrowes of Hercules, without which Calchas ſaid, that the Citie could not be taken; Aiax the ſonne of Oileus, Peneleus, Thoas, Eumelus, Tyſandrus, Euripilus, Athamas, Sthenelus, Tlepolemus the ſon of Hercules; Podalyrius, and Machon, the ſonnes of Æſculapius: Epeus, who is ſaid to haue made the wooden horſe, by which the towne was taken; and Proteſilaus, who firſt leapt on ſhore, neglecting the Oracle that threatned death to him that landed firſt.

§. IV.

Of the Acts of the Gracians at the ſiege.

THeſe, and many other of leſſe note, arriuing at Troy, found ſuch ſharpe entertainment, as might eaſily perſwade them to thinke that the warre would be more than one yeeres worke. For in the firſt encounter, they loſt Proteſilaus, whom Hector ſlew, & many other, without any great harme done to the Troians: ſaue only that by their numbers of men, they won ground enough to incampe themſelues in, as appeareth in Thucydides. The principall impediment which the Greekes found, was want of victuals, which grew vpon them by reaſon of their multitude, and the ſmalneſſe of their veſſels, wherin they could not carry neceſſaries for ſuch an armie. Hereupon they were compelled to ſend ſome part of their men, to labour the ground in Chersoneſſe: others to rob vpon the Sea for the reliefe of the Campe. Thus was the warre protracted nine whole yeeres, & either nothing done, or if any skirmiſhes were, yet could the towne receiue little loſſe by them, hauing equall numbers to maintaine the field againſt ſuch Greekes as continued the ſiege, and a more ſafe retrait if the enemie got the better.

Wherfore Ouid ſaith, That from the firſt yeere, til the tenth, there was no fighting at all: & Heraclide commends as very credible, the report of Herodicus; That the Greeks did not lye before Troy the firſt nine yeeres: but onely did beare vp & down the ſeas exercising their men, and inriching themselues; and so by wasting the enemies Countrie did block vp the towne, vnto which they returned not, vntill the fatall time drew neere when it should be subuerted.

This is confirmed by the enquirie which Priamus made, when the Greeke Princes came into the field, the tenth yeere; for he knew none of them; and therefore sitting vpon an high tower (as Homer tels) hee learned their names of Helen: which though it is like to be a fiction, yet could it not at all haue been supposed that hee should bee ignorant of them, if they had shewed themselues before the towne so many yeeres together. Hom. Il. 3.

Betweene these relations of Thucydides and Herodian, the difference is not much; the one saying, that a few of the Greeks remained in the Camp before Troy, whilest the rest made purueyance by land and by sea: the other, that the whole armie did spend the time in wasting the sea-coasts. Neither doe the Poets greatly disagree from these authors: for they make report of many townes and Ilands wasted, and the people carried into Captiuitie; in which actions Achilles was imployed, whom the armie could not well, not would haue spared, if any seruice of importance had beene to bee performed before the Citie. Howsoeuer it was, this is agreed by generall consent, that in the beginning of that Summer, in which Troy was taken, great booties were brought into the Campe, and a great pestilence arose among the Greeks: which Homer saith, that Apollo sent in reuenge of his Priests daughter, whom Agamemnon had refused to let goe, for any ransome: but Heraclides interpreting the place, saith, that by Apollo was meant the Sunne, who raysed pestilent Fogs, by which the armie was infected, being lodged in a mooriſh piece of ground. And it might well bee that the campe was ouer-pestered with those, who had been abroad, and now were lodged all close together: hauing also grounded their ships within the fortifications.

About the same time arose much contention betweene Agamemnon and Achilles about the bootie, whereof Agamemnon, as Generall, hauing first chosen for his part a captiue woman, and Achilles in the second place chosen for himselfe another, then Aiax, Vlysses, and so the rest of the chiefe Captaines in order: When the Soothsayer Calchas had willed that Agamemnons woman should be restored to her father Apollo's Priest, that so the Pestilence might cease, then did Agamemnon greatly rage, and say, that hee alone would not lose his part of the spoyle, but would either take that which had beene giuen to Achilles, or that which had fallen to Aiax, or to Vlysses. Hereupon Achilles defied him, but was faine to suffer all patiently, as not able to hold his Concubine by strong hand, nor to reuenge her losse otherwise than by refusing to fight, or to send forth his Captaines. But the Greeks, incouraged by their Captaines, presented themselues before the Citie without him and his troupes.

The Troians were now relieued with great succours, all the neighbour Countries hauing sent them aide: partly drawne to that warre by their Commanders, who assisted Priamus for money, wherewith hee abounded when the warre began (as appeares by his words in Homer,) or for loue of himselfe and his sonnes, or hope of marriage with some of his many and faire daughters; partly also (as we may well ghesse) incited by the wrongs receiued of the Greekes, when they wasted the Countries adioyning vnto Troy. So that when Hector issued out of the towne, hee was little inferiour to his enemies in numbers of men, or qualitie of their Leaders. The principall Captaines in the Troian armie, were Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus, and the other sonnes of Priamus: Æneas, Antenor, and his sonnes, Polydamas, Sarpedon, Glaucus, Asius, and the sonnes of Panthus, besides Rhesus, who was slaine the first night of his arriuall; Memnon, Queene Penthesilea, and others who came towards the end of the warre. Betweene these and the Greeks were many battels fought: the greatest of which were, that at the tombe of King Ilus vpon the Plaine: and another at the very trenches of the Campe, wherein Hector brake through the fortifications of the Greeks, and began to fire their ships; at which time Aiax, the sonne of Telamon with his brother Teucer, were in a manner the onely men of note that remaining vnwounded, made head against Hector, when the state of the Greekes was almost desperate.

Another battell (for so antiquitie cals it) or rather the same renewed, was fought by Patroclus, who hauing obtained leaue, drew forth Achilles troopes, relieuing the weary Greekes with a fresh supply. Agamemnon, Diomedes, Vlysses, and the rest of the Princes, though sore wounded, yet were driuen to put on armour, and with helpe of Patroclus,

One great argument Herodotus brings to confirme the saying of the Egyptian Priests, which is, that if Helen had beene at Troy, it had beene vtter madnesse for Priamus to see so many miseries befall him, during the warre, and so many of his sonnes slaine for the pleasure of one, who neither was heire to the Kingdome (for Hector was elder) nor equall in vertue to many of the rest. Besides, it may seeme that Lucian spake not more pleasantly than truely, when he said that Helen, at the war of Troy, was almost as old as Queene Hecuba, considering that she had been rauished by Theseus the companion of Hercules, who tooke Troy when Priamus was very young; and considering further, that she was sister to Castor and Pollux (she and Pollux being said by some to haue beene twins) who sailed with the Argonautes, hauing Telamon the father of Aiax in their company before the time that Hesione was taken; on whom Telamon begat Aiax, that was a principall Commander in the Troian warre. But whether it were so that the Troians could not, or would not restore Helen, so it was that the Embassadours returned ill contented, and not very well intreated; for there wanted not some that aduised to haue them slaine. The Greekes hereupon incensed, made all haste towards Troy: at which time Calchas (whom some say to haue bin a runnagate Troian, though no such thing be found in Homer) filled the Captaines & all the Hoaste with many troublesome answers & diuinations. For he would haue Agamemnons daughter sacrificed to appease Diana, whose anger, he said, withstood their passage. Whether the young Lady were sacrificed, or whether (as some write) the goddesse was contented with a Hinde, it is not needfull here to be disputed of. Sure it is, that the malice of the diuell, which awaits for all opportunities, is neuer more importunate, than where mens ignorance is most. Calchas also told the Greekes, that the taking of Troy was impossible, till some fatall impediments were remoued: and that till ten yeeres were past, the towne should hold out against them. All which notwithstanding, the Greeks proceeded in their enterprise, vnder the command of Agamemnon, who was accompanied with his brother Menelaus; Achilles the most valiant of all the Greekes, his friend Patroclus, and his Tutor Phœnix; Aiax and Teucer, the sons of Telamon; Idomeneus, and his companion Meriones; Nestor, and his sonnes Antilochus, and Thrasymedes; Vlysses; Menestheus the sonne of Petreus, Captaine of the Athenians: Diomedes the son of Tydeus, a man of singular courage; the wise and learned Palamedes, Æscalaphus and Ialmenus, the sons of Mars, who had sailed with the Argonautes; Philoctetes also the sonne of Paan, who had the arrowes of Hercules, without which Calchas said, that the Citie could not be taken; Aiax the sonne of Oileus, Peneleus, Thoas, Eumelus, Tyssandrus, Euripilus, Athamas, Sthenelus, Tlepolemus the son of Hercules; Podalyrius, and Machon, the sonnes of Æsculapius: Epeus, who is said to haue made the wooden horse, by which the towne was taken; and Protesilaus, who first leapt on shore, neglecting the Oracle that threatned death to him that landed first.

§. IV.

Of the Acts of the Gracians at the siege.

THese, and many other of lesse note, arriuing at Troy, found such sharpe entertainment, as might easily perswade them to thinke that the warre would be more than one yeeres worke. For in the first encounter, they lost Protesilaus, whom Hector slew, & many other, without any great harme done to the Troians: saue only that by their numbers of men, they won ground enough to incampe themselues in, as appeareth in Thucydides. The principall impediment which the Greekes found, was want of victuals, which grew vpon them by reason of their multitude, and the smalnesse of their vessels, wherin they could not carry necessaries for such an armie. Hereupon they were compelled to send some part of their men, to labour the ground in Chersonesse: others to rob vpon the Sea for the reliefe of the Campe. About the same time arose much contention betweene Agamemnon and Achilles about the bootie, whereof Agamemnon, as Generall, hauing first chosen for his part a captiue woman, and Achilles in the second place chosen for himselfe another, then Aiax, Vlysses, and so the rest of the chiefe Captaines in order: When the Soothsayer Calchas had willed that Agamemnons woman should be restored to her father Apollo's Priest, that so the Pestilence might cease, then did Agamemnon greatly rage, and say, that hee alone would not loose his part of the spoyle, but would either take that which had beene giuen to Achilles, or that which had fallen to Aiax, or to Vlysses. repelled the Troians very hardly. For in that fight Patroclus was loſt, and his body, with much contention recouered by his friends, was brought backe into the Campe: the armour of Achilles which he had put on, being torne from him by Hector. It was the manner of thoſe warres, hauing ſlaine a man, to ſtrip him and hale away his body, not reſtoring it without ranſome, if hee were one of marke. Of the vulgar, little reckoning was made: for they fought all on foot, ſlightly armed, and commonly followed the ſucceſſe of their Captaines; who rode not vpon horſes, but in Chariots, drawne by two or three horſes, which were guided by ſome truſtie followers of theirs, which draue vp and downe the field, as they were directed by the Captaines, who by the ſwiftneſſe of their horſes preſenting themſelues where neede required, threw firſt their Iauelins, and then alighting, fought on foot, with ſwords and battel-axes, retiring into the rankes of footmen; or elſe returning to their Chariots when they found cauſe, and ſo began againe with a new dart as they could get it, if their old were loſt, or broken. Their armes defenſiue were helmets, breſt-plates, bootes of braſſe, or other metall, and ſhields commonly of leather plated ouer. The offenſiue were ſwords and battel-axes at hand; and ſtones, arrowes or darts when they fought at any diſtance. The vſe of their Chariots (beſides the ſwiftneſſe) was to keepe them from wearineſſe, whereto the leaders were much ſubiect, becauſe of their armour, which the ſtrongeſt and ſtouteſt ware heauieſt: alſo that from them they might throw their Iauelins downewards, with the more violence. Of which weapon I find not that any carried more than one or two into the field: wherefore they were often driuen to returne to their tents for a new one when the old was gone. Likewiſe of armours they had little change or none; euery man (ſpeaking of the chiefe) carried his owne compleat, of which if any piece were loſt or broken, he was driuen to repaire it with the like, if he had any fitting, taken from ſome Captaine whom he had ſlaine, and ſtripped: or elſe to borrow of them that had by ſuch meanes gotten ſome to ſpare. Whereas therefore Achilles had loſt his armour which Hector (as is ſaid before) had taken from the body of Patroclus, he was faine to await the making of new, ere hee could enter the fight: whereof he became very deſirous, that he might reuenge the death of Patroclus his deare friend.

At this time Agamemnon reconciled himſelfe vnto Achilles, not onely reſtoring his concubine Briſeis, but giuing him very great gifts, and excuſing former matters as well as he might. In the next battell Achilles did ſo behaue himſelfe, that hee did not onely put the Troians to the worſt, but alſo ſlew the valiant Hector, whom (if Homer may herein be beleeued) he chaced three times about the wals of Troy. But great queſtion may bee made of Homers truth in this narration. For it is not likely that Hector would ſtay alone without the Citie (as Homer doth report of him) when all the Troians, were fled into it: nor that he could leape ouer the riuers of Xanthus and Simois, as hee muſt haue done in that flight: nor that the Troians perceiuing Hector in ſuch an extremitie, would haue forborne to open ſome of their gates and let him in. But this is reported onely to grace Achilles, who hauing (by what meanes ſoeuer) ſlaine the noble Hector, did not onely carrie away his dead body, as the cuſtome then was, but boring holes in his feet, and thruſting leatherne thongs into them, tyed him to his Chariot, and dragging him ſhamefully about the field, ſelling the dead body to his father Priamus for a very great ranſome. But his cruelty and couetouſneſſe were not long vnreuenged; for he was ſhortly after ſlaine with an arrow by Paris, as Homer ſayes, in the Scæan Gate; or as others, in the Temple of Apollo, whither he came to haue married Polyxena the daughter of Priamus, with whom he was too farre in loue, hauing ſlaine ſo many of her brethren; and his body was ranſomed (as Lycophron ſaith) at the ſelfe-ſame rate that Hectors was by him ſold for. Not long after this, Penthesilea Queene of the Amazons arriued at Troy; who after ſome proofe giuen of her valour, was ſlaine by Pyrrhus the ſonne of Achilles.

§. V.

Of the taking of Troy, the woodden Horſe, the Booke of Dares and Dyctis, the Colonies of the reliques of Troy.

Finally, after the death of many worthy perſons on each ſide, the Citie was taken by night, as all Writers agree: but whether by the treaſon of Æneas and Antenor; or by a woodden Horſe, as the Poets, and common fame (which

(which followed the Poets) haue deliuered, it is vncertaine. Some write that vpon one of the gates of Troy, called Scæa, was the image of a horſe, and that the Greekes entring by that gate, gaue occaſion to the report, that the Citie was taken by an artificiall horſe. It may well be that with ſome woodden engine, which they called an Horſe, they either did batter the wals, as the Romanes in after-times vſed to do with the Ramme: or ſcaled the wals vpon the ſudden, and ſo tooke the Citie. As for the hiding of men in the hollow body of a woodden horſe, it had been a deſperate aduenture, and ſeruing to no purpoſe. For either the Troians might haue perceiued the deceit, and ſlaine all thoſe Princes of Greece, that were incloſed in it (which alſo by ſuch as maintaine this report they are ſaid to haue thought vpon:) or they might haue left it a few dayes without the Citie (for it was vnlikely, that they ſhould the very firſt day both conclude vpon the bringing it into the towne, and breake downe their wals vpon the ſudden to doe it:) by which meanes they who were ſhut into it, muſt haue periſhed for hunger, if they had not by iſſuing forth vnſeaſonably diſcouered the inuention. Whereas further it is ſaid, that this horſe was ſo high and great, that it could not bee brought into the towne through any of the gates, and that therefore the Troians were faine to pull downe a part of their wall, to make way for it, through which breach the Greekes did afterwards enter; it is heereby manifeſt, that the incloſing of ſo many principall men was altogether needleſſe, conſidering that without their helpe there was way ſufficient for the armie, ſo that the ſurpriſing of any gate by them was now to no purpoſe.

Iohn Baptiſta Gramey in his Hiſtorie of Aſia, diſcourſing of this warre, ſaith that the Greekes did both batter the wals with a woodden engine, and were alſo let into the Citie by Antenor, at the Scæan gate: the townesmen ſleeping and drinking without feare or care, becauſe the fleete of the Grecians had hoiſted ſaile, and was gone the day before to the Ile of Tenedos, thereby to bring the Troians into ſecurity. That the City was betrayed, the bookes of Dares & Dictys muſt proue, which whether we now haue the ſame that were by them written, it may be ſuſpected; for ſurely they who haue made mention of theſe writers in ancient times, would not, as they did, haue followed the reports of Homer and others quite contradictorie in moſt points to theſe two authors, without once taking notice of the oppoſition, which they hauing ſerued in that warre made againſt the common report: had it not beene that either thoſe bookes were euen in thoſe times thought friuolous; or elſe contained no ſuch repugnancie to the other authors as now is found in them.

Alſo concerning the number of men ſlaine in this warre, which Dares and Dyctis ſay to haue beene about 600000. on the Troian ſide, and more than 800000. of the Greeks, it is a report meerely fabulous; for as much as the whole Fleete of the Greekes was reckoned by Homer, who extolled their armie and deedes as much as hee could, to be ſomewhat leſſe than 1200. ſaile, and the armie therein tranſported ouer the Greeke ſeas, not much aboue 100000. men, according to the rate formerly mentioned. But it is the common faſhion of men to extoll the deeds of their Ancients: for which cauſe both Homer magnified the Captaines of the Greekes that ſerued in the warre, and Virgil with others were as diligent in commending and extolling the Troians and their Citie, from which the Romanes deſcended. Yea, the Athenians long after in the warre which Xerxes the Perſian King made againſt all Greece, did not forbeare to vaunt of the great cunning which Meneſteus the ſon of Peteus had ſhewed, in marſhalling the Grecian army before Troy: whereupon, as if it had bin a matter of much conſequence, they were ſo proud, that they refuſed to yeeld vnto Gelon King of almoſt all Sicily, the Admiraltie of their Seas, notwithſtanding that hee promiſed to bring 200. good fighting ſhips, and 30000. men for their defence.

The like vanitie poſſeſſed many other Cities of Greece, and many Nations in theſe parts of the world, which haue ſtriuen to bring their deſcent from ſome of the Princes, that warred at Troy: all difficulties or vnlikelihoods in ſuch their Pedigree notwithſtanding. But thoſe Nations which indeede, or in moſt probabilitie came of the Troians, were the Albanes in Italy; and from them the Romans, brought into that Countrey by Æneas: the Venetians firſt ſeated in Padua, and the Country adioyning by Antenor: the Chaonians planted in Epirus by Helenus, the ſonne of King Priamus. To which Hellanicus addeth, that the poſteritie of Hector did reſemble ſuch of the Troians as were left, and reigned ouer them about Troy.

§. VI.

Of the distresses and dispersions of the Greekes returning from Troy.

COncerning the Greekes, they tasted as much miserie as they had brought vpon the Troians. For Thucydides notes, that by reason of their long abode at the siege, they found many alterations when they returned: so that many were driuen by their borderers from their ancient seats: many were expelled their Countries by faction: some were slaine anon after their arriuall: others were debarred from the Soueraignetie among the people, by such as had stayed at home. The cause of all which may seeme to haue beene the dispersion of the Armie, which, weakened much by the calamities of that long warre, was of little force to repell iniuries, being diuided into so many pieces vnder seuerall Commanders, not very well agreeing. For (besides other quarrels arising vpon the diuision of the bootie, and the like occasions) at the time when they should haue set saile, Agamemnon and his brother fell out, the one being desirous to depart immediately, the other to stay and performe some sacrifices to Minerua. Hereupon they fell to hot words, halfe the fleet remaining with Agamemnon, the rest of them sailed to the Ile of Tenedos, where when they arriued, they could not agree among themselues, but some returned backe to Agamemnon; others were dispersed, each holding his owne course. But the whole fleet was sore vexed with tempests: for Pallas (as Homer saith) would not be perswaded in haste.

They who returned safe were Nestor and Pyrrhus, whom Orestes afterwards slew: also Idomeneus and Philoctetes, who neuertheless, as Virgil tells, were driuen soone after to seeke new seats: Idomeneus among the Salentines, and Philoctetes at Petilia in Italie. Agamemnon likewise returned home, but was forthwith slaine by his wife, and by the adulterer Aegysthus, who for a while after vsurped his Kingdome. Menelaus wandring long vpon the Seas, came into Egypt, either with Helen, or (as may rather seeme) to fetch her. Vlysses, after ten yeares, hauing lost all his company, got home in poore estate, with much adoe recouering the mastership of his own house. All the rest either perished by the way, or were driuen into exile, and faine to seeke out new habitations.

Aiax the sonne of Oileus was drowned; Teucer fled into Cyprus; Diomedes to King Daunus, who was Lord of the Iapyges in Apulia; some of the Locrians were driuen into Africke, others into Italie, all the East part whereof was called Magna Graecia, by reason of so many Townes which the Greekes were driuen to erect vpon that coast. Finally, it appeares in Homer, that the Grecian Ladyes, whose husbands had beene at the warre of Troy, were wont to call it, The place where the Greekes suffered miserie, and the vnluckie Citie not to be mentioned. And thus much for Troy, and those that warred there: the ouerthrow of which Citie, as hath beene said, happened in the time of Hebdon Iudge of Israel, whom Samson after a variance or Inter regnum for certaine yeares succeeded.

CHAP. XV.

Of Samson, Eli, and Samuel.

§. I.

Of Samson.

2970. THE birth and acts of Samson are written at large in the 13. 14. 15. and 16. of Iudges; and therefore I shall not need to make a repetition thereof. But these things I gather out of that Storie. First, that the Angell of God forbad the wife of Manoah the mother of Samson, to drinke Wine or strong drinke, or to eate any vncleane meate, after she was conceiued with childe; because those strong liquors hinder the strength, and as it were wither and shrinke the childe in the mothers wombe. Though this were euen the counsell of God himselfe, and deliuered by his Angell, yet it seemeth that many women of this age haue not read,
